late spring when the managers—with empty theaters on their hands—bring out the plays which not even their professional optimism thinks well of. As a result the public does not even know when to come or when to go home. A few of its most eager members wander hopefully in around the first of September; a few of the most hardy are not driven away until the increasing dulness of the dramas makes even the seasonless movies seem either profound or entertaining; and thus the audience, which had straggled slowly in before the play had really begun, melts gradually away after all that matters has been finished. Perhaps the individual American playwright is too much addicted to the "snappy" beginning and the epigrammatic curtain line, but the institution which supports him could profit much by learning a little of his technique. If only the curtain would rise promptly when the play is ready to begin and descend with dramatic finality when it is done!

This year Mr. Arthur Hopkins, generally one of the most interesting and intrepid of our managers, rings up his curtain at the Plymouth Theater with a highly sentimental comedy-drama of back-stage life which tells the not very fresh story of a low comedian who went wrong when he reached Broadway but who was redeemed by the love of his faithful wife. "Burlesque," as the play is called, struggles hard to achieve a picturesque effect sufficient to veil the banality of its theme, and it is sprinkled with cynical wisecracks intended to give a bitter coating to what is in reality a sugar pill, but though the latter are frequently pungent with a typically American wit they cannot disguise the fact the play itself is feebly and stalely sentimental. One of the characters says of a certain tank-town snooper that she is the kind who would ask if Klaw and Erlanger were ever really married, and the soubrette, returned from a rather difficult party staged by some town folks, remarks: "Girls like us shouldn't mix with really nice people—they're too rough." But though these lines are good enough, they lie upon the surface of a play keyed to an entirely different mood, and they are uttered by characters so sweetly correct in all their actions as to make the second of the two seem less satiric than merely platitudinous. Salty dialogue may often be the result of a flash of insight or of a momentary grip upon the essentials of a situation and it may be written by a man who is not, yet at least, capable of the sustained steadiness of vision necessary to present an interpretation of life in any form whose main outlines are not conventional. Hence it is that there are a dozen American playwrights who can put into the mouths of their characters genuinely witty comments for one who can conceive and work out a play in which the thesis and the characterization are one-tenth as pungent, as searching, or as original as the best bits of his dialogue. Perhaps these bits represent his real self, but he is unable to detach it from the complex mass of conventional ideas and sentiments in which it is entangled. The wise-crack may be the beginning of wisdom, but it is no more than that, and "Burlesque" is but a dreary expanse of conventional sentiment illuminated by a few epigrams which carry a snap in their tails.

Mr. Hopkins is not usually content to follow in the footsteps of his competitors, but upon this occasion he has brought the odium of comparison upon himself. Since he probably had "Broadway" in mind when he decided to produce "Burlesque" he can hardly complain if the spectators have it in mind too, and in the bottom of his heart he probably knows that it is not as good. Nor is its inferiority due solely to the fact that the earlier play took the first bloom of novelty off the back-stage setting. For all its factitiousness "Broadway" had a rapidity, a verve, and a vulgar energy which the new piece, in spite of all the smooth production and good acting which have been granted it, fails to achieve. Its lines are quite as good and there is one scene, that at the end of the second act, where the intoxicated ex-husband unexpectedly meets the man who is to marry his former wife and expresses his feelings by falling into a hysterical jazz-wedding dance reminiscent of some Burlesque "specialty," in which it comes nearer to the real thing than any scene in "Broadway" did; but the play as a whole is less fast, less melodramatically tense, and altogether less remarkable as a tour de force than that from which it is more or less frankly imitated. As popular plays go, it is better than the average and is by general consent the best play and the first hit of the new season, but that speaks more for the season than for it. It is trembling upon the edge of a great success, but whether or not it achieves it will probably depend in a great measure upon whether or not any one of the five or six other plays which deal with life behind the scenes are quick enough and good enough to steal the thunder which even in the case of "Burlesque" is at least borrowed.

Rosalie Stewart's revue, "A La Carte" (Martin Beck Theater), begins the season very brightly for the species of performance it represents. "Blood Money," a melodrama by George Middleton (Hudson Theater), is pretty certain to run long. The mystery is fresh and interesting, though the element of love, introduced toward the end through Phyllis Povah, is handled more tritely than it needed to be.

Madame Sun's Withdrawal

WE reprint from the China Weekly Review of July 30 the statement made by Madame Sun Yat-sen (Sun Soong Ching-ling) at Hankow, July 14, three days before her complete withdrawal from active political work in the Kuomintang:

I feel that it is necessary at this time to explain as a member of the Central Executive Committee of the Kuomintang that we have reached the point where definition is necessary and where some members of the party executive are so defining the principles and policies of Dr. Sun Yat Sen that they seem to me to do violence to Dr. Sun's ideas and ideals. Feeling thus I must disassociate myself from active participation in the carrying out of these new policies of the party.

Today we face a crisis and we must probe searchingly into fundamental questions for fundamental answers. We must answer the question of the nature of the revolution in general, of the Chinese revolution in particular, whether it is to be a mere political or a social revolution, and what changes are involved.

In the last analysis, all revolution must be social revolution, based upon fundamental changes in society; otherwise it is not a revolution, but merely a change of government.

To guide us in the Chinese revolution, Dr. Sun has given us his Three Principles and his Three Policies. It is the Third Principle, that of the livelihood of the people, that is at stake at the present time, the principle that answers the questions of fundamental social changes in China.

The Third Principle

The Third Principle was held by Dr. Sun to be basic in our revolution. In this principle we find his analysis of social values and the place of the labor and peasant classes defined. These classes become the basis of our strength in our struggle to overthrow imperialism, and cancel the unequal treaties that enslave us, and effectively unify the country. They are the new pillars for the building of a new, free China. Without their support, the Kuomintang, as a revolutionary party, becomes weak, chaotic, and illogical in its social platform; without their support, political issues are vague. If we adopt any policy that weakens these supports, we shake the very foundations of our party, betray the masses, and are falsely loyal to our leader.

Today there is much talk of policy. Dr. Sun devised Three Policies, which he decided were the only means by which his Three Principles could be carried out. But today it is being said that policies must be changed to fit the needs of the time. There is some truth in this statement, but change of policy must be settled at the point where it becomes a reversal, so that a revolutionary party ceases to be revolutionary and becomes counter-revolutionary, operating under the banner of revolution, but actually working in support of the old structure which the party was founded to alter.

Differences in the Party

At the present time four critical issues. Theoretical and practical differences have arisen between various elements of the Kuomintang. Solutions are suggested. It is because I feel that the carrying out of some of these suggested solutions would destroy the strength of the party and delay the success of the revolution, that I must speak. These solutions seem to me a betrayal of policy which would alienate and suppress the elements upon which our strength largely depends and for whom the party was brought into being. Such a policy, I feel, is suicide for the party.

This new policy is proposed as a corrective to mistakes that have been made. But the corrective seems to me more serious than the mistakes.

It is time for honesty and courage. There have been mistakes, but the fact that some of us are unwilling to face is that we are at least as responsible for many of these mistakes as those whom we would now hold completely at fault. If we look back honestly at the past months in Wuhan, examine our words and decisions unflinchingly, we cannot evade this responsibility. Speeches, statements are recorded in the history of the party. But now we would shirk the responsibility, shift it to other shoulders.

Yes. There have been mistakes, but we must face the fact that they are not only others' mistakes; they are our own as well. We have helped to make them; we must correct them. Moreover, for revolutionary mistakes, revolutionary solutions must be found. We must not betray the people. We have built up in them a great hope. They have placed in us a great faith. To that faith, we owe our final allegiance.

Dr. Sun came from the people. He has told me a great deal about his early days. He came from the peasantry. His father was a farmer and the people in his district were farmers.

Dr. Sun was poor. Not until he was fifteen years old did he have shoes for his feet, and he lived in a hilly region where it is not easy to be a barefoot boy. His family, until he and his brothers were grown, lived almost from hand to mouth, in a hut. As a child he ate the cheapest food—not rice, for rice was too dear. His main nourishment was sweet potatoes.

A Revolutionary from Youth

Many times Dr. Sun has told me that it was in those early days, as a poor son of a poor peasant family, that he became a revolutionary. He was determined that the lot of the Chinese peasant should not continue to be so wretched, that little boys in China should have shoes to wear and rice to eat. For this ideal, he gave forty years of his life.

Yet today the lot of the Chinese peasant is even more wretched than in those days when Dr. Sun was driven by his great sense of human wrongs into a life of revolution. And today men, who profess to follow his banner, talk of classes, think in terms of "revolution" that would virtually disregard the sufferings of those millions of poverty-stricken peasants of China.

Today also we hear condemnation of the peasant and labor movement as a recent, alien product. This is false. Twenty, thirty years ago, Dr. Sun was thinking and speaking in terms of a revolution that would change the status of the Chinese peasant. In his early twenties, he wrote to Li Hung-chang, petitioning for social and economic reforms. In 1911, he wrote an article on the agrarian question in China, printed in Geneva in The Socialist, in which he said that the basis of social and economic transformations in China is an agrarian revolution. All his life, this was one of the big goals he had in mind. Everything he planned he saw as means to the betterment of the life of the Chinese masses. In 1915, when we were in Japan, he urged Liao Chung-kai to study more deeply into the peasant and labor problems.

It is only in the past few years, after four decades of struggle, that these plans for a revolution of the people have begun to bear fruit. I remember clearly the first All-Kwangtung Peasants Conference, in Canton, in July, 1924. Then for the first time, we saw the people of China, who must be her new strength, coming to participate in the revolution. From all the districts of Kwangtung, the peasants came, many of them walking miles and miles, barefooted, to Canton. They were ragged, tattered. Some carried baskets and poles. I remember I was deeply moved.

THERE are two outstanding current books of which it can be literally said: "More exciting than fiction—and selling faster." They are Trader Horn (in its 40th thousand) and The Story of Philosophy (in its 172nd thousand).

The unprecedented popularity of both is a tribute to the wide-ranging intellectual curiosity of Americans, for Trader Horn records stark bodily adventure in the early days of African exploration—while The Story of Philosophy "humanizes" the world's great lovers of wisdom—an adventure for the mind.

More than that, William Allen White ordered ten copies of God Got One Vote for his friends; that is the unimpeachable tribute.

Concerning the personality of W. L. River, author of Death of a Young Man, we have been singularly reticent. Not only did Mr. River request this [illegible] he has [illegible] injected upon it, in the face of many tempting invitations for publicity. He prefers to let his novel speak for itself.

After reading Death of a Young Man, a distinguished novelist telephoned The Inner Sanctum for information about the author. We finally wired him this information to dispatch this night letter in reply:

On Friday, September 30, Will Durant returns from Europe, and we shall celebrate the event by publishing on that date his new book, Transition, A Mental Autobiography.

Transition is "a compliance of things past," set down con amore, a chronicle of changing faiths, an intimate "[illegible]" in which the historian and lover of wisdom looks at life and love. Transition is so frank, so movingly written, so charged with the personality of Will Durant, that The Inner Sanctum cannot take a detached critical view of it.

—ESSANDESS

Dr. Sun was moved also. When we reached home, he said to me: "This is the beginning of the success of the revolution," and he told me again the part the oppressed people of China must play in their own salvation.

All these years, his purpose was clear. But today we talk of recent foreign influence. Was Sun Yat-sen—the leader who was voicing the agrarian revolution for China when Russia was still under the heel of the Czar—was he the tool of foreign scheming?

Not True Followers of Dr. Sun

Dr. Sun's policies are clear. If certain leaders of the party do not carry them out consistently, then they are no longer Dr. Sun's true followers, and the party is no longer a revolutionary party, but merely a tool in the hands of this or that militarist. It will have ceased to be a living force working for the future welfare of the Chinese people, and will have become a machine, the agent of oppression, a parasite fattening on the present enslaving system.

We face a serious crisis. But it is more of a crisis for us as individuals than for China as a country. Whether the present Kuomintang at this moment rises to the height of its ideals and courageously finds a revolutionary corrective for its mistakes, or whether it slumps into the shamefulness of reaction and compromise, the Three Principles of Dr. Sun Yat-sen will conquer in the end. Revolution in China is inevitable.

At the moment I feel that we are turning aside from the Tsungli's policy of leading and strengthening the people. Therefore I must withdraw until wiser policies prevail.

There is no despair in my heart for the revolution. My disheartenment is only for the path into which some of those who had been leading the revolution have strayed.

ONE LEGIONNAIRE led a duck by a string down the Champs Elysees; Oklahoma's delegation included feathered Indians in full war paint, and the Texans appeared as cowboys in ten-gallon hats—while the French movie fans shouted "Tom Mix" from the sidewalks. The girls carried guns, and marched abreast the boys; children born long after the war carried flags; a six-foot-six drum major from Illinois, wearing a twelve-inch shako, tossed his baton high in the air to the delight of the Parisians; the Iowans carried corn-stalks, and the Michiganders wore baggy zouave trousers. A dozen gorgeously attired brass bands, such as Paris never saw before in peace or war, blared out "Madelon," "Tipperary," "Hail, hail, the gang's all here," and "Over There" with the indiscriminate enthusiasm of a Rotary convention. The little band of French wounded who marched solemnly between the uproarious State delegations must have wondered a bit at its football air, but the American Legion parade in Paris was undoubtedly a good show and it expressed the light-hearted spirit with which America went to war. The Legionnaires, for the moment at least, forgot the dirt and blood, the sweat of the long, dusty roads, the endless lines of ambulances, and the steady ratatat of machine-guns. They remembered, primarily, or so it seemed, the year that they had been released from the ordinary responsibilities of civilian life.

THE OVERFLOWING GOOD HUMOR of the Legionnaires won Paris in 1927, just as the doughboys won Paris and a thousand villages in 1917 and 1918. "They are just kids," the French said then, and doubtless they repeat it today, though the kids have thinner hair and are thicker in the middle. There are, however, even in Paris, signs of a sobering recognition of the awful meaning of the war. Rupert Hughes's article, There's Only One Kind of Americanism, printed in the Legion Monthly for July, marked an official discouragement of the excesses which have disgraced many Legion posts. And the resolution sponsored by Representative Hamilton Fish, Jr., which seems destined to pass the Legion convention, also marks a new and maturer sense of responsibility. "Resolved," it reads, > that the Commission on World Peace and Foreign Relations of the American Legion recommend to the national convention in Paris the acceptance in principle by the United States of the offer made by the French Foreign Minister "to renounce war as an instrument of policy until all known means of diplomacy, arbitration, and judicial settlement have been exhausted," and with adequate reservations safeguarding our adherence to the Monroe Doctrine and other essential commitments.

SO MR. McADOO also chooses not to be a candidate for the Presidency? Well, nothing in his political career has pleased us more than the manner of his leaving it. He was, of course, completely out of the race long before he made this gesture, but he should have all the praise accruing to him for it. Yet to us from the beginning it has seemed that nobody so closely associated with the moral wreck of the Wilson Administration would, or should, be nominated for the highest office in the land. While Mr. McAdoo's relations with the railway brotherhoods gave evidence of liberalism and he was one of the warmest supporters of Mr. Wilson's "radical" doctrines in 1912, he was a party in war time to the crushing of free speech and to the harassing of individuals who dared to think for themselves. Nor has he ever found voice to denounce our rascally treatment of alien property. Indubitably an able man, and a shrewd and extraordinarily ambitious politician, he has now placed himself in a position to influence his party far more than he could have done as a pretender for the nomination.

FOR GOVERNOR SMITH Mr. McAdoo's withdrawal in the interest, as he says, of principles, progress, and policies instead of men, clears the road to the Democratic nomination in a remarkable way. There will, of course, be plenty like Senator Harris of Georgia to demand that the Governor follow Mr. McAdoo's example and eliminate himself also, so that a united party can pick another certain loser like ex-Governor Cox or John W. Davis. But we expect "Al" to do nothing of the kind. The plum seems to be so certain to fall into his lap that it is almost impossible to conceive of his quitting now. The opposition to him faces the dreadful handicap that there is not a single other outstanding personality in the Democratic Party upon which it could unite. The drys do not want him and neither do the bigots who still think that to be a New Yorker

Governor is really to send the Pope to the White House. But who is their candidate? To such depths has the Democratic Party fallen that the only other men who can be suggested are former-Secretary of Agriculture Meredith, ex-Governor Silzer of New Jersey, and Governor Donahey of Ohio, second-rank men who are known only because of their offices. There is no dry Democrat in the Senate who stands out by his ability. So the Democracy faces the dilemma of having to choose "Al" Smith or some relatively unknown person. In the years since the last convention not a single new figure has appeared in its ranks with evidence of the qualities of leadership. What a commentary upon our politics that simple statement is.

HOME-MADE REPUBLICS do not always stay tied to mother's apron-strings. There's the case of ungrateful Panama. It was Theodore Roosevelt's enthusiastic and protective and immediate recognition of the Panaman revolutionaries in 1903 which established the former Columbian province of Panama as a sovereign, independent nation, entitled, later, to membership in the League of Nations. The purpose of its "sovereignty" was to transfer to the United States control of the Canal Zone. The purpose of the "independence" was to camouflage the fact that the United States was grabbing territory for which it did not want to pay Columbia's price. It was one of the first of our adventures in the new technique of imperialism. In the rude, old days imperialist nations openly seized territory and ran up their own national flags. The new technique evades such open evidence of subjugation. It leaves the shell of national independence, while controlling the revenues and the gendarmerie. In Panama we subsidize a group of sectarians, at the rate of $250,000 a year, to maintain a docile republic in the neighborhood of our Canal Zone.

BUT PANAMA REFUSES to stay docile. It wants its toys to work; it wants real sovereignty and real independence. The canal treaty is a peculiar instrument: by it Panama > grants to the United States all the rights, powers and authority which the United States would possess if it were sovereign in the territory, to the entire exclusion of the exercise by Panama of such sovereign rights, power, and authority.

A strange phrasing, indeed. Mr. Taft, who composed it, once explained that > to the Anglo-Saxon mind a titular sovereignty is like what Governor Allen of Oregon characterized as a form of words, but to the Spanish or Latin mind, poetic and sentimental, enjoying [illegible] dwelling much on name and form, [illegible] important.

In recognition of which he agreed to use Panama stamps, surcharged "Canal Zone" in the territory wherein the United States was to act as if sovereign but not to be sovereign, and laid the basis for a series of disputes which still continue. Eusebio Morales, former Foreign Minister of Panama, revived the issue this year and aggravated it when he referred to the dispute before the League of Nations, and suggested it as fit subject for arbitration. Secretary Kellogg, ostrich-like, immediately announced that there was no dispute; and, after a period sufficient for a thorough-going exchange of telegrams, Panama's Government agreed that there was no dispute. Of course, there was and is a dispute—several disputes—about Panama's right to levy taxes and apply all sorts of legislation in the Canal Zone. The treaty which Mr. Kellogg sought to negotiate with Panama last year was withdrawn before it came to a vote in the Panama Parliament; it was too unpopular, because it made Panama too frankly subservient to the United States. The new technique of imperialism, like the old, has its drawbacks. Phrases meaningless at birth acquire reality in the eyes of later generations. There is no wholly safe way of empire.

THERE WILL BE MORE about Manchuria in the newspapers, and Japan will need a steady hand at the helm if she is to emerge without serious bloodshed. For there is hardly anything on her islands more important to Japan today than the South Manchurian Railway, the great artery through which she controls the northeastern provinces of China. It brings her food—wheat and millet and soy beans; it brings her coal, and even some iron; it yields financial revenue, and gives Japan her dominant position in Northern Asia. It is at once her buttress against Russia and her wedge into China. The Tanaka Government has pursued a wavering course regarding China. It came into power in April demanding strong action, but it won Chinese favor by refusing to join Britain in bullying; then it veered again, and landed troops in the sacred province of Shantung; in August it announced their imminent withdrawal. But always all Japanese governments have clung to domination of Manchuria. Recently Japan reiterated certain of the infamous Twenty-One Demands of 1916 to reinforce her control of that region. She has demanded the right to open more consulates in remote and sparsely settled parts of Manchuria, and seeks to veto Chinese projects to build railways roughly paralleling the South Manchurian. But this is not 1916; the tide of Nationalist feeling has swept far in advance of the Nationalist armies. There were anti-Japanese riots in Mukden, and anti-Japanese posters appeared overnight on the mud walls of scores of Manchurian villages. For the present the outbreaks appear sporadic, but the volcanic forces beneath them are likely to break into more serious eruptions.

IT IS GOOD NEWS that as a result of the activities of the director of the budget there is likely to be a reduction in the number of reserve officers from 103,000 to 70,000. With the director it is merely a question of finance. For all who do not desire to see the United States become thoroughly militarized anything which will cut down the number of army propagandists is to be greeted with acclaim. Before the war to end war, there was hardly a reserve officer; at 103,000 the officers' reserve corps is about five times the size of the entire regular army from 1870 to 1900, and only a little smaller than the regular army of today. The War Department seems to have sought to make these reserve officers the foci of military, disguised as patriotic propaganda, as the Kaiser did in the old Germany. From the point of view even of the regular officers the experiment has had some unsatisfactory features. According to press reports the reserve officers' camps this summer have been anything but encouraging, there being a great desire to play and none too much to work. More than that, in the reserve officers' associations has grown up a new military machine with great political power, since its members are in civilian life and free to lobby or pull the political strings at home, which is beginning to menace the supremacy of the regulars, who have also been having some difficulty with the National Guard machine. Congress at its next session would do well to limit the War Department to a still smaller figure of reserve officers and to lop off at least 2,500 regular officers for whom it has difficulty in finding work, so over-officered is the army.

"FEDERAL, STATE, COUNTY AND CITY government in spots in America during the past decade has been as corrupt and unrepresentative as that under the Czar of Russia!" This is no pesky uplifter speaking; it is John W. H. Crim, former Assistant Attorney General of the United States. "Who would have believed," he asks, "that the time would have come in this country when federal, State, county, and city employees would graft from the liquor and allied traffics to the extent of $25,000,000 a day?" One answer is A. Bruce Bielaski, retired chief of the "undercover" service, who discovered, among other things, that there were "flagrant cases of local authorities cooperating not with us but with the bootleggers." A second answer would be Major Chester P. Mills, until recently Federal Administrator of the New York district. Prohibition as he described it a few days ago is a new "party spoils system" in which the government agents were so dishonest that even his own office harbored many of the chief violators of the law. Another man who might agree with John W. H. Crim is Seymour W. Lowman, ultra-dry, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury in charge of prohibition enforcement. He has found so many "incompetent and crooked men in the service" that some days his "arm gets tired signing orders of dismissal." In the same tenor is the report of the New York World from Washington that "upward of 1,000 prohibition agents have been dismissed from the federal service since the enactment of prohibition." General Andrews compiled the total of dismissals between 1919 and February, 1926, for bribery, extortion, collusion, conspiracy, embezzlement, perjury, or subornation of perjury, false pretenses, and other serious offenses—875 in that period.

A PLEASANT AND EASY FAITH is growing up in some quarters that the improvement in communications and the growth in the use of the super-power will curb congestion in great cities and scatter industry into smaller towns and cities. Organized labor in many trades is skeptical of this garden-city Utopia. It knows by experience that smaller towns and cities are harder to organize and keep organized than the larger centers. When printing establishments and various branches of the needle trades leave New York, Chicago, and other great cities they go not to seek the aesthetic advantages of green fields and visible skies but open-shop conditions and low wages. A movement of industry out of the big cities must in the long run be in the interest of both employers and workers, but it presents immediate problems that require study.

NECKWEAR-MAKING is the latest industry to try to escape union standards by flight. In New York City this is an industry which has been saved by organization from sweatshop conditions. Lately the growth of homework has threatened what the workers had won. After long negotiations the union made an agreement with the association providing for a transfer of all home work to factories—a transfer to be completed in eighteen months. Promptly four firms resigned from the association and moved to New Haven and Glens Falls, where the union is carrying on a strike against them. Troy, New York, wants more of these runaway shops and one of its big manufacturers has written to New York celebrating the advantages of that open-shop city with plenty of cheap labor and police protection. Not the least interesting part of the story is that one of the runaway manufacturers is conspicuous for his support of Jewish charities. Charity is one of those things which it is more blessed to give than to receive. At least it often looks cheaper and more satisfactory to the giver than justice. But the history of some of these runaway industries has proved that the attempt to operate under open-shop conditions is not always as profitable as it appears in advance. Nevertheless the task of organizing the small towns and cities is one of the biggest jobs before the unions and we wish them luck.

STUDENT LEADERS of the collegiate Young Men's Christian Association have won a striking victory for youth and youth's dreams. As a protest against the subordination of the college organization to the sedentary Home Division of the national Y. M. C. A. the entire national student committee, with its secretaries, resigned. Fearing secession and facing the prospect of an independent college movement, the older men on the General Board of the Y. M. C. A. have surrendered to the rebels on every major point. The surrender has still to be confirmed by the National Council of the organization, but there is little prospect of a veto. In the future the students will have their own department of the Y. M. C. A., elect their own paid representatives, and have the power to add any items they desire to the budget of college work. It means more life, more freedom, more variety in college work. The Nation pointed out last year that the control of college Y. M. C. A.s by the conservative business men who dominate the city Y. M. C. A. was deadening and incongruous. The autonomous college associations are now free to live whether their gospel still has power in this [illegible] to become a living force on the American campus.

THE MOTION-PICTURE INDUSTRY, like the Boston Herald, thinks that the Sacco-Vanzetti case is "closed." It so informed theater-owners in a bulletin recently sent out which said: "The case is closed on the screen, voluntarily. Executives of the news-reel companies were unanimous in their decision to eliminate all reference to the matter in their releases. . . . Films in the vault will be burned." This is what one would expect of the film peddlers; they deal only in treacle and tripe. Nothing that could possibly offend "authority" or "respectability" can pass their censorship. True, they will [illegible] their bellies to every "preparedness" pap for the war and navy departments, but when it comes to a trifling matter like justice for individuals they shut up like clams. It happens not to be in the power of either the Boston Herald or the motion-picture industry to "close" the Sacco-Vanzetti case. As Romain Rolland says in an impressive letter printed on another page, the issue now belongs to the world—and to history. And history has a habit of reopening just those issues which contemporary tyranny and cowardice are most anxious to "close."

The Tariff Reckoning Begins

THE tariff war now looming between the United States and France comes as a shock, we suppose, to the bulk of our business men. They, like most of our countrymen, have long fancied themselves above and beyond all other countries, especially since the World War. The greatest, richest, and most powerful nation could do just what it pleased—let the devil take the hindmost. So we have persistently built a Chinese wall around our country and calmly assured the rest of the world that it would have to buy our goods but that we would take from it only such as could climb over the customs barriers and find a paying market here. Our effrontery has not stopped there. We have demanded of our late allies that they pay the debts they owe us for advances made during the war, and when they have asked us how they could do this if we excluded them from our markets by means of the high tariff, we have simply thumbed our noses at them, told them that was their lookout, and that nonetheless we should exact the last farthing of the settlements that we had arrived at.

Even [illegible] We have deliberately sent a flock of agents abroad to pry into the secrets of foreign manufacturers in order to judge [illegible] and then calmly planned to raise the tariff in certain cases in order to make sure of excluding their goods. This we did by deliberately deluding the foreign manufacturers and making them think that if they only opened their books to our governmental spies we might lower the tariff. To an amazing degree foreigners have permitted our agents to do this—often the spies were incompetent, sometimes, it is said, corrupt, and always their manners were to seek. Were any foreign countries to send similar spies into this country they would be held up at Ellis Island and sent back by the next steamer. We cannot conceive of an American manufacturer allowing agents of the French or German [illegible] his trade secrets.

Naturally our procedure has roused bitter antagonism. Now, however, the Argentine Republic, already outraged by the Sacco-Vanzetti case, and by our tariff upon her frozen meats, has sent word that the tariff investigators whom the United States proposed to dispatch to look into the costs of raising corn and flaxseed in the Argentine will not be welcome and had better stay at home. They do not propose to quibble with this [illegible] and are not deluded by the prospect of selling more corn than usual to the United States this year because of our limited corn crop. They know what the European countries have now learned, that a visit from these American spies is apt to mean higher, not lower American tariffs. So our best possible customer in South America is again offended. There has been an informal boycott in the Argentine against our products for months past which has already cost American manufacturers millions of dollars. What more natural than that it should join Sweden and Switzerland in refusing to permit American agents to pry into the affairs of their manufacturers or farmers?

On top of all this comes now the levying by France of maximum duties upon American goods, and the wails from our manufacturers and our State Department are positively comic. Where is our boasted sportsmanship? Are we not good enough sports to quaff from the chalice we so roughly commend to the lips of others? No, indeed. Our government hastens to explain that what is really back of France's attitude is merely another insidious effort to compel us to reduce still further the debt that France owes to us. So Washington threatens in return that if France does not yield we shall immediately increase all duties upon French goods by 50 per cent, using for that purpose a hitherto unused section of the tariff act, whose character is sufficiently indicated by the fact that it is called the "retaliatory section." What France offers is to reduce the maximum rates under the new tariff by 50 per cent, pending a definite agreement, thus giving America a rate only twice as high as that given to Germany under the new treaty just negotiated by France. Several years ago the French gave us a temporary intermediate schedule in the hope that while that lasted Washington would listen to reason and show that it wished to encourage French exports to the United States by lowering the tariffs which block the entrance of French goods. How sublimely naive! The United States had no such idea. It seeks to keep out French exports, not to welcome them.

What France would like is a commercial treaty with strong reciprocity clauses, but if we granted special favors to France then all the other countries which have treaties with us containing most-favored-nation clauses would be in a position to demand similar low rates, and then we should find ourselves reducing the tariff all along the line! So the State Department points out that France asks a reduction of the tariff, which Congress alone can sanction. Anyone who thinks that the Republicans will consider opening up the tariff question on the eve of a Presidential campaign, in which they expect to purchase the election as so often heretofore by contributions fried out of the tariff beneficiaries, has surely taken leave of his senses. Sentimentalists may say that this is a pretty shabby way to treat our beloved Gallic ally for whom we were shedding blood so freely only nine years ago. But what is that eternal friendship we swore upon two hundred thousand altars and forums, when it comes to lining the pockets of the business men who say that they could not stay in business, let alone pay campaign subscriptions, if the government did not use the law-making machinery to insure them the profits they consider adequate? Of course, it is embarrassing to let the wicked Germans, whom we were so anxious to exterminate nine years ago, walk off with all our business with France, that is where the shoe pinches and why the Administration is so angry at France. Men whose export business to France is wiped out will not feel like shelling out campaign funds. Is it surprising that Washington points out that this same "retaliatory section" goes so far as to give the President the right to "issue a further proclamation that such articles of said country [in this case, France] as he shall deem the public interest may require shall be excluded from importation into the United States?" That, Washington [illegible] should make France behave—although it will certainly not make American [illegible]

We have dwelt at length upon this episode because it affords so perfect an example of the way that tariffs make for ill-will and even actual hostilities among nations. Who can tell, if Washington does not come to its senses and find a way out, how far this breach with France may not take us? The present governmental policies of the United States are planned as if determined to make us the most hated and despised nation in the world. We are antagonizing one country after another by our purse-proud arrogance and our assumption that we are the chosen of the earth and can impose our will upon all others as we see fit. And we are doing it at a moment when, as Romain Rolland points out in another column of this issue of The Nation, we have forfeited through the execution of Sacco and Vanzetti what remaining moral authority we had. If we continue in the same manner for a few years more we shall occupy the place in the dislike of the world which Germany was made to hold during the war years.

Foregoing Theft

THE British and American governments have recently concluded an agreement for the reciprocal release by each to the citizens of the other of part of the sequestrated property held since war days. We have urged the release of all such property, because we do not favor theft, public or private. But the agreement itself, however commendable the object, will in practice benefit British subjects alone, and not American citizens. This seems to be the only type of agreement our present administration of the State Department seems capable of concluding with Great Britain. The subject-matter itself, dealing with stolen property, is repulsive to right-thinking people, and that may explain the desire to dispose of it, even in part.

In the partial and hesitant release of sequestrated property, many technical rules have developed. For example, an American woman—like a British woman—who married a German, Austrian, or Hungarian, acquired thereby enemy nationality and had her property sequestrated — in the United States, if she resided abroad; in England, wherever she resided. Under certain circumstances, the property of American-born women has been released by the United States. England has not been so "generous." She has, with minor exceptions, confiscated—euphemistically called "liquidated" or "charged"—all property belonging to German married women regardless of their original nationality. Under the present agreement, in return for the United States undertaking to release the property of British-born women who had married Germans, or other ex-enemies, and reacquired their British nationality prior to June 2, 1926, Great Britain—not the dominions or colonies—agrees to return the property of American-born women married to Germans, who reacquired their American nationality prior to June 2, 1926. Not only does this cover very few American women, but the agreement expressly provides that it shall not apply to property which the British Government has already "liquidated." Inasmuch as there is very little "unliquidated" property left, American-born women will derive practically no benefit from the agreement. In this respect we note the same adroit hand that negotiated the agreement practically throwing overboard the American neutrality claims against Great Britain, and with it the rights of neutrals everywhere, which must result necessarily in a new increase in naval armament.

The rest of the enemy-property agreement merely states the respective positions of the two governments on recognition of debt claims, certificates of stock, and corporate property owned by non-"enemies." It promises no further releases. When it is realized that the British Government confiscated outright, after the armistice, all shares of stock in British corporations owned by persons who were Germans, Austrians, Hungarians, or Bulgarians prior to January 10, 1920, regardless of who may subsequently have come into possession of the shares—including the property of servant girls, of holders of British consols, even of "enemy"-owned certificates of stock in American corporations when deposited in British banks—the revolutionary attack on the institution of private property and the folly of foreigners who invest in British securities or British territories will be appreciated. Yet, strangely, it is Great Britain which is shocked and belligerent because of the Russian confiscation of foreign-owned property in violation of international law, and on the other hand seeks to influence the United States to confiscate ex-"enemy" private property in order to put us into the same precarious boat with herself and thus prevent us from reaping those advantages which accrue from financial integrity and decency. In Great Britain and France it is the conservatives who have most ardently supported confiscation of other people's private property, yet thunder against "radicals" who challenge their wisdom. That confiscation is a two-edged sword, undermining law and security everywhere, these alleged statesmen do not appear to know.

And our incompetent State Department does not yet seem to realize the British policy with respect to our sequestrated property, though, fortunately, the Treasury Department does. It will be interesting to observe what further agreements the State Department may conclude with Great Britain for the surrender of American rights and of world interests.

Through Sport to Peace?

COMPETITIVE games, particularly in the international field, have been hailed now and again as a great "moral equivalent" for war. Whenever an American meets an Englishman, Frenchman, or a loyal citizen of some other country, in some difficult game of skill like tennis, polo, or peanut-pushing, it is the occasion for people to start talking about cementing the bonds of international friendship. Discounting the extreme weakness of such bonds at vital moments in past history, it would still be interesting to know how much truth there is in this hypothesis today. There is a corollary to this nice theory which maintains that if nations and peoples play games long enough, they will gradually become accustomed to the standards of fair play and sportsmanship in their treatment of their opponents and will then carry these ideals over to their diplomatic relations. It is thus only necessary to have a sufficient number of international contests to set two hemispheres well on the way to world peace.

If this be true considerable progress should have been made toward friendship between the United States and France at the recent Davis Cup tennis matches—which the French won—and Anglo-American relations should have been improved noticeably by the international polo cup competition, in which the American team was victorious. Thousands witnessed these contests and the newspapers were generous with publicity. Even the polo games were trumpeted on the front page of the newspapers—the staid old New York Times leading the way. Yet, we suspect that a great many of the spectators agreed with "F. P. A.," who said in his column in the New York World: "It is the general feeling among us American sports that those British polo players are ambassadors of good will, cementing the bonds, etc.; and that Lacoste and Cochet play too well for any use."

Whether or not this was the crowd's sentiment we hesitate to say. It is, at least, the conclusion to which an uninformed person might have been led by the carefully placed applause. A week later, in the national singles matches, when French, Spanish, Japanese, and American players were again in competition, the applause was as judiciously administered. In the Hennessey-Cochet match, which unexpectedly turned into a nip-and-tuck affair, with Indiana's Mr. Hennessey winning, the sympathy of the audience was quite apparent—even to Cochet. Thunderous applause greeted each point gained by the American youth, while his every error prompted an ominous gasp from the spectators; Cochet's brilliant plays received a scattered and perfunctory hand-clapping. Yet tennis is the gentleman's game par excellence and the people who watch it supposedly share its gallantry. To say that the audience was malicious would hardly be fair; they were only acting naturally—as naturally as did the French spectators a few years ago when they booed, jeered, and abused a victorious American rugby team at Colombes. Both episodes were simply manifestations of nationalism—the same nationalism, if you please, that reached its peak in war time.

Just as it is treason for a Yale man to cheer a perfectly executed Harvard forward pass, so is it unpatriotic to applaud too vociferously (if, indeed, at all) a foreign player. The war psychology has really become a part of athletics. The same "win or die for dear old Oshkosh" spirit that predominates in American sport is prevalent in the international competition. Spectacle games are played not for the fun there is in them but for the serious business of winning—anything less is disgraceful. Sports have acquired a war vocabulary of "attack," "defense," and "strategy." More than one military gentleman has lauded football because it is fine training for army officers. It is difficult to see how an amelioration of nationalistic feelings or prejudices can come about through the development of this sport-incentive on an international scale.

From the psychologists we get [illegible] matter. They hold that results of a discipline in one field of endeavor are not transferable to problems in another. So even if one did develop a strong feeling for fair play in international tennis, it would not necessarily indicate that this quality would become a part of one's philosophy in politics. While Governor Fuller, for example, was pondering over the Sacco-Vanzetti case, he was photographed in the newspapers playing football at his summer home, and there is no reason for thinking that the Governor did not observe every rule of sportsmanship.

Some time ago we read about an imaginary baseball game between the Ku Klux Klan and the Knights of Columbus for the benefit of Jewish orphans—umpired by a Negro. When that game is played we shall have more hope of the effect of athletics on international affairs.

The Charm of the Victorian

SIGNS are numerous that we are once more about to turn our faces with respect toward that time, so long and so broad, when Queen Victoria is supposed to have ruled the taste of the English-speaking peoples on all the continents of the earth. Or if not with respect, then with that degree of affection which amounts to respect. The immemorial process is under way. First we shied away from the middle nineteenth century with all the disgust to be expected of a generation just emerging from the prison house of habituated thought and feeling. Then came a brief period of indifference, when the very thought of things Victorian was of something so stuffy that it could not and should not be mentioned. More recently still the age was satirized by minds so keen that they succeeded, even while they made us smile, in awakening our sympathy and our understanding—it is a curious paradox, for instance, that Lytton Strachey aroused on the whole the tenderest of emotions towards the late Queen of Balmoral and Buckingham. And now it looks as if we were entering a time when the doings and the sayings of seventy-five years ago will seem to have positive charm. We shall condescend in the proper degree. It was not our way, our life. We order things more sensibly now. But our grandfathers and grandmothers were certainly quaint old folks, and you would be surprised to see how readable their books are, even if their chairs are still not to be sat in without pain.

Who would insist that the chairs themselves, and the sofas, and the beds, and the tables could not possibly come back into favor and be bought up with the same relish which we now show for seventeenth- and eighteenth-century objects? It seems unlikely, but it may happen. Certainly it has happened that we now forget the loathing we once felt for the heroes, not to speak of the heroines, in the novels read by our grandfathers. An anonymous reviewer in the Saturday Review recently spoke with favor of the "nineteenth-century flavor" he had found among the pages of "Uncle Silas," a masterpiece by Le Fanu, a now almost forgotten Victorian thriller. We too have read "Uncle Silas," and we know what the reviewer meant. The heroine of the tale is swathed in those very robes of delicacy which we not long ago hated with all the hatred bred in us by the Nineties. But she is charming nevertheless, and the story, incidentally, is one that no inferior novelist could achieve in any age. Will there be a revival of Le Fanu? We hope so.

G. K. Chesterton revived Dickens early in the present century—restored him, that is, to the critical position he had been denied by a fastidious generation afraid of his sentiment. The revolution in taste of which we have been speaking will involve, of course, a reconstruction of our notions concerning sentiment. As Mr. Chesterton said somewhere the other day, we shall have to learn to listen to things which we have heard before and which we have always felt to be true though the rules of a sophisticated society prevent us from acknowledging this truth. We shall have to make peace with wholesomeness, kind-heartedness, obedience, and faith, even if it be only a peace of condescension. We not only can do this but are doing it. There is Anthony Trollope, for instance, another great Victorian novelist who is coming back and is filling shelves of the "World's Classics." And there will be more.

It Seems To Heywood Broun

A COUNTRY largely devoted to talk of ideals and idealism has need of vices. Prize-fighting caters to a number of instincts not altogether pretty and accordingly it deserves a place in the life of the nation. Man does not thrive on sweetness and light alone. But this business of blood and blows has all but lost its tonic quality by becoming an industry. In the public mind no enterprise involving more than a million dollars can be anything but respectable. A little vicarious cruelty is by no means a bad prescription for us, but surely we in America are in no need of an additional dose of hypocrisy.

Under present-day conditions a big boxing match lets loose a flood of treacle. In the first place the public is only slightly interested in boxing, though it enjoys a fight. If the crowds were truly eager to see displays of speed and skill, the various battles of the century would enlist the services of little men. The flyweights, the bantams, and the feathers do furnish sword-play and the quick flash of thrust and parry, but there are thousands who attend the heavyweight encounters for every one who goes to see a bout in any of the lesser classes. This phrase, "the manly art," is built upon two lies, because prize-fighting for the title has in it little of aesthetic value and bears no discernible relation to virility. Women have won the right to attend big bouts and the game has gone coeducational. I won't deny that certain fights have furnished me with thrills, but I doubt if I came away cleansed and purified by the spectacle.

If prize-fighting were accepted as a savage rite occasionally necessary for all descendants of the fallen Adam there would be no complaint from me. My protest goes against the propaganda which would find splendor and moral lessons in jabs and uppercuts. It has been said that but for boxing this nation would soon lose all capacity for triumphant warfare. Waiving the fact that I am pacifist, I believe a misconstruction has been put upon Wellington's remark about Waterloo and playing fields. Certainly he hardly meant to suggest that Napoleon was routed by soldiers who had prepared for conflict by sitting in the right-field bleachers and shouting "Go on in, Jack. He can't hurt you." Dempsey moves like a cat and Tunney has square shoulders, but I have never taken off a single pound from necessary areas by watching these young men, no matter how attentively. A red-blooded American ought to be able to defend himself with his fists, but I have seen the greatest of the boxers and still remain vulnerable to anyone who swings at me, no matter how ineptly.

I know there is no law compelling anybody to pay $40 for a seat strangely aloof from the center of activity. Mr. Rickard is a showman, which means that he has the ability to thwart an adage and bring burnt children back to the fire. This is very clever of him, but I do not understand just why he should be hailed as a public benefactor. I resent the manner in which he has grown rich upon American snobbery. He has found that it is sufficient to print "ringside" upon a ticket, and that each one of the forty thousand in these exclusive sections will be satisfied merely by the pleasant sound of the word, no matter how poor the spot to which he finds himself conducted. The only wonder is that Mr. Rickard has never yet issued a special limited edition of tickets in limp leather or, better still, a privately printed issue bearing the signatures of both the fighters. This would be feasible, for all our modern gladiators are writing men.

But the entrepreneur is not the only responsible party. In recent years championship bouts have been in some measure civic enterprises. Cities and States have lent what was practically official sanction to Mr. Rickard's methods. One Governor all but abdicated his office in order to bring a big bout within his borders. It is not good that servants of the people should suddenly appear in new and shining raiment whenever a promoter comes to town and wants a permit. Nor do I believe that the eagerness of every sporting writer to boost a battle rests wholly upon the itching of his nose for news. Of course, I do not think that every boxing reporter who fills his columns with hyperbole is either a crook or a press agent. The capacity of the public for news of fights and fighters is vast, but even so I am ashamed of the manner in which newspapers lose every vestige of the sense of proportion when a championship bout is on the ways. The most devoted partisan of boxing can hardly wade through the immense amount of stuff which is printed while the principals are engaged in training.

Of course, if the sporting commentator devotes himself to Tunney's taste in literature I'll grant you that he has a story. And why, I wonder, is so little attention paid to Dempsey's literary preferences? Some years ago I found him in a training camp completely surrounded by his books. It is true that they were not his own but came with the furnished cottage which he rented. Still he had browsed a bit and he was not much pleased with the selection which the shelves afforded. Zane Grey and other chroniclers of cowboy life were largely represented.

"I don't like that stuff," said Dempsey. "It's all fake. I've been a cowboy."

Pressed to name his favorite in the selection, he spoke with enthusiasm of a novel called "The Czar's Spy" which concerned the adventures of a grand duke among the Bolsheviki.

"If you had been a grand duke," protested a reporter who doubled in boxing and book reviews, "you'd probably think 'The Czar's Spy' was a fake."

"I never was a grand duke," said Dempsey, and with this simple but profound remark it seemed to me he justified the entire romantic movement.

I have not understood why Tunney has seemed to some the more interesting figure of the two. He is a pleasant young man with agreeable manners, but I rather suspect him of having boned up on Elbert Hubbard's Scrapbook. There is an occasional chink in his erudition. "And were you never worried for a moment?" asked a young woman after the Fighting Marine's triumph in Philadelphia. "Oh, yes, my confidence was seriously impaired in the fourth round when he had me laying on the ropes," replied Tunney.

A MESSAGE TO AMERICA ON THE MASSACHUSETTS TRAGEDY

[Following is a translation of a letter written by the author of "Jean Christophe" to Lucien Price of Boston upon receipt in Switzerland of the news that Sacco and Vanzetti had been executed. Permission to publish the letter has been obtained by cable.]

Villeneuve, August 23, 1927

MY DEAR FRIEND:

I am writing to you under the crushing burden of the impression produced by the judicial murder of Sacco and Vanzetti. I have no doubt that you and M—— share my sentiments; but I wish to express them to you because it may be of some use if you can manage to make them known in your country. My testimony will perhaps have a certain value, because it is that of a man who has long held himself aloof from political parties; who has acquired the habit of looking and thinking "au dessus des siècles" and beyond the passions of the day; and, I may add, of a man who is by certain traits of race as well as of temperament more akin to the Anglo-Saxon than to the Mediterranean.

That which seems to me to be the most terrible side of the tragedy of last evening is not the frightful fate of the two unhappy men, whom death has delivered, finally, from the long torture which drained them of their blood, drop by drop, at the hands of their judicial murderers. (The names of two of these latter—Judge Thayer and Governor Fuller—will be inscribed imperishably among the reprobates of history.) No. It is not their fate. It is rather the abyss which this offense has now dug between the United States and the rest of the peoples of the world. You don't suspect that, perhaps, in your country. You cannot have any idea either of its depth or of its causes.

The question of the guilt of Sacco and Vanzetti had become secondary—although, if now their innocence should ever be demonstrated, the revelation would mean the moral crumbling of all official prestige of the representatives of the United States, and of their country with them, for centuries. Guilty or not, one no longer saw in them anything but two unfortunate men, subjected for years to a refinement of cruelty such as the most barbarous in our world today, Moloch, Hitler, or Stalin, would have thought too cowardly, too inhuman. One simple solution was demanded: mercy. And it was this that I cabled to Governor Fuller on the 20th of August: "A friend of America entreats you to [illegible] Sacco and Vanzetti. Even if guilty, humanity would demand it."

[illegible] But I am not at all astonished that these bloodthirsty souls [illegible] We know similar ones in the Occident today. The great judges, lay or military, are both of the same species. And the great judges, after passing judgment, would have let the whole world crumble rather than admit that they had made a mistake. This pride, monstrously more cruel than cruelty itself, implacable and stupid, remained obstinate in its error, with jaws clenched. If there exists a Hell, the place of honor in it is reserved for such pride as that.

But the crime of such men involves only themselves. It does not involve their nation and community. And it is the duty of these latter to dissociate themselves from it. Thus did the better France in the Dreyfus affair. The better France, after years of struggle and suffering, snatched the victim from the torturers. It was this that the Defense Committee for Sacco and Vanzetti tried to do—without success—for the United States.

And the most overwhelming and heartbreaking event of all this drama, this disaster in the eyes of the world, is this: not one of the notable official personages who represent the Government of the United States intervened to give audible expression to the voice of humanity. Coolidge found the hour propitious for his annual vacation (perish the thought of disturbing him!) while they were assassinating Sacco and Vanzetti. Taft didn't find it worth the trouble to return from Canada for two men—more or less—who were merely being killed. Borah—and this is bitterest of all—said (if the words are correctly reported here) that it was merely a question of facing down the insolent clamor from abroad, rather than a question of doing justice as far as these two men were concerned.

Thus the most vulgar sentiment of amour propre, of national pride, tramples humanity under foot!

We know well that it is not pleasant for a nation to receive the objurgations of foreigners. We also have known (and we deplore it) that in too many cases the indignation and grief of the multitude are translated abroad into acts of violence, threats, and insult. So, naturally, communists and anarchists have tried to fish in troubled waters.

But you know well, all of you in America, that those most overwhelmed by the judicial crime of America have not been the violent in Europe. They have been the moderates. They have been the liberals, the Christians—all the saner and better balanced elements of Europe. And the majority of the protests which have come to you came from sincere friends of the United States, who, like myself, were heartbroken when they saw such a crime soil the honor of the great nation they love, and destroy the ideal image which they had made of it.

A strong nation possesses imagination. It takes thought. Yours should have done so. For your nation owes to itself and to the world to scorn the threats made against it; but not the supplications of its friends, not enlightened counsel. Of itself it should have taken the initiative in some exceptional measure which would have given the unfortunate men mercy or, at least, reduced their sentences to life imprisonment. Thus at least it would have fortified itself in advance against the rigors of a mistake which would be nothing less than a national calamity.

The pitiless hardness of heart of all the leading public officials in America, their absolute insensibility toward the question, have produced a most sinister impression throughout the entire world. It was a question not of justice, but a question rather of simple, humble, divine humanity. Not one of you in America can have an idea of that corrosive thought which has now been given vitality abroad by this act. During almost a decade there has been spreading throughout the world the idea that such was, indeed, the new mentality emergent in the United States; and a deep hostility has been stirring in the hearts of all other peoples. We struggled against this current. We knew that there were, with you as with us all, two natures, two Americas, like the two Frances of "Jean Christophe": the France of "La Foire sur La Place," and the France of "Dans La Maison." And we live in the better one.

And now, here is this world tragedy (no more American than the Dreyfus affair was French alone), this calamity, which has shown the crushing supremacy—from afar one might almost say the unanimity—of this frightful America whose heart is stone, of this America for whom humanity does not exist, for whom there exists only legalism, of this America which insists on having condemned men rejudged by the same judges who have already condemned them, this scandalous derision of all real justice which allies justice with hypocrisy!

What is to be done? The abyss yawns. I know too well the peoples of Europe, and the travail that is going on within them, not to perceive that from this day on a state of moral warfare exists between them and the United States. And, should it be six years, or twenty, or fifty, or a century, this state of moral warfare will be realized one day indeed. For the conscience of the world has received a blow. And, alas! a blow received in history is always sooner or later given back.

The brilliant result of the satanic tenacity of Judge Thayer and Governor Fuller in crushing out these two victims is that, henceforth, these poor Italian immigrants take their places in the pantheon of the martyrs of the civilized world. There, for centuries, one will still speak of Sacco and Vanzetti as one speaks still of Jean Calas. But Sacco and Vanzetti have not found in America their Voltaire!

I am not an American; but I love America. And I accuse of high treason against America the men who have soiled her with this judicial crime before the eyes of the world. Their abominable parody on justice has destroyed the most sacred rights of all humanity.

Americans We Like

Daniel Willard: A Selfish Man

By DONALD KIRKLEY

The second in a series of personality portraits

DANIEL WILLARD, stern and benevolent overlord of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, has won an amazingly widespread reputation for fair dealing by steady pursuit of a wholly selfish plan of action. He is generally called a just man, and he is a just man. Thousands of men and women, whole families and communities, are richer and happier because their sustenance comes from the great railroad system built up and guided by Daniel Willard. Yet Daniel Willard's first duty, as he sees it, is to safeguard and increase the value of the property given into his care.

No other industrial overlord, it is probable, is trusted, liked, and respected by so many thousands of persons in so many widely different walks of life. The lesser barons of the B. and O. and their respective retinues of white-collar men and women look on Mr. Willard with a veneration that is close to worship. They say: "We love him." Seasoned railroaders out on the line, more dignified and disinterested, give "Old Dan" their hearty respect. They say: "He's one square guy." The newer battalions remember that the president started as a track walker. They say: "He used to be one of us." Labor leaders, natural foes of the position, make allowance for the man in it, and give him credit as magnanimously as possible for doing the best he can according to his lights. As one labor leader outside the railroad unions put it: "Willard's got a conscience and uses it, and that's a damn sight more than you can say about a lot of those birds." Certain of Mr. Willard's peers, moreover, men as great as he, measured in terms of the property they control or manage, regard the head of the B. and O. with much admiration tempered with a very small amount of suspicion. As one Bourbon of business remarked: "Willard's too easy on the sons of guns," meaning, of course, the men who operate the railroad.

But in the railroad world and out of it Daniel Willard's word is as good as another man's bond. His private life has been clean and wholesome. In his adopted city, Baltimore, his advice is respected and sometimes followed in the fields of art and higher education. Those who know of his achievements as a railroad statesman in the days when he was chairman of the Council of National Defense and the War Industries Board, in the post-war struggles between the railroad employees and the railroad owners, and in the never-ending maneuvers of the railroad magnates in their campaigns against each other, and those who know of him only by his standing as a citizen, are quick to agree that his outstanding quality is fairness.

How has Mr. Willard won the trust of his employees? How can he live up to his reputation for fairness and still be consciously selfish?

Born in a respectable, fairly well-to-do Vermont farmhouse, young Dan decided to become a scientific farmer. Astigmatism, not so easily corrected in those days, drove him from agricultural college at nineteen. Needing to work with his hands for a time, he thought he'd try railroading. He went to work laying ties and sprinkling ballast on the Central Vermont, although the foreman rather believed the student was not strong enough for the work.

A year later, when he resigned to take a job as fireman on another road, the foreman remarked that Willard was the only man he'd ever had who couldn't be replaced. Fighting the handicap of astigmatism and building up a strong body, Willard was soon at the throttle of an engine. He migrated to the Northwest and went up the line by the usual steps. Once he was laid off on account of a slump in business. He had found meanwhile that he was born to the railroad purple. He loved railroading passionately, finding, as do many railroaders, high romance in the vital business of moving the crops and products of this vast country and of linking together its widely different peoples. He left his engine finally (he had ridden always with a book or two under the seat) with deep, sharp regret, for he loved the personal contact with the mighty machine, and the thundering, breathtaking daily drive down the line.

This love explains in part why young Dan climbed from one department to the next higher with such rapidity and ease. He was no genius; he never did his job, whatever it was, better than it had been done before. But he drove himself harder than his fellows, he studied constantly, he bent every ounce of energy to the problems of railroading as an art. His work was his chief recreation and, next to his home life, his greatest joy. Furthermore, his mind was exactly fitted to the task in hand. He had a remarkable memory and an easy grasp of figures. Whenever he came up with a subject of which he knew nothing, whether it was Renaissance sculpture or the manufacture of axles, he went to his books and got a mindful. In his conversation he frequently fishes up odd details and remote ramifications on astonishingly diverse matters.

By the time Willard came to the B. and O. he had worked out a practical philosophy for himself. It was not very original. He had picked a precept here and a maxim there and fitted them together until the whole served as an excellent guide for a railroad president. He took over the tumbledown and disreputable B. and O. chiefly because he saw a chance to put his ideas into full operation for the first time. His imagination took fire at the thought of getting his fingers on a potentially great system and remolding it nearer to his heart's desire.

The new president came to Baltimore in 1910, almost unknown in the East. The B. and O. was then the butt of vaudeville jokes and the target of local newspaper attacks. Some of the men in the central offices were open to reproach as to their private habits and public practices. Today Baltimore is proud of the railroad and of the men who run it. The newspapers praise it and them. The Fair of the Iron Horse (September 24-October 8), in celebration of its one hundredth anniversary, finds the B. and O. prosperous too. Mr. Willard has been the biggest single force behind the change, and every Baltimorean who thought about the matter at all was much gratified when the president of the B. and O. was installed recently as chairman of the board of trustees of Johns Hopkins University. That honor was keenly appreciated by Mr. Willard, not because it came to him as an individual—he is very modest—but because it formed a concrete symbol of public recognition of that regeneration to which he has given a great part of his life.

It was no easy matter to refashion the old B. and O. into the splendid system of today. It cost $400,000,000, and Daniel Willard had the spending of the money. He was responsible to the owners, and the owners have never had cause to complain. But he believed that the best way to serve the owners was to please the public, to be scrupulously honest and frank in his business dealings, and to see to it that the men and women in his employ were satisfied and cheerful.

With this in mind he began putting his policies into effect. One of his first acts was to stop all advertising until such time as the passenger service of the railroad had been brought to a point where it deserved to be advertised. In dealing with business it was his policy to put his cards on the table. "You'll get trimmed sometimes," he said, "but in the long run it pays." His policies were seldom original. There was the "Safety above everything else" slogan, with which Mr. Willard led the safety movement in the East; the "will to please" slogan, which has become a watchword among B. and O. employees; the "good neighbor" policy, under which any local superintendent is authorized to bring all the resources of the railroad to bear for the relief of any emergency of fire or flood, without waiting for orders from above. There was the plan for encouraging shopmen to make suggestions for betterment of the service, a plan which resulted in 18,000 suggestions in four years. Of these, 70 per cent were put in effect, with a saving estimated at $3,000,000. Half that sum was returned to the employees in the form of increased wages.

Mr. Willard has put one of his beliefs into the following words: "I am anxious that Baltimore and Ohio employees should at all times be courteous in their relations with the public and with each other, and that they should make every reasonable effort to operate the trains safely and on time. I would like also to have their constant and helpful cooperation toward improving the operation of the property in such ways as may be possible—not, however, because they feel obliged to do so, but just because they want to do so."

There he has given the formula for his own success, with the exception of one ingredient—the mind quality which gives him his tremendous knowledge of all questions having to do with the many phases of railroading. The formula, which is known to every employee, puts every one on his mettle and has resulted in a strikingly strong morale all down the line. The president has set a hard pace and a high standard for his employees; he is a stern taskmaster to the slothful and negligent; and he lives up to the pace himself.

When facing a problem which involves his relations with an employee, the president invariably asks himself: "How would I feel if I were in his place?" There is no cant about this, no sentimentality. Naturally benevolent and warm-hearted, Mr. Willard puts duty first; and he could not bring himself to do a kindness that would interfere with his duty to the shareholders. But since he is convinced that kindness to employees pays dividends, he has much latitude. And he does remember how he felt when he was a trackman, a fireman, an engineman, a trainmaster, a superintendent. He remembers the conditions under which each man in the system works, he has a vast store of facts regarding the operation of the 5,000 miles of track, he is in intimate touch with the details of every department. And he has the knack of marshalling facts to meet the problem of the moment, whether it is big or small. Every trainman with a just grievance knows he can come in and talk it over with the president. Trainmen often come to the Old Man in trouble and they seldom go away empty. He has been known to relieve distress more than once with money from his own pocket, and he hates to have that known. His sympathy is broad and deep, his temper steadfast and calm. He never makes a disparaging remark about friend or enemy. In his personal contacts he is genial and courteous to all men; but he never drops for a moment a certain dignity which, one suspects, he believes he owes it to his office to maintain.

Is that dignity the insignia of office only? Once the president left strict orders, on a road trip, for Jim, the porter on his private car, to call him at five in the morning. Jim, the story goes, awoke to find Mr. Willard standing by with a smile, saying: "Jim, it's five o'clock."

On most Sunday mornings, too, a gray-haired gentleman of sixty-six, soberly dressed, with much fun in the kind eyes behind gold-rimmed glasses, walks through the deserted corridors of the B. and O. Building, with two fine lads by his side. He looks in at his offices, taking, one imagines, vast pleasure in this leisurely contact with the place he loves next best to his home. Meanwhile his grandchildren romp and frolic about with post-church enthusiasm. This Sunday half-hour is almost a rite, and it is hard to say whether it is enjoyed most by the boys or by their grandfather.

For the rest, Daniel Willard fits into conventional molds, in his life away from the road. He is a thoroughgoing American with a firm respect for things as they are. He plays golf and patronizes grand opera. He serves on committees and takes a respectable interest in civic affairs. He is a Unitarian, and he does a good deal for charity without talking about it. He is happy with his wife and children and grandchildren; he belongs to clubs and goes to dinners and finds it easy to live an orderly, decent life.

There are other men who have used the phrase "enlightened selfishness" to describe their actions. But Mr. Willard is one of the very few who put their principles into constant daily practice, almost as a matter of course. It is perhaps a pity that the first cause of his fair dealing is his solicitude for the shareholders, his conviction that happy, well-paid men make more money for the railroad. Some may say that workers deserve happiness whether or not their happiness contributes to the welfare of the property owners. Still, call it selfishness or what you please, quibble as much as you like, the fact remains that Mr. Willard's way has made him a useful man in his chosen field, a valuable public servant, a loved man. He has won happiness for himself because, those who know him believe, this happiness has been reflected in the lives of others. His life thus far illustrates the tremendously important fact that the surest way to find spiritual and financial profit is to work hard for the welfare of many people.

Isadora Duncan Is Dead

By MAX EASTMAN

ISADORA DUNCAN was the last friend I saw when I left Europe this spring. She stood in the little crowd on the platform at the Gare Saint Lazare. She had been saying goodbye to Ruth Mitchell near the front of the train, and my car passed her as the train pulled out of the station. I was standing at the open window, laughing and half-crying at the sadly funny excitement of people parting with their friends, and suddenly I heard her voice calling my name and "Goodbye!" She raised her hand when I caught sight of her, and stood still with it raised in the air and moving slowly in a serene and strong benediction. A great beam of that energetic and perfectly idealistic light shone out of her eyes to me. She looked very great. She looked like a statue of real liberty.

It made me sad for a long time, because greatness in this little world is sad. Greatness coming to an unhappy end is almost unendurable, and I had felt that Isadora was coming to an unhappy end. I felt it underneath all the delightful bubbling of her mirth when I saw her during the winter in Cannes. It was at the house of our friend, Lucien Monod, a Communist and an artist. She had just received a cablegram that money would be forwarded for her memoirs, and she was full of laughing joy—that wild, reckless, witty joy that all her friends remember. Isadora could sprinkle the whole world with her wit and make it shine. A lot of stupid Americans—indeed almost all of stupid America—imagine that they laughed at Isadora. They are completely mistaken. Isadora laughed at them. She laughed as Rabelais would laugh at them, or Montaigne, or Shakespeare, or Aristophanes. Any great man or woman would laugh at them. And Isadora Duncan was one of the great men and women—more indubitably so, I think, than any other artist who has lived in our time. They speak of Duse and Sarah Bernhardt and Isadora as a trio of great women, but Isadora was incomparably above the other two. She was not only a perfectly supreme artist as they were—endowed by nature with momentous power and the exquisite gift of restraining it—but she was also a mind and a moral force. She used her momentous power, as the giants of mankind have always done, not only to entertain the world, but to move it.

And she did move it. It is needless to tell how she changed the art of dancing in our time. She was a revolution in that art, and so to some extent in the whole art of the theater. All the civilized world acclaimed her, and recognized in that young brave girl's beautiful body, running barefoot and half-naked, running and bending and pausing and floating in a

Isadora Duncan

You bring the fire and terror of the wars
Of infidels in thunder-running hordes,
With spears like sun-rays, shields, and wheeling
Flame shape, death shape, and shaped like scimi
With crimson eagles and blue pennantry,
And teeth and armor flashing, and white eyes
Of battle horses, and the silver cries
Of trumpets wide strewn and piercing.

Who is this naked-footed lovely girl
Of summer meadows dancing on the grass?
So young and tenderly her footsteps pass,
So dreamy-limbed and lightly wild and wa
Their bugles murmur and their banners furl,
And they are lost and vanished like a storm.

MAX EAST

stream of music, as though the music had formed out of its own passion a visible spirit to live for a moment and die when it died—all the world recognized in that an artistic revolution, an apparition of creative genius, and not merely an achievement in the established art of the dance.

But I think few people realized how far beyond the realm of art—how far out and how deep into the moral and social life of our times the influence of Isadora Duncan's dancing extended. All the bare-legged girls, and the poised and natural girls with strong muscles, and strong free steps wherever they go—the girls that redeem America and make it worth while to have founded a new world, no matter how badly it was done—they all owe more to Isadora Duncan than to any other person. And the boys too that have a chance to be unafraid of beauty, to be unafraid of the natural life and free aspiration of an intelligent animal walking on the earth—all who have in any measure escaped from the rigidity and ritual of our national religion of negation, all of them owe an immeasurable debt to Isadora Duncan's dancing. She did not only go back into the past to Athens to find that voluntary restraint in freedom that made her dancing an event in the history of art. She went forward into the future—farther, I suppose, than Athens—to a time when man shall be cured altogether of civilization, and return, with immunity to that disease if with few other blessings, to his natural home outdoors on the green surface of the earth. That made her dancing an event in the history of life.

Isadora was exiled—banished by more than an accident of the marriage law—from America. It was inevitable that she should be. America had never seen a woman genius before, and could not think of anything else to do with her. But nevertheless Isadora was very American. The great big way in which she conceived things, and undertook them, and the way she succeeded with them, was American.

Even her faults were American. Her passion for pulling off stunts—"gestures" is the refined way to say it—was American. She made a grand sport of her public position and character. She played with publicity like a humorous Barnum. Even her extravagant and really bad irresponsibility, which went almost to the point of madness in late years, was in the reverse sense an American trait. It was an exaggerated reaction against America's "righteousness." Wrongtiousness is what it was. And there will be a lot more of it here, if the righteous go much farther the way they are going.

America fighting the battle against Americanism—that was Isadora. From that battle incomparable things are to come—things that will startle and rouse the world. And Isadora led the way into the fight all alone, with her naked and strong body and her cold Olympian beauty as an Amazon. If America triumphs over itself—over its cheap greed and prudery, its intellectual and moral cowardice, its prurient puerile senility—if America triumphs over that, Isadora Duncan will be sculptured in bronze at the gate of the Temple of Man in the new day that will dawn. She will stand there, poised in terrible impatience, knee raised and arms tensely extended as in the Marche Militaire or the Scythian warrior's dance—beautiful—a militant and mighty woman, the symbol and the veritable leader of those who put on their courage like armor and fought for the affirmation of life in America.

Serving Two Masters

By T. SWANN HARDING

I SPOKE today with the scientific director of a large corporation. I could honestly use the stereotyped phrase, "You would know the name in an instant if I mentioned it." You probably would. This was a big man, in business, and he belonged in the intellectual strata, again speaking in a strictly business sense.

He was safe and sound of course. By that I mean that he honestly believed Coolidge should be drafted for the Presidency in perpetuity and that Sacco and Vanzetti got their just deserts. He also knew that we were right now in a business depression which he was sure would grow vastly worse before it got any better. Indeed he had had a little firing to do and he diverted me somewhat as he perfunctorily endeavored to have me believe that it had torn his heart and bled his undershirt when he approached the difficult problem of deciding who should stay and who should go. For one is taken and the other left, in times of depression—to pilfer a Biblical phrase.

And the corporation of course works on the common principle—I now purloin the racy idiom of a worker—of working hell out of employees in rush times and dropping them summarily in slack times. Big men of course remain big men at all times, and draw $10,000 annually and dividends.

Being a pale creature of academic vintage I frankly confessed that four years' experience in industry had failed to endear it to me. The director plainly felt wounded and asked me why I entertained such sentiments. I remembered and was cautious. I remembered resigning from an industrial position once and saying, when the president asked me why, that I preferred a seven- to a nine-hour day. I remembered his choler—his denunciation of me as lazy and unambitious; his repugnance to such weakling ideas. I remembered that he, the president, worked five hours a day. But now I amplified my grievances for safety. As industrial liabilities I listed, besides long hours, the chronic state of nervous suspense the worker is made to entertain for fear of being deprived of his job, and also the fact that most of the time I could never count absolutely on an evening, a Sunday, or a holiday without interruption by an emergency telephone call. This at once agitated him and he whipped out: "Well, what do you want out of life anyway?"

Feeling naive and candid I ventured: "I want assured leisure outside work hours."

"For what? To perfect yourself further for the main business of life?"

"Exactly," I said, deliberately mistaking his meaning. "I want leisure in which to read and write and invite my soul so that I may really live. Indirectly, of course, the acquired breadth of vision will make me a better worker in my profession."

He was stunned momentarily and I had taken an unfair advantage. I had detoured him from his customary mental roadbed and the scenery was now entirely unfamiliar to him. Finally he said, with a look of dawning understanding: "Oh, I see! You work merely for a living. You actually live in your hobbies—the reading and writing part of your life?"

"Not at all. I want a living, to be sure. But I also love my professional work, take a pleasure in it, and live there too. You see I enjoy both my professional work and my hobbies. One balances and rounds out the other. It is my good fortune to be thus admirably situated in life."

It was now apparent that I had produced just the same effect I should have produced had I been gifted to state my sentiments in Bulgarian or in ancient Hebrew. This absurd concept entirely eluded him and he tactfully turned the conversation to more profitable matters. He said he distrusted Japanese.

It sometimes seems that odd features of the soi disant Christian philosophy have become inbedded in our folkways and actually mold thought and action among people who are manifestly unchristian in every ordinary sense of the word. One attitude Christianity seems to have imposed very successfully among all strata of Americans is that implied in such statements as "No man can serve two masters," or "He that is not for me is against me."

The scientific director would have been startled in the very same way had I told him that I belonged both to the Moose and the Elks and devotedly loved each of them. Or that I passionately loved two or more women at the same time, none of them being my wife. Or that I liked both the New Masses and the Atlantic Monthly, burlesque shows and symphony orchestras, which would have been a fact.

This specialization to which we are addicted was not invented in Ford factories. It existed much before industry harnessed it to the practical matter of dollar production. It was innate in our very attitude towards life; it is a natural part of our everyday philosophy in America. Whatever we may have said or done superficially, the majority of us always regarded a really sound and useful man as one who stuck to one woman, to one journal, to one sect, to one party, to one attitude, to one profession. Diversity of interests has been regarded as an indecency bordering on breadth of culture. A man is, therefore, supposed to devote his entire creative urge specifically to his profession or work in order to be considered any good at it. The advantage of a broadening of interests in producing a better worker by indirection is entirely ignored. The idea that a man must have a single major interest is predominant. It is also ridiculous.

There is no reason for the confinement of an intellect strictly within the rigid limitations of this or that petty segment of life provided it is big enough to attend other segments. Time and time again men have been amply proficient, have even excelled, in this or that profession while simultaneously being intensely interested in other matters quite divergent. We do not have to go back to Goethe. Ignatius Singer, British physicist, and Jose Echegary, Spanish mathematician-dramatist-novelist and what not—neither long dead—will serve as examples. Samuel [illegible] managed to do some creditable work in three arts. D. H. Lawrence and Max Beerbohm happily combine two. S. Weir Mitchell and Jacques Loeb come to mind as authentic scientists who were also men of broad cultural interests.

Dr. C. A. Browne, the noted American sugar chemist and chief of the now reorganized United States Bureau of Chemistry, is a living example of a truly learned man greatly interested and proficient in history, Greek, and the classics, yet a specialist second to none in his line in America. Moreover, the very successful president of the quite successful Cutter Electrical and Manufacturing Company of Philadelphia demonstrates that a money-making business man may also be an essayist of charm and a book collector of distinction. Reference is of course to A. Edward Newton. Finally, I myself knew a perfectly efficient scientific director once who excelled as an amateur violinist and knew the Bab Ballads all by heart.

But this scientific director left me with the plain assumption that I was simply another of those asses. I was all right, you know, but lackadaisical, unfit for a business career, deficient in high resolve, loyalty, and intense application—probably a bit of a Bolshevik. I did need a haircut.

He also left me wondering, in my turn, what atrophy of natural human curiosity (the embryo of scientific progress) has taken place when so many persist in selecting some great, hurried, much traveled road through life, to pursue it with eyes straight ahead and without ever once stopping to investigate the intricate byways, the thrilling woods, the inviting, open meadows some kind fate has strewn everywhere about for those who care to invite their souls and really live.

The maturity of the human mind is characterized by an independent interest in knowledge for its own sake and a realization that breadth of knowledge has a personal value of its own which cannot always be resolved into practical interests. La Rochefoucauld errs in defining only two kinds of curiosity in his maxim CLXXIII—i.e., that springing from a desire to know what may be useful to us and that springing from a desire to know something of which others are ignorant. There is a third type of curiosity, the most natural and sane of all—the persistent desire to know for the sake of knowledge itself, and this leads always to more abundant life than our scientific director ever dreamed of.

Also, curiously enough, it leads by painful but certain indirection to material progress, for all industry rests upon science which, in its purest form, is a direct descendent of robust, natural curiosity.

Alabama's Super Government

By CHARLES N. FEIDELSON

TO say that Alabama is the most completely Klan-controlled State in the Union is to put the matter correctly, although the sweeping statement needs some explanation. It is not equivalent to saying that all the people or even a majority of them belong to or are responsive to the Klan. It is not equivalent to saying that Jews or Roman Catholics, or even Negroes, are being actively molested because of creed or color. But it does amount to the declaration that the Klan is so well entrenched politically, that so many judges, solicitors, sheriffs, jury commissioners are members of the Klan or submissive to it, that State and county governments are so thoroughly beholden to the Klan, that Alabama is a veritable Eden to the Knights—or was, until the apple of discord in the shape of the Calloway case appeared.

One night late in June, Jeff Calloway, a lad in his early twenties, stood in front of the Antioch Methodist Church, near Oneonta, which is some thirty miles from Birmingham. An illiterate orphan, who had somehow grown up in that neighborhood, he was on this particular evening armed with a bottle which he had drawn upon fairly liberally. A body of masked men, who had been uplifted by a discourse from one of themselves, emerged from the church, seized this young devil, carried him some distance away, and whipped him mercilessly. He managed to find his way to a nearby house for the night, and the next day his wounds were dressed by a doctor at Onconta.

Word reached the newspapers, which played up the happening. The early reports described Calloway as fourteen or fifteen years old. Then came a concerted demand from the Montgomery Advertiser, the Birmingham News, and the Birmingham Age-Herald—the Hanson group—that Governor Bibb Graves should take charge of the situation and bring the floggers to justice. Governor Graves responded with the declaration that floggings must cease in Alabama, and gave orders to Attorney-General McCall and the law-enforcement department to spare no effort in finding the culprits.

Why Governor Graves took this course remains a mystery. As an avowed Klansman, elected under Alabama's extraordinary primary arrangement as a Klan candidate and through Klan strength, he could not have been eager to hurt the organization. This was the first time the issue had been presented to him. The Hanson newspapers had delivered some sharp thrusts. The Governor probably thought this would be a nice gesture and nothing more. These are some of the explanations offered for his bold reaction. To be sure he had no reason to believe, if past experience counted for anything, that the floggers would be identified, indicted, and found guilty. Even if matters went this far, the Klan as an organization would not be involved—so he must have thought. If his mind could have envisaged the truly bitter consequences of his command, he would never have issued the order for a sweeping investigation.

At the trials of seven men, charged with kidnapping and flogging Jeff Calloway, two defendants were found guilty and the others entered pleas of guilt. But, during the hearings, the undisputed testimony of three witnesses, themselves Klansmen, was that the whipping of Calloway was a Klan affair, under official Klan orders, in the regular course of Klan functioning—in short, for perhaps the first time since Colonel Simmons launched his organization, it was caught red-handed. Someone had blundered. The Attorney-General, himself a Klansman, was perhaps satisfying a private grudge against James Esdale, Grand Dragon of Alabama; the Governor had failed to tell his enforcement officers where to stop; a brave judge was on the bench; the citizens of the vicinity revolted against the masked tyranny they had long suffered from; a stupid Klansman had let the cat out of the bag—and some, or many of them, helped to make the conviction of the first Kluxer so epochal an event in the life of Alabama that the Age-Herald could compare it to the fall of the Bastille.

Then, repenting of what they had done, the State authorities withdrew from active participation in Klan prosecutions. Announcements of new floggings and old floggings—two score or more in number—became the order of the day. But the Attorney-General let the officers and sheriffs do their duty. And the Governor became incomunicado on the score of masked lawlessness. He had other fish to fry.

He had to put through the General Assembly one of the most extraordinary revenue bills ever struck off by the hands of lesser tribunes of the people. He had to stave off the passage of a measure providing for a double primary instead of the preferential system which had served to elect him, the first choice of about thirty per cent of the voters. He had to prevent the adoption of an anti-masking bill, making it a felony to wear the mask except under obviously innocent conditions.

Finally, stung to the quick by the direct charge of the Birmingham News that in his opposition to this proposal he preferred his loyalty to the Klan to his allegiance to the State, the Governor tried to force through the House of Representatives one of the most oppressive measures conceivable to strangle the press by enlarging beyond all just or decent bounds the scope of the libel law. In this latter attempt the Governor failed, through the direct intervention of a just providence or a happy strategic stroke in the upper house by a handful of level-headed men, but not before he had revealed the extent to which he speaks for the Klan and his conception of office as a means for venting his private spleen.

Where, then, does this leave Alabama? By no means out of the woods. The State faces the prospect of three years and more of such a Governor and such an administration. Some progress has been indubitably made to rid Alabama of masked lawlessness and the sinister spirit behind it. But most of the fight has yet to be fought.

In the Driftway

IF Charles Augustus Lindbergh only knew it, one of the most charming honors that came his way was the one which Quimperle, quaint city of Brittany, conferred upon him when it named one of its crooked cobbled streets Lindbergh. And if he is looking for a rest after his strenuous continental tour in the interest of aviation, let him take boat for Brittany and Quimperle. There let him change his airplane for a bicycle and explore the indescribable peace of the Breton countryside. Within a week he will come to doubt that such a thing as an airplane exists in this world.

THERE are fine things in Brittany for a tired man: quaint costumes and customs; stone cottages with cool dirt floors where one may buy red wine and watch the chickens scratching on the great hearth; ruined churches in the depths of green forests, where the unimaginable age of the earth becomes a tangible thing under one's feet; saintly statues worn by the weather of seven centuries until they are hardly more than pieces of stone; stormy headlands of black rock rising from a blue sea that goes white at the edges; wistful beauty of black pine trees outlined on a cloudy hill.

THERE are wood roads in Brittany where even Lindbergh has not been heard of. The Drifter ventured down one of these one sunny afternoon and found strange things. First there was stillness so intense that it seemed as if there never had been and never would be a sound in the world. Then he saw a barn in the distance and took courage. As he approached, a white peasant cap with eyes beneath it appeared around the corner of the barn. Then another, and another. He walked on, hoping for conversation to break the weird silence. But when he reached the barn the caps and eyes had disappeared. He found two houses and some chickens scratching, but neither sound nor sight of human beings. He went on into the forest. After a time he came to a great stone arch which was the entry to what had once been a monastery. He passed under it into the courtyard. It was covered with yellow straw which glistened in the sunshine. Here too a few chickens were scratching, but again there was no sign of human life, although the dormitories of the monks, which stood along one side of the court, apparently had been taken over as peasant dwellings. The Drifter looked furtively into doorways and windows, hoping to catch a glimpse of one of these mysterious inhabitants, but to no purpose. Through a gate he saw the ruins of the church he had come to find. Subdued by the strangeness and silence of the place, he passed with light steps through the sunlit yard. Then, as he opened the gate, he saw the child, standing by a tree. Her flaxen hair was brushed back in the manner of Alice in Wonderland. Her eyes were blue and wide but not frightened. She seemed to have been looking at him for a long, long time. He passed quite close to her but she made neither move nor sound. The Drifter explored the old church. When he turned to go she was still there. And she is probably there now, unless someone spoke to her and she disappeared into thin air.

* * * * *

THERE are things not so fine in Brittany—superstition, ignorance, fear, that combine to produce that "quaintness" which is so "picturesque" to American tourists. The Bretons still believe in the "evil eye." It is said that they still propitiate the monoliths, those great gray stones, some of them twenty feet high, that stand upended in peasant fields as they have stood for no one knows how many centuries. And if one would probe the true spirit of Brittany he should seek out these stones. They are the most vivid expression of fear, and worship, that the Drifter has ever seen—like primitive cries for mercy preserved in stone. It is evident that they still dominate the peasant mind, for the church has taken care to place on the top of most of them tiny stone crosses. And this combination is a revealing commentary. Twenty feet of pagan stone—and six inches of the Christian cross—that is Brittany.

Is the American Legion Liberal?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It is a relief to read in The Nation an article so fair-minded as Sylvanus Cook's on the American Legion. Much of what he says might be applied to the Officers Reserve Corps. Both represent cross-sections of America and both come in for undeserved slaps because of their zealots.

The great mass of men in these organizations—the unimpassioned and, in the case of the reserve officers, those interested primarily in professional fitness—have little instinct for publicity and no desire to impose their political beliefs on their fellow citizens.

New York, September 8 JOHN D. KENDERDINE

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The article on the American Legion by Sylvanus Cook in your issue of September 7, may be an effective defense of the Legion, but it is a most terrible indictment of the cowardice of the liberal majority and the liberal officials in the Legion for their failure to stand up against the bigotry and intolerance of the minority.

We have, right here in Boston, boys and girls in the Young People's Socialist League with more courage than those men. Two years ago when we held a peace parade in Boston on Armistice Day, the American Legion, or rather—according to Mr. Cook—its noisy and intolerant minority, were breathing fire and hatred against the parade and especially the Socialist contingent, because we had stood for peace in 1917-18. Yet not a single one of the boys and girls in the Yipsels failed to show up to take their part in the parade. It seems to me that the alleged liberal majority in the American Legion might take heart from the example of the courage of those Socialist young people.

Cambridge, Mass., September 3 ALFRED BAKER LEWIS

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It was time that somebody should say a good word for the Legion, and Mr. Cook has done it very well. It was a specially propitious moment for reminding the public of the great work that the organization has done in taking care of disabled ex-service men and in rendering assistance in times of distress such as flood, fire, earthquake, tornado, and mine catastrophe.

A number of references in Mr. Cook's article seem to imply that the American Civil Liberties Union has been a harsh and unfair critic of the Legion. Probably Mr. Cook either got his information from the newspapers instead of reading the union's annual report, or he read the report with an interpretation which is hardly fair. The one general statement about the American Legion in the report for 1926 was as follows: "Twenty-seven States reported the American Legion as the most active agency of intolerance and repression, the Ku Klux Klan having lost its influence in practically every section." This means simply that correspondents in various localities believed, because of acts of individual posts, that the Legion deserved the prize for intolerance and repression. These particular acts were not specified in most instances but were used merely as a basis for answering specific questions in a questionnaire, the purpose of which was to ascertain what agencies during the year had been most active in repression and intolerance.

The Civil Liberties Union will always be glad to recognize any signs that the Legion as a whole is broadly tolerant and liberal. Mr. Cook wishes to know whether the report for 1927 will record that the Legionnaires of Emporia, Kansas, defended the right of a militant pacifist to speak in their midst. Assuredly it will, if it is able to find confirmation and full particulars in connection with this unusual event.

FORREST BAILEY, Director,
American Civil Liberties Union

New York, September 6

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Perhaps you will grant me the opportunity to supplement Sylvanus Cook's article in your September 7 issue, The Real American Legion. As a fellow liberal who finds membership in the Legion entirely consistent with his liberal views, I would like to clear up the matter of "militarism" of which the Legion has often been accused.

Ninety per cent of the Legion, I judge, believe in adequate preparedness—but not in over-preparedness. In this respect the Legion may continue to be criticized, for various well-known reasons.

The Legion has among its members nearly every army officer who served in the war. These officers are men of experience and it is not strange that their opinions often prevail over those of other Legionnaires who have not the military mind. In the large cities the Legion often avails itself of the hospitality of commanders of armories for meetings and social affairs. As a result, when favors are sought by army or navy officers they are difficult of refusal. As long as the Legion accepts favors from professional army and navy boosters, it will be criticized for its militarism. As a whole the Legion has no love for conflict, having tasted of it in the raw.

I have before me a copy of the Fidac Bulletin for August, published in Paris by the Federation Interalliée des Anciens Combattants. In it is a report of the International Congress of [illegible] held at Luxemburg, July 9-12. There were present delegates from the Reichsbanner Schwarz-Rot-Gold, Arbeitsgemeinschaft der Vereinigung der Kriegsgefangener Deutschslands, and the Reichsverband der Kriegsbeschädigten, German ex-service organizations representing 3,850,000 men; other German organizations representing 600,000; delegates from four Austrian organizations representing 190,000 men; French delegates representing 1,150,000 men; Belgian organizations of 115,000 men; the American Legion of 700,000 men; the British Legion of 400,000 men; Italians representing 470,000 men; Polish representing 463,000 men, and Rumanian representing 62,000 men. It was the first time enemy had met enemy since the war.

Occasionally some of us fear the Legion is being led away from its original purposes, especially when an isolated unit goes to the limit of intolerance. At such a time national headquarters manages to assure us that the Legion's feet are on the ground and its mind unbefogged, as in July when the Legion Monthly published There's Only One Kind of Americanism, by Rupert Hughes, at a time when feeling was running high because of the action of a West Chester, Penn., Post in securing the dismissal of two teachers for their liberal views.

The Legion is young; a majority of its members are also young—have not learned yet to study controversial questions coolly and in consequence remain quiet when the noisy intolerant minority rears on its hind legs—but they are gaining experience all the time. and making it harder for those with an axe to grind to speak for the entire organization.

Our Wonderful Language

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your editorial plaint as to the "lingo" used by our eminent sports editors may be extended to broadcasters of radio programs in the holy city of Boston.

On my visit there a month ago, the broadcasting announcer of one of the stations introduced a trio of instrumentalists in the following manner (I do not recall the other names but they were of Celtic, Hebrew, and Italian origin):

"And now I have the pleasure of presenting to you the artist [illegible] of the following numbers, Mr. Dooley, who claims a more leading Mr. Dooley, who claims a direct ancestry with Mr. Finley Peter Dunne, who doubtless [illegible] the [illegible]" [illegible] Cohan, Lowell, and Lawrence!

The Author Complains

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

Dear Sir: The review of "Mammon and the Arts" in your issue of June 1 deals savagely with a volume purporting to be mine, but I do not complain. I consider honest criticism always just.

I have, however, to call your attention to the fact that my first intimation of the existence of the book is contained in your review. As far as I am aware, the whole thing is a gross imposition. As long as twenty years ago I wrote "The Mirrors of the Sky" and other stories for Frank Leslie's Magazine and Munsey's. The stories were cordially received. Your reviewer should have satisfied himself that I did not have time to write a book in addition to my regular work.

May I ask you to give me the address of its publishers, the Purdy Press? If all reviews of this stolen book are like yours, I shall soon be made ridiculous. My deserving to be so does not make me want to be so!

The Role of the Farm Bureau Federation

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In checking the article under the title, "The Armours Betray the Farmers," on page 196 of the August 31 issue of The Nation, I find several errors in fact which I believe should be called to your attention.

First, the listing of Gray Silver as former president of the American Farm Bureau Federation. Mr. Silver at no time was president of this organization. He at one time was a member of the executive committee, but for the most part served as an employee of the organization in charge of the Washington office.

Second, the American Farm Bureau Federation did not undertake to, nor was it contemplated in the Grain Marketing Company plan that the Farm Bureau should sell stock to Farm Bureau members. The American Farm Bureau is not a commercial institution and does not sell stock in any enterprise.

And again, this statement appears: "His (Emanuel Rosenbaum's) testimony was received with approval by the officials of the American Farm Bureau Federation." I find no record justifying this conclusion.

Chicago, August 27 H. R. KIBLER,
Director of Information, American Farm Bureau Federation

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. Silver was never a president of the American Farm Bureau Federation. But when Mr. Kibler states that the federation did not sell stock to its members he is splitting hairs. The Grain Marketing Company was formed with the aid of Farm Bureau officers. One of those officers, Mr. Silver, was placed in charge, and Mr. Kibler's own weekly news letter, sent to members, hailed the project for months and outlined the method of selling stock. Mr. Silver stated from the witness stand that he expected to sell the stock to Farm Bureau members. Obviously the actual transaction of sale of stock would carry the name of the Grain Marketing Company as vendor, rather than the name of its sponsor, the American Farm Bureau Federation. I was present at the hearing when Mr. Rosenbaum testified and told of his "struggle" to give cooperative marketing to the farmers. Illinois members of the federation stated to me at the time that they believed Mr. Rosenbaum had acted in good faith; Mr. Silver stated the same thing. The following day Mr. Rosenbaum declared to me that as a result of his statement that he would go in for a cooperative marketing scheme again, he had been approached by Farm Bureau members and asked if he could submit another plan.

Since this article was published I have received a letter from Charles T. Peavey, grain auditor, 300 South La Salle Street, Chicago, in which he charges that he investigated the properties before they were bought by the farmers and reported the price too high. He now states that since the failure of the company 60 per cent of the Armour and other properties which were appraised at $2,000,000 were actually sold for less than $800,000.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

Sir: Your whole handling of the Sacco-Vanzetti case seems to me masterly and your editorials so superb that I must express my appreciation and say "Thank you." Also I wish to thank John Dos Passos for his letter to President Lowell.

Quaker Pagan

By SARA BARD FIELD

Quintessence of quietness,
Gesture of trees
Or grasses
Bending in the breeze;
His rafters yellow-hammers choose,
Near him to rear the helpless brood;
First-urged willows use
His garden. When he walks the wood,
No trill abruptly falls to hush,
No sudden whir of wingéd dread;
Nor run the timid crests to brush,
Warned by the cock-quail overhead.
No frightened furry feet are seen
Scurrying to secret green.

His pagan spices purify
A puritan-polluted land;
A step, a snapped twig near at hand—
Never a girl need snatch her dress
Fearing dripping loveliness
Be withered by the evil eye.

Only forbidding is forbidden.
Only ugliness is hidden.

In Haiti

Occupied Haiti. Edited by Emily Greene Balch. New York: Writers Publishing Company.

WHEN Thomas Jefferson was President of the United States the black slaves and freedmen of Haiti drove their French masters into the sea and set up the second independent republic in the western hemisphere. When Woodrow Wilson was President in Washington United States marines landed in Haiti, seized the gold in the National Bank, took over the customs-houses, closed the legislative assembly, and refused payment of salaries to Haitian officials who refused to do the white man's will.

That was war time, and the American people, engrossed in the European carnage, did not stop to notice that our own marines had killed 3,000 Haitians fighting for freedom. In so far as they heard anything of the bloodshed, they understood that the marines had killed some "bandits." That is the technique of imperialist publicity the world over, and the Marine Corps copy-boys know their job.

In 1920 James Weldon Johnson, of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, persuaded Mr. Harding, then a candidate for the Presidency, that he might gain votes by denouncing Democratic excesses in Haiti. Mr. Harding did so; and after he became President a senatorial committee "investigated" Haiti. The Haiti-Santo Domingo Independence Society, organized in the office of The Nation, and inspired largely by the passionate idealism of Ernest H. Gruening, who believed that if the facts were made known the American people would stop the outrage, sought to make the investigation real, and did for some months keep the tiny Negro republic on the front pages of the newspapers. Then the senatorial committee issued an on-the-one-hand-and-on-the-other report, and the impression gained currency that while unfortunate excesses might have occurred the situation had been remedied. Sunday stories now appear with interesting regularity reporting the astonishing achievements in health and agriculture of the American experts, and the desolate backwardness of the Haitians before the marines came to uplift them.

Now, in 1927, we read that the marines which are no longer needed to uplift Nicaragua are being returned to their posts in Haiti. The American people have shown scant interest in the facts or sympathy for the second republic in the Western hemisphere. Gas is cheap; and when it rains the movies are open.

Five American women, and one male college professor, representing the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, visited Haiti in 1926, talked with American officials, French priests, Haitians of every class and occupation, and now submit their report. It bears marks of the most rigorous editing. Passion is excluded; the bare ribs of factual data stick out on every page. Paul Douglas summarizes the official record of the American occupation—how it came to be, what it costs Haiti, what it costs the United States, the balance-sheet of American corporations in Haiti. They have, it seems, had scandalous privileges, and, with the exception of the National City Bank, have generally lost money. Emily Balch with scrupulous fairness expresses the American point of view that large land holdings and foreign capital are necessary for Haiti, but obviously fears the development of a landless proletariat such as makes Porto Rico miserably unique in the West Indies. She also reports upon the energetic Dr. Freeman of the Department of Agriculture, who has an ambitious plan for rural agricultural schools throughout Haiti, and has begun with a Central School of Agriculture, attended exclusively by subsidized city boys, where the learned American instructors lecture in English and pause while their remarks are interpreted into French for the benefit of the ignorant Haitians. Chapters follow on public health—the brightest page in the record; education—where the Haitians have stubbornly resisted Americanization; public works; the gendarmerie; and racial relations. The social relations between the bringers of civilization and the native Haitians are what one might expect those between Southern soldiers—and their wives!—and Negroes to be.

"Even more than [we] anticipated [we] found the problem in Haiti to consist not in individual instances of misused power but in the fundamental fact of the armed occupation of the country. . . ." Many of the American officials are earnestly endeavoring to work for the Haitians, but they have not learned to work with them. So the committee in a final chapter recommends withdrawal of the American officials and restoration of self-government "as soon as practicable," with interim civilian control.

The committee obviously labors to be fair to the American officials, and to be practical. After all, the Americans have destroyed the frail edifice of Haitian self-government, and what can you do about it? "Let's be practical," one is told. "You can't [illegible] indemnities for the damage the marines did. And after all, we have stopped revolution. What the Haitians need is peace, and foreign capital. It's a rich country, with great possibilities. Rubber . . . cheap labor . . . don't sacrifice the poor peasants to the city politicians. . . ." Lord, how smug Americans can be when they set out to uplift the rest of the world above their own home level! The committee, one feels, restrains itself on every page of its report; it hopes thereby to impress the enemy. I hope it will. (Possibly this effort explains the curious omission, in its history, of any reference to the work of Dr. Gruening, Mrs. Weed, Mr. Johnson, and the Haiti-Santo Domingo Independence Society.)

But what William Hard calls "the glacial drift of the American republic toward uplift at home and abroad"—especially abroad—continues. American corporations continue to invest American dollars abroad, and where they invest they expect protection. The Anglo-Saxon capacity for committing murder in the name of civilization is still unchecked; with smug self-righteousness, in Nicaragua, Shanghai, Boston, and Haiti, we still make of our crimes a virtue. Books like this help set straight the balance-sheet of history; and make a faint beginning toward a counter-drift. The struggle is not helpless. The juggernaut of imperialism does not roll on unopposed. China may seem to be in chaos, but the glacier of imperialism is receding in Asia; and Latin America's turn will come.

LEWIS S. GANNETT

A Philosophy of Renunciation

Platonism and the Spiritual Life. By George Santayana. Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.75.

FEELING perhaps the need to give his system a greater cogency and deeper foundations, Santayana has of late been making incursions into fields which had previously interested him slightly. In this book he attempts further to elucidate his obscure concept of spirit, with which he had wrestled unsuccessfully in what is undoubtedly the worst chapter of "Skepticism and Animal Faith." Be it because his usual style is not adequate to bear the burden of precise analysis—to attempt to render fundamental abstractions in loose poetical metaphors is to add to confusion—or be it because the concept is not quite clear in his own mind, he succeeds indifferently in his task. Santayana, however, has asked us several times to consider him a moralist, not a philosopher in the strict sense of the word. And, indeed, his thought obtains attention outside of academic circles as the moralist of "The Life of Reason," and not as the author of one more system of epistemology.

The life of reason is to Santayana the life of balanced interests and instincts held in check or satisfied for the sake of a wide and liberal moral economy. On the surface, as he enunciates it, it has a persuasiveness which is far from being based—as it has been said to be—upon the beautiful style in which Santayana has couched it. For its principle, that of selection, is not only one which naturally commends itself to the interests of a shrewd mind, but one which imposes itself as essential to any sort of conscious life. A certain amount of daring in fact, of intellectual foolhardiness, is necessary to reject it; or else a deeply irrational antagonism toward happiness and a brutal preference for chaos and unfruitful struggle. But the principle upon which a philosophy is based and its final elaboration into a way of life are two very different things. Santayana, guided by temperamental preferences, has perverted a wholly sound principle into a system which cannot be accepted when examined in the light of its implications.

From a social point of view, Santayana's philosophy must be objected to because more than a way of life it is really a sophistical defense of that which was against that which may be. There is in Santayana a radical distrust, almost a hatred for change; a tendency to idealize the past which makes him suspicious of all reform and revolution. His tirade against liberalism—all the more dangerous because it is an intelligent misunderstanding of it, so to speak—is not the only instance in which this distrust finds explicit avowal. Implicitly, his resentment of change permeates his whole thought so thoroughly that the critical reader often wonders whether this man, who as a moralist must necessarily be a reformer, and is yet so smug about traditional institutions, is not really a preposterous, living contradiction. From a psychological point of view Santayana's philosophy is even more objectionable. The system of ethics embodied in "The Life of Reason" is the product of a timid yet dogmatic spirit, apathetic to the thrill and danger of life; of a spirit naive enough, or arrogant enough, to pretend that it holds the key to wisdom in its hands. For that fine discrimination which Santayana persuades one to use, that selectiveness in meeting immediate contingencies, has not really wisdom for its source, but fear of experience, which presses a meretricious, timorous wisdom to its aid. Lack of courage—not intellectual, of course, nor moral, but courage to live—dictates in his thought reason's choice, and makes him prefer the pale happiness of denial to the risk of utter loss or success, which the man eager for life for its own sake would prefer to mediocre satisfaction. Either apathy or a low vitality causes him to hold as essentially evil the lust of experience, and makes him counsel the absolute eschewing of pain, as if pain, too, did not have its rewards, greater often than those of a calculating, narrow-visioned shopkeeper's love of safety. There can be no room therefore in his system, and in fact there is none, for the hero and for the martyr—though there may be no lack of praise for those who have been consecrated and are thus rendered safe—since the risks these choose are a tacit denial of the validity of happiness as an absolute ethical criterion. Obviously, a way of life with such limitations may be very well adapted to a finished, settled, perfect world, or to a world of philosophers, but it is certainly not a useful grammar of conduct in a world which remains yet to be conquered, and which resists conquest with irrational tenacity.

This is perhaps the main reason why Santayana has so signally failed to make a scratch upon American life. The American, a gambler, a man of action who must wreak his superabundant energy upon any object irrespective of ultimate consequences, may feel for Santayana's system of squeamish renunciation the same mixture of admiration and respect which the ragamuffin feels for the poor little rich boy. But he also feels a tremendous temperamental incompatibility with it. Renunciation may possibly be the better part of wisdom and the foregoing of experience itself an experience. A certain amount of renunciation is certainly imperative to the well-ordered life. But in Santayana's system it becomes an implicit end in itself. An ethics such as this, so closely girt with the staid neat row of elms of an academic view of life, cannot serve as inspiration or guide to a people adventurous and daring. It can only appeal to men afraid lest life impinge its luxuriance and its brutality upon their safety.

Merezhkovsky

The Birth of the Gods. By Dimitri S. Merezhkovsky. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.

Akhnaton. By Dimitri S. Merezhkovsky. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

MEREZHKOVSKY is always Merezhkovsky—a grotesque and pathetic little figure, a miniature compound image of Soloviev and Dostoievsky. Yet it is curious to see this purblind little man, this dogmatic little scholar in "silk morning dress and tasseled slippers," clench his fists, puff his cheeks, pop his eyes, and try to execute one grand and unprecedented leap into futurity. The present? He disdains the present. Contemporary wars and revolutions mean little to him. Together with his dogmas and his linens, he packs his endless excerpts from countless authors and scuttles off abroad, to Poland, to France, anywhere out of the Communist inferno. After a bit of fussing and fulminating, he settles in Paris, and there he does his great, his final, his glorious leap. Merezhkovsky disdains the present. By soaring over mankind's remote and pagan past, over ancient lands and forgotten civilizations, over countless ages in man's history, he hopes to reach the future. A rather devious way of getting there, but for a man of Merezhkovsky's courage to scale infinitude is a simple matter, particularly since he is possessed of mystical powers. Striking a flying posture, he whispers "abracadabra" and he is off.

To Merezhkovsky's eclectic mind the development of mankind from its earliest beginnings to the Java man and from the Java man to modern times is the "geometrical space in which the Body of Christ is being formed." All of pre-Christian history is only an adumbration; the birth of Christ is the "geometrical point that unites the Body and the shadow." "The mystery of the suffering God stretching throughout the ages falls at the feet of Christ." All the suffering and immolated gods of old—Osiris of Egypt, Tammuz of Babylon, Adonis of Canaan and the Aegean Islands, Attis of Asia Minor, Dionysus of Greece—"are the shadows, and the Body is of Him." Take Christ out of universal history, and you destroy universal history, "for the whole of it is about Him."

Making this leap through the past, our author alights in the future. For just as Christ was the "revelation," the "apocalypse" of paganism so will the "Holy Ghost," the "Mother," be the revelation, the apocalypse, of Christianity. Paganism was the religion of the Father foreshadowing the coming of the Son; Christianity is the religion of the Son foreshadowing the coming of the "Mother."

"The Birth of the Gods" and its sequel "Akhnaton," one dealing with ancient Crete, the other with Egypt during the reign of Akhnaton, are not novels at all. They are merely illustrations of the first part of the author's thesis, namely, that Christianity is the apocalypse of paganism. In these "novels" the men are not men, and the women are not women. Love is not love, and hatred is not hatred. The characters are puppets whom Merezhkovsky compels to tremble and shiver, to utter mystical words, to have epileptic fits, and to prophesy His coming. One does not believe Merezhkovsky, but if one believed, one might imagine that the peoples of the ancient world, the Cretans, the Babylonians, the Egyptians, lived only for one purpose—to prove that "all of paganism was an insatiable yearning for the Son." It is this schematism, this artificiality, this forcing of historical evidence, that gradually begins to pall on the average uninitiated reader. Indeed, the interest in this author evinced by some sections of the American intelligentsia seems rather strange and anachronistic. In Russia Merezhkovsky is dead. Some Russians say that he has merely ceased to exist, but others agree with Trotsky and maintain that Merezhkovsky "had never been." JOSHUA KUNITZ

Washington in Pictures

Washington. By Joseph Dillaway Sawyer. The Macmillan Company. Two volumes. $20.

IN two fat volumes of more than 1,200 pages, Mr. Sawyer retells the conventional story of Washington familiar to us all. It is a complete negation of the Woodward and Hughes biographies, accepting the traditional figure of mingled myth and fact. The more bizarre stories, like those of Weems, are not sponsored—nor neglected. The Jumonville incident is dismissed lightly, the schoolbook interpretation of Braddock is adopted, and Sally Fairfax does not swish her silken skirts at all. The hero is shown kneeling in prayer in the snows of Valley Forge despite the fact that even in church he did not kneel. From all of which it is evident that Mr. Sawyer is more an idolator than an interpreter, and that his biography will be found more comforting to the sensitive than to those previously mentioned.

Unfortunately the author has but a slight appreciation of the significance of the political struggles of the [illegible] Administrations. Hamilton here remains one of the sponsors and creators of the Constitution. He left the convention, it seems, after making an "impassioned speech," but the nature of that speech, an impassioned argument on the advantages of monarchical over the republican form of government, is not suggested. The Whiskey Rebellion is dismissed in less than two pages—merely a rising of wicked men. Again we have the story of the mob that wanted to drag Washington from his home—which is without foundation. The Livingston resolutions asking for the papers in connection with the negotiation of the Jay treaty again appear as threats of impeachment. The author seems to think that Hamilton's resignation was the first break in the Cabinet—Jefferson apparently not worth mentioning. And here, again, we have it that Washington refused to take command of the army in the framed-up war with France unless Hamilton should be second in command. A reference to the letters exchanged between Wolcott, Pickering, Hamilton, and McHenry would reveal a conspiracy of misrepresentation telling a different tale. No biography, however, goes so intensively into Washington's Masonic relationships.

Even so, this work is not to be flippantly dismissed. It represents the ardent labors of a lifetime; and the result appears in the greatest collection of pictures of Washington and scenes associated with his career ever assembled in a single work. More than a hundred pages are required for Washington portraits alone, comparatively few of these, of course, having been painted from life. As a pictorial biography this is probably as complete as we shall ever have. Pictures of the ancient seat of the Washingtons in England; numerous pictures of scenes in Barbados, including the interior of the house in which Washington, while with his brother, was stricken with the smallpox. Turning these pages one can scarcely conceive of any possible pictorial omissions. Without a line of text the two volumes would be well worth while as a biography in pictures. They are unique. CLAUDE G. BOWERS

Bad Editing

The de Imperatorum et Pontificum Potestate of William of Ockham. Hitherto unpublished, and now edited by C. Kenneth Brampton. Oxford University Press. $2.50.

THE editor of this reprint of Ockham's famous treatise is at pains in his introduction to make clear that his interest in the matter is not with the "details of an arid controversy" but with "some fundamental problems of practical experience." This is altogether a proper justification for a treatise which proceeds to a nice logical analysis of a problem (that of the relation of church and state) which has not ceased, since the fourteenth century, to interest the world. But Mr. Brampton permits his Protestant enthusiasms to spread an anachronistic color over the enterprise, and the audacious criticism in which Ockham is led to the denial of both the infallibility of the pope in spiritual matters and the propriety of his concern in temporal matters is made prolific of significances. These appear in the 38-page introduction in which Mr. Brampton undertakes to survey the history of attitudes toward the papacy from the time of Paul to John XXII, with prophetic glances further; as an introduction this was to have been in elucidation of Ockham's work, but it is quite free from immedite historical concerns, and there is no mention of even such matters as the attack of Konrad of Megenberg. Ockham had had occasion to criticize the abuses of a pope, but before his editor finishes he must off to dispose of the papacy.

The text, however, is even more startling than the introduction to it. This, according to the title-page and preface, should be the edition of a hitherto unpublished and unique manuscript. Actually the manuscript has been published before and far from being unique it is only about half the length of the complete work which has already been published from another manuscript. As long ago as 1911 Richard Scholz edited this treatise in the Unbekannte Kirchenpolitische Streitschriften (prophetically named, one supposes, for the present editor). That Mr. Brampton should not have known this edition is bad enough, but it is inexcusable that his edition should end in the middle of a sentence halfway through Ockham's tract; the second half of the work, which he leaves out, was published in 1924 (in the Archivum Franciscanum Historicum, see vols. XVI pp. 468-492 and XVII pp. 72-97). Had Mr. Brampton known the Deventer manuscript he might have been saved his romanticizing concerning the circumstance of this work coming through the ages in a single manuscript, and he might have been saved too his conjectures concerning how the last sentence might have ended—ante expropriationem talem habuerant, he has it, whereas it turns out to have been ymno quam aliquando habuerunt.

It is not unimportant to point out that the Oxford Press has sinned more than once of late in the unscholarly form it has given to what, from the language alone in which they are written, should be learned contributions. Even in an age of popularizations Latin manuscripts should be edited with rather more scholarship than unction. It is hard to understand what concern an editor can have with useful and practical aims, however edifying, if they are to lead him so far afield; one might even suppose, though the suggestion is doubtless unfair to the former editor of Marsilius of Padua, that the human and practical values with which his introduction is concerned might have been better served if he had busied himself with the arid details of learned journals.

RICHARD MCKEON

A Gifted Portraitist

Robert Field. By. Harry Piers. Frederick Fairchild Sherman. $20.

ROBERT Field is an artist who has been little more than a name to many students of early American painting. Specimens of his work are almost altogether privately owned, except for a few in public places in Nova Scotia; consequently it has been difficult to form an accurate estimate of his merits. For instance, Anne Hollingsworth Wharton, in her "Heirlooms in Miniatures," shows an acquaintance with only one of his pictures in the four sentences she devotes to him. Mr. Piers's new book on Field, with its fifty-three excellent illustrations, makes it clear that he is a more important figure than has been generally realized. He was an accomplished maker of portraits in oil and of miniatures on ivory and in water color, as well as a competent engraver. His oils, to be sure, show some unevenness of execution, judging from the reproductions before us. Several of them appear not to rise much above the standard of the average itinerant of the period. But his best canvases are obviously the work of one of the genuinely gifted painters of his time. Mr. Piers's contention that Field's style is to some extent similar to Stuart's is scarcely borne out by the illustrations, but one readily agrees that the portrait of Commander John Harper, which serves as frontispiece to this volume, no less an artist than Raeburn might have been proud to sign.

It is his miniatures on ivory, however, that most impressively display Field's powers. Even the uncolored reproductions manifest a delicate but firm beauty and a sure molding of the head that compel assent to the author's favorable comparison of this work with that of Malbone.

By diligent search Mr. Piers has been able to construct an outline of the main events of this interesting artist's life, although most of the details are still lacking. Field was born in England about 1769. After some artistic training he emigrated to America in 1794 and worked in Baltimore, Philadelphia, Washington, Maryland, and Boston, until in 1[illegible] he returned to British soil by taking up residence in Halifax. Here he enjoyed considerable professional and social success for about eight years, and then, having painted most of the paintable citizens of Nova Scotia, sought fresh laurels in Jamaica. Of his experience in this island his biographer has been able to discover almost nothing except that he died there August 9, 1819.

Mr. Piers adds a scholarly analysis of Field's technique and a full description of the 146 portraits known to him. It is evident that the author, himself a Nova Scotian, has worked with prolonged devotion over his subject in order to acquire the minute information concerning Field's paintings which he reveals on every page. None the less he recognizes that his catalogue is incomplete; hence the reviewer may be allowed to suggest one addition: the miniature of Lawrence Read Yates, shown at Philadelphia in the recent exhibition of the Pennsylvania Society of Miniature Painters.

Though writing in a manner that aims to inform rather than to interest, Mr. Piers has produced a monograph that is of unmistakable value to the special student and the collector, and that is an honorable accession to the growing shelf of books on the early art of America.

ORAL SUMNER COAD

Books in Brief

Harsha. By Radhakumud Mookerji. Oxford University Press. $2.

King Harsha (606-648 A.D.) was not only one of the greatest of Indian rulers but also one of the most interesting. Of sufficient political and military ability to extend the empire he had inherited until it covered practically all northern and central India, he was also a religious enthusiast, and, amazing to relate, a dramatist as well. His character recalls Asoka (c. 250 B.C.) and the Western Constantine, each his superior as conqueror and administrator, but neither boasting literary ability. He came to the throne on the foul murder of his elder brother, whom he succeeded, and the abduction of his sister, whom he rescued just as she was about to ascend a funeral pile. At the height of his rule, he used to hold a general alms-giving once every five years, in which he literally gave away the accumulated treasure of five years, including his own gems, clothing, and other possessions; at the end he begged from his sister an ordinary second-hand garment, which he put on and then paid worship to the Buddhas of the ten regions, rejoicing that his wealth was bestowed "in the field of religious merit." In more reflective moments, he composed three dramas of high merit, which have come down to us, and lyric poems, of which two are preserved. What a biography might have been written about such a man! But Professor Mookerji has not written a biography of Harsha; rather he has written an account, and a good one, of the social, economic, and administrative conditions under that emperor, with a couple of biographical chapters thrown in. And these chapters are the poorest in the book. We are disappointed, for we had expected a personal study of Harsha.

Problems in Shakespeare's Penmanship. By Samuel A. Tannenbaum, M.D. The Century Company. $4.

This volume, published for the Modern Language Association of America, is the second volume to appear under the terms of the Revolving Publication Fund. It is a detailed and severely technical study of a subject which has more of interest in it for the general reader than might at first glance be supposed; for upon the conclusions regarding Shakespeare's handwriting rest ultimately a great many vexed problems in the text of the plays. There is also the question, much debated during the past decade, of Shakespeare's share in the play of "Sir Thomas More." Dr. Tannenbaum reaches the conclusion that the three manuscript pages of that play, which several scholars believe to be in the poet's autograph, were not written by Shakespeare. He holds, on the other hand, that the signature in a copy of Florio's "Montaigne" may be genuine. He includes a detailed examination of the will. He was led to this investigation by the hope that his study might throw light upon the reasons for Shakespeare's early retirement and untimely death. The volume is illustrated with abundant and excellent facsimiles.

The American Civil War. A Brief Sketch. By David Knowles. Oxford University Press. $3.

The chief importance of this little book to most American readers will be in the evidence which it seems to afford of a growing popular interest in England in American history. Mr. Knowles, who confesses to a "long and deep interest" in the Civil War, has written a sketch which naturally lays no claim to originality, and which in matters of fact is not always inerrant, but which nevertheless merits the conventional praise of being readable and well-proportioned. His character drawings of Civil War leaders, on the other hand, on both the Union and the Confederate sides, are much better than ordinary, and his emphasis upon these personal elements of the war ought specially to commend the book to readers who like their history in terms of biography. Incidentally, the book should be well received in the South, if the South reads English books, for its appreciations of Lee and Stonewall Jackson are notably friendly as well as discriminating.

An Introduction to Sociology. Edited by Jerome Davis and Harry Elmer Barnes. D. C. Heath and Company. $4.48.

This latest exposition of the science of sociology is surprisingly, not to say erroneously, subtitled "A Behavioristic Study of American Society." The two editors write upon The Evolution of the Great Society and upon Sociology Applied to Social Problems, Mr. Barnes being responsible for the first and Mr. Davis for the second. Ellsworth Huntington writes on the physical environment of society, Frank H. Hankins on the biological equipment of society, L. L. Bernard on the psychological foundations of society, Malcolm M. Willey on the cultural heritage of society, and Seba Eldridge on Social Organization. The volume has many excellencies and, in spite of some perhaps unavoidable overlapping, presents a unity and coherence not ordinarily found in such cooperative undertakings.

The Twilight of the White Races. By Maurice Muret. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.

M. Muret sees a rising tide of color washing hither and thither through the world, but he sees it through the eyes of other observers and magazine articles, and if his chapter on race problems in the United States may be taken as a test he does not see it either comprehensively or very clearly. Believing that Woodrow Wilson inaugurated the present wave of democratic feeling and the spirit of self-determination instead of realizing that his value was as an interpreter is characteristic of the thinness of his view. His opinion is the comparatively cheerful one that if the white races have to go down before the rest the process will be gradual and so painless. They could put up, he suggests, a long defensive warfare. But that is not the kind of war they want to fight. Most of the warfare on these lines has been the result of the white races' desire to insist on contact with the other races on their own conditions.

The Spirit of '76 and Other Essays. By Carl Becker, J. M. Clark, William E. Dodd. Washington: The Robert Brookings Graduate School of Economics and Government.

These lectures, three in number, were all delivered on November 19, 1926, at the Robert Brookings Graduate School, "in commemoration of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the year which witnessed the publication of 'The Wealth of Nations' and The Declaration of Independence." Professor Becker, who suspects that Professor Lyon of the school, who asked him to speak, "hadn't any clear notion of what was meant by the phrase 'The Spirit of '76,'" and who confesses that he himself had none, offers as his contribution an alleged manuscript of 1792 in which one Jeremiah Wynkoop, of New York and Greenwich Village, is made the central figure of a twentieth-century discussion of the reasons which led some Americans to become Patriots and others to remain Loyalists. Professor Dodd, for his part, tells in agreeable fashion the story of the rôle, chiefly military, which Patrick Henry played in the revolt of Virginia. The historical substance of both of these addresses would adapt them admirably to the requirements of an exceptionally provincial woman's club or a moderately high-grade luncheon group of Rotarians. Professor Clark, on the other hand, appears to have taken his invitation seriously, and presented to his audience a capital brief account of the position of Adam Smith and a summary of his contributions to economic theory and practice.

Drama

Pickwick Redivivus

AT least half the magic of Dickens is purely verbal and hence not to be translated into visual terms. Not only was his primary gift a gift for words, but even these words are usually effective less because of the exactitude with which they convey an image than because of the flavor which they diffuse. Intoxicated as he was with his own good humor, he could make even the cadence of his exuberant sentences do much towards creating in his readers that mood of abandonment which enables them to accept his situations; and his fantastic characters can breathe no atmosphere other than that wholly unearthly one generated out of mere language. No illustrations—not even the famous ones by Cruikshank—are quite satisfactory. They inevitably degenerate into something nearer mere caricature than the personages they are intended to represent ever, on the printed page, appear to be, and the reason is simply that both the narration and the description of Dickens are frequently no more than a series of colorful suggestions never intended to be completely objectified. His characters and situations were not first visualized and then written down but grew in the writing instead, so that they have their existence in sentences and paragraphs rather than in any plastic realm.

To say this is, of course, to say that his novels are not very well fitted for dramatic treatment, since only his dialogue can be directly utilized and since no designer of a mise en scène can either handle his rebellious materials as nimbly as Dickens handled words or make it as changingly responsive to the mood of the moment. And yet, within these necessary limitations, "Pickwick" (Empire Theatre), which Cosmo Hamilton and Frank C. Reilly have fashioned from the best and most characteristic of the Dickens extravaganzas, is both surprisingly fine and delightfully entertaining. There are, to be sure, occasional moments—like that in which the hackney-coachman, who has just driven upon the stage, describes his horse—when one is forcibly reminded of the fact that, for instance, no real horse present before the eyes could ever live up to the description which has just been given of him, but such moments are rare and the effects seldom miss fire. The adapters have frankly accepted the episodic character of their material and they have got much out of the episodes. Without resorting to any of that too forcedly exuberant clowning which so often renders modern performances of old comedies genuinely painful, the production does manage to achieve the requisitely exuberant good humor, and without ever falling into sentimentality it does also manage to achieve that hint of sentiment which makes certain of the moments charming. Thus the courtroom scene in which Buzfuz describes to the jury how the monster Pickwick betrayed the faith which the widow Bardell had always had in single gentlemen, is a brilliant piece of satiric farce, and thus, too, the concluding scene—the Christmas party at Old Wardell's—is, in spite of the fact that it is no more than a tableau, picturesquely delightful.

Doubtless the play, superbly acted though it is, would not stand wholly on its own feet. One must bring to it some previously acquired capacity to understand things "in the Pickwickian sense"—one must, that is to say, be able to anticipate or interpret some of that which one sees upon the stage by the memory of a mood which the play is sufficient to generate in the first instance; and yet, however important the little which the spectator must bring with him may be, it is not much. Any one who ever, even long ago, read "Pickwick" with delight will find the play also delightful. He may miss some of his favorite characters—where, for example, is that reverend but unfortunate Mr. Stiggins who had his face immersed in a horse-trough?—but he will see enough to repay him richly for a visit to the Empire.

If—and I confess that it does not seem probable—Theodore Dreiser should ever collaborate on a play with Mr. Willard Mack the result probably would be something very much like "Women Go On Forever," the melodrama now playing at the Forrest. The author, Daniel Rubin, has combined the technique of the crook play with the ethos of the naturalistic novel, and the result is something far from ineffectual but not a little startling. His scene is a cheap boarding house and his story involves three gang murders, but instead of sweetening his characters up after the conventional formula he treats them with all the crass cynicism of a police court reporter, and produces a play as sordid in its implications as a front page story in the tabloid press. It ends when the amorous land-lady who has just sent one of her boarders out to be shot in the alley begins to make eyes at the new tenant, and even a hardened audience tittered nervously at the scabrous brutality of some scenes. The ineptly named drama "Such is Life" (Morosco Theatre) is a serious study of three sisters crushed by a sense of family duty. The scene is the America of the Nineties and the play has solid merit in spite of certain crudities. Crudity is, on the other hand, the last thing one would charge against the new Cohan farce "The Baby Cyclone." It revolves around the efforts of a young man to get rid of a dog too much beloved by his wife, and in spite of the fact that this theme is far from new, extraordinarily expert writing keeps it continuously funny. Moreover it has at least one original touch. Though one never felt quite safe until the curtain finally descended, the fact is worth recording that the difficulties were settled without even a hint that a little stranger, destined to displace the dog in the affections of the woman, was imminent.

British Opinion on the Sacco-Vanzetti Execution

BEFORE the execution of Sacco and Vanzetti foreign newspapers and periodicals presented an amazing unanimity of opinion in opposition to such an act. French, German, and English journals, regardless of their political sympathies and even in spite of their acknowledged horror of both anarchistic and communistic theories, pleaded that the United States observe "a decent respect to the opinions of mankind." Feeling was aroused still further by the news of the execution, as the following quotations from English periodicals, mostly weeklies, indicate:

THE LONDON NATION, AUGUST 27

At the center of a world scene that has had no parallel in history, Sacco and Vanzetti were executed at midnight on Monday in Charlestown jail, Boston. The city was as if in a state of siege. The entire police force was mobilized, together with detachments of the State militia. The prison was occupied by a special guard of five hundred police, heavily armed and supported with machine-guns, gas-projectors, and tear-bombs. The reasons for such extraordinary precautions were not apparent in Boston, since the only demonstrations reported were mass meetings of protest on the Common and processions toward the jail. In New York, where the police force at call is stated to have reached a total of fourteen thousand, a great protest was organized in one of the central squares. Demonstrations against the executions took place in numberless cities throughout the world, the most violent being in Paris and Geneva, where all American official centers and every place known to be frequented by Americans were in imminent danger from the mob. Police to the number of two thousand were set to guard the American Embassy and Consulate-General in London, perhaps the only capital city in the world where the anger aroused by the terrible end of the affair was not a menace to the public peace. For the first time in 150 years the flag of the United States has been treated in every land as the symbol of a great wrong. This is the grave fact which the American Government and people have to recognize. (Italics ours).

THE NEW STATESMAN, AUGUST 27

There is grotesque irony in the fact that the killing of these two Italians involved in the United States a display of armed force such as no American citizen has ever before seen, and in every European country a police mobilization costing huge sums of money. . . . In Paris and Geneva the authorities had to deal with mobs raging against the United States and swooping down upon every public place, every cafe and cabaret, associated with Americans. "The imposing unanimity of foreign opinion has made a deep impression everywhere," cabled the Times Washington correspondent, and we can well believe it. The conclusion of the whole tragic matter would seem to be that the Governor of Massachusetts was able to resist the remarkable force of legal authority and public opinion organized on behalf of the victims because he knew himself to be supported by the blind mass-opinion of American nationalism, demanding that Sacco and Vanzetti be done to death—first because they were Reds and, therefore, pests to be wiped out, and secondly because Uncle Sam is master in his own house. And yet, it may be recalled, the authors of the Declaration of Independence affirmed that what they did in 1776 was done with "a decent respect to the opinions of mankind."

THE SPECTATOR, AUGUST 27

There has been a continuance of demonstrations, riots, and explosions all over the world. In Hyde Park on Tuesday night a very large crowd was dispersed by the police. Some persons were injured chiefly through being thrown down by the jostling crowd which was trying to escape. There is no doubt that the whole Sacco-Vanzetti affair has caused considerable misgiving among many thoughtful Americans. As such incidents, which provoke hot foreign criticism, are likely to lead to bad feeling, let us be precise once more as to where we think criticism is justified and where it is not. . . . The defects to which we think we are entitled to call attention are the fact that Judge Thayer should hear appeals against himself and that there should have been the monstrous delay of six years during which the condemned men were in unrelieved suspense.

THE ECONOMIST, AUGUST 27

Compared to the torment of constantly expecting, year in and year out, to be put to death, the final infliction of the penalty seems almost an anti-climax—a relaxation of the tension rather than the last turn of the screw. When we turn, however, from the humanitarian aspect of the case to regard it as a social phenomenon, the interesting fact is the violence of the emotion which it has aroused and the extent to which this emotion has propagated itself through all countries and all classes. To begin with, no doubt, it was not unmixed with political partisanship. In the earlier protests, the most prominent part was played by the political organizations of the condemned men's fellow-Communists; and no doubt the Communist leaders, beyond their genuine and spontaneous feeling for their comrades, saw in this agitation a favorable opportunity for spreading the atmosphere of the class war. Another political current, again, has been derived from the gradually accumulated irritation against the United States which undoubtedly exists both in Europe and in Latin-America, and which has found vent, in those continents, in a campaign on behalf of Sacco and Vanzetti, in which the "bourgeoise" has participated almost as heartily as the "proletariat." The point of real interest is that, beyond these expressions of class or continental feeling for which the martyrdom of these two European Communists in America has given occasion, there has been called into activity a genuine international public opinion of a quite disinterested kind . . . and as it becomes less emotional and better informed, it may become the greatest force for good.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS, SEPTEMBER

On Tuesday, August 23, something happened whose consequences will stretch far on in time; one of those events which, by crystallizing men's fluid thoughts, shape them to belief and action. Two obscure Italians, Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti, who had lain in jail seven years on a charge of murder for robbery, were electrocuted by sentence of the Massachusetts court of justice. During those seven years millions of people all over the world came to believe these two men innocent. Never has there been such a world-wide passion of revolt against a judicial sentence. The Dreyfus case was nothing to it. In America itself a devoted committee gave time and poured out money in protest and defense. In Latin-America, in Britain and Germany and France, and even in Switzerland, oft-renewed popular demonstrations have witnessed to deep feeling. It is the nature of that feeling which gives peculiar political and social importance to the killing of these two. Outraged sense of justice, pity for men so long tortured, gave poignancy to feeling; but the intensity of passion which bound millions together over this case is the measure of their conviction that there is no justice for those who take political means to change fundamentally the lot of the worker. They may tinker, but they may not try to change the social order. Above all, the institution of war is sacred. These two men were pacifist anarchists, and therefore terrible.

It is probable that those responsible for American justice believed that they were honestly doing the right thing; that is the ghastly part of it. Hot-blooded murder is not half so ghastly as such stupid automatism. Some of the demonstrations against the process of law have seemed, on the surface, as unmeaning and as undirected; basically, however, the most violent and senseless of them had an infinitely deeper and sounder foundation in humanity.

THE NEW LEADER, AUGUST 26

The incredible has happened. Sacco and Vanzetti have been electrocuted, despite the moral protest of the whole world. Their names and words will be revered through history. The day will come when even America will be proud of them and ashamed of their murderers, as we are proud of the many martyrs in British history and ashamed of those who did them to death.

The explanation of the indifference of the Massachusetts judicial authorities to the opinion of the world is indicated in one of the messages sent by the Daily News correspondent. "At the eleventh hour public opinion in America remains unchanged," he cabled:

> That opinion, in brief, is that it is better these men die [illegible] encouragement to attack the political basis on which prosperity rests.

Even from this callous point of view the American ruling class will find that it has made a mistake. The murder of Sacco and Vanzetti has done more to bring the "political basis" of America into contempt than all the propaganda of the anarchists.

The Fascist State

THE following view of the Fascist state is from the London Times of August 18:

The war bore particularly hard, in Italy, upon the lower middle class, from which come the professional men, the physicians, lawyers, doctors, and engineers—all those, in a word, who see in a university degree a means of making a career, in a country where industry, commerce, and colonies do not yet attract and absorb, as in England and America, a great part of the population. The youths of the lower middle class, whose studies were interrupted and whose ordinary channels of life were closed by the war, threw themselves into the Fascist movement. Let us say [illegible] sources. Signor Mussolini, who sometimes is sincere to the point of brutality, once said that, all things considered, the Fascist revolution had simply been "a violent substitution of [illegible] ness" in itself, but these youths, encouraged by success, went [illegible] help to transform it on the lines laid down by the Syndicalists, in order to be able to satisfy their needs more generously. The [illegible] officers, and has set up with the syndicates a complex, vast, and remunerative bureaucracy in which, as organizers, secretaries, and so forth, hundreds of thousands of persons are finding place.

With what thoughts and with what feelings have these youths reached all the posts of responsibility in the new Italy? The great majority of them came with very little preparation and with an incomplete education, having been away from schools and books for four or five years. But they came with a remnant of the feelings of violence and arrogance which the war had awakened—at least among those who had fought with [illegible] above all with the conviction that the war, which they had won, had been [illegible] sults adequate to the effort made, and that their country ha[illegible] been deprived, by the envy and ill-will of the Allies, of th[illegible] fruits of victory at Versailles. Hence their exasperated an[illegible] aggressive patriotism, their distrust of the Allies of yesterda[illegible] and, generally, their instinctive dislike and suspicion of a[illegible] that is foreign. Hence, also, that feeling of scorn so wide[illegible] spread, not to say general, in the new Italy for the Leagu[illegible] of Nations, which in their eyes represents the guarantor o[illegible] treaties which they believe unjust to their country and of [illegible] status quo and a peace which they think it is not in Italy[illegible] interests to preserve too long.

The new Italy has a grievance and means to redress it[illegible] Hence the bellicose spirit that it is desired to instil into th[illegible] new generation, which is to think and feel imperially and pre[illegible] pare for the day—der Tag!—(Signor Mussolini has informe[illegible] us that it will be between 1935 and 1950) when the "wings o[illegible] Italian aeroplanes will obscure the sun. . . ."

[illegible] reap th[illegible] fruits of her victory, the fault lay not only with the Allies[illegible] but also with the statesmen and, generally, the men and [illegible] parties responsible for the government and the policy of th[illegible] country at the time when peace was discussed and concluded[illegible] and Democracy, Socialists and Socialism, and their infatuation for ideas of absolutism, dug up from all the dusty treatises of political archæology and brilliantly presented by the Fascist writers as the new and original revelations of the Third Rome.

Finally, as a third consequence of the ideas and the feelings with which the new state is now being formed, these youths, who wish at all costs to be different from their predecessors, oppose to what they scornfully call Liberal idealism the practical and realistic spirit of Fascism. Never has the cult of material things had so many devotees as it has now in Italy. To construct bridges and turbines, hydraulic plants and railways, ports and ships, engines and machinery, to develop industry, commerce and agriculture, is no doubt a promising sign of energy and enterprise: it is a very beautiful thing, but, surely, it is not the only thing that will give happiness and greatness to a people. For the moment, at any rate, we see that its chief result has been to give a certain amount of riches to a certain section of Italian society. The lower middle class has, in a very short time, risen to fortune, and today sits in the front row of the national show.

ADMIRAL MAGRUDER'S BROOM has raised a cloud of dust in the Navy Department that seems to have set the whole Washington staff of arm-chair tars choking. He says in the Saturday Evening Post that the department is rotten with inefficiency and extravagance—so much so that "for every dollar expended for repairs it required that nearly four dollars be expended to maintain a navy yard to make repairs." Since 1908 the cost of the navy has quadrupled; it has twice as many men and four times as many officers as twenty years ago. Where 171 officers were on duty in Washington in 1916, 508, with a full force of clerks and stenographers, spend the government money today. A new aircraft-carrier is comfortably equipped with 62 typewriters. And so on. The majesty of the Department seems aggrieved at the admiral's plain speaking—bureaucrats always resent criticism; but the country is likely to agree with Senator Borah and to wish that we had a Magruder in every department and bureau in Washington.

INDIANA'S POLITICAL SCANDALS broaden and deepen. Following the indictment of Governor Jackson has come the trial and conviction of Mayor Duvall of Indianapolis for violating the corrupt-practices act of the State. Mr. Budenz, in telling on another page the curious vagaries of Mayor Duvall, indicates that Indiana's political dirt has soiled the hands of men as high up in the Republican Party as United States Senators Watson and Robinson. Mayor Duvall himself appears to be an oddly befuddled individual whose promises have far outrun his possible performances. In order to find jobs enough to go around he has filled about every place in the City Hall twice. Since Mr. Budenz wrote, Mayor Duvall has appointed his wife as City Controller and had persuaded Claude Johnson—who previously had held three successive posts in one day—to become Chief of Detectives. Johnson was asked to relinquish the office of City Controller in order to make way for Mrs. Duvall. If Duvall's conviction is upheld in the higher courts and he is ousted as mayor, his wife will succeed to that job. The people of Indiana are reported to be stunned rather than angry over the revelations thus far. We shall watch their actions with interest when they come out of the daze.

PROGRESSIVE PROGRAMS, in the absence of a progressive party, may seem of the substance of dreams, but they are also the substance of which parties are built. Senator Nye of North Dakota has drawn up a platform for Progressives in the next Congress. He wants farm relief—as to what kind he is vague; flood relief; a clipping of the overgrown wings of the federal-reserve bank system; government operation of Muscle Shoals and other power developments; abolition of the "lame-duck" sessions of Congress; and abandonment of all semblance of government guaranty of private loans abroad. Senator Nye has gone further in defining his program than many other Western Progressives, but we wish that he might have developed it as a coherent philosophy of popular government. Parties seem to crystallize about immediate issues, but where they endure they express something more profound. Also, Senator Nye does not seem to see that the tariff is the Achilles' heel of that business control of government which he seeks to destroy.

SO COLORFULLY AND AMICABLY has the Legion convention in Paris gone that we cannot but regret that it should have been topped off by the choice of Edward E. Spafford as head of the Legion. For Mr. Spafford represents all the reactionary and narrowly patriotic tendencies within the Legion. He stands for the opposite of what the liberal minority in the permanent staff of the society is trying to accomplish. We seem, therefore, to be in for a year when the Legion as a national organization will be on the side of the 100-per cent patrioteers and heresy-hunters. More than that, there are uncomfortable rumors afloat in Legion circles that the election was the result of a deal put through at the last annual convention, and that the methods employed to bring about Mr. Spafford's election suggested the familiar methods of cheap ward politicians.

THE TEXT of the American note to France on the tariff entanglement has not yet been printed in full, but enough of it has appeared to make the Westminster

Gazette in London declare that it is unprecedented in tone and substance. It admits that our tariff is high and will continue to be high, but it demands favors for us with, apparently, no quid pro quo. Premier Poincaré, it is announced, has personally taken the matter up and is studying the note with care. We hope he is, and merely trust that nothing will keep him from replying with the greatest frankness. He usually has the courage to say what he thinks and in this case he can if he wishes speak for all of Europe. He might point out that one of the beloved Fourteen Points for which we went to war called for "the removal so far as possible of all economic barriers and the establishment of an equality of trade conditions among all the nations consenting to the peace." We doubt, however, if he will, as Washington fears, link his reply with the question of the money France owes us, though, economically speaking, he would be entirely justified in doing so. The European nations can hardly pay their debts to us if we continue to maintain our high tariffs. If Washington wants tariffs most it ought to accept the consequences—the loss of hundreds of millions of dollars, and tariff wars thrown into the bargain. Tariffs spell international hates and trickery and friction, and are stupidity itself for a country like the United States, which is compelled to obtain from the rest of the world at least seventy vital articles of trade.

IT WILL SOON be necessary to organize a national society for the reform of our police. In Memphis no less than thirty-eight policemen have had to be dismissed at one fell swoop, including lieutenants and sergeants, because their names appeared on a bootlegger's payroll. Even more serious are the persistent crimes by policemen against the persons of men they arrest. Magistrate Silberman in the Washington Heights court of New York City recently denounced two policemen who had arrested three Negroes on the charge of assault and declared that these guardians of the peace had acted like "infuriated beasts" and "raving maniacs." The Negroes had done nothing, but, as one policeman explained, "we've had three shots of liquor and we feel like raising hell." So they beat the Negroes until the patrol-wagon came and then subjected them to the almost usual procedure of being beaten up again in the police-station. "Have you ever heard of anything more brutal in the history of the city?" asked the magistrate as he declared that not a scintilla of evidence had been produced against the Negroes. Well, we have. There have been worse cases here in New York, but we are perfectly certain that the Police Commissioner will do as little in this case as he has done in the other instances of police crime which have found their way into print. He has not yet done anything decisive to stop the reckless shooting by his men who recently killed three citizens in a week.

THE NEGRO is the target not only of criminal policemen. Recently an elderly physician was murdered in his motor car in the woods near Hammonton, New Jersey. His wife declared that two partly disguised Negroes had stopped the car, attempted to assault her, and, when her husband came to her aid, killed him. At once State police and posses searched the country. Had two Negroes been caught near the scene they would have been lucky to have escaped with mere "third-degree" torture. It now appears probable that the wife was carrying on an intrigue with another man, and the police have abandoned the search for those Negroes. Every Negro knows that there is no commoner device of white criminals than to blacken their faces or for persons guilty of a crime to declare that "two Negro brutes" committed it. In August Manly Justice, white, shot and fatally wounded Earl Williams, at Durham, N. C. Until he died Williams maintained that a Negro had shot him and a mob at once instituted a "man-hunt." After Williams died Justice confessed to the murder. Luckily no Negro had been caught and killed meanwhile. On March 15, 1922, Maurice Mays, colored, was legally executed in Knoxville for the murder of a Mrs. Lindsey, a white woman. In August, 1927, a white woman confessed in Norton, Va., that she, "dressed in men's clothes and with her face blackened," had killed Mrs. Lindsey. Despite her confession she was released. Had not a dead "nigger" already atoned for her crime?

DEFEATED BY THE OVERWHELMING POWER of the employers, the State militia, and the strike-breakers, eight hundred strikers of the Harriet Cotton Mills of Henderson, North Carolina, have gone back to work. The strikers were working a fifty-five-hour week in an old-fashioned, unsanitary mill-village, in many cases for wages of less than $9 a week. They asked for a 12½ per cent increase in wages, and were ignored. They struck, and were organized into the United Textile Workers by an organizer of one of its branches, the full-fashioned hosiery weavers. In spite of their isolation and poverty, and in spite of the needless intervention of State troops, they held out for many weeks with magnificent courage. The mill-owners agreed, in taking the strikers back to work, to clean the village wells, provide shoes and school-books for the children, and to forget five weeks' back rent.

THIS HENDERSON STRIKE marks an important step in the progress of the Southern mill-workers because of the sympathy which the strike aroused in the South. Farmers for miles around Henderson contributed food to the strike. Some powerful Southern papers, notably the Raleigh News and Observer, owned by Josephus Daniels, questioned the justice of the mill-owners' position. The advertising of the strikers' grievances served to underscore some very significant statistics concerning the distribution of our national prosperity. The Henderson strikers who received $9 a week are not exceptional—the average weekly wage of all cotton-mill-workers in North Carolina is only $13.63—and North Carolina has a legal sixty-hour week with higher wages than any Southern State. The men who started the Henderson strike and lost their jobs may never again secure employment from the anti-union mill-owners of their State, but their efforts have not been in vain. They have done much to prick the bubble of self-satisfaction with the South's industrial boom.

AN INCONSPICUOUS DISPATCH from India via London, published in the New York Herald Tribune, reports two items bearing significantly on social questions of the greatest importance. The first announces the promulgation in the native state of Kashmir of a law prohibiting the consummation of marriage of girls less than fourteen years of age and of boys less than eighteen. This is a most vigorous measure against child marriage, perhaps too much so to be enforceable, yet indicative of the growing tendency toward reform. All over India leaders have for many years labored for such action: but in British India, due to the more complex nature of the governmental problem, it has been harder than in the more autocratically ruled native states to overcome the prejudices of orthodox Hinduism—with orthodox Hindus to have a daughter who has reached puberty without being married is accounted a major sin to the parents. Most gratifying is it to see that the present step has been taken in a state governed by a Hindu, not Mohammedan, family.

THE SECOND ITEM points to retrogression. The aged Begum of the large native state of Bhopal, having recently abdicated the throne, now as a private citizen devotes her personal fortune, estimated at fifty million dollars, to an India-wide drive for Islam. The most lamentable phase of the present Indian situation is the Hindu-Moslem tension that keeps the country in two great hostile camps, even making it necessary that members of the various legislative bodies should be elected separately by religious communities, and, as Gandhi constantly points out, more than any other fact prevents the attainment of self-government. Five years ago under his persuasive leadership the age-long conflict had temporarily subsided; within the past two years it has blazed forth again in renewed fury. The Begum's pious act will fan the flames still higher, and is to be mentioned only in the same breath with the provocative Shuddhi (purity) campaign of the Arya Samaj to win back to Hinduism certain groups that have been converted to the Mohammedan faith. If the glory of India has in the past been her religions, one may wonder if they are not now her curse.

THE MERGER of the George H. Doran Company with Doubleday, Page and Company comes as a surprise to those who supposed that either publishing house was as large as it could comfortably be. Whatever the motives for such consolidation, or whatever the necessity, it is clear that in Doubleday, Doran and Company we are to see one of the most elaborate of all organizations to date for the production and sale of books. In England also will the effect be felt, since the firm of William Heinemann, Ltd., enters the merger and brings a long and representative list of British authors. The new house, which officially begins operations on January 1, will be the publishers for Kipling, Conrad, Bennett, Wells, Conan Doyle, Somerset Maugham, Ellen Glasgow, Hugh Walpole, Frank Swinnerton, Booth Tarkington, Mary Roberts Rinehart, Edna Ferber, Irvin Cobb—and hundreds more—a formidable list of writers both popular and distinguished. And there are all the magazines issued under the name of Doubleday from Garden City. Things are happening in the world of books, and this perhaps is one of the most significant. Possibly the future there as elsewhere lies in the direction of consolidation. What will be the result?

THE STOCK OF JAMES BOSWELL continues to soar. Professor Tinker's recent edition of the letters written by that friend and creator of Dr. Johnson woke numerous readers to a realization that in him we have one of the principal spirits of the eighteenth century. And now comes Colonel Ralph Isham from England with the contents of the famous "ebony cabinet" which Boswell mentioned in his will as containing valuable literary remains. The whole contents of the chest are still to be known, but there are new letters between Boswell and Pitt, Johnson, Burke, Malone, Goldsmith, Voltaire, Burns, and William Temple; there is the complete manuscript of "An Account of Corsica"; and there are other, perhaps still more precious, memoranda describing experiences and relationships which we shall want to know about. Professor Tinker with pardonable partiality has been quoted as saying that the collection is the most important literary discovery of the century. In any event it is one of the most interesting, and we now await the edition of the papers which is promised by Colonel Isham in collaboration with Geoffrey Scott. The nineteenth century supposed that Boswell was a silly man and therefore not a great one. He was silly; he was, in his own very original way, great.

YELLOW FEVER came to America in the water-jars of the African slave-ships, a sort of cosmic curse upon the institution of slavery. It killed hundreds of thousands—8,000 in one year in New Orleans, only three-quarters of a century ago. There were ports in South America which became known as sure-death pest-holes, and lost their trade. Then came the suggestion that a mosquito carried the infection, and the heroic proof when Walter Reed and his associates faced death to prove a scientific guess; and then the demonstration by Dr. Gorgas, in Havana and Panama, that sanitary measures could wipe out the plague. In the last two decades yellow fever—in large part due to the work of the Rockefeller doctors—has been virtually wiped out in the Western Hemisphere, surviving only in a few remote parts of Brazil—one of the greatest scientific achievements of our day. In recent years the Rockefeller doctors have followed the germ to Africa, attempting to locate the source of the infection in West Africa, hoping in the coming decades to stamp it out off the earth. That Adrian Stokes, one of the British doctors with the Rockefeller Yellow Fever Commission, should have died in West Africa of an infection caught from one of the mosquitoes used in his own experiments, is an heroic tragedy in keeping with the strange history of the disease.

THE TRAGIC DEATH of the German Ambassador to the United States, Baron von Maltzan, in an airplane accident, is a grave loss to both countries. There was an unusually warm note of regret in the official condolences sent by President Coolidge and Secretary Kellogg, and there is no question that all of Washington official society will lament this termination of a career which, short as it was, had accomplished a great deal for the reestablishment of the old friendly relations between the two countries. The Ambassador showed tact and discretion in his contacts with the government, was guarded and discreet in his wisely occasional public utterances, and, with the great aid of his wife, made his embassy socially the most popular in Washington. It is no derogation of him to say that he knew what cards to play, how to play them, and with what persons to play, for that, after all, is a diplomat's business. The task of recreating the relations of the two countries after such a ghastly war of falsehood, calumny, and lying on both sides was a gigantic task. Herr von Wiedfeldt began it well as a quiet business man; Baron von Maltzan carried it far as a skilled professional diplomat and man of the world.

Wanted: Leadership

NICHOLAS MURRAY BUTLER may have been wrong when he declared that there were no great men in the world today, but he could point to the position of the old political parties in the United States as proof positive of the correctness of his statement as far as this country is concerned. The absence of outstandingly first-rate men among those most mentioned for the Presidency seems to us another striking evidence of the humbug which our participation in the World War was. Had the war been that glorious uprising for democracy, that passionate spending of ourselves in order to preserve civilization, that selfless forging of a new charter for humanity which it pretended to be, could we today face the fact that, barring Herbert Hoover, not a single one of those whose names are suggested for the Presidency rose out of the war or gained prestige from it? The war achieved no immortal music, no national hymn, no glorious bit of literature, and no statesman who in his ideals, his aspiration, his record, or his personality even faintly typifies the "crusade" of 1914 and consequently challenges the interest and regard of the American electorate.

Take the Democratic Party. It is universally admitted that the retirement of Mr. McAdoo leaves Governor Smith far in the lead for the nomination. Ex-Senator Underwood of Alabama declares he must be named; representative Democratic politicians from eight Western States all but unanimously declared on September 23 that Smith was the man. There is actually no alternative, save to name as candidate a man unknown to the bulk of the party, who has neither program nor policies, who would have to win his audience as completely as a hitherto unheralded stage star on his or her first night. So the Democracy must choose "Al" Smith, who, for all his engaging qualities, has not identified himself with any national political program or defined school of thought, who has given not the slightest evidence of equipment to deal with the vital international issues which confront not only the United States but the whole world. What, let us ask, would happen if an unkind fate should disable Governor Smith before next June? The great Democracy which cast votes at the last Presidential election would not know which way to turn for a candidate now in public life. It might then be compelled to turn from politics to business and to consider a man of the type of Owen D. Young, who has made his name in connection with one of the biggest business enterprises in the country.

The Republicans are, of course, in a better situation. Mr. Hughes has unusual ability, a ruthless will, a self-righteousness and self-conceit to rank him with Woodrow Wilson himself. Mr. Hoover is a success as an administrator, without, however, the attributes of political leadership or of popular appeal. Ex-Governor Lowden made a record as Governor of Illinois which reformers and progressives in that State are quick to admit is deserving of high praise. These three all stand in ability head and shoulders above Calvin Coolidge—yet not one gives the slightest promise of breaking the stronghold of Big Business. They personify the present trend of Washington—have not Hughes and Hoover helped to shape it? Both of them are militant imperialists at heart who may be counted on to carry on the international policies which have made us universally disliked, feared, and hated in one country after another.

When one turns to the Senate the dearth of Presidential timber is obvious—although the increasingly erratic Senator Borah ranks high. But, of course, the fact is that no one in the Republican Party will be definitely chosen to succeed Calvin Coolidge until the masters of that party get together in a hotel room either before or during the convention and make up their minds who their choice is. It may be that it will be settled soon, for the leaders are worried over the Smith candidacy and are beginning to believe that if the Governor is nominated it will be necessary to take Mr. Hughes who has carried New York whenever he has run. Secretary Mellon has only made a half-denial of his reported leaning to Mr. Hughes and belief that Mr. Coolidge's "choice" is final. For Wall Street Andrew Mellon is a beneficent deity, and it is certain that if Mr. Mellon really indorses Mr. Hughes's candidacy and proceeds to work for him the ex-Secretary of State will go to the convention almost solidly backed by the business interests. Is he not a great corporation lawyer? Has he not unquestioned ability and long training? Has he not been a successful Justice of the Supreme Court and an able Secretary of State? Is he not safe and sound? Will not he, who held out so strongly against the recognition of the Soviet Government, be in the White House a glorious bulkhead against those subversive elements who seek to alter and therefore undermine the best possible government in the best of countries? Can he not be counted on to back the United States flag with marines and warships wherever it shows itself in company with American dollars? Yet to our renegade minds Charles E. Hughes is one of the last men who should be picked for the White House.

And what of the Progressives? There, too, the leadership is wanting. Were another like the elder La Follette ready to head a third-party movement, we believe that it could be made more formidable than the last. There are more Americans consciously dissatisfied today than in the campaign year of 1924. To multitudes, we believe, the Sacco-Vanzetti case has proved an eye-opener, to many others the final straw. We are emphatically of the opinion that if one man of power and uprightness should step forth now to take up the old fight against the corruption which is permeating our entire public life, there would be a tremendous response. Only the absence of such a leader makes it possible for the New York Times to rejoice that whatever else may happen, there will be no third party in the field this year. Even the Socialist Party could make a big showing now if it but had the leader. We are drugged by our prosperity as well as poisoned by the bacilli of war.

But we shall not be so for long. There are plenty of portents to the contrary. We are still in the trough of the after-war wave, but there is no more ground for discouragement than there was in the days when to advocate freedom of the slave meant official reprobation, imprisonment, or mob violence. It seemed long then before the tide turned; millions of backs were scarred by the lash or bowed by the yoke, and thousands died in misery while it was turning. But the change came, the tide turned, and the needed leadership arose. And so it will again.

From Morgan's Up

DWIGHT MORROW, partner in J. P. Morgan & Co., has been named United States Ambassador to Mexico. Mr. Morrow happens to be a college classmate and lifelong friend of Mr. Coolidge's. But he is so much more that his appointment was an act of courage on the President's part and his acceptance an act of courage for Mr. Morrow. Hardly any post to which the President might appoint him could give Mr. Morrow power comparable to that which he wields as a partner in the greatest international banking firm in the world. The extent to which the Morgans dominate the industrial system of this country—its railroads, its power companies, its enormous automobile industry—can hardly be exaggerated. Throughout the Great War, furthermore, it acted as the agent for the British, French, and Russian governments in this country. To its power and organization was largely due the immediate success of the great loan which reestablished Japan after her earthquake; the mere announcement of a Morgan credit—coupled with the knowledge that such a loan meant Morgan financial guidance—steadied the falling French franc; the Morgan firm has buttressed Italy; it dominates the International Consortium which makes or withholds loans to China; it leads the group of creditors who negotiate, more successfully than Washington officialdom, with the Mexican Government. In the ordinary understanding of the word it is no promotion for a Morgan partner to be named United States Ambassador to Mexico; and Mr. Morrow is one of the leading Morgan partners.

Even if he were to become Secretary of State Mr. Morrow would hardly have more power than he has had as a partner of Morgan. J. P. Morgan & Co. negotiates on equal terms, unhampered by any responsibility to Congress, with foreign Powers. America has a natural prejudice against the financier in public office, and the financier has usually preferred to pull the strings without accepting political responsibility. Yet Mr. Morrow obviously has been eager for official life and has accepted this difficult post as his first opportunity. It is striking that a business man can still be so eager to don the harness of politics in a day when leadership has seemed to gravitate so overwhelmingly to business.

What will Mr. Morrow do in Mexico? The office is a challenge to his powers. Mexico is a graveyard of reputations; three administrations have failed to reach an equilibrium with that volcanic republic. American business has stood in the way of American diplomacy. But Mr. Morrow comes of a wise school of business. We have often remarked that the great lending houses of Wall Street have a longer vision than the oil men or the manufacturers. J. P. Morgan & Co., long interested in Mexican governmental loans, has not always seen eye to eye with Mr. Doheny, and it has been able to negotiate agreements which Mexico was willing to countersign and keep. Presumably any Morgan partner knows, as every lender does, that it is to the creditor's interest to set the debtor on his feet. He cannot want intervention; he must want to see the oil wells at work, producing for Mexico the revenue with which to pay her loans.

It is, of course, true on the other hand that the whole group of financiers interested in American foreign investments have a common horror of Mexico's social legislation, and fear it as a precedent in other countries. If one backward country can redeem its national heritage, freeing itself from control by the foreign moneyed interests which have been buying up the mineral resources of the world, others may follow. It is equally disturbing that Mr. Morrow's record, while it is full of examples of high-minded and disinterested service (he is a trustee of Amherst College, of Union Theological Seminary and of the Russell Sage Foundation, and has been active in prison-reform and charitable work) is definitely a big-business career. He began his public life as an attorney, and it was largely his services to the New Haven Railroad, where he ably opposed the public-service conceptions of Louis D. Brandeis, that won him promotion to the Morgan firm. One may be sure, however, that Mr. Morrow will not take orders. He will have a prestige with American business firms in Mexico which no one but a Morgan partner could have. If he recommends to them a less stubborn policy, they will hardly dare complain. And Mr. Morrow, resigning from the Morgan firm to enter politics, must be determined to succeed in his first mission.

To those Americans who have not realized the extent to which our diplomacy has become a tool of business Mr. Morrow's appointment will be a shock. But in view of the possible alternatives, of subservient corporation lawyers and lame-duck politicians, and despite the ghastly example of Mr. Mellon, we greet this assumption of responsible public office by one of the outstanding leaders of financial America with hope. It is always better to send the chief than the office-boy on an important mission, and Mr. Morrow is a real chief.

Abolishing the Death Duties

"THE federal estate tax must be repealed." This is to be the battle cry of an exceedingly well organized and well financed group of lobbyists in the next session of Congress. A similar attempt failed last year, but the effort is to be made again with renewed hope—and better lobbying. Regardless of the merits of the inheritance tax, bankers and business men in cooperation with legislators are determined upon its repeal. There can be little doubt about the intensity of the fight which they will wage. Supporting them, they have the legislatures of twenty-two States, the governors of twenty-five, perhaps a majority of the Senators, and, in the Administration, both President Coolidge and Secretary Mellon.

The inheritance tax, of course, rests most heavily upon the wealthier classes of the population, reason enough for every loyal Republican to find his sympathy with the present repeal movement. Already the Administration has exerted itself considerably to make the lives of our bankers and brokers run more smoothly, but there yet remains this federal estate tax as a source of unpleasant irritation. Of all the taxes in our revenue system, none is more obnoxious and challenging to the instincts of the expert coupon-cutter. In the property tax and in the income tax there are many paths that lead to the enticing forest of evasion—which good lawyers can find at fair rates—but the inheritance tax defies such strategy. It must be paid. When the wealthy taxpayer dies, his bonds, his stocks, and other securities—although they may have been hidden throughout his life in the "forest of evasion"—must at last come out into the open.

For the legal protection of the heirs, the executor must list and itemize the deceased man's property, and thus his securities come under the ruthless gaze of the inheritance-tax administrator. Even tax-exempt bonds are subject to this horrid estate tax. No wonder it infuriates some wealthy citizens to be forced to submit their property to so sure, efficient, and inescapable a levy, and no wonder, too, that they have wasted little time in finding a way out.

If evasion of the tax is not possible, then it must be repealed. It is the effort to carry out this resolution that we shall witness in the next Congress. Of course, we shall hear no talk about the difficulty of evading the federal death duties—that will be kept camouflaged by arguments more appealing to the community. Already in the newspapers a flood of propaganda, sponsored principally by the Banker's League and the American Taxpayers League, has been let loose telling the American people what a terrible thing this estate tax is. And what is their contention? In the main, peering out of many confusing and distorted arguments, one discerns an earnest solicitude for the finances and revenues of the forty-eight States. The statements are seldom definite with respect to the means by which the States should secure these death duties but, in varying degrees, one is assured that the sentiment is there. Ominous predictions are likewise made that something fearful will happen because the estate tax "eats up capital" and is inherently "communistic" and "bolshevistic." All of this, of course, is grotesquely misleading. No tax has a better basis in sound economics.

If the State revenues are to be helped by the death duties, then surely the worst thing to do would be to abolish the present federal measure. In a practise of thirty years the States have demonstrated their inability to cope with the more serious problems of evasion and multiple taxation. In the period before the federal tax, rates varied greatly among the States; some, with the hope of attracting men with capital, even abolished the death duties altogether. Today five States have no inheritance tax, and Florida has a constitutional amendment against such a measure. Repeal of the federal estate duty would be likely to mean the appearance of other taxation paradises like Florida, with similarly attractive provisions for millionaire residents. We should witness again the old inter-State rivalry for capital and the intolerable conditions of multiple taxation would be made worse.

If the States really need revenue and if their present spokesmen among the State legislatures and governors are in earnest, they should propose instead that the 80 per cent rebate clause of the Act of 1926, which returns to the States an amount up to 80 per cent of the federal inheritance tax, should be increased to the full amount of the tax. States' rights would then be preserved, yet there would remain a just tax with a uniform rate throughout the country. As Simeon Leland of the University of Chicago states:

> The chief argument advanced in favor of the repeal of the estate tax is seldom mentioned, yet it underlies practically every statement of the case against the federal tax. The repeal of the federal tax is desired mainly because it is a success, while the inheritance taxes of the States are not. The federal estate tax functions too efficiently to suit its adversaries.

That is it. The federal tax functions "too efficiently," and therefore organized wealth is making this concerted effort to end it.

Pious Unbelief

MISS CHRISTINE WALKER, eighteen-year-old secretary of the Junior Atheists League, has arrived in New York from Gap, Pennsylvania, and at the Fourteenth Street headquarters of the Anti-Bible Society she is formulating plans which look toward a vigorous revival of disbelief among the members of the younger generation in this city. Reporters who have interviewed her find her flashing blue eyes persistently reminiscent of Miss Uldine Utley, girl preacher of the old-time Bible religion, and they say that she speaks of her mission with a genuinely evangelical ardor. "I have," she says, "read enough of the Bible to feel that it is false, and I want to enlighten other people."

Miss Walker also informed the reporters that there are at present four active chapters of her organization—in New York, Philadelphia, Los Angeles, and Petoskey, Michigan—though she did not explain how it happens that the latter place rose to this dangerous metropolitan eminence. She did add, however, that much of her work among the high schools and colleges has to be carried on secretly in order to avoid interference from educational authorities, and it is this latter fact that amazes us. Anyone who ever attended a free-thinkers' meeting must have realized how nearly its atmosphere resembled that of a non-conformist chapel and anyone who has ever known any group of fervently professing atheists must know that a certain priggishness is the only moral vice which can usually be charged against them. Miss Walker feels that the experience which she gained as a worker in the Presbyterian Westminster Guild in the days before her negative conversion will be of great service to her in her new task, and Miss Walker is entirely right. Atheism is one of the evangelical religions and a really devoted atheist is one of the most churchly of people.

If we were among those who are worried by the lax conduct of the younger generation we should welcome the entry of the atheists into the missionary field, and our only fear would be that the movement would not spread very widely for the simple reason that the impeccable conduct and the proselyting zeal expected of an active member of any atheistical society are too nearly indistinguishable from those required by the Y. M. C. A., the Baptist Young People's Union, and the Epworth League to appeal to very many who have not already joined one or more of those organizations. Most of the frivolous young who are bored with talk about God will be equally bored by talk about his non-existence, and those who prefer jazz to the hymnbook are not very likely to break off a foxtrot in order to consider the errors of Moses. But wherever the Anti-Bible Society does find a foothold, wherever it can gather together a group of young people dedicated to the spread of unbelief, there, we predict, will be found a sober and harmless group. If it is merely a question of keeping the youth off the streets, a Free Thinkers Society is every bit as effective as a chapter of the Christian Endeavor. Who ever heard of an ardent young atheist with a flask in his hip-pocket or any inclination to go on a petting party? In the first place he has weighty things to think about, and in the second place he has to confound his religious enemies by the uprightness of his life. It is those who don't care whether God's in his heaven or not that cause most of the trouble.

GOSSIP about anybody is good and gossip about a public character is better. One must be more than usually high-minded not to admit curiosity concerning an account of a President caught with his shirtsleeves down, as the saying goes. "The President's Daughter" undoubtedly will serve to satisfy this reprehensible but natural craving.

As in the case of all memoirs the question of authenticity may not be brushed aside. There has been, as far as I can ascertain, no official denial of the fundamental facts set forth in "The President's Daughter," and it may be that eventually admirers of the martyr president will be asking us to judge Mr. Harding not by this book, set forth as fact, but by "Revelry" which purports to be fiction.

Nan Britton's book professes to make a plea for more merciful laws in regard to legitimacy. This excellent object is somewhat lost in the shuffle, and more stress is given to the promise upon the jacket that here is a book "revealing the love-secret of President Harding." A young woman without any vestige of literary skill and an entire absence of good taste has managed to write a book which is often absorbingly interesting. Possibly the secret lies in its insincerity.

Again and again she breaks into rapturous admiration of Warren Gamaliel Harding, but it is hard to believe that she did not possess some underlying hatred of the man, for the portrait is that of an utterly fatuous person. Still, it must be admitted that the author does very little better by herself, and the general effect is not unlike a tale by Fanny Hill concerning her great romance with Elmer Gantry.

Beyond question the book is shocking. Here and there one may find a phrase somewhat more frank than usual, but this is not the factor which tends to make "The President's Daughter" a shade disturbing. It is the undying smugness of the story which causes a sinking sensation. Persistently Miss Britton insists that her romance with Mr. Harding was one of the great love stories of all history, but this point is somewhat impaired by her report of the very first ardent meeting. "Between kisses we found time to discuss my immediate need for a position." Nor is the reader more warmly drawn to either protagonist when the book goes on to reveal the manner in which Mr. Harding made good his promise of patronage.

"Mr. Harding handed his card to the secretary in Judge Gary's outer office. The Judge came out immediately. After introducing me to Judge Gary, Mr. Harding inquired casually of him whether his senatorial services in a certain matter had been satisfactory. The Judge replied that they had indeed."

From this auspicious point the romance flowers and we learn that "Going down in the elevator Mr. Harding whispered to me: 'Now, do you believe that I love you?'"

A little later Miss Britton obtained a job with the United States Steel Corporation at $16 a week.

Some of the heroine's enthusiasm for her knight in shining armor is a little puzzling. She seems inclined to endow the great man with gifts not altogether inherent in the evidence. Thus we are told: "Mr. Harding himself was, I thought, quite an epicure, despite the fact that he could enjoy plain substantial food. Eggs were my breakfast stand-by, but invariably Mr. Harding's query when we breakfasted together would be: 'Will you have some codfish cakes with me this morning, dearie?'"

Always she seems to have been "dearie" to him, although he occasionally switched to "you purty thing." Miss Britton was rather more formal and tells us: "I called him Warren very rarely. He used to tease me to say: 'Warren, darling, I love you,' and it seemed to delight him to hear me say his name. But I was so much younger than he—exactly thirty years his junior—that somehow it seemed out of tune for me to address him by his first name. I just resorted to endearments, usually called him 'sweetheart.'"

To this particular reader the whole romance seems to have been an exceedingly shabby and clumsy involvement, but it has not been his privilege to read the love letters which are for the most part omitted. That seems a pity for the book states: "Many of the heart-revealments of which I have spoken and will speak were put in writing by Mr. Harding—and declarations much stronger as well—and he himself admitted that nowhere except in French had he ever read anything comparable to the love-letters we used to write to each other."

It is just as well that the two parties concerned were willing to admit that in France such things are done better, for the strategy of the romance was often sadly bungled. Once Warren Gamaliel Harding was obliged to hide in a wardrobe, but at that time he was merely a Senator and his dignity may not have been a matter of vital moment. The White House rendezvous seems to have been a clothes closet, and there were many trysts in such hotels as local taxi drivers cared to recommend.

Concealment would appear to have bulked larger in the mind of Mr. Harding than in that of Miss Britton. To be sure, she did not reveal to everyone that Warren Harding was her lover. But the President was not altogether a model of delightful reticence himself. If we may judge from Miss Britton's report he "always spoke disparagingly to me of Mrs. Harding, and in loving as well as in disposition and everything else he certainly failed to picture her as his ideal."

It is unfair to assume, of course, that every word set down in "The President's Daughter" is true beyond all question. It may be that Miss Britton has drawn largely upon her imagination. In that case I owe her an apology. If the book is in any large measure creative work it would be grossly unfair to deny the author a high degree of literary skill. In that event Sinclair Lewis would be obliged to abdicate his leadership of the more savage satirists, for modern American fiction contains no such complete and convincing picture of an utter bounder.

We have had professors in the White House and soldiers, but if the testimony of "The President's Daughter" is to be accepted Warren Gamaliel Harding was the first heavy-sugar daddy. And out of his many precious words the little girl whom he befriended has preserved a single sentence which might well serve as the epitaph of his entire administration: "Remember, dearie, no recriminations."

Justice Brandeis: Apostle of Freedom

By NORMAN HAPGOOD

The third in a series of personality portraits

WHEN The Nation asked me to write something about Justice Brandeis I was not sure whether to be glad or sorry. It is wholesome to celebrate a powerful spiritual and liberal character, in a time when the type in this country is rare, but also it is difficult to do justice to forty years of service, covering a multitude of issues, in a short space.

After Woodrow Wilson was elected, in 1912, I happened to be talking with Joseph Medill Patterson, at that time much more in sympathy with critical movements than he is now, and to say I hoped Mr. Wilson might put Mr. Brandeis in his cabinet. "The place for a man like that," said he, "is on the Supreme Court. There is where the real influence is exerted." About the same time Jane Addams said: "What the Supreme Court thinks determines not only what laws Congress may enact. It decides the possibilities for forty-eight State legislatures also, and for every social worker in the land."

In 1916, when there was another vacancy, Mr. Wilson said to me: "I cannot live up to the standard I set when I appointed Brandeis. I cannot find another man who is at the top of his profession in practical success, and who at the same time represents not concentrated money but the interests of the whole public."

On that subject Mr. Brandeis himself said, a number of years ago: "It is true that at the present time the lawyer does not hold that position with the people which he held fifty years ago; but the reason is in my opinion not lack of opportunity. It is because, instead of holding a position of independence between the wealthy and the people, prepared to curb the excesses of either, the able lawyers have to a great extent allowed themselves to become an adjunct of the great corporations, and have neglected their obligation to use their powers for the protection of the people."

The fact that Mr. Brandeis, in spite of first-class practical success, kept himself free from the psychology of excessive wealth, and devoted his efforts to public service, was what created the bitterness against him. That bitterness was moderate in amount and intensity as long as he was engaged in solving traction problems in Boston, working out a proper relation between the public and the gas companies, or starting a device by which the poor, if they cared to do so, could get their insurance much more cheaply. It broke into a fury when he interfered with the plans of the New Haven Railroad, for in that road were invested many of the funds of the people who make up respectable society in New England. The controversy with the New Haven had the same origin as the earlier services in checking the inroads of public utilities on public rights. Both came from a conception of freedom. It was years ahead of Mr. Wilson's exposition of "the new freedom," but it meant the same thing, and Mr. Wilson to his death was grateful for the help he found in the philosophic depth and detailed mastery of Mr. Brandeis. Here is a statement of the underlying doctrine:

> The government must keep order not only physically but socially. In old times the law was meant to protect each citizen from oppression by physical force. But we have passed to a subtler civilization; from oppression by force we have come to oppression in other ways. And the law must still protect a man from the things that rob him of his freedom, whether the oppressing force be physical or of a subtler kind.
> There is no such thing as freedom for a man who under normal conditions is not financially free. We must therefore find means to create in the individual financial independence against sickness, accidents, unemployment, old age, and the dread of having his family destitute, if he suffer premature death. For we have become practically a world of employees; and if a man is to have real freedom in dealing with his employer, he must be financially independent of these ordinary contingencies. Unless we protect him from oppression, it is foolish to call him free.

In the notable victory over the New Haven Mr. Brandeis was doing something beside the work of a great business expert, protecting the public against wild finance. He was also protecting it against oppression. He saw lucidly why the hectic expansion of the road meant in the end injury to the investment, but he also felt with ardent conviction that New England could not be free if it put no limit on the size of the money combinations that might be allowed to grow up in its midst.

LOUIS D. BRANDEIS
Associate Justice
United States Supreme Court

Mr. Brandeis could never have done his work if he had not been an expert in money matters, but money and its combinations have always been looked upon by him as a tool to be used for promoting the higher forms of freedom, not as ends sacred in themselves that may be permitted to invade the general freedom. When the authoritative life of this justice comes to be written I hope the keynote of it may be liberty. There are not many prophets of that doctrine here and now, for this is not only an age in which Mr. Mellon is Secretary of the Treasury, in spite of the existing statute intended to protect us from just such a control of the treasury by big business, but it is an age also in which the usual American thanks God for the good fortune of having so rich a man in so high a post, and in which the usual newspaper, with income and profit taxes hanging over it, subject to treasury interpretation, treats Mr. Mellon, who has had little to do but spend and reduce a huge surplus, as a combination of the genius of Hamilton and that of Gallatin.

If, alone among lawyers of his rank, Mr. Brandeis threw his strength into representing the public against overgrown special interests, he accepted full responsibility for building where he tore down. He would never attack without being able to replace. If he believed railroad rates were too high he was prepared to tell the roads how to save a million dollars a day, and he steadily refused to lift a finger against the head of the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad from the moment when he saw his victory essentially won.

The city public-service corporations, the railroads, the banks, the insurance companies, the inflated industrials, the evils of long hours and low pay, had all been dealt with by him by 1912, and during the campaign of that year he was the most powerful intellect assisting Mr. Wilson to expound the principles of democracy applied to the problems of a machine age. From his speeches and writings during those months can be built the best picture I know of the advantages of small and moderate units in industry as against gigantic ones. Inevitably some of the devices that Mr. Brandeis originated or adapted for one purpose or another are of less interest to him today, but not the small unit. It is fundamental, and it remains as much a part of his faith as it was a part of the faith of Aristotle.

Those who believed the place for Mr. Brandeis to be the Supreme Court have been justified by the outcome. Powerful dissents are needed in that body—in the nine dictators of our law. Even the majority opinions sometimes show the influence of the presence of a great expert in modern industry, but it is the dissents of Holmes and Brandeis, alone or with one or two others as the subjects differ, that are building up a body of thought on social rights at least as influential in our leading law schools as the majority opinions opposed to them. If the bar has a spiritual revival, before our grandchildren are buried, these dissents are the material of which the revival may not improbably be made.

And the fact that Justices Holmes and Brandeis are thus bracketed shows how shifting a substance are words. Justice Holmes is not a liberal, in the sense that Justice Brandeis is. He is not excited about what may be done by legislation to make better the lot of man. Rather is he impressed with the futility of most such dreams. Often when Brandeis is filled with the picture of the evil a law seeks to kill, or the advantage it seeks to bring about, Holmes's mind, skeptical of such visions, and not addicted to studying them, is not less vehement in the same conclusion, reaching it by the route of the public's right to experiment. Never has he swerved from his fidelity to the basic tenet of our system, that the courts are not to substitute their ideas of policy for those of the elected legislators.

This dogged refusal to usurp takes on an added importance when we remember that the most successful climbers in the legal profession make themselves psychologically members of the plutocracy. That Holmes and Brandeis reach the same spot from partly opposite directions is to me a most cheerful fact. It shows that our Constitution, and our political institutions in general, are adequate to our present needs if they are committed to men of knowledge and detachment from limited interests.

Lest we put too much stress on the devotion of our own lawyers to plutocratic ideals we might quote a statement of Mr. Brandeis about the tendency of the bar in all times:

> Law has always been a narrowing, conservating profession. In England it has always been easy for a Tory government to find great lawyers for judicial office, but for a Liberal government it was hard. And so it has been throughout history. . . .
> What we must do in America is not to attack our judges, but to educate them. All judges should be made to feel, as many judges already do, that the things needed to protect liberty are radically different from what they were fifty years ago. In some courts the judges' conception of their own powers must also change. . . .
> The courts and the people have been too far apart. There is no subject so complex that the people cannot be interested in it and made to see the truth about it if pains enough are taken; and I believe that a common agreement of public sentiment should influence the court's decision on many a question.
> For the aspirations of the people must have adequate legal expression. Otherwise we shall have a revolt. . . . The people are beginning to doubt whether in the long run democracy and absolutism can coexist in the same community; beginning to doubt whether there is really a justification for the great inequalities in the distribution of wealth. This movement must necessarily progress; the people's thought will take shape in action. And it lies with our lawyers to say in what lines that action shall be expressed: wisely and temperately, or wildly and intemperately; in lines of evolution or in lines of revolution.

Of course the time when questioning of our present economic morality amounts to much is still afar, and will not come while the general standard of living is rising. But statesmen think of the future. Holmes and Brandeis cannot last forever. During the present craze over material things are we likely to elect anybody President who would even wish to find their counterparts?

The author whom Justice Brandeis quotes most often is Goethe, more often, I think, than Shakespeare or the Greeks. Goethe has a ballad called The Magician's Apprentice, Der Zauberlehrling. The magician had ordered the apprentice to scrub the floor while he himself was absent. The water had to be brought from the brook, but the apprentice had seen his master order a broom which stood in the corner to bring the water, and had noticed the words used; so he repeated them, and the broom obeyed. It brought a bucketful, emptied it on the floor; then another, and another. Not knowing how to stop the flooding of the room the apprentice broke the broom. Then each part began bringing as much as the whole broom had brought before, and the house was full. Finally the magician returned, knowing how to control the process, as well as set it going, and he ordered the broom back into its corner.

In connection with this story Justice Brandeis quotes, also from Goethe, "Even if we had the wise man's stone, the stone would be without the wise man." (Wenn wir den Stein der Weisen hätten, der Weise mangelte dem Stein.)

Into a machine age, into the irrepressible advance of technique, it has been Justice Brandeis's life work to put wisdom.

Scandals of 1927—Indiana

By LOUIS FRANCIS BUDENZ

THAT political typhoon, which blew up this midsummer to rock Indiana's ship of state, continues into the autumn with unabated fury. The apostles of mysterious clap-trap who lately threw terror into the Hoosier citizenry, suddenly find themselves the center of a storm of ridicule and censure. Heavy seas of scandal and exposé threaten to wash overboard the most exalted members of the Klan-fearing crew—United States Senators James E. Watson and Arthur R. Robinson. When and where the end will be, no man knows. Senator Robinson has even declared in his own defense that the "President of the United States is indirectly involved."

The junior Senator, with delightful naivete, rushed forth impetuously to bring the deluge down upon his head. A slick tongue has been Mr. Robinson's chief asset throughout his public career. It has compensated largely for his lack of mental depth. Through this powerful organ of speech he has climbed successively into the State Senate and the Republican leadership thereof, into a judgeship, and finally into the Holy of Holies itself, the United States Senate.

In the present Gargantuan emergency, however, this source of strength—his nimble tongue—proved to be his weakness. He spoke up at the wrong time. Noting an attack upon him by the Indianapolis Times to the effect that he was part of the supergovernment—or, more exactly, the subway government—bringing Indiana into disrepute, he boldly demanded a retraction. Were that not forthcoming within three days, dire penalties would be inflicted upon the "unscrupulous editor of that unscrupulous publication."

The three days came and went; at their conclusion his own hitherto faithful ally, the Indianapolis Star, proceeded to put him in a pretty pickle. By way of a news beat that paper published correspondence showing that Robinson had endeavored surreptitiously to exert pressure on the State Supreme Court in the contempt case of Dr. E. S. Shumaker, head of the Indiana Anti-Saloon League. Shumaker had made it very plain that the fate of the Republican Party rested in the hollow of his hand. At his behest the alarmed junior Senator had pleaded with Senator Watson last year "in your own way" to persuade the Supreme Court judges to free the anti-liquor crusader or let him off with a fine.

Caught thus red-handed, Mr. Robinson executed a complete somersault. Now he declares that he will say nothing further on the subject, for fear it would seem to be exerting undue influence on the court which he formerly sought to influence sub rosa. Out of the episode has come a further proceeding in the Supreme Court to extend the sixty-day sentence of Shumaker. At the hearing of this case the two Senators, Henry Lane Wilson, ex-Ambassador to Mexico, and the Klan-appointed Republican State chairman, Clyde Walb, will be compelled to testify. Much more of the back-stairs government of Indiana bids fair to be dragged out into the open in the course of this proceeding.

The strange case of Arthur Robinson, thus brought to light, is important in that it reveals him as one of the missing links between the Anti-Saloon League and the Klan. Old croney and personal attorney of ex-Grand Dragon D. C. Stephenson and devoted adherent of George V. Coffin, Stephenson-created Republican chairman of Marion county, he has always been at the same time a zealous follower of the Shumaker coterie. With becoming consistency, he waxed fat financially off the defense of wealthy bootleggers, on the basis of a widespread rumor that he had special influence with Federal Judge Balzell. If such influence existed, it was never very apparent. The judge seemed to send Mr. Robinson's clients to jail with the same gusto that he committed others to a like inclement fate.

Other missing links in the Klan-Anti-Saloon League interlocking relationships are now coming into the foreground. One of the most conspicuous of these is the Rev. George S. Henninger, militant pastor of the East Tenth Street Methodist Episcopal Church in the city of Indianapolis. He has been no small figure in the just-concluded trial of the capital city's Klan Mayor, John L. Duvall. Ruddy and pugilistic in appearance and mannerism, the Rev. Mr. Henninger has packed a wicked punch in behalf of both Anti-Saloon League and Klan. The most powerful figure in the Marion County Klan No. 3, he testified against the Mayor, with uplifted left hand (Klan-fashion), that the said Mayor, as a candidate, had pledged himself in open meeting to deliver 85 per cent of the city positions to the white-robed guardians of purity if elected to the office he sought.

The Mayor apparently attempted to keep this pledge in his own bungling way. Testimony for the defense consisted of a long parade of city employees, who were or had been Kluxer zealots and Volstead Act protagonists. Their stammering mentalities and confused conceptions of Klan principles gave some clue as to why the Invisible Empire had chosen to remain invisible. Stripped of their flowing robes and robbed of the friendly cover of darkness, their childish ignorance made them a sorry and depressing lot. Their testimony failed to impress the jury; it had enough acumen to see the obvious, and found Duvall guilty of the crime charged. Duvall's sentence was fixed at thirty days in jail, with a fine of $1,000 and four years' exclusion from public office.

The trouble with the Mayor was that he promised too profusely. He did not have enough positions to go around. A feeble, wishy-washy character, suffering apparently from some fear mania, he sought to solve the problem by lightning-like shifts in his official family. Almost every important office in the city hall has been filled at least twice during his term. Only a short time ago he discharged Claude Worley, Stephenson's old pal, as Inspector of Detectives. Learning that Worley had been promptly made special investigator by Judge Collins of the Criminal Court, and would probably therefore dig into Duvall's various indictments, the Mayor suddenly recalled the outcast and elevated him to the chieftainship of police. To do this, he had to shift the erstwhile Chief, Claude Johnson. That gentleman found himself Chief one morning, Superintendent of Detectives in the afternoon, and City Controller by midnight—all in the same day. It is now disclosed that the Mayor gave several prominent Klansmen secret written appointments which he later withdrew. Wiggling and wobbling were his settled policies.

So it was with his affair with "Bill" Armitage, ex-saloon keeper and gambler, which brought Duvall into court this first time. "Bill" is a typical political boss—flashily dressed, diamond-studded, and diamond-ringed, cynical and hard-boiled. He was the dominant personality in the preceding Lew Shank administration. When he saw that Duvall would be elected mayor through Klan support, he hastened to offer that gentleman $12,000 or $14,500—the sum is in dispute—for various important appointments. Duvall accepted the money, and put it away in his safety box at his bank. After the election, when the bargaining for offices began, Duvall in a sweaty fright rushed to return the money. Only, however, after a secret meeting with Armitage in Pekin and Springfield, Illinois, where they registered at a hotel under assumed names. The Mayor's defense was that he took the money "to protect the taxpayers" and get Armitage out of the way, intending to double-cross that gentleman all the time.

The Mayor will probably be obliged to have still another day in court. He has been indicted anew on other corrupt-practice charges by the present grand jury, which also indicted Governor Jackson for bribery, along with his law partner, Robert I. Marsh—the much-advertised and eloquent lecturer, "G4," of the Indiana Klan.

What do the people of Indiana think of the mess of incompetence, underground intrigues, and widespread corruption which is being washed up by this flood of disclosures? To say that they are flamingly indignant would be to state a falsehood. It is more literally correct to conclude that they are stunned. By and large, they cannot understand why so much attention is being given their troubles by the outside world. Taking the State as a whole, they have not yet grasped the inevitable connection between the outcome and the reign of such a moronic movement as the Ku Klux Klan. The newspapers, more alert than the rank and file of the populace, adopt a more healthy attitude. This includes a number of Republican papers. Vigorous denunciation of the "gang" in power is becoming a pleasantly common thing. The Klan is on the run, however, because leading personalities in its ranks are on the defensive or utterly discredited. There is no dashing or unscrupulous leader behind whom the scattered legions can rally. With that said, almost all is said.

There will be a housecleaning in Indiana, but the passions and prejudices which created the situation will remain. Let a new Messianic message, the old patent medicine stamped with a different label, be offered to the Hoosiers—and he would be a rash prophet indeed who would foretell its rejection.

The "why" of that is easily understandable through only a cursory study of the State's population. The northern section can be ruled out of our calculations; spiritually it is not a part of Indiana at all. A goodly infiltration of alien blood has changed its complexion and viewpoint. A Catholic, a Jew, or even a radical has at least half a chance in that region. Reaction can rule there on economic questions, but not so readily on the basis of Nordic intolerance. In the broad central belt, which dominates the State to a large extent, an entirely different condition exists. There the Catholic, Jew, and foreigner are decided oddities. From Indianapolis to Vincennes—a distance of 195 miles—there is not one Catholic parish. In Hamilton County there are sixty-five Catholics in a total population of 15,000. These are rough examples of the status of the rural districts in that section. And in regard to the Catholics and the Jews in these parts it seems that prejudice against them increases in proportion to the slimness of their numbers.

In the extreme southern section of the State Jews are very scarce and Catholics have herded themselves together in little colonies, aloof from the surrounding peasantry. These were in origin mostly German-speaking towns, in some of which even the Irish became Germanized in the course of time. A language barrier divided them from the "hill-billies" and the farmers of the south. It increased the possibility of misunderstanding.

The city of Indianapolis is fed by immigrants from the rural territory of the central belt. It is full of good folks who connect the Negroes in some mysterious way with the dark Latin peoples, under the Pope, and consider a shady pigmentation a possible link with the devil. "Niggers and Catholics" were to be kept out of office, according to Mayor Duvall's promise to the Klan brethren of the Red Star. That expresses the sentiments of these rural immigrants to the capital city to a T.

The Hoosier, anyway, is not much given to indignation or enthusiasm, except in what might be called metaphysical questions. He is as economically servile as he has been impotent to cope with political corruption. His farmers have seldom engaged in the great revolts that have marked the history of the Northwest. The industrial population of Indianapolis, with much less colossal combinations of capital to deal with than many other cities, suffers low wages and poor conditions. They are ruled by one of the most active and belligerent of employers' associations. They live under one of the most drastic anti-picketing ordinances in the country, with scarcely a murmur of protest. During the dominance of the Klan, no man of substance in financial or business life spoke up against it. Correspondents from other places were given information behind closed doors, and then with the solemn injunction: "Don't quote me." Meredith Nicholson, the author, was the only man of any prominence who made it a business to decry what was going forward.

When the winds and waves have passed a number of figures of high and low degree will have been washed off the ship of state. It is doubtful if the root-causes for their having been at the helm will have been wiped away with them.

November Corn Field

By WILBERT SNOW

The tattered standards of the broken corn
Rustle defiance on the frozen air
That strove to wreck them; blouses now outworn
That gave their youth a gay mid-April flair
When on parade, cover today instead
A decimated legion old and proud—
Their dry bones rattle in the breeze; their bed,
Ice-cold at night, awaits the winding shroud.

A canteen hanging loosely here and there
For rats and crows to riddle, they recall
When they could scale at ease the high stone wall
And forage in warm pastures whose long stare
At blades and gorgeous tassels gave the field
Faith in their standing orders not to yield.

On the Trail of Sacco-Vanzetti Abroad

I. The Anger of South America

By RUTH CRAWFORD

Buenos Aires, August 23

"LISTEN!"

I had been listening. How long I did not know. How long had I been lying there, listening to that crying, shouting, that rose above the tread of thousands of feet, the clatter of horses' hoofs, the whirr of motorcycles, the clarion honking of automobiles?

"Listen!" The whisper brought complete awakening. Then I knew. This was the night Sacco and Vanzetti were to be executed unless some miracle saved them.

"They've been killed."

We said no more. We left our beds, threw coats on, and hurried to the bedroom window which opened on to the Avenida de Mayo in Buenos Aires. We opened the wooden shutter and leaned out. Five stories below stretched the Argentine's principal thoroughfare.

We looked down the street toward the Plaza de Mayo, for it was from that direction the crowd was coming. There, before the office of one of the leading newspapers, stood a mass of men whom we knew were reading the news association flash. They read, then joined the procession moving slowly, angrily, resentfully, up the avenue.

As we watched that moving mass of men, foreboding, yes, terror came to us. Safe, we were safe, but this feeling was nothing personal. It was a fear for our country. These people, these South Americans, were marching because it was the only way they had of venting their hatred against the United States, the land of oppression, as they sincerely believed.

What did it matter that we knew differently? How make these others know that some of our countrymen had fought valiantly for two Italians whose fate had curiously come to symbolize a struggle over human rights? How explain to these indignant Argentines that the struggle had gotten beyond human straightening? The message on the bulletin board meant only one thing to those thousands of men marching up the Avenida de Mayo. To them two innocent men had been sacrificed to the world by the United States of America, the land of oppression.

Thus ended for me the trail of Sacco-Vanzetti, followed from Rio de Janeiro through the interior of Brazil, then across Uruguay to Montevideo, and at last to Buenos Aires and the Argentine.

I had left New York shortly after Judge Thayer's decision had been given. The impassioned plea of the condemned men for justice stood out clearly and vividly for me. I had faith. They would have justice, I thought confidently. Soon I learned that South America had no such faith.

"You don't mind what happens to you, do you?" the American Consul asked as I entered his office in a beautiful building overlooking Rio's magnificent bay.

"What do you mean?"

"You are right in the path of that bomb that is scheduled to blow all of us to glory," the Consul laughed, affecting a gaiety which did not ring true. The consulate had been warned that there might be trouble from Sacco-Vanzetti sympathizers; that accounted for the presence of the guards passing regularly to and fro before the building.

Reds, bolshevists, anarchists, they were just using this Sacco-Vanzetti thing to take out their long-smoldering hatred of the United States, our fellow countryman explained. They looked at us askance as we dared protest that in the United States it was not merely the Reds who doubted the justice of the verdict.

"They should have been done for seven years ago," was the inevitable answer.

Brazilians, evidently, had another view, for the day I left Rio the automobile in which I was riding was turned out of its way. There was a Sacco-Vanzetti demonstration on the steps of the municipal opera house. It was a holiday, one of the numerous ones which brighten the lives of the Brazilians, but instead of attending fiestas and making merry dancing the maxixe, they were gathered by the thousand to hear an impassioned oration against the "murder" of two Italians by the United States.

Several days later in São Paulo, the richest industrial city of Brazil, I visited the American consulate. Two policemen, standing in the entrance to the building, looked critically at all who entered. In the consulate itself there was the same laughter as that in Rio, but this time men frankly admitted danger. They were planning to have no elevators stop at the consulate floor.

"It's a bad situation," said the Consul. "What do the people in the States think of the case?" he asked. He hoped for enlightenment, which was not forthcoming, about what had brought our country to the position where in friendly Brazil her consulate offices had to be guarded.

From São Paulo I took the train for the interior of Brazil, bound south for the Argentine. The route lay through Paraná, the state of the great pine forests, parts of which are as yet unexplored; then on to Rio Grande do Sul, the cattle country of Brazil. The country is so primitive that the train stops whenever flagged in order that the inhabitants may come aboard to buy fruits and liquors and deliver and collect mail.

Surely a country so unsettled would have no touch whatsoever with a court case in far-off Boston. But time after time I, who could speak no Portuguese, listened as I heard my fellow passengers talk of Sacco and Vanzetti. At Marcelino Ramos, a frontier town in the heart of the forest, a newspaper was found which had been brought from one of the coast cities. The men all read it eagerly. Then they passed it to me. They pointed to the headlines, "Sacco-Vanzetti," as if they would have an explanation.

The next day we stopped at Cacequy. I doubt if there has been so picturesque and so primitive a frontier settlement since the time when our own West was being settled. Down a dirt road lined with blacksmith shops, bars, eating houses, and a general store, we walked, following behind an oxcart filled with oranges. Brazilian cowboys, who had ridden in to meet the weekly train, stared at its passengers and then went about their trading. A crowd gathered around a blind Negro who was playing the maxixe on his guitar. It was like being in a story land, so far, far away from modernity was this settlement.

Finally we reached our eating place, a shed which had been converted into a dining room. We all sat around a long table to eat our beans and rice and drink maté. The man next to me asked if I were a North American. Like all Brazilians, he wanted to talk even though we had no common language. He had been to the cities, he made me understand. We laughingly tried to talk to each other about my country. I would name the cities; he would make a comment upon them.

New York—his face beamed as with gestures he indicated its speed. Washington—he exclaimed with pleasure. Boston—the smile left his face. "Sacco-Vanzetti?" he asked. I could not answer his question.

As we were going through the illimitable plains of Uruguay the next day I discovered there was a fellow countryman on the train, the first I had met on that week's journey, day and night, through Brazil.

"Is it true that Sacco and Vanzetti are dead?" I asked.

"No, they have been granted a stay of sentence, some new evidence or something like that," he answered. Then he queried: "You've just come down from the States. What about that case?"

How was I to tell!

"Well, anyway, it's a fine old mess down here now. I've been over to Porto Alegre (the most important southern port city of Brazil)—had to go to see why we had a cancellation for a shipment of automobiles. Found out the fellow was getting in French cars when we thought we had him cinched. I asked him about it. 'It's this way,' he told me. 'Yours might be best—no, I haven't a complaint about them; satisfactory, but every time I think about that Sacco-Vanzetti business—' "

Upon arriving in Montevideo, Uruguay, and announcing my intention to go to the consulate for mail, protest was raised. "It's dangerous. There's a strike on. It's not safe to go there today. This town's a hotbed."

Sacco-Vanzetti again. A sympathy strike of the Uruguayans.

Then in Buenos Aires, one horrible week before the night of the execution! Sacco-Vanzetti—could one never escape those words, the reproach, the arguments, the hard feeling they engendered everywhere? Was there no getting away from this? Our countrymen were embarrassed.

"It is none of these Argentinos' business," they asserted. They looked sheepish as one turned on them: "No, it is none of their business. I guess we're just getting a taste of how these Latins like our interference in what they think is none of our business."

The Saturday before the execution there came a prized opportunity to talk to Dr. Alfredo Palacios, president of the Latin American Union, one of the most brilliant of the Argentines. I had gone to interview him, but he asked the first question: "Will Sacco and Vanzetti be saved?"

"No one knows," I answered. Then I asked: "But if they die—"

"Then it will take years for America to live down the hatred which will follow."

I believed him Monday afternoon—the day of the sympathy strike in the Argentine—as I skirted the crowds which filled the plaza before the House of Congress. Five speakers at different sections of the plaza were holding the crowd. Squadrons of mounted police were stationed within hearing distance. Other police watched the crowd from their vantage point in the monument overlooking the plaza.

And yet—no one was certain. There was only the newspaper bulletin. Flash after flash about this judge and that one. Finally there came the report that the defense had given up. Still, there might be a way to avert the trouble which the North Americans in the Argentine feared.

We awoke shortly after midnight to know that no way had been found. That was why this crowd was going so desperately along the Avenida de Mayo. The men in it had cared enough to wait before the newspaper office until the verdict came. They had cared enough—bolshevists or whatever else they might be called—to march slowly but not impassively in a protest against the United States.

But the Argentine Government was protecting the United States. Guards were there by the scores, their swords flashing as they rode along. A group of them were drawn up ready to ride should a signal come from the consulate, only a few blocks off the Avenida.

We watched until the chill of the Argentine winter night drove us to our beds for warmth. Long we lay listening to that marching, crying crowd in the street below.

"It is our country they hate!" was all we had to say to each other.

II. A Visit to the Men's Home Towns

By K. M. RATCLIFFE

TORREMAGGIORE is Sacco's birthplace; and here his father, sisters, brothers, and numerous relations still live. The father as a former mayor (podesta) of the city, is held in great respect, and doubtless his prestige is not lessened by the possession of a Fiat automobile. Torremaggiore lies on a hill about four miles to the west of San Severo, in Apulia, and San Severo by rail is a good thirty-six hours by train from the western frontier of Italy. It was early in the morning of a hot August day that the delegate of the American Defense Committee left Turin, with her English companion [the writer]. This was one week before the Boston executions.

The way lay across the plains of Piedmont and Lombardy, passing many cities

> Whose names beholden
> Fill men's eyes with light as of golden
> Days more fair than their flight was fleet.

As an express message had been mailed from Turin, the pair were expected, and Sacco's brother was already on the platform with an interpreter, Angelo Carideo, a musician who comes and goes regularly between Italy and Boston. With affectionate concern the simple station caffe prepared a fresh brew of coffee and sent for the morning's milk. All the way this interest in the cause célèbre was accumulating. As the cart drove through the streets the morning markets lay on the curbs—piles of rosy tomatoes, beans, gourds of every size, shape, and color, peaches and grapes in abundance. Here and there the goats were being milked on the sidewalks.

The party became even more conspicuous as it was transferred into the spacious Fiat and charged up the long white hill to Sacco's home town. By a miracle no casualty was incurred, not even in the lanes of Torremaggiore, where again the morning markets seemed in full swing. The kindly hosts were anxious to show all that was possible of their native town, and so by many detours the Sacco home was reached.

From the moment of the visitors' arrival the coming and going never ceased. The circle of chairs in the large, lofty room was constantly added to. There were impetuously affectionate welcomes from the womenfolk and appreciative sympathetic greetings from the men. The crowd at the open doorway never dwindled, and that in spite of vigorous cuffs distributed repeatedly and at random by a spirited younger member of the group. One was grateful for something that softened the harrowing nature of the visit. The entrance of the father was unforgettable. He is probably in the prime of life, a small, spare figure, refined features, dignified and courteous manner. But the suffering depicted in his eyes and recorded in the lines of his face had given a look of premature age that touched the heart.

The American visitor produced her messages and with conscientious eagerness told the family how Nicolo had looked last June on the day of her farewell visit to the prison, how both had enjoyed the exercise with the Italian balls given them by friends, and much more that must have brought warmth and comfort to the listeners, who in turn read their message to the Pope and his Holiness's answer. While the interpretation of question and answer was going on, word was brought that the mayor would like to receive the visitors, and at once a group conducted them to the Palazzo Municipale. Here, in the Mayor's private room, the more technical points of the trial and its sequelae could be explained before a skilled member of the legal profession. The Mayor was a young, energetic man, evidently efficient and markedly proud of the Mussolini regime so far as it had affected Torremaggiore. By this time the need for food had become clamorous and the members of the Anglo-American mission had reason to be grateful when after many calls of the mayoral telephone, marmalade, jam, and sweet wafer biscuits were brought in for them, while one generous townsman, Silvio Palma, the second interpreter, surrendered his family's milk to the visitors, truly a gracious gesture.

Never can the departure fade from memory. Descending the white stone stairway to the sudden glimpse of a sea of heads, the walk from the City Hall to the car through a living lane of Nicolo Sacco's townsfolk, in their faces compassion welling up for his unhappy family; the farewells which only half hid the tears, and then, a car broke away and they looked back for the last adieux, the deep regret that whatever else the visit had brought it could bring no hope.

The same underlying hopelessness marked the visit to the Vanzetti home, which took place on the Monday of the week before the executions. Villafolleta is a village of about four thousand, to the southwest of Turin, not far from the foothills of the Cottian Alps. By delaying the start till noon the crowd of holiday-makers were avoided; this was the second day of Ferragosto, the Italian bank holiday, when all who can leave the hot, dusty cities for the hot, dusty countryside, for family reunions and the excitement of the chase. At every little wayside station some simple contadini had come to meet their visitors, and boys and girls were submitting to the double kiss inflicted at most continental greetings and partings. Villafolleta is only two or three hours by stopping train from Turin, but the journey seemed long as well as hot. Yet the object of the visit in its tragic nature annihilated physical discomfort. As the Quakers say, the travellers "had a concern," and everything else sank into insignificance. The mere question: "La casa del Signor Vanzetti?" was enough to draw attention to the visitors as they stood outside the station and make sure that, as the country cart jolted peacefully along the mile of dusty road, and clattered into the broad pebble-paved street of "my micropolis," as Vanzetti himself called it, the other six travellers knew quite well why the two strangers should have been set down at this remote Italian village.

Bartolomeo's home was the village wineshop. Two cardboard placards announced his merchandise: "Vendita di Vino al Ingrosso." "Aceto bianco e rosso." (Wines sold wholesale. Red and white vinegar.)

The deputation passed out of the glare into the quiet of the tiny stone-flagged shop, where the lines of bottles were rigorously neat and regular. The same exquisite cleanliness and order were repeated in the adjoining room, whither Vanzetti's younger sister conducted her guests. It was small but lofty, its almost painful nakedness accentuating the worn refinement of her face and the rich beauty of the only ornament, a wrought silver crucifix fastened to the bare wall. Signorina Vanzetti's face would have melted adamant. The neighbors told of her constant weeping, and indeed the sad dignity of the reception she accorded was that of a Mater Dolorosa.

The handicap of no common language, felt so keenly on both sides, was in the end a means of grace. For from his adjacent home brown-eyed, glowing, young Pietro was quickly fetched, and proved the most delightful interpreter imaginable. His modest efficiency and unconscious youthful charm certainly helped to deaden the encounter with so huge a grief. The brother's letter was first delivered and then the representative of the Defense Committee told all the happy personal details she had stored in her memory for solace, support, and comfort. A cousin brought in iced-syrup drinks, while appreciative letters from an earlier American caller were shown, and the photo of the condemned brother with the faded roses sent from Paris at the time of Signorina Luisa's sailing for New York. It was all terribly moving. The younger sister's eyes begged for hope; hope there was none.

But the garden had to be seen. The dusty courtyard was crossed, where the elderly father was tranquilly shelling beans; the group crossed the lane into the little sunny garden where the squashes with their pretty Italian names sprawled across the grass, where beans lay drying among mulberry and peach trees and figs beginning to ripen. A deep, transparent brook was chattering past. How the unhappy man's memory must have lingered over the lovely details of his village home, perfect in its simple refinement and dignity. On the way back to the house the good father managed to tell in his broken English how he had been for several years in California in the fruit-canning business.

It was nearly midnight before Turin was reached; it was festa and the train was more than an hour late in starting. Cousin Caterina with her mother, Louise Caldera, had accompanied Pietro to the station, and the last view was of these dear affectionate Italians, for whom nothing was too much to show their sympathy with the family and their gratitude to the envoy.

Some Mass Demonstrations

By FREDA KIRCHWEY

Heiligenblut, Austria, August 16

I. Berlin

WITH others of our kind we walked across the Schlossbrücke, past the angry lions crouching at the monumental feet of Wilhelm I to guard the spoils of empire, through the stony courtyards of the Schloss itself, and out into the Lustgarten. The Sunday brightness fell on small groups of Berliners perched here and there on benches and on the edges of granite monuments. A few children ran about. Some boys and girls walked through with packs on their backs, home from a week-end in the country. The Lustgarten was no less dull and no less peaceful than any other small city park on a Sunday afternoon. Except for one fact: that police walked or stood or lounged at every corner. Behind the lions in the corners of the stone colonnade, rifles were stacked in pyramids and policemen stood in groups beside them. Around the Schloss and in its echoing courtyards were more police—negligent and casual in manner, but with arms near at hand. Among the trees beyond the Dom, a squad marched along under the eye of an officer.

Were these the Sunday habits of the Berlin police force? I thought of asking a cheerful young officer who leaned against a bronze horse and smoked a pipe. But before I could ask there came the sound of a band, and in a moment a line of marching men and women rounded the corner of the Schloss. A few of the men wore gray tunics with red arm-bands; most of them were in nondescript workmen's clothes. The women were bareheaded. Some small children trotted beside them. There were banners—red banners—and placards: "The Capitalists Are Preparing a New War Against Soviet Russia." "Join the Red Front for the War Against War." "Soviet Russia is the Motherland of the Proletariat." And then other ideas, proclaimed rather as side issues: "Heraus mit Sacco and Vanzetti!" "Remember Our Fallen Comrades in Vienna."

These marching workers looked few and weak, I thought, in spite of the martial clamor of the band. But the police showed signs of interest and attention; and almost immediately more drums were heard, more banners flamed, more gray tunics and red arm-bands appeared at the corner. Soon, like a tide flowing in around rocks and sheer cliffs, the gray workers of Berlin swept past the stony barrier of the Schloss, eddied around statues and benches, and gathered into vast pools, while more workers poured through the narrow openings.

The Communist Party had called out the workers of Berlin on the anniversary of the Great War to protest against other wars in the making and especially to denounce the grouping of the Powers against Russia. And the workers were out. Active Communists, battalions of the Rote Front, working women, children, "youth" organizations, factory delegations, veterans of the war, all were united for a day in a wave of protest against the system that had driven them from war into starvation and threatened to drive them back into war again. They were of all ages, but a great number looked as if their childhood had passed in the hungry war years. They were thin and pale, but they knew how to march. They kept time and sang; the bands played gaily; the speakers shouted defiance at a world in league against peace. They kept time and sang and for a few hours they flowed through and possessed that piece of ground that had been an emperor's garden, and with their swelling strength they made themselves and me believe that the workers might indeed unite to stop wars and overthrow outworn systems. But all the while they knew—and I knew—that enough guns were stacked in nearby corners to drown the great square in the blood of the workers of Berlin.

"They're always pulling off these shows," said an American newspaperman. "The Social Democrats had an anti-war demonstration on August 1. I hear it was a fizzle." "I wouldn't call this one a fizzle," I said. "The papers say there were 125,000 workers out." "Yes," said the newspaperman, "the Communists pull off good ones. They all turn out—even the boys who vote Social-Democrat on election day. But it doesn't mean anything." "Why doesn't it?" I asked. "O, because they're always demonstrating," replied the newspaperman easily.

II. Vienna

But it meant something in Vienna. It meant, even on the face of it, the death of more than a hundred people, the destruction of fine buildings, the creation of a tangible atmosphere of fear and suspicion. Underneath it meant even more: it was a visible spasmodic shudder passing through a people who have suffered too long from misery and the pin-pricking of injustice. It was only a faint spasm—but it hesitated on the edge of a convulsion of revolt and terror. It hesitated and then collapsed under an indiscriminate downpour of soft-nosed bullets.

I reached Vienna on August 10. All over Europe, and in America, in ways sane and insane, people were protesting against the death of Sacco and Vanzetti, set for the following day. But Vienna was quiet; you would have thought it unconcerned. I asked Herr Breitner, Socialist chief of the city's finance department, how the people felt about the threatened execution.

"The feeling is very bitter against it among all classes," he said. "Even the bourgeois papers denounce it." "But there are no demonstrations," I said. "No, of course not now. Before July 15 surely there would have been great meetings. But now that sort of thing cannot be risked. The trouble in July came too close . . . a little more and it would have been revolution."

In Vienna, too, the workers were "always demonstrating." Here the demonstrations were Socialist-led, encouraged and directed by the militant Bauer. They have been used effectively as a fist shaken in the face of a reactionary Catholic government, and the workers have felt the exhilaration of power through direct action. In July it was apparently "just another demonstration"—spontaneous and, at the beginning, orderly and quiet. But flames sweep fast through ranks of marching men and women. The wild gestures of a few irresponsibles, the brutality of the police, these are enough to bring trouble when the marching ranks are hungry and hopeless to start with. Just a little more and it would have been revolution in Vienna; with a sure sequence of intervention and reaction to follow.

III. Heiligenblut

Mass demonstrations are of all sorts, and it is this that keeps the old guard in power. As long as the faiths of common men clash, the old guard is safe.

Yesterday was Marientag—the festival of the Virgin. Before daylight the bells in the steeple of the church of Heiligenblut began a pleasant, dissonant clamor. At seven o'clock and from then on at short intervals through the morning a gun let out thunderous lumps of sound that crashed against the steep rocks across the valley and bounced back from wall to wall. Soon after breakfast the procession began. It came from the church. Slowly it moved down the road. It comprised surely ten times the population of this little village. The farms far up on the mountain meadows above us, farms in other valleys, must have emptied themselves into the church. They were all there, especially the women, though the hay lay on the fields and the sun shone. A band played cheerful marches in several keys.

First came the youngest of the maidens with small wreaths of artificial white flowers on their heads. They marched soberly, their great awkward shoes clumping, their hands pressed together in attitudes of prayer. The older girls followed, dressed in their best hats with ribbons streaming. Their long skirts and fine silk aprons came down past the tops of their boots. They carried rosaries and murmured "Heilige Marias" while the band played. A few boys and men followed. The fortunate ones had laid off their Tyrolian breeches and feathered hats—worn even on Sunday for church—and had covered their knees with a clumsy version of store pants. Some carried banners. A group of sober middle-aged citizens held poles supporting a white canopy, embroidered in colors and gleaming gold. Under it were priests—not the parish priest, but important dignitaries from a distance, dressed in fine embroidered vestments. And one among them carried the tiny vial containing the drop of holy blood brought here by the good Saint Briccius in the tenth century. Then came the women. Strong young mothers with babies in their arms; heavy women, clumsy with farm work; old bent women. Their flat hats had flowers embroidered under the brim and ribbons falling from it; their aprons over full, long skirts were gay with stripes and flowered patterns. This was their day, the day dedicated to women and girls, so they marched in their best and said their prayers as they marched. But the faces of all except the young children in that long line were empty of all expression except one of heavy patience. They were earnest faces, brown and deeply cut by wind and the sharp sun. They were terrible faces, the faces of men and women who have spent all their years in a steady fight to draw life out of bare stony fields set up on edge against the sun. In no adult face was there a look of eagerness or humor or reflection. They were poor, bare souls making their mass demonstration to the suffering God who hung, even more stark and weatherworn than they, on the cross beside the road where they stopped to kneel in the dirt and chant their litany of hope.

They kneeled in the dirt. The old, old woman who had walked bent half over on her cane carefully picked up her long silk apron and her dark skirt and kneeled on the broad red and white stripes of her petticoat. She led the prayers of all the women around her. Her voice was surprising—harsh and strong. "Heilige Maria," she chanted, and the chorus of women joined in the phrases of their faith. She looked like a stark symbol of battered, spent humanity, voicing fiercely a belief in some better life in another world, quite remote from the world of hard and shining hills that leaned above her.

The band played and the mass demonstration of the workers of the mountain valleys got up from its knees and proceeded down the steep road, carrying with it the vessel of holy blood deposited here by miraculous means in the year 914 by the good Saint Briccius. Gladly, no doubt, they would have marched on to Vienna, if the need existed, to defend the faith against Socialists and atheists. For what is the duty of man but to support the Holy Church and to labor and suffer in patience, knowing that a heavenly reward awaits all but unbelievers and unrepentant sinners? And what is to become of this world if the forces of anti-Christ prevail and the Holy Church is delivered into the hands of her enemies?

These grim and earnest workers, in simple faith, are on the side of the old guard. And it is hard, here in the mountains, to believe that the faith of the workers of Berlin and Vienna can soon prevail against them.

In the Driftway

VARIOUS good people, especially church people, in this Christian land of ours have for the last few years been voluble in their denunciation of any kind feelings the State Department may have had toward Turkey. They say that Turkey should never be recognized by the United States and they base their plea upon the fact that the Turks have murdered so many of our Christian brothers, the Armenians.

* * * * *

NOW the Drifter holds no brief for a massacre, no matter who the victims may be, but he does feel that even a massacre may have extenuating causes. If the Armenian slaughters had as their sole reason the fact that the victims were Christians, the Drifter might more readily join the chorus of hate against Turkey and even insist that it should be outlawed by Mr. Kellogg and his Christian State Department. Even then it would be rather an illogical procedure. "Christian" nations have murdered a good many heathen in the last two thousand years, yet the Drifter has never heard of a heathen nation outlawing them on that account.

* * * * *

BUT the Drifter happens to have inside information on these Armenian massacres, and he feels much less bitter toward the Turks than he did in the days when he believed all that he was told by the history books and newspapers. For it appears that the real reason for these massacres involves not a question of religion but of brass beds. The Turk, so the Drifter is assured by a historically-minded, humorous realist, has an inordinate desire for brass beds. But the Turk finds it difficult to gather together the price of the beautiful shiny bed of his desire. The craving increases. Now there is always one person in his vicinity who has money—and that is the nearest Armenian. So the Turk goes to the Armenian and asks for a loan. The Armenian is always ready to lend money, at sufficient interest. Everybody is happy. The Turk has his bed, the Armenian his interest. In time, however, the Armenian begins to worry about his principal. He asks for it, but in vain. He demands it, and still it is not paid. Finally, he commits the unforgivable sin. He goes to the Turk's house and carries away the brass bed.

* * * * *

THIS series of events is almost invariably followed by an Armenian massacre. But the Turk is not murdering Christians. He is murdering bill collectors. And at this point the Drifter certainly has sympathy for the Turk. Of course, it may easily be that the Turk, because all the bill collectors he knows are Christians, thinks that all Christians are bill collectors, but this confusion is widespread even among the best minds, so the Turk can hardly be blamed for falling into it. On Leaving Newspapers

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I wonder if on leaving the World Mr. Broun felt as I did in leaving the dramatic department of a Boston newspaper after the dramatic editor had informed me that a Shubert musical comedy came in ahead of Ethel Barrymore in the reviews, because the Shuberts paid more per year to our paper for advertising than the Barrymore management.

My father, a veteran newspaperman, started training me at eighteen to be a sob sister. I quit at twenty-four. I couldn't be that much of a hypocrite.

Andrew Carnegie Said:

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: When Andrew Carnegie, on December 14, 1910, transmitted $10,000,000 to the Carnegie Peace Fund, he remarked, in the course of the letter of transmittal, that "the judge who presides over a cause in which he is interested dies in infamy if discovered." Could there be an apter summary of the probable future of one Webster Thayer, of Massachusetts?

Wayne B. Wheeler

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: You missed the mark in your editorial on Wayne B. Wheeler, in my judgment, when you wrote:

"To his mind any means was justified that helped the good end—poison, sharp politics, perhaps even near-bribery."

A great many of us refuse to believe this; nor can what you call "the moral failure of national prohibition" be explained as easily as you infer.

Keep up your good work of exposing some of the other moral failures of our generation but please be fair to one of the most unselfish men of our time!

A Buddhist Source for Christian Legend?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Through shortening of my notice of E. J. Thomas's "The Life of Buddha as Legend and History," published in The Nation for September 7, my meaning has been somewhat obscured. The place is in the next to last paragraph, where I speak of Mr. Thomas's apparent aversion for the notion that a few Christian gospel legends may be derived from Buddhist sources. In my original manuscript I had mentioned, with some reference to detail, the legend of the Buddhist saint Asita, which is an excellent parallel to the Angel Chorus and Presentation to Simeon, with the Nunc Dimittis, in Luke 2:8-18, 25-35. I then went on to say, as in the published review, "To escape the possible conclusion that the Buddhist legend is the source of the Christian, Mr. Thomas goes to much effort to show it 'late'—one version of it surely is not—and by referring to details in which variants disagree make it appear no parallel at all." The omission of my mention of Saint Asita and the Christian legends in Luke 2, leaves the pronoun "it" (occurring three times) in the sentence I have just quoted without an indication of the specific legend to which it refers.

In my original manuscript I had also pointed out, in this connection, the inexcusably inadequate bibliographical references Mr. Thomas gives on the subject of Buddhist and Christian borrowing.

Vilma Glucklich

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The news from Vienna that Vilma Glucklich of Budapest died there suddenly on August 20 came as a shock to her friends. Her death is an irreparable loss to the international feminist and pacifist movement.

Vilma Glucklich, professor at a high school in Budapest, came from a family of educators. She was already teaching when in 1895 the schools of philosophy and medicine at the University of Budapest were opened to women. Vilma Glucklich left her post and matriculated, as the first woman student, in mathematics and science.

Like the multitude of persons mysteriously descended from the pioneers of the Mayflower, there is a whole generation of Ph.D.'s claiming to have sat next to Miss Glucklich during the four years of her university studies. Several years of teaching at a girls' high school in Fiume made her the idol of the Hungarian-Italian youth of that city. Changing to a post in a municipal school at Budapest she was singled out for leadership in the Hungarian feminist movement. From the start of the movement in 1904 to the day of her death she was president of the Hungarian Feminist League.

Men and women of all classes followed Vilma Glucklich's leadership enthusiastically. The purity of her character, her crystal-clear intellect, and her high scientific achievements were combined with a puritan reserve. But under the calm surface her soul was burning with indignation at the stupid mismanagement of human affairs.

Vilma Glucklich stood the fire-test of her convictions during the World War. The Feminist League, founded on pacifist principles, stood uncompromisingly against the war. Miss Glucklich refused to cooperate in civilian war work and, as professor in a municipal school, risked dismissal and worse.

At the Woman's Peace Congress at the Hague in 1915 she joined those who demanded immediate peace. But the compelling force of her personality and the political weight of her organization saved her from trouble. Some months later the military authorities sentenced her and some other Hungarian pacifists to a few days in prison for carrying on a house-to-house propaganda for peace, but they feared to make a martyr of her. Peace meetings continued all over the country.

When the opportunity offered in 1922, she left her work and her country to become, for three years, general secretary of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, of which Jane Addams is president. From her headquarters in Geneva, she directed the work of women of all continents who united in opposition to the rule of international violence.

Sacco and Vanzetti

By KATHLEEN MILLAY

Wake

I am ashamed of weeping and of words.
They are the little way
For little woe
To swagger for a while and find their ease;
They are the empty way
For frightened souls
To clamor and be still.

Dirge

It is too much to know a million men
Can make no footprint on the bleeding world,
It is too hard for humankind to learn
A million million cries can but return
Into the emptiness whence they were hurled—
And wait a little while and cry again.

Elegy

If in the past at times I have forgotten,
If I have hoped the world was such a place
That men might live and laugh beneath the sun
And lay them down to rest when day was done—
If in the past at times I have forgotten,
Now nevermore again shall I forget.

Ancient Arabia

Handbuch der altarabischen Altertumskunde. In Verbindung mit Geheimrat Fr. Hommel und Prof. Nik. Rhodokanakis, Herausgegeben von Dr. Ditlef Nielsen. I Band: Die altarabische Kultur, mit 76 Abbildungen. Kopenhagen: Nyt Nordisk Forlag, Arnold Busck.

THE Queen of Sheba need not be jealous of Semiramis. Like her, she once moved in majesty before the eyes of men, the representative of a vanished and forgotten civilization. She came from the ends of the earth to see Solomon and all his glory, tried him with riddles, communed with him of all that was in her heart, and gave him treasure, gold, and precious stones. Then she left Jerusalem, and was relegated to the shadowy realm of legend. Now Semiramis has returned to the stage of history as a real queen, ruling on her throne in 811-808 B.C., though she occupies a modest place among the hundred rulers of Assur, Calah, and Nineveh. Such miracles may be wrought where the spade is at work and inscribed bricks are turned up by the thousand. Arabia's past is also unfolding. While circumstances have not yet permitted excavations, thanks to the travels and labors of such men as Karsten Niebuhr, Arnaud, Halévy, and Glaser, copies and squeezes of about seven thousand inscriptions on stone have been secured, our knowledge of the country has greatly increased, and a tentative outline of its history for perhaps fifteen centuries before Mohammed is possible. In the light of what is known today it is not at all improbable that when Solomon was building ships at Ezion-geber, on the Aelanitic gulf, an Arabian queen, perchance a fair rebel in the northern colony of Sheba, set out on a neighborly visit to Jerusalem to talk over the political situation and, after the fashion of monarchs, to establish an entente cordiale against common enemies. What is of vastly more importance, the story of her people's life, their kings and parliaments, their social institutions, their agriculture, trade, and commerce, their palaces and temples, their religious conceptions and practices, can now be roughly told.

Nothing could give a better idea of the advance of our knowledge in this field through recent discoveries than the "Handbook of Arabian Antiquity" now appearing in German under the competent editorship of Dr. Ditlef Nielsen of Copenhagen. When the extraordinary difficulties of the task are considered, the first volume, just out, must be regarded as a work of real distinction and great value. Students of the epigraphic material will, of course, look forward with special interest to the texts, many of them still unpublished, the translations, the commentaries, and the lexicon and grammar promised for volumes II and III. But historians, sociologists, artists, and theologians will be grateful for the general orientation volume I provides. It is authoritative, amply documented, and excellently written. Dr. Nielsen begins with an admirable sketch of the material, how it has been obtained, where it is, and what it amounts to. He takes in not only the inscriptions from Ma'in, Saba, Kataban, and Hadhramaut, kingdoms known already to Eratosthenes and Strabo, but also the Linyanian and Thamudene around al-'Ula, the Safa'itic south of Damascus, and the recent Sinaitic, as well as the earlier Abyssinian. His teacher, Professor Hommel, with whom he studied many years at Munich, outlines the history of the South Arabian states.

The chapter on Public Life in the Old South Arabian States, by Professor Rhodokanakis, is an extraordinarily valuable contribution. Perhaps the most startling discovery is that parliamentary institutions existed, at least in Kataban. They consisted of a general assembly, meeting in the capital, in which the nobility and land owners of the various tribes were represented, excluding apparently only slaves and peons; and a council, made up of a limited number of nobles and probably officials, who proclaimed the law in the name of the king. Both had administrative as well as legislative functions. One is reminded of the Carthaginian constitution, though Aristotle's account is none too clear.

In the closing section, Dr. Nielsen treats at length the religious life of ancient Arabia. In all parts of this country he finds a divine triad, father, mother, and son, the moon-god, the sun-goddess, and the boy Venus. The numerous other divine names are, at least originally, adjectives designating qualities of these three. Il, Ilah, al Ilahu, Allah is the great national lunar deity. Renan went too far in positing a primitive Semitic monotheism, but "the possibility cannot be denied that Il once was what he later became, a spiritual, personal god, having nothing to do with any nature cult." Ilahat, Allat, as well as al Uzza is the solar goddess. Athtar is Venus worshipped as a god. Among the northern Semites, coming from Arabia, the sun (Shamash, Shemesh) became a god, and Venus (Ishtar, Astarte) a goddess, because of changed social conditions. El, Eloah, Elohim remained a lunar god, and so also Yahu, Yahwe, symbolized by a bull, as in Arabia, before the connection with the moon was severed through the prophetic movement. In Israel this movement derived strength from the surviving Arabian tendency to emphasize divine paternity and mercy in contrast to the dominant North Semitic conception of man's relation to the deity as that of slave to master. In Arabia, Mohammed was more profoundly affected by native thought than by what little he knew of either Judaism or Christianity.

The simplicity and grandeur of this conception are impressive, and there is unquestionably a great deal of truth in it. Yet it is impossible to suppress some doubts and queries. Is it likely that all objects of divine worship were connected with the celestial luminaries? May not many of the adjectives refer to local numina? Were there no mountain, tree, and river gods, no chthonic divinities in Arabia? The El of Penuel was apparently a river god. Is it necessary to suppose that, before the Arabian Il was associated with the moon, he was "a spiritual, personal god"? Were there no survivals of earlier stages of religion, animistic and pre-animistic? Did really all the peoples classed as Semites come from Arabia? As regards the Semitic alphabet, its origin is pushed back to the middle of the second millennium B.C. This is justifiable, whatever the date of the Ahiram inscription may be or the significance of the Sinaitic graffiti. Format, paper, print, illustrations, and indexes are excellent. But there should have been, in addition to the routes of Niebuhr, Halévy, and Glaser, a general map of Arabia.

NATHANIEL SCHMIDT

A Hungarian View of Diplomacy

Bismarck, Andrássy, and Their Successors. By Count Julius Andrássy. Houghton Mifflin Company. $6.

WITH the exception of certain voluminous contributions like Conrad's "Aus Meiner Dienstzeit," the Austrians and Hungarians have been scarcely as prolific as the Germans in producing autobiographies and memoirs dealing with the pre-war diplomacy. Hence we may welcome this first instalment of a two-volume work by the son of one of the most famous of Hungarian statesmen since the union of 1867. The present volume deals with the period from 1870 to 1905, and the second will bring the story down through the war period.

Count Andrássy takes the sensible view that a correct understanding of the diplomatic history of Europe from 1870 to 1914 is the indispensable basis for the correction of the evils of contemporary European diplomacy and international relations. In his two earlier books, which followed the outbreak of the war and the Treaty of Versailles respectively, he sharply criticized the alleged bellicose policy of Germany. Now, after reading the "Grosse Politik," he admits that:

> In the twenty-five volumes of the Transactions of the German Foreign Office that I have so far been able to examine, there is not a single expression to lend color to the allegation of belligerent aims on the part of any German statesman—not a single remark which even an unfriendly reader could interpret as bellicose.

There is little in the book which will be novel to those familiar with Rachfahl, Brandenburg, and Hammann, but it is a moderate and highly interesting work, which takes on added importance from the distinction of the author and the fact of his personal knowledge of many of the episodes and personages dealt with. It is particularly illuminating on account of the estimates of personalities, of which the most complete is that of the Kaiser. He acknowledges the Kaiser's intellectual ability, his devotion to the prosperity and happiness of Germany, and his desire for European peace, but criticizes his international manners and diplomatic methods. Andrássy is highly critical of the Russians, though he recognizes the personal honesty and pacific intent of the Czar. By and large, the new Russian documents support his indictment.

In general, his case against the Central Powers comes down to this: that Germany after Bismarck's time, for the most part, exhibited excellent diplomatic technique in a dubious policy, while Austria spoiled a good policy by maladroit diplomacy:

> If only Vienna had known how to use its inherently good policy more skilfully, if only Bülow had devoted his superior diplomacy and personal ability, coupled with the loftier prestige of Germany, to the cause of a better basal idea, the position of the Central Powers might have been far more favorable.

This verdict is certainly correct in regard to German policy with respect to England and Russia. With respect to Morocco, however, exactly the reverse was true. Germany there bungled an excellent cause by stupid diplomacy. The chief mistakes of Germany were her letting go of Russia in 1890; her failure to seize the psychological moment for an alliance with England, after having abandoned Russia in part to secure better relations with England; and the needless irritation of England by the specific methods and attitudes of Germany in the policy of creating her larger fleet. His criticism of Germany for failure to link up with England is sharp, for he holds that it was the greatest of the German diplomatic blunders and was what made possible the launching of the World War by France and Russia. He holds Holstein chiefly responsible here. In the main his view is correct, though he takes Eckhardstein slightly too seriously and fails to indicate adequately the failure of England to offer reciprocal advantages and obligations in return for what she demanded from Germany. Particularly accurate and cogent is his general estimate of German world policy as compared with that of the Entente and the United States. He contends that Germany was less culpable in fact, but seemed chiefly at fault because of her noise and bluster.

In an eloquent passage Andrássy defends the thesis that there was nothing aggressive in Austro-Hungarian foreign policy after 1878, the sole ambition of this state being to preserve the status quo. This was not due to any unearthly nobility of ideals or policy, but simply to the fact that such procedure was to the interest of the Dual Monarchy. Disaster came to Austria-Hungary chiefly because she did not have enough weight in European affairs to exert a decisive influence, particularly in promoting Anglo-German concord, and because her diplomatic methods in the Balkans alienated those who might have been made friends by a more adroit procedure.

Andrássy might have said more about the effect of Tisza's treatment of the Rumanians in the Dual Monarchy in alienating the Balkan peoples, but, in the large, it must be admitted that his estimate of the policies and methods of the Central Powers is remarkably accurate. We shall await with impatience his second volume, which will treat of an even more thrilling period.

Brain Child

The Love Child. By Edith Olivier. The Viking Press. $1.50.

AT first glance "The Love Child" would seem to be one of those child-birth-and-abortion books of which there are too many masquerading as realism in a suddenly sex-conscious America. Miss Olivier's little novel has a title that is provocative and wittily deceptive. For Clarissa, the love-child of Agatha Bodenham, spinster, might be more accurately described as a brain child, since she is a pure figment of Agatha's imagination. Agatha in her lonely inability to make any friends whatsoever creates Clarissa with such intellectual earnestness and passion that the child becomes real and embarrasses her creator by her physical presence. Agatha explains to an inquisitive policeman that Clarissa is a love-child, an explanation which creates gossip but not scandal, since no one can believe such an event in Agatha's blank life. Clarissa grows into an engaging neighborhood character, draws friends to the lonely Bodenham house, and eventually a lover, David. But at David's kiss Clarissa vanishes forever from physical reality—like Peter Pan, she can never grow up. And Agatha is left none too sanely lamenting.

This remarkable tale is told with an utmost simplicity that gives credence to the incredible and with a gravity that points up the fantastic with humor. On the surface it is a literary hors d'œuvre told with unfashionable and welcome tenderness. Underneath are discovered philosophical and Freudian implications. "The Love Child" might illustrate fictionally Berkeley's intricate notion that nothing has existence outside of the mind, or it might be an aesthetic demonstration of the famous suppressed desire. And most happily of all it is not outside the realm of the fairy tale, a fairy tale however, like the might-have-been daughter in one of Barrie's plays, not quite innocent of tragedy and tears.

MARIE LUHRS

The Science of Social Psychology

An Introduction to Social Psychology. By L. L. Bernard. Henry Holt and Company. $4.50.

PROFESSOR BERNARD'S volume will take its place among the distinctive additions to the rapidly growing shelf of texts and guides in this engaging but not well-defined field. It merits recognition by virtue of the author's command of his data and their coordination, his industry and skill, his directness and independence of approach and presentation. No student or reader can follow this compendium attentively without securing a profitable acquaintance with the problems, the concepts, the points of view, the data, the conclusions that constitute the sociological thought of the day. It may well become a preferred avenue for class-room and reference service.

By reason of these not inconsiderable credits, the volume may be discussed in terms of the more fundamental service to be expected of "social psychology." What shall be the credentials and province of that science? The question arises whether "social psychology" is the specialty of the psychologist who focuses upon the social phases of psychic behavior, or of the sociologist surveying the psychological foundations of his domain. Content and treatment will follow accordingly. At closer range we meet the same issue (or, as it hardly carries that measure of disagreement, the same alternative of emphasis or preference of exposition) in considering the phenomena common to the two disciplines either predominantly as trends of behavior, as psychic processes, or as their products characteristically institutional, but in so comprehensive a sense as to include customs, beliefs, organization, and the instruments of their continuity. The sociologist's point of view will conceive the project in terms of products, concrete working details, materials, specifications, environmental conditioning; the psychologist's bent will run to plans, styles, meanings, formulae, interpretations, the interplay of processes and their career. The one will consider what man does in terms of what he is; the other will trace the essential evidence of what he is in what he does.

One must be careful not to overvalue definitions and demarcations; there is no intention of either scientist to stake a claim and homestead the territory. The remark is apposite that sociology was founded by taking possession of the neutral territory where the contours of the other sciences failed to meet; yet the organization of that domain imposes the obligation of a proper logical system of occupation. If he is an adherent of the one temper, the social psychologist will present those phases of psychology of most direct service to the sociologist, just as the "educational psychologist" would serve the teacher, or the "medical psychologist" the prospective and practising physician. If his alliance is in the other camp, the social psychologist will analyze and interpret human institutions as psychological data, for the psychology that in them lies, as a differently minded student would survey them for their economic bearing, and another for their moral aspects; for thus are economists and moralists specialized. It would lead to clarity and orderliness of exposition to have these purposes clearly in mind, however liberal and eclectic their application.

Presumably an excellent and serviceable text could be prepared from either approach, so much more does value depend upon the skill of the expositor, his individual flair for the pursuit; the success of the exploration is determined by the explorer's capacity and insight more than by his choice of routes. So judged, Professor Bernard's volume, like many another, invites criticism. Two defects are conspicuous: the constant and detailed concern with definitions, concepts, triangulations, elaborate preparations for a journey that is never consummated; and the equally constant occupation with the generic, the abstract, the principular to the consequent neglect of the concrete, the descriptive, the actual and factual realities, the clinical diagnosis, without which (to change the figure) the portrait of social psychology is featureless. For one gathers, despite the shift of focus and lack of precision, that Professor Bernard is a sociologist who has delved into the psychological foundations of his science more deeply than many of his confreres, through the conviction shared by many that man the sociological reagent can be understood only through the intricacies of the human psychological organism. He is so bent upon including every phase of a psychological determinism that the resulting composition is crowded and its meaning obscured; and since he has adopted this manner of perspective, the sociological canvas, when he reaches it, is over-psychologized.

A better "sociology" would have resulted if the author had made the psychological background more precise, and had made more concrete and prominent the sociological nature of homo psychologicus. Professor Bernard is an environmentalist. That conviction determines his psychology and might bring him into a spirited controversy with those who assign a deeper determining potency to the organic conditioning; it makes his treatment of temperament, disposition, sex, and race rather cavalier, and ascribes to human grafting and training a value in some directions exaggerated, in others distorted.

In the confederation of the sciences the position of psychology is secure. The temptation is strong for the sociologist to capitalize the large psychological stock which he must carry to accredit the total conduct of his enterprise. If he leans too heavily upon the psychologist for his Fach-material, he may have a fear that his occupation will be curtailed; if he concerns himself too dominantly with human products, he may be trespassing upon the domain of the anthropologist, or the economist, or the moralist, or the religionist. Yet sociology cannot attempt to be all things to all men. Doubtless the day of system-building is of the past; but the ventures of Herbert Spencer, and, with greater pertinence and pioneering penetration, those of Lester F. Ward, still exemplify the ideal of a distinctive career which modern eclecticism has too largely forsaken. We still await the master sociologist to justify the conviction that he can lay the keystone in the arch of the science of humanity.

Buddha Once More

The Life of Buddha, according to the legends of ancient India. By A. Ferdinand Herold. Translated from the French by Paul C. Blum. A. and C. Boni. $3.

OF the three biographies of the Buddha that have appeared recently, M. Herold's, within the limitations of the surviving materials, is the most effective in accomplishing its avowed purpose.[1] It is not meant, as are the others, to decide the historicity of the various legends preserved or to provide an exact rendering of the Buddha story according to the oldest established texts, but rather to extract the essence of Buddhist feeling about the Master and present it intelligibly and beautifully to Western minds. The result is wholly admirable.

The key to an understanding of Buddhism lies in the story of Gotama, just as with Christianity it lies in the story of Jesus. The theme, as with the founder of any religion, is the evil of the present existence and the hard-to-find road to something better: the quest of Siddhartha, god become man, his struggle and his victory, constitute life, entanglement, and release as ideally conceived by the Buddhist masses. The same legends were carved into enduring rock by Buddhist artists throughout most of Asia, but especially in the Gandhara region about two thousand years ago, and everywhere furnish the subject of the greater part of Buddhist art. Even those innumerable statues of the Buddha that all seem alike to uninformed eyes really represent a number of different moments in the great story. Such is its importance to the Buddhists.

The narrative of M. Herold is not much interrupted with doctrinal teaching. This seems to reflect the attitude of the Buddha himself, for his message appears to have been exceedingly simple. Discourses have been preserved in which he refuses to discuss difficult metaphysical problems, and it might have added another jewel to the crown of M. Herold's book if he had utilized one of them. Doctrine on abstruse points was not relevant to the solution of the great problem of religion.

[1] Two other biographies were reviewed in The Nation for September

M. Herold's account is taken from ancient Buddhist texts, composed of inseparable fact and fiction, which he does not translate or reproduce in full, but re-renders with condensation, retelling, paraphrasing. This in itself would not be sufficient to make his book a work of art, but in addition he tells the tale with an unsurpassed choice of word and a corresponding simplicity of style that, matching the beauty and naïveté of his originals, gives the spirit of the Buddha story as well as its substance. Such is the aim of every conscientious popularizer and interpreter, but only rarely is it achieved.

W. Norman Brown

Books in Brief

How Red Is America? By Will Irwin. J. H. Sears and Company. $1.50.

The answer is "Not very." The American Legion and the alarmists may rest in peace. The Communist Party with its fringe of sympathizers number, according to the author's outside guess, no more than 75,000. Add 3,000 anarchists and 16,000 I. W. W.'s and you have 95,000, or one-sixth of one per cent of the adult population of the United States. The other brand of "reds," who are really pale pink, the Socialists, are favored with a liberal estimate of 400,000, members and camp-followers together. All told, this dilutes 100% Americanism with three-fourths of one per cent of "redness." The "radicals," says Mr. Irwin, "are losing ground." He has figures to prove it. Why? In a few pages he traverses the entire American economic scene to show how improvements in the workers' lot, trade union capitalism, employee share holding, etc., along with Fords, radios, and bathtubs have made a difference. The author may be right, but his method here is slipshod. When he asserts that millions own Standard Oil stock he ought to prove it and show whether the "millions" are workingmen. In an effort to be "jazzy" and interesting, scientific procedure has been sacrificed. The future? This chapter is a hodge-podge of everything which says nothing. Our halcyon days of prosperity, to be sure, will end and there will follow distress and discontent, "the soil in which radicalism flourishes." But it will depend on Europe's recovery, on the rise of a "red Moses or Marx, on developments in Russia, on the relation between the Soviet government and the Communist Internationale, on the emergence of political trade unionism here, and on many other things, including a new cut in Karl Marx's whiskers." (Mr. Irwin owes an apology to H. G. Wells for this.) The whole thing is a racy and elongated magazine article.

China and Foreign Powers: An Historical Review of Their Relations. By Frederick Whyte. Oxford University Press. $1.

This little apologetic for British policy in China was presented to the Institute for Pacific Relations at Honolulu by the Royal Institute of International Affairs, apparently as a model of British historical research. The careful reader may be intrigued by the contrast between the two and a half lines which veil British advances in Tibet and the pages given to Russian moves in Mongolia. One gathers that the pro-Chinese orientation of the Washington Conference, including the denunciation of the British-Japanese alliance, was of purely British inspiration, and that the British have no responsibility for their failure to keep their promise to return Weihaiwei to the Chinese; one learns that "in the present politically weak state of China the Consortium is almost the only remaining bulwark of her political integrity" and that the Reorganization Loan of 1913, which enabled Yuan Shih-kai to crush the republican movement, was part of British determination to "stand aside and leave China to work out her own salvation"—and that such is British policy today more than ever. The mind of a British "liberal imperialist" is a curious phenomenon.

The Europa Year-Book, 1927. Edited by Michael Farbman, Ramsay Muir, and Hugh F. Spender. Harper and Brothers. $5.

"An annual survey of economic and social conditions; a European directory and Who's Who in politics, trade, commerce, science, art, and literature," the editors call this book. It is, in fact, a sort of modernized "Statesman's Yearbook," less official, less governmental, more concerned with the economic problems which dominate the formal veneer of politics.

The Art of History. By Prof. J. B. Black. F. S. Croft and Company. $2.50.

The historical specialist of today considers his predecessors of the past as mere amateurs. Nevertheless, history has fallen from its high estate. The new scholarship has not produced works with a vitality that will hold the readers of future generations. Professor Black attacks the problem by the case system. He analyzes four historians of the eighteenth century, Voltaire, Hume, Robertson, and Gibbon. He traces the elements of their success and in it finds a lesson for the modern historiographer. Many inaccuracies can be pointed out in their work. Their criticism of sources was not thorough. Voltaire failed to carry out his books on the vast scale he planned. Hume was led astray by his didacticism. Gibbon very rarely got down to really primary sources. Robertson had very formal ideas about the dignity of history which stiffened his style. This illustrious quartette, however, were saved from the perils of too great specialization. "They applied the whole culture of the age in which they lived to what they did know of the past." Professor Black believes that history should cease to ape the exact sciences and regain its ancient footing among the muses.

Stone Walls Do Not

THE John Golden Theater, until recently given over on alternate weeks to a portrayal of the difficulties of Ned McCobb's daughter and to an exposition of the ease with which a too loving son may trip over the Silver Cord, now echoes nightly to the spit of an automatic and resounds with the familiar "Y-e-a-h? Now what d'yuh think about that?" ironically uttered by one of those ubiquitous plain-clothes men who—upon the stage at least—are always dropping in upon the enterprising burglar just at the moment when he is least anxious to receive visitors. This time Sullivan—known to his intimate enemies as "Sully"—is on the trail of a reformed gunman who unfortunately forgets himself so far as to fling an old enemy off a roof-top, and in the end Sully marches off with his victim not because the latter had not provided himself with a water-tight alibi, but because he has come to realize that he chooses that inward freedom which not even a prison can take away rather than submission to a mean little woman who knows his secret. The occasion of these proceedings is "Four Walls," a new melodrama written by Dana Burnet but touched up and directed by George Abbott, whom it has become the custom to call it whenever it is necessary that a rough-house shall be made thoroughly convincing and that the pistols shall not fail to go off. If you still like this sort of thing—and the incontrovertible evidence of the box-office proves that a great many people still do—it is to be noted that "Four Walls" is one of the best of its kind. It is more careful than most pieces in a similar style to build up a convincing atmosphere before the shooting begins, and it is calculated to hold the nerves tense until the last curtain.

There is, indeed, some evidence that the original author had at one time some idea of writing a drama of character before he yielded to the dangerous impulse to distribute pieces of what the thugs of melodrama euphemistically call "hardware" to the members of his dramatis personae, but thereafter he forgot his purpose in the excitement which they introduce. The hero, a thoughtful young Jewish boy, has succumbed to the influence of his environment, but when the curtain rises he has just returned home after five years in prison and he is still chewing the cud of reflection. Stone walls, he thinks, do not a prison make, and freedom lies within. It is from our passions, from the things which we want, that (pace a still more learned Jew) we forge the chains of our realest bondage, and it is in the realm of the intellect that we must seek for human freedom. "Four Walls" promises to trace the effect of this idea in the mind of a half-articulate East-Sider, and the final situation is intended to indicate the conclusion to which it brought him; but during most of the proceedings the purpose of the play is pretty thoroughly lost sight of.

Now the "laws of the drama" exist for the most part only in the imagination of pedants and there are few of them which have not been triumphantly disobeyed by the breakers of tablets, but there is one which is well nigh inviolable and that is the one which rests upon the sound psychological principle that one cannot successfully play upon the mind and the nerves at the same time. Mr. Burnet cannot expect us to be interested in Spinoza when pistols are being flashed upon the stage, for when someone is about to be shot it never makes, for the moment, very much difference why, in the idiom of this sort of play, he is going to be bumped off. When melodrama comes in at the door every other kind of drama flies out of the window, and one must make one's choice. Many other authors before the present one have fancied that they might make cerebration more palatable to the general by relieving it from time to time by something more exciting, but the plan never works because, if thoughtfulness seems pallid to some when it stands alone, it inevitably seems so to everybody when placed in juxtaposition to things more immediately and superficially exciting. When "thoughtful" melodrama succeeds it is always because it is melodrama, never because it is thoughtful, and such will be the case in the present instance. "Four Walls" is well written and directed in such a way as to keep its melodramatic values intact and it will be popular, but it will be so because while its appeal to the nerves is never for one moment forgotten its Spinoza remains a mere harmless excrescence.

Seeking about for an ultimate absurdity and supposing that I had found it I once suggested that our dramatic censors should see to it that, out of respect to the friendly Japanese, no revival of "The Mikado" was ever attempted here; but the censors always forestall by an actuality any extravagance of satiric imagination, and from the program of the current production I learn that in 1907 the English Lord Chamberlain not only issued a ban against it on the ground that it might give offense to a Japanese prince then visiting in London, but stuck to it even after the prince in question had publicly declared that he would not be offended. I trust, however, that no untimely visitor from the Orient will, in the present instance, interrupt the run of the joyous and well-nigh perfect revival of that opera which Winthrop Ames has produced con amore at the Royale Theater. In New York we are accustomed to the lavish spending of money and Mr. Ames has not wasted himself in that direction, but we rarely see productions upon which care and skill have been so generously expended. Not only is it rich both pictorially and musically, but the difficult job of coordinating the various elements, of seeing to it that the picturesqueness, the tunefulness, and the humor all get their due without interfering one with another, has been most adroitly accomplished. It is rich with effective business, it shows everywhere the presence of excellent taste, and it is, all in all, probably as satisfactory a performance of the opera as has ever been given.

"Ten Per Cent" (Cohan Theater) manages to extract a reasonable amount of amusement out of the adventures of two ambitious young theatrical producers with a Jewish "angel" who is equally anxious to satisfy his daughter by getting her on the stage and to satisfy himself by getting her safely married. "My Maryland" (Jolson's Theater) is another of the elaborate Shubert operettas with lusty marching choruses and impressive ensembles. Although "Revelry" (Theatre Masque) is said to take place "in the day beyond our day," every little schoolboy will recognize in it the story of the scandals and corruption that shook the Harding Administration. Dramatized by Maurine Watkins from Samuel Hopkins Adams's novel, the play is a somewhat jerky melodrama which only at times becomes impressive.

Trotzky Answers Some Questions

ON August 19 the delegation of American labor men and economic experts who recently visited the Soviet Union, interviewed Leon Trotzky, who answered a number of questions submitted to him by members of the delegation. A detailed account of the interview appeared in the Moscow Pravda of August 24 which accompanied Trotzky's answers with some remarks of its own. Trotzky's answers and the comments of the Pravda follow in part:

Q. Would it be correct to say that the Soviet state is a democracy, or should it be said that this is a dictatorship of one class or of a part of that class—the Communist Party?

A. It depends on what is understood by democracy. I agree that, from the point of view of the existing American democracy, the Soviet Union may be denied the right to call itself a democracy. But I reserve for myself the right to deny, from our point of view, that the United States constitutes a democracy. . . . The United States is ruled by the dictatorship of the most concentrated capital under the camouflage of the external forms of political democracy. . . . The Soviet system represents the dictatorship of the working class which has no interest in misleading anybody as to the character of its dictatorship. . . . Another essential difference . . . is in the fact that, while the feudal lords and capitalists strive to perpetuate their rule, the Communist Party looks upon the dictatorship of the proletariat only as upon a temporary passing phase. The object of the revolutionary dictatorship is to create a society wherein there will be no need of state authority since it will be based on the solidarity of the producers liberated from exploitation and with all class barriers removed.

Q. Why is there no freedom of the press and of speech?

A. In order to answer this question we again have to agree as to what is understood by freedom of the press, freedom of speech, freedom of assembly. Everybody has the freedom to fly. But in order to exercise this freedom one must have an airplane. The workers in any democratic country may have the right to their own press, their meetings, etc. But for the press you must have printing plants and paper, and for meetings you must have halls and leisure time, and these things belong not to the workers but to the bourgeoisie. . . . For the workers of America freedom of the press means the freedom to buy for two cents one of those newspapers which are created by bourgeois journalists in the interests of the capitalists. . . . There is no such freedom in our country. . . . We have put these material instruments of the "freedom of the press" to serve the interests of educating the working classes and the people generally.

Q. Is it not a fact that, under the Soviet regime, there may be a possibility of the people being dissatisfied and not having any means for the expression of its dissatisfaction?

A. Of course, the possibility or the existence of dissatisfaction cannot be denied. As long as there is scarcity, as long as there are class differences—and all these things exist in our country—it is inevitable that there should be dissatisfaction, and this dissatisfaction is a force moving forward. Can it find expression? We maintain that, notwithstanding the shortcomings of the Soviet regime as it is at present, this system—through the agency of our Party—offers incomparably greater possibilities for the more complete and direct expression of the interests and feelings of the toiling masses than the thoroughly artificial and deceptive system of bouregois democracy. . . . The Soviet state system, as opposed to bourgeois democracy, offers the working masses incomparably greater possibilities of exerting their direct influence on the course of the national and social life.

Q. What are the causes preventing the recognition of the Soviet Union by the Government of the United States and what should be done for the elimination of these causes?

A. To this question, I should like to hear the answer of the esteemed guests. The basic obstacle, as I understand it, is rooted in the contradictory character of our social systems. The United States at present represents the most complete, the most perfected, and the most powerful expression of the capitalist system, and we represent the first experiment, the rough sketch, of a socialist system. . . . The basic obstacle cannot be removed since neither country is prepared to change its system voluntarily. However . . . much might be done to improve relations. In the first place, it is necessary to explain that we are not as bad as we are thought in America. . . . It is necessary, in particular, to explain that, although we are opposed to private ownership in principle, we heed existing facts, and when we conclude contracts with capitalists, we faithfully carry out our obligations. Why are we being accused of subversive propaganda? Because the capitalist governments cannot reconcile themselves to the fact that there exists a government which represents a non-capitalist mode of thinking.

Take, for example, our present conversation. We are sitting here in a government institution. I have before me a list of about twenty questions, and almost every one of these questions . . . might be construed as an attempt at the overthrow of the Soviet order. Nevertheless not one of our newspapers would think of accusing the esteemed guests of subversive propaganda against the Soviet regime. But imagine a delegation from the Soviet Union in one of the government institutions at Washington putting to one of the government officials of the United States similar queries and questioning the very bases of the American social and state order. You can see for yourself that it is impossible. I beg pardon if my words might be construed by somebody as a reproach for asking such questions. . . . I only want to show that if we should ask questions of this nature in regard to a capitalist state, they would invariably be pictured as an attempt at subversive propaganda.

Q. What are the tasks of the Soviet Government in the field of foreign policies?

A. Our primary task is to maintain and preserve the peace. We think that this task we have in common with the laboring masses of all the world. . . . Our efforts to preserve the peace are rooted in the very foundations of our order, which is a state of workers and peasants, and for us it is a law of social and cultural self-preservation.

Q. Will the Soviet Union be in a position to overtake the advanced capitalist countries, and how soon?

A. We are constantly advancing—that has been proven by facts. We have no doubt but that we can keep on advancing. That part of the national income which formerly had been diverted to the monarchy, the nobility, the bourgeoisie, can now be spent for the development of the productive forces and for raising the material and cultural level of the working masses. We have the great advantage of a centralized economic management. . . . The distance which separates us from the advanced capitalist countries is still very great. Our task is to lessen this distance systematically by the rational utilization of our own internal resources as well as of those additional resources which we may receive—of course, at the price of adequate compensation—from the world markets of capital and goods. But in order to answer the question as to when we may overtake the capitalist countries, it is also necessary to know what will happen to those countries in the meantime. . . . At present the capitalist countries of Europe have attained the pre-war economic level. Simultaneously we see the recurrence of the struggle for markets and for the sources of raw ma-

[illegible], that same struggle which, thirteen years ago, [illegible] war. The further growth of the productive forces in capitalist countries will automatically lead toward a new war, and a new war will bring on a revolution [illegible] all in Europe (the United States will have a respite). On the basis of the immediate [illegible] and social upheavals. It is hard to foresee what technical and cultural level will be maintained in the capitalist countries. This one thing is certain: a victorious revolution, be it in Germany or England, and, moreover, in all of Europe in conjunction with our Soviet system and our natural resources would stimulate immensely the development of the productive forces both in our country, and in Germany, England, or the whole of [illegible]. Such a course of events would also, naturally, accelerate the coming of the revolution in the United States.

Q. What is the most important achievement of Communism in the Soviet Union since 1921?

A. We have reconstructed our industry and attained the pre-war volume of production. . . . For the first time in history socialism has proved by this that it is able to raise the productive forces of the country. . . . In connection with the question of the war danger I return to the question of the differences in our party. . . . First of all we would ask you to make this clear to yourself, that here we deal with differences within one party which has been welded together in all its previous history of struggle underground, by the battles during the November revolution, by the Civil War, by the socialist reconstruction, by internal iron discipline. It is hardly to be expected that these differences could lead toward such events as our enemies are counting or would like to count on. That which separates us is incomparably smaller than that which binds us. Some of the most hostile, most lying, and most muddled foreign newspapers have attempted to attach even war possibilities to the struggle within our party. Such calculations or hopes are basically false. . . . We have remained the same revolutionists as at the time when we raised the banner of revolt against the autocracy of the czars, against the bourgeoisie, against the war; and if our enemies think that since then we have become fat and lazy on our government positions they will be sorely disappointed.

Q. Is not the day near when Soviet Russia will permit freedom of opinion in social life both for the workers and for all those who are not in agreement with the policies of the Government?

A. We would immediately sign an obligation of this kind, if those present would sign a parallel obligation that our world enemies with the enormous material means at their disposal would not intervene in our internal life with the aim of aiding the exploiting classes to overthrow the Soviet regime and turn the country back upon the road to capitalism. . . . Humanity is divided into two main camps: the revolutionary proletariat and the imperialistic bourgeoisie. Everything that occupies a position in between these two joins in critical moments the one camp or the other. The struggle does not cease for a single day. It is not a matter of the abstract freedom of abstract opinions. The question is whether this country is to be a socialist or a capitalist country. . . . Humanity divided by class antagonisms is not a debating society. In their struggle the classes resort to all means of persuasion and coercion. We are the pioneers of a new social order. Our enemies are incomparably more numerous. They are wealthier, better armed than we. They are watching every step we make. . . . For the aims of their struggle against us our enemies used the so-called "democratic liberties." We will not concede it. As before, we will defend by all means of persuasion and coercion at our disposal the dictatorship of the proletariat, which is the only road toward a new actually free human society. If, however, the present or absent friends will promise to eliminate the rule of the banks, trusts, armies, dreadnaughts, airplanes on land, on sea, and in the air, we will promise that same day to give full and unlimited freedom to all parties and all factions.

An Advertisement of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company

No ONE person owns as much as 1% of the capital stock of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company.

The company is owned by more than 420,000 people, with stockholders in every section of the United States. It, in turn, owns 91% of the common stock of the operating companies of the Bell System which give telephone service in every state in the Union, making a national service nationally owned.

The men and women owners of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company are the largest single body of stockholders in the world and they represent every vital activity in the nation's life, from laborer and unskilled worker to wealthy and influential executive. Although the telephone was one of the greatest inventions of an age of large fortunes, no one ever made a great fortune from it—in fact, there are not any "telephone fortunes." The Bell Telephone System is owned by the American people. It is operated in the interest of the telephone users.

MEN of DESTINY

"THE welkin has been pretty well rung already for Walter Lippmann's Men of Destiny, but I cannot forbear adding a few lusty cheers to the critical chorus. This is one of the fall books that demand to be read by all thinking Americans; it has the fine quality of stimulation. Mr. Lippmann is extremely persuasive in his reasoning, but it is not at all necessary that one agree with him to enjoy him.

"Often there is a fine irony in these pieces and there are few from which an intelligent man may not get something to stir his mind. Rollin Kirby's drawings are an admirable feature of an exciting book."

Trotzky Corrected

The Pravda, speaking for the Communist Party, made corrections to some of the answers, as follows:

On the question whether the Soviet state is a democracy: To the question put by the members of the American delegation in this form, Comrade Trotzky has not given the correct Leninist answer. Instead of emphasizing the fact that the Soviet state represents a proletarian democracy, which is a higher form as compared with the bourgeois democracy, Comrade Trotzky missed the class conception of democracy and substituted for it the incorrect contrasting of "democracy in general" and "dictatorship in general" which is contained in the formulation of the question by the delegates. As a result, Comrade Trotzky reduced the whole question of democracy to the "camouflage" which is needed for the dictatorship of the bourgeoisie but is not needed for the dictatorship of the proletariat, thus failing to emphasize the proletarian democracy which is the basis of the proletarian dictatorship and overlooking a historical fact of the greatest importance: the unprecedented development of democracy under the Soviet regime.

In answering the question . . . whether the day is not near when Soviet Russia will permit the freedom of opinion in public life both for the workers as well as for all those who are not in agreement with the policies of the Government . . . Comrade Trotzky essentially dwelt only on the question of the bourgeois parties. He entirely left without a reply the allegation that there is no "freedom of opinion" for workers. . . . We think that an acquaintance with the facts of Soviet reality will convince the members of the delegation that the allegation that there is no freedom of opinion for workers in the USSR is false and slanderous. In our country more than sixty million of the toiling population over eighteen years of age, irrespective of race, sex or nationality, enjoy the right of voting. During the last election campaign more than 50 per cent of this number actively participated in electing the members of the soviets. . . . In our country elections mean the personal participation of the voters in the meetings where the reports of the work of the soviets are heard and discussed . . . and the candidacies of the persons running for soviet posts are discussed and decided upon. More than thirty million workers and peasants exercised this right during the last campaign when the now-functioning soviets had been elected. The number of active participants in the elections is growing from year to year. Not a single bourgeois country can boast of that much. . . . It is true there is no freedom of opinion for bourgeois and anti-proletarian parties the aim of which is to overthrow the rule of the working class and to restore capitalism. But this fact has nothing to do with the freedom of opinion for workers. It is for this reason that ours is a proletarian and not a bourgeois democracy, a democracy for the poor and not for the rich, for the workers and toiling masses of the city and country and not for the capitalists and landlords.

Comrade Trotzky stated that in the Soviet Union . . . "dissatisfaction is a force moving forward. . . ." In that general form in which the assertion was made ("where there are class differences," "dissatisfaction is inevitable"—this apparently refers to the dissatisfaction of classes) it is true in regard only to capitalist countries where the class dissatisfaction of the working masses is a revolutionary force "moving forward. . . ." In a country where the power is in the hands of the proletariat, class dissatisfaction is shown in the first place by the bourgeoisie. . . . This counter-revolutionary dissatisfaction can in no way be recognized from the viewpoint of the proletariat as a "force moving forward," and this is what may be inferred from Comrade Trotzy's statement.

We consider entirely incorrect the answer given by Comrade Trotzky to the question whether the Soviet Union is in a position to overtake the advanced capitalist countries. . . . There are fields in which we have overtaken the capitalist countries long since (the soviet system as a form of proletarian dictatorship and as a higher type of democracy; the successes of the socialist economic method which subjects the public economy as a whole to the interests of the proletariat and the toiling masses). . . . Supposing that the question of the American delegation referred only to the technical achievements of the Soviet industry . . . we can overtake the capitalist world in this field also under the condition that our development will not be obstructed by intervention on the part of foreign imperialists. This success is guaranteed by the advantages of socialist management and economic planning.

LUCKY STRIKE CIGARETTES are, as we all know, "toasted." Many of us have also read, in the advertisements, that 6,000 doctors recommend them. Unless this paragraph discourages Lord & Thomas and Logan, advertising agents for "Luckies," we may soon learn that dentists also urge their use. At any rate, some thousands of dentists have received from this firm of counsellors on public relations a carton of one hundred Lucky Strikes, free of charge. With them went a letter stating that "a good many dentists are recommending Lucky Strikes," a ready-stamped envelope, and a questionnaire card, as follows:

1. In your judgment (where proper care is taken of the teeth, including scientific cleaning at regular intervals) does smoking tend to inhibit the progress of dental decay?
2. Do you think (from scientific deduction or from your own experience with Lucky Strike cigarettes) that the toasting process used in the manufacture of Lucky Strike cigarettes serves to remove all harshness and consequently to make them non-irritating to the sensitive mucuous membrane of the mouth and gums?

Name ..... State .....

Street ..... City .....

The letter adds:

> We certainly have no purpose to publish any testimonials and our reputation for integrity must be your assurance that your identity will be preserved in confidence by us, and that your name will not at any time be published.

With this assurance of anonymity doubtless many dentists signed on the dotted line and smoked their hundred Luckies with serene assurance that they were thereby inhibiting dental if not moral decay. We submit it as a sample of modern scientific advertising methods.

RUTH McCORMICK is another American we like. She chooses to run for Congressman-at-large in Illinois against the henchmen of Governor Len Small; and we bet on her to win. She happens to be a daughter of Mark Hanna and the widow of the late Senator Medill McCormick, but fortunately she is not running for office as a widow. The sentimental appeal of the widow for her husband's office seems to have become a settled part of the blah of American politics, but there is no respect for women in it. The politicians do not renominate the widows after one mournful term, and if they do the voters do not elect them. The whole tradition belongs to the same school of newspaper thought which greeted with surprise the announcement of a Cornell scientist that women's brains could be as large as men's and treated it as first-page news. Mrs. McCormick belongs to another school. She has in Illinois an organization of Republican women voters which is one of the few politically effective organizations of women in the United States—and it is her own creation. She asks for votes not in order to commemorate her husband but in order to smash a corrupt politician, and she has a demonstrated personal ability to offer as a substitute. She seems in a fair way to prove what the many estimable women who have sat in Congress and in governors' chairs have not yet done—that a woman can beat men at their own game of politics.

"AL" SMITH and his managers persuaded the New York State Democratic convention not to indorse him for President now because they thought that in the long run it might hurt the campaign to nominate him. And the Republican bosses persuaded their equally well-managed convention not to indorse Charles Evans Hughes because they were afraid they might want to change their minds later. Neither party dared peep about prohibition, although the delegates probably discussed it among themselves even more than they discussed Presidential possibilities. These conventions are an instructive comment upon the apathy the voters showed in the previous week's primaries. Why shouldn't they be apathetic, when the bosses are so afraid of an issue or a man or of any clean-cut, honest statement on a controversial question? Philadelphia voters trooped to the polls to nominate Boss Vare's white-washing crew, and even the prospect of an independent campaign in the regular election, with a nonpartisan-ticket campaigning for common honesty, does not seem to alarm Pennsylvania's Senator-elect. Only in Rochester, New York, did independent voting prevail, and there it was supported and heavily financed by George Eastman, the millionaire manufacturer, who in his seventies has turned from kodaks and big-game-hunting to city management and municipal reform.

LITTLE TEDDY ROOSEVELT is unlucky. His plans to blow himself along his father's trail seem doomed always to go awry. His wild abuse of "Al" Smith at the Republican State Convention missed fire even on the day of its utterance, and now proves a boomerang. "A man must be judged by the company he keeps," said Roosevelt. "Next to being corrupt yourself is tolerating it in your supporters." Two days later a nonpartisan committee of high distinction, headed by Dr. Haven Emerson, made public a long and detailed report charging a whole series of acts of malfeasance against Mrs. Florence Knapp, former New York State Secretary of State, who was young Roosevelt's associate on the 1924 Republican ticket. George K. Morris, Republican State chairman, is also heavily tarred by the exposure. "A man must be judged by the company he keeps." Quite so.

"KASH FROM THE KLANSMEN" has long been the war-cry of Ku Klux Klan officials, and now that the Klan is engaged in exposing itself, particularly in Pennsylvania, we learn from affidavits signed by Kleagles and Klaliffs that Imperial Wizard Hiram W. Evans has pocketed a considerable portion of the half billion dollars that has been raised by Klan memberships and other fees during the past few years. The Imperial Klan, which evidently means Evans, has a neat system of mulcting the gullible: first by gaining new members and charging them an initiation fee of ten dollars and subsequent fees in proportion, second by revoking charters of Klan locals and appropriating the funds in their treasuries. From time to time business has been slow, new members have been hard to find, and in circumstances such as these the real business acumen of Evans and his associates has come to the fore. It was a simple matter to instigate a riot, to manufacture a lynching, to stage a kidnaping, in order to make it seem that American womanhood and white race supremacy were in danger. This the Klan did; one of its most successful riots —according to the charges now being investigated—took place at Carnegie, Pennsylvania, in 1923. There one Klansman was killed and many wounded, which resulted in 25,000 new members at ten dollars a head. We cannot work up much sympathy for the 25,000 victims of this swindle; but it is devoutly to be hoped that they will learn not only how not to be swindled out of their money, but how not to be gulled by false patriotism and race hatred.

THE BOYS AND GIRLS of Gary, Indiana, have gone far to make us doubt our favorite doctrine that youth is always right. In Indiana youth may, on the contrary, be in the Ku Klux Klan. Nearly 1,200 students walked out of the Emerson High School in Gary in protest against the presence in the school of nineteen Negroes. For a time the authorities stood firm: if the boys and girls of Gary were ready to forego their high-school education for the sake of bigotry and prejudice, at least there were the Negroes willing to be taught. But the strike went on, and the authorities faltered. The strike committee conferred with the mayor, and together they drew up a petition to the City Council. In response to this petition the Council has appropriated $15,000 for a temporary school building to accommodate the Negro students, and the white students have generously consented to attend classes on the following terms: Three Negroes who are seniors and have attended the school for several years may remain and finish their studies; three others are to be transferred to another high school with a large Negro enrolment; the rest will apparently wait for the new $15,000 school. Three Negro members of the City Council voted against the appropriation for this school; in order to shove the measure through the Council abrogated its own rule requiring a three-quarter majority vote on any emergency measure. Ultimately a "million-dollar all-Negro school" is promised. When that is built, Gary will doubtless feel it has wholly sustained the principles of liberty, equality, and fraternity. Meanwhile, wouldn't it be well to change the name of the Emerson High School to something more appropriate—such as the Hiram Wesley Evans School for Protestant Evangelical Nordics?

SOMETIMES MILITARY MEN are astute and then again one might call them almost subtle. The Round-Up, for example, a paper which expresses the journalistic ambitions of New Mexico State College students, prints the following alluring invitation:

> Advanced R. O. T. C. pays. Whether you juniors believe in military training or not, if you are in need of money you had better take the course. The compensation is nine dollars a month. Besides this, a thirty-six-dollar uniform is given to the advanced student. . . . Some claim that the summer camp is a disadvantage. True they get only seventy cents a day, with board, room, and clothing; but most of them make considerable from the transportation appropriation, which is five cents a mile.

This nine-dollars-a-month bait may work well enough in New Mexico, but obviously the sons of bankers and successful soap manufacturers who attend Yale demand more. Accordingly the military department in New Haven maintains a stable of polo ponies for the artillery students, and thirty-six-dollar uniforms are replaced by snappy tailor-made officers' outfits. The Yale Daily News presents the further sagacious argument:

> "Why learn to be a soldier?" [it says] is a perfectly natural question that comes into the mind of a Freshman when he is debating whether or not he should take R. O. T. C. . . . If he is serious about the matter he may feel that four years training in the field artillery would benefit him little in a bond selling career. . . . Letting alone the desire of the government to build up an organized reserve, there remains the fact that this military training gives a man one of the finest preparations for a profession or business that can be found at Yale.

INDUSTRIAL STRIFE in America seems to have reached a stage wherein the main participants are the federal courts and organized labor, the employers politely withdrawing into the background. The most recent example is the injunction granted by federal Judge Schoonmaker against picketing by the Pittsburgh miners. More serious in principle, however, is the injunction handed down by federal Judge W. I. Grubb in New York against the Journeymen Stone Cutters' Association of North America. The 5,000 members of the stone-cutters' union are enjoined from their customary practice of refusing to work on non-union stone imported into the metropolitan district. Such a decision destroys the trade-union principle of never working on "scab" material. A similar issue arose last June in the fight of the Bedford Stone Company of Indiana upon the Journeymen Stone Cutters' Association. The United States Supreme Court there decided that the refusal of union men to work on material cut by non-union labor constituted a "conspiracy in restraint of interstate commerce," Justice Brandeis dissenting in an opinion which stated that "the propriety of the union's conduct can hardly be doubted by one who believes in the organization of labor." Newspaper reports hail the New York injunction as "a great victory for the government." To us such a "victory," virtually crippling organized labor, seems a disaster.

HINDENBURG IS EIGHTY, president of the German Republic, and a mighty warrior. There is something in the massive figure of the dour old man that commands respect and excites enthusiasm. His lieutenant, Ludendorff, stumbles in a bog of race prejudice and party politics; others of his fellow-generals eat out their days in lonely recollection; Hindenburg alone has succeeded in maintaining himself above party yet indisputably contemporaneous. He was the demigod of the Kaiser's Germany, yet he survived the shattering of idols in the days that followed the armistice. When Wilhelm fled to Holland and Ludendorff escaped in disguise, Hindenburg remained. After his fashion he has adapted himself to the republic and accepted the new regime. One may disagree with his philosophy and doubt the wisdom of his speeches, but one knows that his acts arise out of something far beyond personal ambition or party scheming. He represents and expresses German nationalism, German patriotism, at its dangerous best, and it is fitting and natural that in these dull aftermath-days the German crowds should find an outlet for their long repression in celebrating his birthday.

WHO IS JOHN COOLIDGE? To what public office has he been elected or appointed? All we know about John is that he is a student in Amherst College and happens to be a son of the President of the United States. And yet we read that he has arrived in Amherst for his senior year "accompanied by a young secret-service man." In the name of Beelzebub, why? We heard first of this secret-service man last year and hoped by now that he had been returned to some legitimate work—or is there such an army of these men that no legitimate work can be found for them all? We can't think of a shadow of a reason why John should need a watchdog or, if he does, why Calvin Coolidge shouldn't pay for it out of his own pocket as any other father would. Are we to wind up by charging the American people for a nurse for Calvin Coolidge's fourth cousin's baby girl Gwendolen or a veterinary for his wife's great aunt's pet poodle Trixie?

THE ANNOUNCEMENT of the plans for the second season of the Civic Repertory Theater signalizes the success of one of the most remarkable theatrical enterprises undertaken in New York City. Miss Le Gallienne's company based its appeal upon nothing except interesting plays well produced. Housed in an old and remote theater on Fourteenth Street and surrounded by no smart or fashionable atmosphere, it attracted an audience generally said by theatrical managers to be non-existent—an audience, that is to say, which preferred serious plays seriously produced to any of the extraneous attractions of Broadway. Miss Le Gallienne held, moreover, more consistently to the repertory idea than any other New York organization has done in many years. Not only did she produce and keep alive a number of plays during a whole season, but she will carry six of them over into the present winter. Despite the gloomy prophecies amid which she began, her organization bids fair to become one of the most firmly established as well as one of the most interesting in New York.

STEFAN GEORGE is the first German writer to receive the Goethe Prize of 10,000 marks, offered by the Common Council of Frankfurt-am-Main for work best representing in modern times the spirit and dignity of the author who made Frankfurt immortal in his "Dichtung und Wahrheit." As long as there must be literary awards, and apparently they increase in number around the world, this seems to us one of the more justifiable kinds. To be sure, it tends to obscure the recipient by placing another name than his in the foreground, and by lending him a kind of historical identity. But it emphasizes that principle of continuity which informs any vital literature, and if it is intelligently administered year by year—which of course there is always a chance it will not be—it need not provoke thoughts of the dead hand which the past is supposed to hold ever ready to descend upon living artists. No really living writer ever got along without the past—or the present either. It is only to be hoped that the administrators of the Goethe Prize continue to interpret this truth with imagination and courage.

NEWS COMES from London of the recent and sudden death in London of Walter Fuller. He was, during the years of his work in this country, inevitably connected with every valiant intellectual impulse and enterprise. First with the World Tomorrow and later with the Freeman, he added to his functions as editor a creative touch very like magic, bringing life and humor and individuality to dull men and prosy articles. In 1917 when Morris Hillquit polled 145,000 votes for mayor of New York, Walter Fuller flung a rare sort of political imagination into the dust of the campaign. He saw possibilities other men missed; he invented jokes, he created situations. Wherever he was, new meanings sprang out of commonplace situations. Our liberal cause lost much when he went back to England, his home. His work there has been varied; but for some time before his death he was editor of the Radio Times, organ of the great official British Broadcasting Company. A London dispatch to the Manchester Guardian says of him:

> He was one of the first English journalists to realize the importance of wireless for education and entertainment, and in the radio world there was no more vivacious and resourceful worker. . . The opportunities of radio stimulated and absorbed him. He overflowed with ideas for the educational programs, in which department for a time his work lay, and he made a very competent and effective job of the Radio Times.

The Navy and Army Waste

REAR ADMIRAL MAGRUDER has rendered a service to the navy and the government to entitle him to a D.S.M. if only he has hit hard enough to compel the Navy Department, or better Congress, to act. The waste and extravagance of which he complains in the Saturday Evening Post have always been inseparable from our naval and military administrations. There has never been a time in our knowledge when an efficient civilian administrator like Owen D. Young could not have gone into either department and saved millions upon millions of dollars, provided he were given a free hand by the politicians and the ruling cliques in the Navy and War Departments. For this situation it is only fair to say that the Navy and Army officers are only partly to blame. The responsibility is even more that of Congress and the Executive. Next to the Post Office the Navy Department has always received the worst Cabinet deals from the several Presidents. While the Post Office has been used as a roosting-place for the professional politician who successfully steered the campaign of the incumbent of the White House, the Navy Department has been decorated with a succession of misfits, lawyers, society favorites like George Von L. Meyer, incompetents like Denby (whom the Supreme Court of the United States has declared highly censurable), or unhappy bunglers like the present secretary, who was taken off the Supreme Court of California to put his foot into it whenever he could, by public utterances such as his cruel castigation of two of the lost Pacific flyers for sending an S.O.S. signal before they were actually dead.

The greatest scandal of the navy has, however, been the maintenance of the navy yards by the politicians. Rear Admiral Magruder points out that there are seven navy yards doing the work that three or four could accomplish. From the beginning of the republic this scandal has been going on and nobody has ever been able to stop it. New yards have constantly been built like those at Charleston, S. C., and Port Royal and Bremerton, Washington, for purely political reasons, just as during the nineties any Senator could get from Congress a brick barracks for his pet city. Thus Senator Proctor of Vermont obtained an appropriation for a cavalry post near Burlington, climatically one of the worst places in the United States for mounted troops—on the excuse that we had to watch the Canadian border!—and Senator Carter of Montana worked a bill through to give him a regimental station at Helena, Montana, which has no military value whatever. When the Democrats were in, the Southern yards profited; when the Republicans control the Treasury, the Northern and Western navy yards flourish. In one of these yards the only vessel repaired during the last fiscal year was a tug.

Now Admiral Magruder points out that the Navy's high officers have realized the folly of this but have considered themselves powerless to abandon the useless navy yards because of pressure from politicians. The Admiral rightly points out that this is no excuse; that they could refuse to send ships and men to the needless yards, and at least make some saving in that way. From end to end of the naval service he points out extravagances and incredible waste. An airplane carrier about to go into commission is to have sixty-two typewriters, and presumably that number of clerks to keep the typewriters going! He shows that the cost of the Navy has risen since 1908 from $82,000,000 to $300,000,000, for which he says the United States gets a $200,000,000 navy. We should lower that latter figure a good deal, but we entirely agree with the Admiral when he says that "the truth is that they are spending money like hell and getting little for it." We believe that if a general could be found with the courage of a Colonel Mitchell to tell the truth about the rest of the army as Admiral Magruder has told it about the navy, there would be a similar showing of hundreds of millions of dollars wasted.

Here are some of the facts which Admiral Magruder has brought out: The number of officers has risen from 2,204 in 1908 to 8,574 in 1925, although this covers the period since the Washington Disarmament Conference, after which we put an end to our battleship-building and destroyed thousands of tons of seagoing vessels. In the same time the number of men has risen from 38,500 to 82,000, and the pay of the navy from $24,000,000 to $124,500,000. Meanwhile, and this is highly significant, the number of officers on duty in Washington has risen from 146 to 519—that is where the lobbying is done, where the fortunate inside clique which rules by favoritism, toadying, politics, and petticoats has its seat; where one falls over needless admirals. There are now fifty-five active rear-admirals, for whom of course there do not exist the necessary commands, so that one vice-admiral now commands a light cruiser and six destroyers, and another four fuel-supply and repair ships and five tugs!

Fifteen admirals took part in the maneuvers in 1926, although there was no fleet to warrant such an overhead of commanders. The truth is that the fleet was never demobilized after the World War, and that the navy itself has continued the utterly extravagant methods introduced during the war, when the motto in all the departments of the government was "hang the expense." It is over-organized afloat and ashore; it keeps useless ships in commission and good ships out of commission; it is honeycombed with inefficiency, waste, extravagance, and red tape. The naval officers cannot free themselves from the responsibility for this. If the General Board would devote itself to problems like this instead of scheming to get larger appropriations out of Congress and planning for coming wars with Japan and Great Britain, we should get reforms in plenty, worthwhile economies, and a more efficient fleet. But they like the present situation because it means more fuss and feathers, more rank, more display, more influence, more quarterdecks to parade, more projection of their personalities upon the screen of our political and official life.

Secretary Wilbur has been wise not to yield to the clamor for a court martial for Admiral Magruder's "traitorous" articles. But his order that the Admiral work out a plan for the entire reorganization of the navy is both tricky and puerile. The Admiral has outlined any number of reforms in his article; if Secretary Wilbur should act on them he would win the thanks of the country, make himself a respectable figure in the Cabinet, and find enough to do for the rest of his term in office to keep him from chiding desperate aviators for calling for help.

Literature and Tradition

NO one who looks over lists of books announced by publishers these days can help being struck by the number of reprints he finds there. It is not merely that the classics are being rendered popularly available at a rate hitherto unknown. That process, after all, is well over a hundred years old, and was quite familiar to the Victorian reader. As we have our Everyman's Library and our World's Classics, he had his Morley's Universal Library and his Cassell's National Library; and if it is of Greek and Roman works that one is thinking, there was Bohn's Classical Library long before the Loeb Classical Library was dreamed of. We refer rather to the demand for old books off the beaten path—old books, it may be, merely because they are old books. The last few years have seen an astonishing development in the business of type facsimiles—that is, volumes reproducing as perfectly as possible the appearance and flavor of, say, a first edition of Gray or Collins of Akenside or Shenstone or George Herbert or Henry Vaughan or Michael Drayton. And it would seem in general that all past literature, British and otherwise, is being ransacked for unique, reprintable items. It is fashionable, if one can afford it, to be a subscriber to the Dove or the Nonesuch or the Golden Cockerell press.

This can mean a variety of things. It can mean simply that in an age of many books there is an audience for the antiquarian as well as for the new. Many of the reprints at any rate are so attractive to the hand and eye that they may be said to have the value of any beautiful object whatever. Or it can be made to mean that a novel form of decadence has beset us—that, losing the blind urge which drives creative artists in the healthiest periods of production, we have become tired of creation and have begun to sit back easily in the cool company of ancestors who knew nothing of our problems, and who, though they had problems of their own, did once for all settle them. T. S. Eliot's recent complaint that British fiction more and more loses contact with current realities may, then, have a connection with the circumstance that the advertising columns of the London Times literary supplement are regularly emblazoned with descriptions of exquisite revivals of half-forgotten works; or with the fact that the Oxford University Press has come to many readers to stand for expensive editions more than anything else. In the United States the movement started a little later than it did in England; but here too we have our "libraries" and "bookshelves" conceived in the interest of the American literary past. Here also the charge is brought that the creative impulse which freshened our letters a decade or more ago has at last been spent.

But it may not be necessary to use the word "decadence" in this connection. There is still another explanation of the tendency we have been describing. Into some of the best criticism of the last few years has been creeping the word "tradition"—a word very much frowned upon in the heyday of our "renaissance," and a word, to be sure, which only the ablest critics ever seem able to use without making fools of themselves. It was folly, for instance, that inspired the enemies of free verse to attack it some years ago merely because it was new; or that moved some of the deans of American letters to shudder in print at the novelties achieved by our subtlest story-tellers. There is today, however, a school of critics who appeal to tradition in a fashion that is worthy of respectful attention. T. S. Eliot, who consistently attacks the generation of Shaw and Wells, does so because in his opinion that generation cared nothing for the discipline without which art is seldom achieved. It was generous and loose and free, he says, and perhaps magnificent in its impulses. But it sacrificed the letter to the spirit; whereas, insists Mr. Eliot, "the spirit killeth and the letter giveth life." An understanding of this apparent parodox—perhaps it is a paradox only to those old-fashioned folk who believe in the perfectibility of man—would involve an understanding of the whole intellectualist movement which Mr. Eliot represents both for England and for America. And it would help anyone to understand further why the sternest critics we have—and the most insistent upon contemporaneity—are most aware of the importance of all that has happened to literature in the past. The current realities which Mr. Eliot cannot find in current fiction are the realities of a new life, a new society, a new psychology which the utopianism, the optimism of our now aging prophets somehow fail to control. Mr. Eliot and his school may be very wrong—may be only reading their own special thoughts into the intellectual structure of the age. But there they are, and they need their literary ancestors about them as they work.

The Courtship of Chiang

CHIANG KAI-SHEK, having resigned as generalissimo of the Chinese Nationalist armies, has engaged in a more congenial campaign. He is suing for the hand of Mei-ling Soong, Wellesley, '15. Miss Soong, the cables report—and who would doubt a cable from China?—is willing; but her sister, Mrs. Sun Yat-sen, graduate of Georgia Wesleyan, and her brother, T. V. Soong, Harvard '15, and her brother-in-law, Sun Fo, once of Columbia University, and her other brother-in-law, H. H. Kung, erstwhile of Oberlin College, object. They have all been associated with the Hankow Government, against which Chiang fought; and they seem to believe that in China, as in dynastic Europe, marriages should continue to partake of the color of politics.

Yet Chiang has gone to Japan to win the consent of Mrs. Soong, and doubtless the spectacle of the ardent general reverently traveling abroad to seek a parent's permission will soften the heart even of a mother of Harvard, Wellesley, and Georgia Wesleyan graduates. Chiang has been too conservative in politics to suit the men of Hankow; but in marriage he goes the limit of modernism. He has divorced his first wife—which is more than Dr. Sun did before he married the beautiful lady who is now in exile in Moscow; he has freed his concubines, which is action unusual in a Chinese general; and he has taken the utterly unprecedented step of appearing publicly as a suitor before he has been accepted. It is many a century since a Chinese leader has appeared in a role so humiliating to the male—and it is a sign that along with China's other revolutions has gone a revolution in the status of woman.

Chiang Kai-shek is close to forty, and his only foreign schooling was in Japan, where marriage customs are as conservative as in China; oddly, it is the foreign-trained young men and women of the Soong, Kung, and Sun tribes who are objecting to a marriage based solely upon the love of the two parties principally concerned. Every foreign-trained young man or woman in China has faced the same dilemma. Should they marry as their hearts bade them, according to the code learned in the West, or let their parents pick their mates, according to the immemorial custom of China? Many a girl student has flung herself into the rivers of China when family pressure put an end to a college romance. More than one of the young leaders best known abroad bears the wounds of the struggle that ended when he decided that his usefulness in China would be finished if he did not obey his parents' wishes. A Chinese statesman, well known in Europe as a cultured modern, recently sent an intermediary to propose marriage to a girl whom he had met at a foreigner's home, saying that he could not lose face by appearing in person until he was certain of success.

Many stories are told in China of the courtship of Feng Yu-hsiang, the "Christian general." This much at least is fact: Feng wanted a "modern" woman as his second wife, and was impressed by stories of the talents of a Y. W. C. A. secretary. He sought to make her acquaintance, but she, faithful to old codes, refused, and it was by a ruse that he succeeded in meeting her at the home of a foreign missionary. And it was only after he had made a whole series of pledges of conduct different from that customary in a Chinese husband that he won his present bride.

Feng's wife was a graduate of Yenching, an American mission college; but Mei-ling Soong passed years in the United States. She knows the West; she has contributed good verse to American periodicals; she can be as tart-tongued as any Yankee flapper; and the generalissimo Chiang can hardly have been the first to ask her mother's permission. Her Georgia-trained sister had much to do with Dr. Sun's success in his later years; it will be interesting to see whether a Wellesley wife, unorthodoxly wooed, can coach Chiang Kai-shek back to leadership in China.

Faster Atlantic Liners?

AGAIN the project for a faster transatlantic service has been mooted. This time the proposal is for a four-day crossing from Montauk Point to Plymouth or Havre. The 20,000-ton turbine ships are to have a speed of between 30 and 35 knots. More than that, departures are to be daily from each side, for which reason the fleet is to comprise no less than ten vessels. They are to be quadruple-screw, with accommodation for 400 passengers in modest staterooms, and room for only 500 tons of first-class freight. The turbines are to develop no less than 100,000 to 130,000 horse power, the steam being supplied by twelve boilers. The ships are to carry airplanes for the use of passengers who wish still further to shorten the time of the voyage when the weather permits. The names of some well-known steamship men are mentioned in connection with the proposal, among them that of Mr. H. B. Walker, president of the American Steamship Owners' Association. While it is not yet clear that the money for the enterprise has been found, it is hinted that the Pennsylvania Railroad may be interested by reason of its ownership of the Long Island Railroad, which would carry all the freight, passengers, and mails from the ships to New York City and vice versa.

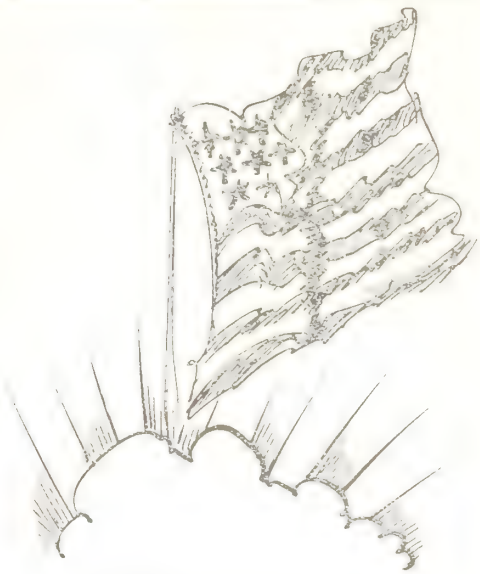
It will take a great deal of backing to make us believe in the feasibility of this particular scheme. We have long been of the belief that the time of crossing the Atlantic should be cut and have thought of the possibility of two fast ships to make the trip in four and one-half days, leaving New York early Friday evening and arriving at Plymouth Tuesday morning. There is nothing impossible in this. The speedy Mauretania on her last voyage to New York left Cherbourg at 6 P. M. Saturday and was at her American pier by 10 P. M. Thursday evening—within one hour and a half of the transatlantic record made by her—yet she is twenty years old and a veteran of the World War. Four more knots of speed and the trick could be done, and the Mauretania carries not less than 1,000 tons of freight and 550 first-class passengers—even more when crowded. Such experimental vessels as we have suggested could be run as extra-fare boats, precisely like the limited trains (such as the Twentieth Century) which are amazingly profitable for the railroads which operate them.

Our objections to the Long Island scheme are that daily sailings are unnecessary and, at present, financially impossible. Every extra knot of speed costs enormously. Some money could be saved if all the costly accommodations could be banished, such as the de luxe staterooms, the gymnasiums, swimming pools, tea-gardens, orchestras, etc.—all unnecessary extravagances for a four-and-a-half-day voyage. Indeed, the architect of the ships, Ernest H. Rigg, is clearly of the opinion that the cabins should be as simple as Pullman compartments. But even with this saving the cost of speed remains very high, and we cannot see a daily service running except at a dead loss during the bad winter months. Moreover, one must admit that no four- or four-and-a-half-day ship can keep her schedule in bad weather. She must slow down to avoid plunging in heavy seas, with the terrific strain upon her engines, to speak not at all of the comfort of her passengers. Again, it would take more than ten vessels to keep up a daily service, yet leave a reasonable rest for crews and a margin for accidents and delays. Finally we cannot wax enthusiastic over Montauk Point as a terminal. New London has a superb harbor and a fine State pier, and is hardly an hour's further steaming. The New Haven Railraod can run fast boat-trains better than the Long Island. Besides, New London is half way from New York to Boston. Trains could leave at once for Canada and all New England points. If there is to be an American Southampton or Plymouth let it be New London.

Fast vessels are a luxury because of their heavy winter losses—which is a chief reason why the lines are so eager to charter their big vessels for winter cruises. It is also the reason why a company which operates a Leviathan or an Ile de France must surround those vessels with a fleet of economical, slow-running vessels with low coal or oil bills. Yet, as we have said, we should like to see the experiment tried with 20,000-ton rather than 50,000-ton vessels. There will be greater discomfort from vibration and motion in the smaller size—the 40-knot destroyer is indubitably the worst vessel to go to sea in; but, in the years that have elapsed since the Mauretania made her world's record, engineering has progressed and so has the stabilization of ships. The United States has grown vastly more important to Europe during those years, and Europe to us. The transatlantic mail service could and ought to be improved as to speed and will pay for itself if it does cross in faster time. The Zeppelin and airplane-mail services still lie far in the future. Faster steamers are possible. Let us have them.

Yesterday your correspondent interviewed a Prominent American now making certain economic studies along the Boulevards of Paris. This patriot declared himself disgusted with recent French victories in the field of sport.

"This will never do," he said. "We can't afford to let a frog get the best of an honest American. And it is up to Congress—



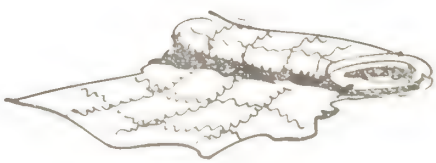
"to vindicate the honor of old Glory as it has done in other fields during these last fifty years.

"Look here, those Frenchmen used to beat us at dress-making. Very well, we passed a law which put 80 per cent on all French dresses.

"Those silly Swiss yodlers used to make better watches than we do. Very well. We put a duty of 90 per cent on all Swiss watches and saved the reputation of the American clock industry.

"The Wops made better cars than we did. So we put a tax of 95 per cent on all Eyetalian cars and gave our own machines the victory.

"Then there were the Dutch. Our bulb lobby told Congress that Dutch tulips were full of dangerous bugs. We legislated them out of existence and our own tulips are triumphant.



"And it was a cinch to put such a duty upon English cloth that our own mills won their well-known victory. And so in the future why not apply a little tariff commonsense to international sport?"

SOMEBODY in Kansas said that a man who took a high-ball was as much a public enemy as one who threw a bomb. This is not as silly as it sounds. Drinking has always been a form of protest. It has, however, the advantage of being effective and dignified. As a progressive I may express myself by shouting for Mr. McAdoo or for gin. I much prefer gin.

People who are entirely satisfied with the present state of the world have a right to be bone-dry. All others should drink to excess. It seems, so the anecdote goes, that there were two reformers.

"Why are you drunk?" said the one called Osbert.

"Why are you sober?" patly answered the one called Mike.

The right to get tight belongs with the right to assemble, to petition, and to speak freely. Sooner or later there will be a recognition in this country of the fact that the wet-and-dry problem is an issue between radicals and conservatives. At the present time you may find reactionaries in the rum camp and liberals in the ranks of the enemy. This is all wrong. The count should be delayed until the men are compelled to go to their rightful corners.

I don't see how anybody can be politically dry and at the same time progressive. To argue that America is anything less than the Utopia of the dreamers is to insult the Anti-Saloon League. To view with alarm at the present moment is sedition to the Eighteenth Amendment. This is the richest and most fortunate country in the world and everybody is happy. In the old days the tariff did it, but now it is prohibition which scats the wolf away from the worker's door. In other words, the prohibitionist has got what he wants and must logically become conservative. But we who believe that much is out of joint owe it to our cause to drink and defy the smug and satisfied.

Moreover, alcohol transcends political considerations. It is the rock at which material and spiritual forces divide. Without wine the soul perishes. You cannot have dry poets, painters, and dreamers. Quite justly all the famous prohibition leaders in America have denied the charge that they are fanatical. Obviously this is a silly accusation. You will find none but practical men in the tents of the anti. [illegible] 6.1216 per cent of the inhabitants of Hillsboro County were [illegible] 15.6982." In the old days preachers [illegible] beyond the skies, but [illegible] rum is compounded semi-annually. If you would [illegible] things you must find yourself a speakeasy.

Possibly the misfortune is personal and accidental but I have never heard any good conversation in a house bereft of rum. I don't mean that wholly sober people are incapable of puns and anecdotes and perhaps a little dancing, but they are so insufferably frivolous. Nobody talks about immortality, love, or the way to paint a pretty nude who stands under the vine leaves. Cold-sober people keep both feet upon the ground, and if there isn't a Greek legend there should be one about a mortal who found he could renew his strength by kicking up his heels.

Again and again at parties I have noticed the sudden lift which came to all present when the last teetotaler went home. His exit marked the end of singing "Lord Geoffrey Amherst," playing twenty questions, and discussion of the market possibilities of American Sumatra. As the door closed behind him some one said: "I think of God as ——" and the essential part of the evening had begun.

It would be silly to say that there are no kind and charming people who are also total abstainers. I have met none. Being dry and agreeable is extremely difficult. A man who doesn't drink is prudent. The world could hardly get along without prudent people. They are the hewers of wood and the drawers of water. They should drive automobiles and perform surgical operations, but certainly nobody looks to the prudent for entertainment. Possibly even the most enlightened country should have a helot class of wholly sober people. It may even be that in a true Utopia life without liquor can prevail, but as yet no nation is good enough to get along without stimulation. When every slum is down, when science has conquered pain, and dull and grinding work is gone there will be time enough to talk of prohibition.

It is conceivable that a non-alcoholic nation might develop a greater efficiency than the world has ever known. That seems to me no very glittering goal. There is a great deal of efficiency in America right now. There is hardly a single practical thing which is not better administered by us than any other country in the world. Being efficient is the national vice. Unfortunately no man and no nation can achieve efficiency without shouldering self-sufficiency as well. Uncle Sam was more lovable in the days before he took up calisthenics and the morning's cold shower-bath. I am only middle-aged, and yet I think I can remember back to a time when it was not considered necessary for every American to button-hole each foreign stranger and tell him of our gold reserve. There may even have been a day when we did not send ideals and marines to backward countries. I think it was a better land when we were all a little poorer and far less sober.

To be sure, it is only fair to say that no nation has appealed to us and been turned away with a stone. In every crisis we have been ready with advice. Columbia in her coach was told that Europe had no bread and to this she is said to have replied: "Why don't they have ideals?"

Of course, not every consequence of prohibition has been hurtful. But for Mr. Volstead we might have run head on into the destruction which lurks for all who bow down to wood and stone. Without the respite brought into being by the Eighteenth Amendment we might never have nicked the belief that the Constitution is something carved in rock-hewn tablets on the top of Sinai. Again in our own day there recurs the sane and comfortable doctrine that bad laws are best forgotten. And looking back across the years we now may drink a not altogether unsatisfactory toast in bootleg gin to the gentlemen who gave the tea party in Boston harbor.

HEYWOOD BROUN

The Federal Reserve Fight

By ELISHA M. FRIEDMAN

THE directors of the Chicago Federal Reserve Bank at their weekly meeting in the early part of September considered credit conditions in District Number 7 and advised the Federal Reserve Board that in its opinion the Chicago rediscount rate of 4 per cent should stand. Thereupon the Federal Reserve Board ordered the Chicago Reserve Bank to lower its rate to 3½ per cent, the rate prevailing in most of the other banks of the system.

The Federal Reserve Bank, according to the Federal Reserve Act, was empowered "to establish, subject to the review and determination of the Federal Reserve Board, rates of discount to be charged by the Federal Reserve Bank for each class of paper, which shall be fixed with a view to accommodating commerce and business." Previously the Federal Reserve Board had urged changes. This was done through the weekly submission by the banks of their reserve rates for approval by the Board. This rule was revoked and the initiative again left with the reserve banks, which submitted rates to the Board only when they desired to make a change. However, in 1919, when it was thought that a crisis existed, one of the reserve banks was prevented by the Board from fixing a high rate. In the autumn of 1925, when the Federal Reserve Bank of Boston wished to raise its rate to check speculation, the Federal Reserve Board deferred the rise for six weeks.

The controversy has assumed several aspects. Shall the Federal Reserve System tend toward the central-bank idea, or shall each bank have local autonomy? Shall the Federal Reserve Board or the local bank initiate a rate or be the final arbiters of that rate? Shall international financial considerations share in determining a change of rate?

As to the legality of the action, there seems to be little doubt, according to the Attorney General's ruling of 1919. As to its advisability, there is another question. It is certainly not desirable to throw disputed questions of the Federal Reserve System on the floors of Congress. To say that there has been political influence from Washington in the Chicago rate decision is meaningless, for the controversy finds Mr. Glass and Mr. Borah, a Democrat and a Republican, both on the same side. Hot heads may open the system to attack of sectional politics and to tinkering by advocates of panaceas and utopias.

It is charged that the reduced rate will stimulate speculation. However, the Florida land boom and fiasco, the real estate speculation which has been going on for the past five years, have not been dependent upon a 3½ per cent rediscount rate. It is charged that the recent cotton speculation was due to the ease of money. However, in the same journal in which this charge is made, there is the government report of a short cotton crop, which had a decidedly bullish effect, as well as the department's prediction of a lower price trend, which had a decidedly bearish effect. It was these two conflicting government reports, rather than the reduction in the Chicago rate, that caused the recent speculation in the price of cotton. As for stock speculation, it is well known that there have been bull markets on 4½ per cent and 5 per cent money and that a low money rate alone will often not produce a bull market, as in periods of industrial depression. The call money market in New York in the past five years has moved quite independently of the Federal Reserve rediscount rate. For example, on July 29, 1926, the call money rate for the preceding week was 4 per cent and the Federal Reserve rediscount rate was 3½ per cent, whereas on July 29, 1927, the call money rate for the previous week was lower—3¾ per cent—whereas the Federal Reserve rediscount rate was higher—4 per cent.

Nevertheless, the problem of a uniform rediscount rate throughout the United States presents difficulties. The United States has the largest area and the largest population under one banking system. Conditions in various parts of the country are very diverse. Industrial Essen and agricultural Pomerania do not require as diverse bank rates as do say Pittsburgh and Texas. For instance, on August 31, 1927, the Federal Reserve Bank ratios of gold to liabilities were 82 per cent at New York, 83 per cent at Chicago, 59 per cent at Dallas, and 52 per cent at St. Louis. Similarly the rates on prime commercial loans charged by member banks in August, 1927, were quite diverse—in New York 4½ per cent, in Chicago 5 per cent, in Atlanta 6 per cent, and in Cleveland 6 per cent. And yet a 3½ per cent rediscount rate prevailed at all of these cities except Chicago.

Undoubtedly the prime consideration in reducing rates in the United States was to help England maintain the gold standard and thus to keep the other exchanges of Europe sound. The United States could afford to do so, for in the period 1920-1926 the United States had a net import of gold of one billion five hundred million dollars. The increase in the supply of reserve funds outran the demand for reserve bank funds by over a hundred million dollars. The reduction in rate was helpful because normally sterling moves against London during her period of heavy importations of agricultural products, and threatened to do so this year. This would have resulted in an outflow of gold from England, where it is seriously needed, to America where it is redundant. As a result of the reduction of the Federal Reserve rate, sterling exchange went above parity a few days ago, for the first time since June 30, 1926. The Federal Reserve Board followed a practice which was quite common in Europe before the war—regulating exchange rates by an increase or reduction of the discount rate, which results in a flow of funds from a low interest market to a high interest market. The policy of the Federal Reserve Board is a consequence of the restoration of a gold basis in England. Keynes and other economists favored the deferring of a return to the gold basis, and even advocated a "managed currency." Keynes predicted the evils of deflation—high production costs, strikes, and high interest rates. However, the conservative bankers in England decided that the advantages of a stable currency offset the evils incident to attaining it. The coal strike and unemployment in England were probably aggravated by the premature return to a gold standard. At present, when so many countries of Europe are on a gold basis, it is important that America help maintain the gold standard. One of the devices in accomplishing this purpose is to make interest rates lower in this country than in England, so that American funds will flow to London, thus creating a supply of dollars and a demand for sterling.

In the light of these facts, the attitude of the Chicago directors now may be more intelligible. The Middle West has entertained a strong anti-foreign feeling. It was a Mid-West Senator who asked, "What have we to do with abroad?" It was the Middle West that elected Wilson on the platform that he "kept us out of war." It was the Middle West that opposed the League of Nations and now is indisposed to be helpful in the financial restoration of Europe. And Chicago elected as its Mayor, Mr. Thompson, whose campaign slogan was "Down with King George V."

There are some who favor an isolationist financial policy. They say that if sterling was put on a gold basis too soon and therefore needs artificial support, why let it drop. However, the repercussion throughout the world and even upon ourselves might be serious. Moreover, the altruistic policy followed by the United States is not without its benefits. The maintenance of a low rate of interest in New York has resulted in the growth of New York as an important financial center. Foreign financing in New York has grown very greatly as a result of low rates prevailing. On the other hand, England at one time embargoed foreign loans so as not to create too large a supply of sterling in foreign hands, which would depress sterling exchange. In fact, the New York market has taken foreign issues which hitherto had never borrowed except in London, such as Australia and the states of the Commonwealth. At present New York is issuing twice as large a volume of foreign loans as London, with the result that the supply of dollars thus created in foreign hands has depressed dollars and improved the other exchanges. The reduced rate of discount has made it possible for the very Chicago banks that now complain to become leaders or participant in large foreign-bond underwritings.

Furthermore, as a result of the low rates of discount, New York is becoming increasingly a center for short-term financing by acceptances or bills covering imports and exports. "Salt water" acceptances of the United States have grown substantially in the past few years, and with the maintenance of low rates in this country an increasing part of America's foreign trade will be done by means of American bank drafts rather than through foreign bank drafts. In view of the fact that in the Federal Reserve System as a whole the ratio of reserves to liabilities is close to 80 per cent, there would seem to be adequate justification for the maintenance of a low rate and for the encouragement of the growth of the American acceptance market.

The reduction of the Chicago rediscount rate and the focussing of public attention on the international aspects of the question, throw light on many related problems quite outside the field of technical finance. England is primarily an industrial power, depending upon manufactures and exports. The restoration of England to financial and industrial soundness and health is a matter of efficiency and competition. Low rates of interest in the United States and heavy lending of dollars are but temporary expedients to help England. A revision of British industrial methods and labor relations is essential to the permanent reestablishment of Britain's position in the world of trade.

Others say that the difficulty lies primarily in the large invisible credits received by the United States on payment of inter-allied debts. The cure for Europe would, accordingly, be even more complete cancellation of the inter-allied debt and the elimination of reparations. This would reduce the flow of gold to the United States in payment of these obligations. Money in Europe would, therefore, not be so tight nor deflation in Europe so disastrous. However, the total payments on the inter-allied debt at the current low rates of interest and with partial cancellation agreed upon, are but a fraction of the interest on the other foreign loans issued in this market at from 6 per cent to 8 per cent. In comparison with the other invisible credits in the American international balance of payment, interest payment on the inter-allied debt is not an important factor. Even if these debts were completely cancelled, the difficulty of Europe attendant on returning to the gold standard would not be removed.

A solution proposed generally in Europe is to have America check the inflow of gold. Gold has not been coming in as the result of any deliberate policy fostered by American bankers or the American Treasury. It has come into the United States in response to industrial and financial forces which are not easily controlled. America, with its 120 million people, is a big free-trade market which makes possible mass production and low costs. These in turn facilitate exports—as autos, typewriters, agricultural implements—at prices under those of the European manufacturer. Part of the gold comes in payment of our exports. Again, Europe could obtain gold by buying it in this market and keeping it, but with Europe partly on a gold-exchange standard rather than on a gold standard, these countries do not wish gold because it earns no income. Instead, they buy as their bank reserve American bills and securities which are convertible into gold at will. In other words, the American gold reserve is partly foreign owned, even where it is not so ear-marked.

Another form of adjustment of the international balance of payments is for American citizens to buy luxuries abroad, to travel extensively in foreign countries, and to increase other invisible debits. In this way Europe's debits to us will be offset.

The Harvard Economic Service in its letter of July 23 is quite pessimistic.

> So long as we continue to lend money needed to pay debt charges, the readjustment of international trade may be postponed, but the difficulty of the ultimate readjustment will be increased in proportion to the period of postponement. Extending credit postpones payment for a time, but even so, the day of reckoning must come.

However, what has been the British experience? Great Britain, with a population of approximately forty million, had in 1913 foreign securities equivalent to about twenty billion dollars. America, with a population almost three times as large, surely can lend far beyond the eleven odd billion dollars of government loans, excluding the uncertain factor of the inter-allied debt. The readjustments will come, not through any formula, but through the organic processes which characterize a living society.

This whole discussion points out the costliness of war. Norman Angell's pre-war prophecies are being fulfilled. Wars must be paid for. Achille Loria, the Italian economist, laid down the law that the zone of arbitration widens as the costs of war increase. Wars will cease—not through yearnings of sentimentalists, but through the cold facts of economics. When even the victors can expect only a loss, peace becomes a practical possibility.

Americans We Like

Georgia O'Keeffe

By FRANCES O'BRIEN

The Fourth in a Series of Personality Portraits

IN an apartment on the twenty-eighth floor of the Shelton a woman sits painting. A tall, slender woman dressed in black with an apron thrown over her lap. Beside her is a glass palette, very large, very clean, each separate color on its surface remote from the next. As soon as a tone has been mixed and applied to the canvas its remains are carefully scraped off of the palette, which thus retains always its air of virginity.

It is late afternoon and even in this high place the room is growing dusky. The artist does not seem to know this. She goes on painting carefully, swiftly, surely—and she and the canvas and the glass palette are one world having no connection with anything else in existence. And then the telephone rings.

"Hello, Georgia? This is——" "Hello, how are you? Would you mind calling up a little later after the light goes?" And the chastened caller ponders the twilight outside his window and wonders how even on a twenty-eighth floor one can go on painting. But of such intensive work as this is born the beauty which annually, on the walls of the Intimate Gallery, makes that little room the largest place there ever was in the world. Paintings of flowers and leaves and the music of flowers and leaves. Paintings also of tall buildings, of tiny shells, of Lexington Avenue. The flowers are painted very large, the leaves are painted very large, until you begin to feel large yourself. And the colors make some people say "gorgeous" and make other people keep quiet altogether.

All this is because Georgia O'Keeffe has never allowed her life to be one thing and her painting another. She has never left her life in disorder while she sat down to paint a picture that should be clean, simple, and integrated. To her art is life; life is painting. What you are is also the thing you put on canvas, or into a symphony or a book. When you look at her pictures you know that she is chiseled, ordered, and fine just as they are. You know that she lives simply, almost as a recluse, that she orders carefully every detail of existence so that the maximum of time may be given to her work.

Georgia O'Keeffe is an iconoclast to the old European traditions of art and artists. All the thrilling tales we have heard of life in a studio, of Bohemianism, of cocktail-inspired masterpieces become remote fabrications beside the serenity of this woman of many paintings. We begin to believe that inspiration really comes out of introspection, human sympathy, profound contacts rather than, as we were taught to believe, out of a bottle. America is versatile—producing alongside of jazz and the Black Bottom so austere and ascetic a religion for artists.

O'Keeffe is America's. Its own exclusive product. It is refreshing to realize that she has never been to Europe. More refreshing still that she has no ambition to go there. Born in Sun Prairie, Wisconsin, and with a childhood spent in Virginia and Texas, she absorbed an atmosphere untainted by theories, by cultural traditions. When she came to New York, William Chase, at the Art Students' League, was explaining to young America the brushwork technique of the Paris salons. Georgia, being just seventeen, listened politely and wielded her brush with such dexterity that Mr. Chase awarded her the medal in his still-life class.

But the candor that was to distinguish both her life and her painting was even then playing its role. She may have said: "Why should I receive a medal for being an obedient, intelligent child? Is not this supposed to be a class in painting? What has a medal to do with me? Moreover, what has all this painting to do with me?" She may have said all this. Those who know O'Keeffe best will admit that this would have been characteristic of her. And presently she abandoned the league and with it New York and its esoteric painting. All painting, in fact.

The next few years found her doing advertising work in Chicago. "Commercial art" they call it nowadays. Then it was just making pictures of alarm clocks and tomato cans. Our aesthetes may well lift their eyebrows in horror. But I have no doubt that then, as now, Georgia O'Keeffe was "working herself out." This period of work having afforded her the means to do so, she journeyed to the University of Virginia and spent the years 1912-1914 under the paternal baton of Alan Bement. She studied everything except painting and presently found herself in Texas with the title "Supervisor of Schools." Later on she became the "Art" of the West Texas Normal College.

Meanwhile, having purged herself of New York's borrowed art theories and the academic technique, she would lock herself in her room evenings and tentatively draw with charcoal. And nothing was urging her to draw save the pure need of expression. No one was to see what she did. Having struggled by herself with life, she was free to set down her feeling about it. No instructor was standing behind her to signify with sophisticated squint his approval of what she did—or his disgust. It was very nice; life was complete in a bit of charcoal carefully rubbed on a sheet of paper. And Georgia impulsively showed two drawings to a friend.

The woman to whom she showed the drawings took them to New York; and that is why this past February we could walk into the Anderson Galleries and see hanging there "Forty New Paintings by Georgia O'Keeffe."

At that time Alfred Stieglitz was making his brave struggle to present America with its own artists and Europe's in his famous "291" Fifth Avenue, an institution remembered today by but a few of the intelligentsia, but an all-important chapter in the history of American art—when we get to the point where we can write one. To "291" came the academicians and native art dealers to shake with uproarious laughter at walls hung with Matisse and Picasso. Also a select and very small group of the far-seeing to gaze with religious awe at new and significant manifestations such as these, and to quarrel about their virtues. Verily, they were days of travail for Stieglitz. And then, one day when he was feeling his weariest from the fruitless endeavor to explain to Babbitt that this, also, was art, there walked into "291" the woman to whom O'Keeffe had confided the two drawings.

To Alfred Stieglitz nothing was ever so refreshing as those two drawings. Long after the woman who brought them had gone they remained on the walls of "291."

A controversial correspondence followed between Stieglitz and the young lady who was teaching art in the West Texas Normal College, the upshot of which was that there presently arrived in New York an artist with approximately $40 in her pocket-book, but with an indomitable enthusiasm. True, artists have arrived in New York with less than $40 and quite immeasurable enthusiasm and—well, I can't help recalling George Bridgeman's boast that he never has to pay any subway fare because all his former students at the Art Students' League are now officiating in the ticket booths.

Ten years have not made a different person of Georgia O'Keeffe. Today finds her the same strong, clear, and introspective person as the girl who wandered with her classmates through the Virginia woods, studying bird life. Georgia never saw the birds; but no flower or leaf or tree escaped her passionate exploration. "If only people were trees," she has said, "I might like them better." That is why she has remained undisturbed by the worship of the culturally elite. That is why of all our modern painters she is the least influenced by any of the trivialities, the aesthetic fashions of the time. These things do not exist for her; her roots are in the earth and her kinship is with the things that grow from the soil.

Yet there is one potent bond uniting her with the world of humanity. If Georgia O'Keeffe has any passion other than her work it is her interest and faith in her own sex. She married Alfred Stieglitz about eight years ago, and you must not, if you value being in her good graces, call her "Mrs. Stieglitz." She believes ardently in woman as an individual—an individual not merely with the rights and privileges of man but, what is to her more important, with the same responsibilities. And chief among these is the responsibility of self-realization. O'Keeffe is the epitomization of this faith. In her painting as in herself is the scattered soul of America come into kingdom.

In the Driftway

AS the Drifter stands on the pier to greet the hordes of tourists returning to New York, and constitutes himself an entertainment committee to give them the keys and freedom of the city, whatever those may be, his delighted hospitality is tempered by certain serious reflections. Sometimes he can hardly restrain a shudder at the sight of so many amateur drifters, who have learned the crude outline of his honored profession and missed its essentials. Can he have looked like this when he himself returned after some voyage—full of souvenirs, anecdotes about the customs, and condescending remarks about prohibition? The Drifter cries to Heaven. At least he was never able to afford to come home laden with a cargo of presents of Florentine leather work, French perfume, and Irish linen for friends who would try to keep him from guessing that they had bought the same thing on Fifth Avenue the week before.

* * * * *

THE DRIFTER'S hatred for souvenirs weakens, however, when they come from bazaars. He has often been rude to ladies who forgot the contents of the Musée du Louvre, but remembered those of the vast department store with the same name. He always ignores their collections of pewter out of an antique shop in the rue des Saints Pères; but a much inferior set which has been assembled piece by piece, Sunday after Sunday, from the junk-piles of the Flea Fair never fails to excite his envy; and he will listen patiently to the owner's tales of how much the old woman wanted for the large porringer, and what she said when he asked the meaning of the cock on the handle of the ancient twisted spoon.

* * * * *

NOR does the Drifter claim to be entirely free from the feminine vice of shopping himself. Not when he travels in the Orient. He haunts bazaars, in fact, with the fidelity of a beggar. This does not mean that he would display any great degree of heroism in the cause, like one of his friends who made a painful journey across the Caspian Sea, on the slower than slow eastern trains that push their exhausted way into the foothills of the Himalayas, where they gradually give up and come to rest in the hill towns; and through desert villages whose entire water supply trickles down the gutter of the steep street, and whose best accommodations are squalid inn rooms bare of any furnishing save dirt—undergoing all this hardship simply for the sake of buying brasses and embroideries in the bazaars of Tashkent and Samarkhand. The Drifter's enthusiasm does not lift him to heights like these, but it has kept him walking through the dust on aching feet under a semi-tropic sun, up and down past shabby booths in chattering crowds; and it has led him up a steep hillside into booths as ruinous as the Parthenon, to buy senseless gewgaws soiled with snow and mud, on winter days when his stiff fingers could hardly pick a coin from his purse. He has seen the great bazaar of Stamboul, spread like a mellow carpet over a wide space; but he would always prefer a village fair of Angora or the Caucasus, sprawling over fields on the outskirts of town, where peasants travel all night in creaking carts to bring homemade brooms and butter and squares of lace.

AT his first visit the Drifter was ignorant enough to pay the trifling price that was asked for some rudely decorated water jugs, degenerate cousins of the proud family of vases that the ancients used to make in the same town. He will never forget the look of contempt and disappointment on the face of the vendor, who would rather have lost a third of his price than the pleasure of the argument. At his second visit, accordingly, the Drifter grew penurious, haggled for five minutes over every purchase, and finally made none. After that he went to some trouble to learn the art of bargaining. He worked out mathematically the proportion of the expected price asked by the peddler, whose technique is at least as complicated as that of a graduate of a school of high-powered salesmanship in Detroit or Chicago. The whole procedure of both buyer and seller is a highly organized and recognized form of bluffing, at which orientals invariably excel. Their impassive poker faces conceal any desire they may feel; but the secret is to feel none. Months of serious study convinced the Drifter that the only way to bluff successfully is not to bluff, a principle which can be applied to even more important concerns than country fairs. If you walk away from the bit of antique jewelry, or the exorbitant gondola, or the desirable lady, feigning indifference, your own eagerness may bring you back eventually, but you will never be summoned. But if you honestly don't care enough to pay the price, you will find that the price is always lowered, or at least often enough to make it worth while to take the chance, and haunt bazaars, and develop an oriental philosophy.

Honor in Languedoc

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of August 31, 1927, H. H. Horowitz calls attention to the case of Jean Calas in connection with the Sacco-Vanzetti matter, and to Voltaire's pamphlet on "toleration." One of the most pertinent things in this pamphlet reads:

> They [the Calas] had still enemies, however, for it was a question of religion. Many of those people who are known in France as "devout" said openly that it was much better to let an innocent old Calvinist be slain than to compel eight councillors of Languedoc to admit that they were wrong. One even heard such phrases as "There are more magistrates than Calas"; and it was inferred that the Calas family ought to be sacrificed to the honor of the magistrates. They did not reflect that the honor of judges, like that of other men, consists in repairing their blunders.

There's Room for Freedom in Texas

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: We hasten to supplement the dismal picture painted by our fellow-reader W. M., writing to The Nation from "Somewhere in Texas." His statement that "no teacher in this benighted South . . . dare acclaim The Nation and its ideals . . . and hope to live by teaching. It just isn't done. The mob would be on his neck," is as true as the statement, "It never rains in summer time in Texas."

Which is to say, it all depends on where you are. Texas, let us remind those who have forgotten it, is a very large State. W. M. could be living farther from us than Dedham jail is from the Bowery for all we can tell from his address, which is "Somewhere in Texas." We are acquainted with the depravity of the South from the plumber who was flogged in Fort Worth for getting too much business to the case of W. M. himself. But let us tell a thing or two about our neck of the woods.

We are a town of 6,000, having for a neighbor (or a suburb) the thriving and beautiful city of San Antonio—sunny Antonio reeking with history and, as advertised, the nation's playground. You could hardly imagine the playground of this nation being closed on Sunday; and it isn't. Nor is our little city. Nor, as a matter of fact, is El Paso, and for all we know, several other important centers in the State. All of which is contrary to the State law. And when some rabid reformer in the legislature proposed that the State militia be called out to dry up our oasis of anarchy the proposal somehow managed to get pigeon-holed before any damage was done, and it has not been heard from since.

The Nation is in the reading-rooms of the libraries of the State Normal School at San Marcos and the State University at Austin. Not only on file, but patronized. One of us is about to teach in the grade school here, and while neither of us has stood on the street corner proclaiming the gospel of The Nation, nothing has been done or said to indicate that its weekly appearance in our P. O. box is a liability or a disgrace. We know of a girl teaching American history in the State Normal School who is a regular reader, and the last we heard she was on the verge of accepting a high-school position in San Antonio.

We feel for W. M. We have been in somewhat his position in another State. But before losing himself to complete despair over the South we invite him to look around a little. The New South is pushing forth its sprouts with unexpected vigor in places where the soil is richest. And we know of one town at least, in Texas, where the policy of live and let live is a tradition that is jealously guarded.

When the Fan Stops, Get Out

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have just noticed the communication of John B. Andrews, secretary of the American Association for Labor Legislation, criticizing my review of "The Rock Dust Remedy," by Harry Phythyon, a State mine inspector of Pennsylvania. He implies in his communication that Mr. Phythyon and I are opposed to rock dusting bituminous mines, which is incorrect.

Mr. Andrews ignores my statement that "Mr. Phythyon would certainly not relegate rock dusting to a less important position than the last line of defense. He is not against rock dusting as such, but he insists that it be kept in its proper place." He believes in rock dusting as one of the safeguards against mine disasters but he does not believe in magnifying its importance out of all proportion to other means for preventing explosions, as is done by the American Association for Labor Legislation and the Bureau of Mines. Such undue stress on rock dusting will result in the neglecting of the primary defenses against loss of life by explosions such as adequate ventilation, which prevents the accumulation of explosive gas, and proper equipment to prevent the ignition of gas. Over-reliance on rock dusting will also result in overlooking such important secondary defenses as enough exits from the mine to enable the men to escape in case of an explosion so that they will not be killed by after-damp.

"Seven hundred miners owe their lives," Mr. Andrews writes, far from the coal fields, "to this safety device (rock dusting) in the most recent coal mine explosion of Pennsylvania." He undoubtedly refers to the Ehrenfeld mine of the Pennsylvania Coal and Coke Corporation, where there was almost a major disaster but in which all but four of the nearly four hundred miners escaped with their lives. I was working at the time in a nearby mine of the same company at Cresson and went with other Cresson miners to Ehrenfeld. While rock dusting probably helped prevent the explosion from spreading in that instance, there were numerous openings in the remote corners of the mine by which the men were able to escape in a few minutes before any of them were killed by after-damp.

A few years ago I saw seventy-nine dead bodies taken from a mine in Spangler, Pennsylvania. About fifteen had been killed by the force of the explosion. The others died some hours later from the deadly after-damp following the explosion because they could not get to the shaft over a mile from where they were working. The mine shaft was only ninety feet deep, yet there were no openings except the main hoisting and air shafts far from the coal face. This disaster was distinctly a gas explosion; rock dusting could not have saved the men. Adequate ventilation and safety lamps to prevent the ignition of gas would have saved them all. Openings near the working places would have saved over sixty of them who, trapped, were suffocated hours after the explosion.

The question whether gas or dust is the greater factor in mine explosions is important, because on the answer to it depends whether one stresses most rock dusting or ventilation. Mr. Phythyon shows that although the non-gaseous mines outnumber many times the gaseous ones no major explosion has ever occurred in the entire mining history of Pennsylvania in a strictly non-gaseous mine. Those who say that rock dusting will prevent mine explosions are, therefore, lulling the operators, miners, and public into a false sense of security and thereby endangering human life.

Rock dusting is important, yes, but when advertised and stressed out of all proportion to its usefulness it results in such astounding statements as the one I quoted from the Salt Lake City Tribune of March 12, 1926, which does not seem to disturb Mr. Andrews in the least: "The Bureau of Mines is convinced that neither ventilation nor water will prevent mine explosions. Ventilation particularly is ineffective, as tests have shown that explosions occur only when the dust is in motion and ventilating fans therefore add to rather than diminish the danger." Any one who has ever worked in a mine knows that when the fan stops it is time to get out.

To Chicago Readers of The Nation

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

Sir: I move that we form a circle of Nation readers in Chicago. Such a group of like-minded progressive people would not only form a sound foundation for a liberal club, but it would also materially advance the influence of the publication which we cherish. Let us rally around The Nation for such a circle.

I suggest that Nation readers in Chicago get in touch with the undersigned at P. O. Box 1224. We will then issue a call to all these to meet for a conference and organization.

The Citizen Abroad*

By EDWIN M. BORCHARD

EVERY science starts from certain major postulates which are assumed to be true and are rarely if ever reexamined. In the subject we are to discuss today it is assumed that the country owes a duty to its citizen abroad, and for itself has a privilege, to protect him against the impairment of his rights in the foreign country in which he resides or invests. What those rights are and how far they may be protected by international action are serious questions, which deserve examination.

The institution today under discussion reflects one of the most primitive theories and practices of community life —the theory that when a member of the clan is injured by some alien clan or agency, his entire clan must go to his rescue. Carried out to its logical extreme in this day of immense foreign investments, it presents an opportunity and a danger of more or less continuous intervention in the affairs of other nations and a very considerable supervision and guardianship of foreign investments. A distinguished statesman has recently advanced the thesis: "The person and property of a citizen are a part of the general domain of the nation, even when abroad." If by this it is intended to claim that the citizen must not submit to the local law, or that he carries with him a certain extraterritoriality, the assertion is open to serious question.

The very fact that the danger is now so common of having to enlist all the citizens of a country in the cause of one of them has produced considerable feeling that the postulate itself is open to challenge, or, at least, that the method by which the rights of the citizens abroad are determined and the method of giving effect to them should be modified. The challenge runs to the point of demanding that the citizen abroad should take the risks of his location and of the local law, as he finds it, and should not ask his fellow citizens to become his insurers; and the argument is advanced that the citizens abroad can ask no greater rights than are enjoyed by the natives of the country in which he makes his home or investments.

It is doubtful whether this criticism of the existing practice, and the demand it involves, can be accepted completely as a measure either of the citizen's rights or of the nation's duty. Yet there is reason to believe that unless the countries of the foreign investors exert some self-restraint and adopt some more definitely legal machinery than that now employed, to determine impartially both the validity of the right and the manner of its enforcement, these demands made by fellow-citizens at home will receive ever greater political recognition and will be translated into general rules of municipal law and into rules of international law. It must be remembered that the greater part of the world consists not of "exploiting" but of "exploited" countries—terms used in no opprobrious sense—and that the latter have already for many years been demanding legal limitations on the privilege of protecting internationally those who live among them, or acquire economic interests there, as aliens.

It is commonly said that the alien entering a country is entitled to the enjoyment not only of the local law but also of international due process of law, the standard of civilized justice below which a nation's municipal law, in its application to the alien, may not fall. When he complains of injuries at the hands of the local administration, measured by the standards of the local municipal law and of international law, he is required first to exhaust his local remedies, if they are deemed adequate or promising of relief, before he invokes the diplomatic protection of his country. The main ground of such interposition is discrimination against the alien. So in the case of legislation to which international objection may be made—it is the element of discrimination which is the essential basis of the international claim. To be sure, occasional international objection has been raised to the application of general domestic legislation binding on all the inhabitants of the country indiscriminately. When made, the objection can rest only on the very unusual allegation that the domestic legislation, as a statutory system, falls below the standard of civilized justice or what may be called international due process. This is not a light charge to make against the legislation of a foreign country, and it must be realized that a promiscuous use of this privilege of objection would hamper foreign countries in undertaking social and legislative experiments which, as free and independent countries, they may deem themselves privileged to make. It is, indeed, not at all settled how far a nation may go in such experiments without violating what may be called international law, nor whether the international claim may go further than a demand for compensation without asking a repeal of the legislation itself.

The question arises mainly not on the principle that no nation may legitimately act or legislate in violation of international law, but on its application, and this again involves the issue who is to be the judge of the question. Now it is not unknown to history that strong nations are prone to make such determinations for themselves, and will decline to give the weak nation the benefit of the doubt or even suggest arbitration. It is to this unilateral determination of the question that weak foreign countries object, and the distrust created by a frequent resort to compulsion to induce a recognition of claims is not lightly to be disregarded. It may ultimately grow to considerable proportions and affect political relations.

On the other hand, we cannot leave the questions of the alien's rights and whether the local law has violated them exclusively to the local courts, as so many foreign countries have demanded. This would make them a judge of their international duty, and under present postulates of international law, that demand will not obtain acceptance.

The realization of the inequity likely to result from a unilateral determination of such difficult questions, either by the complaining or by the defendant state, suggests that the only practical solution for the determination of the issue is the international forum, in the event of inability of the two countries to settle the matter diplomatically. Each country usually assumes that it is entirely right and that there is nothing to say for the other side. Experience does not sustain the axiomatic truth of this assumption. Without now undertaking to reach a conclusion upon the question in any way, I will assume that a foreign country seeks to change its system of land tenures. Those who, citizens and aliens, are likely to be affected by the change, however slightly, are likely to charge "confiscation." That, of course, if only a label for a set of facts, events, and emotions. The real issue is, has the country gone so far in the diminution of property values by the change of its [illegible] and every country is continually exerting its police power to modify property rights—as to justify an impartial tribunal in declaring that the municipal legislation falls below the standard of civilized justice—constitutes a denial of justice or of due process. This, again, is a question of degree, and on that question neither party is competent to be the exclusive judge. Violent and serious impairments of property rights bring their own reward or penalty—a loss of confidence and the loosening of that cement, law and the feeling of security, which holds the social structure together. We label those impairments, when severe enough, confiscation, but, strange to say, such practices cannot be laid only at the door of weak countries. What the world has seen put into practice since 1918 in the way of the confiscation of foreign investments, not by general legislation, but by legislation directed exclusively against particular foreigners, has no counterpart in history. It not only weakens the force and dignity of any demand made against weak countries, but constitutes a precedent for all time, dangerous to the confiscator and to all foreigners. The sooner the road to financial integrity is again resumed, the better for all concerned and for the world's future.

But to return to the manner of establishing the right and its enforcement, when determined. In the Porter proposition at the Hague, arbitration was agreed on in the case of contractual claims, with an unfortunate sanction of force if arbitration is refused. If the right is determined in an international forum, it is to be doubted whether the question of enforcement will present serious difficulty. But if its exercise should prove necessary, it will be likely to have the support of world approval. At present the unilateral determination of the right and the arbitrary enforcement of that determination is calculated to arouse resentments without necessarily promoting justice or the rule of law. It may well be asked, then, that not only in contract claims, but in tort claims as well, the nations shall agree to submit to an international tribunal, existing or to be created ad hoc, the question of the existence of the right. This legal method of judicial determination should be deemed an inherent part of international due process of law. On this continent it has already been agreed in the Pan-American Conventions to submit all pecuniary claims to arbitration; and questions involving property rights, and the propriety of their alleged impairment, are distinctly legal. In Europe, some eighteen nations have ratified the optional clause of the Permanent Court of International Justice, giving the court jurisdiction in such cases at the behest of a complaining signatory. The aim should now be to induce all the nations, including especially the larger powers, to adhere to such obligatory jurisdiction over legal questions, or, if not that, of pecuniary claims arising out of alleged injuries to citizens abroad. That alone would take out of the channels of politics and force a subject which is essentially legal, and would promote the rule of law.

Apart from such obligation, which nations should and may assume without the slightest loss of sovereign or of legitimate rights, it may be deemed advisable to give the injured citizen himself a right to proceed against the defendant nation in an international court, if he believes that the local remedy still embodies a denial of justice in the international sense. If necessary, his nation may think it proper to aid him financially and with counsel, if it considers the case meritorious. This will require international agreements, but it seems to me to be asking but a trifling concession in the interests of law and order. The existing practice is dangerous to all parties concerned because of the injection of the elements of unilateral determination, force, and politics. The reform suggested, mild and temperate and promotive of the rule of law, should, I believe, command general support.

"It Brings One's Education Down to Date" Writes Professor E. A. Ross of this

Prose Epic of the Modern Universe

In which modern science, society, art, religion, and philosophy are outlined and integrated in one poetic world whole

The New Universe

By Baker Brownell

Hailed with an Enthusiasm Few Books Could Inspire

BERTRAND RUSSELL: "Its scope is amazing. I do not know of any other book that so covers the modern world."

THE NEW REPUBLIC: "This book is poetry; it is all poetry. It is a literary achievement of high order."

ZONA GALE: "For the first time in America, so far as I know such writing, here is a biography of the universe, bodied in beauty, undeniably singing, yet colored and lit by the brilliant common sense of America."

PROFESSOR JOHN DEWEY: "It is a most valuable contribution to the coordination of present specialized knowledge."

CARL SANDBURG: "Of all the outlines covering various fields of knowledge in recent years, this is my favorite. It merges document and poetry."

EDWIN E. SLOSSON: "I do not know of any other book which gives in one volume such a sweeping survey of modern views and recently acquired knowledge of all fields—astronomical, physical, biological, and sociological."

NEW YORK TIMES: "A book of hope, inspiring hope. It goes back to the eternal things; it inspires new hope for the future of philosophical thinking and writing in America."

These are but a few typical selections from the avalanche of praise for this book. You will find it as "The Nation" testifies, "A new thing in literature." Don't miss its stimulation, enlightenment, challenge. See the volume at your bookseller's, or if you wish, it will be

SPEAKING OF GREAT DISCOVERIES ~

A little more than fifteen years ago life insurance actuaries found that large groups of men and women could be insured without medical examination and at minimum cost, the law of averages making this concession possible.

Thus was Group Life Insurance born. Today its benefits have been extended to nearly FIVE MILLION wage earners, who are covered for about $5,500,000,000.

Much has been said of the value of this form of protection, in increasing efficiency, reducing labor turnover, and creating good will, but it does more than that. It guards the dependent family from the necessity of relying on "hat passing" when emergency arises.

If you are an employer or an employee, ask your Prudential man about this policy.

from THE INNER SANCTUM of
SIMON and SCHUSTER
Publishers . 37 West 57th Street . New York

"The whole truth of the matter is that falling into this book, head first, which is the only way one can fall whether he wants to or not, is like finding yourself suddenly in a gold mine, surrounded on all sides by riches to which you have only to turn your eyes and they are yours, gleaming and solid and rare, in deep veins and strangely-shaped nuggets. This book is the best thing that has hit the reading world in years. There is not on any book-shelf, anything quite like it . . . All we plead is that no one with a spark of imagination, of life, of intelligence will hesitate to send today for this book. No, we are not agents for this book. We almost wish we were, for then we could with propriety go through the country in a gayly bepostered wagon shouting through a megaphone:

"Here you are! Here's your copy! Step up ladies and gentlemen. Don't push!"

This review from the current issue of the Elks Magazine refers to Trader Horn. It is restraint such as this which has kept Trader Horn in second place on the best-seller list, just behind COL. LINDBERGH'S We. If the reviewers really let themselves go, the book would be further ahead than its 51st thousand in three and one-half months . . . The Inner Sanctum will just have to grin and bear it philosophically.

The Inner Sanctum policy of never using rejection slips may be suspended temporarily, now that we have unearthed the following form used by a Chinese editor of pre-revolutionary days:

"We have read thy manuscript with infinite delight. By the sacred ashes of our ancestors, we swear that we never before have reveled in so enthralling a manuscript.

"If we printed it His Majesty the Emperor, our high and mighty master, would ordain us to take it as a model never hereafter to print anything inferior to it. As it would be impossible to find it equaled within ten thousand years, we are compelled, tho shaken with sorrow at our failure to return thy divine manuscript, and begging as we ask of thee a thousand pardons."

WILL DURANT'S new book Transition, A Mental Autobiography was written before The Story of Philosophy was published. DR. DURANT says of it: "The accompanying 'remembrance of things past' was written in a pleasant vacation time, as an indulgent relief from a year of historical research, but it was done con amore; and there are some passages in it which I am afraid will remain to the end the best that I have written."

REV. EDGAR WHITE BURRILL, whose Literary Vespers are well known to the booklovers of New York, has this to say of WILL DURANT'S new book, Transition, A Mental Autobiography:

"I have this moment finished reading Will Durant's fine book. I must tell you and I want you to know that I feel it to be a greater thing than his Story of Philosophy. It is one of the finest and most poignantly told life-stories that I have ever read.

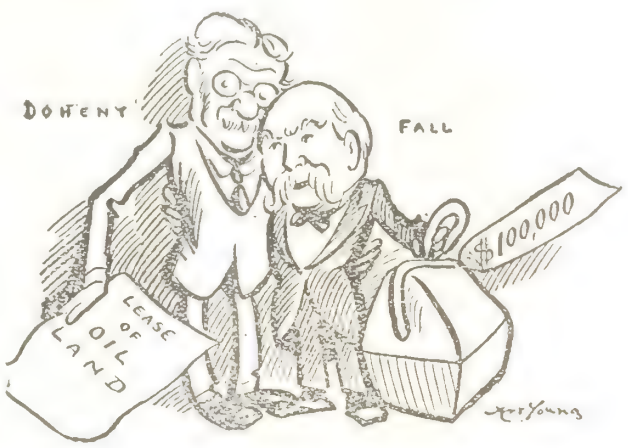
Muckraker Tactics

By HEYWOOD BROUN

ONCE upon a time the muckraker charged straight at the citadel of corruption and from behind the barricades the entrenched forces riddled him with bullets. He has, with the passing of the years, taken to tactics and learned the value of hitting an exposed flank. And so when people ask why Samuel Hopkins Adams chose to call Warren Gamaliel Harding "Willis Markham" the answer is very simple. "Revelry," the novel, and the current play derived from it, gain vastly in effectiveness from being cast into fictional form. The parable is still the silver bullet of the reformer.

Much that Mr. Adams put into "Revelry" is a matter of public record, and the public record merely aggravated the tendency of Americans to fly into a great state of calm about public scandals. Most of the testimony concerning the oil deals was damning, but obviously neither the voting nor the reading public took it to heart. An episode in a novel fires the imagination far more than a news report. Indeed when "Revelry" was still in manuscript Mr. Adams showed his story to a journalist who prides himself upon his familiarity with current events. To make no secret of the matter, the volunteer reader was "F.P.A." And this Mr. Adams reported back to the author that it seemed to him a lively tale, but that some of the incidents failed to carry conviction. The columnist did say that one portion of the book seemed to him utterly thrilling and persuasive. "I refer," he said, "to the chapter about the young lieutenant who is sent to seize the fields to further the plot of the grafters."



At this, the creator of the tale made rather a long face and confessed. "It ought to sound true because I took it almost word for word from the testimony of a young lieutenant who was a witness at the inquiry." This particular part of the public record attracted not the slightest attention, but once imbedded in a novel the thing took on vitality and interest.

Naturally, I do not intend to suggest that Samuel Hopkins Adams is the first reformer to hit upon the device of attacking persons in the public eye by casting them as characters in a novel. Each one of us who opens a can of beef today should mention Upton Sinclair's name in saying grace. Now if Mr. Sinclair had chosen to call his book "A Plain Statement of Facts About The Packers," canned beef would be pretty much the same this morning as in the bad old days. More shrewdly the author got his information abroad by garnishing his truths with a tale. It may be that the adult-minded are prepared to take their information straight, but most of us want some pleasant chaser. Deep-rooted in the human mind is the feeling that if it isn't fiction it can't be true.

Obviously, not everything in "Revelry" is literally from the life. No one has a right to ask that much of any fictionist. The business of the novelist, as I understand it, is to take observed experience and shuffle it around a bit. The only complaint to be made against Samuel Hopkins Adams is that he has shuffled too little rather than too much. He, and Miss Maurine Watkins, who dramatized the story, have done perhaps no more than cut the cards before dealing. A few may feel that since President Harding did not commit suicide and Willis Markham did, the book and the play must contain no more than a pack of lies. But that is a silly assumption. The only responsibility resting upon Mr. Adams was to be faithful to the mood of the Harding Administration. From this point of view I think he has given the country a fundamentally truthful document. Probably a close analysis might reveal the fact that here and there "Uncle Tom's Cabin" contained passages slightly exaggerated, and yet it may be that the novel did more to arouse opposition to slavery than any plain statement of fact.

The recent agitation in Philadelphia against the production of "Revelry" seemed centered less in a feeling that the charges were untrue than in the familiar emotion that it is best to say no ill concerning the dead. People who refuse to pursue grudges beyond the grave's edge flatter themselves that they possess a kindliness of spirit, but I think this squeamishness is animated rather by superstitious terror. In some unexplored cranny of the mind there lurks the dread that a hard-pressed ghost will rise to haunt his attackers. And I hold to the theory that Presidents, at least, do not die utterly.

No service is done to the national welfare by saying, "Let Warren Gamaliel Harding sleep deep." Indeed the members of his party have not even offered such a compromise. Instead we are supposed to wink while monuments are reared to this great and good man because he happened to die before he was found out. Friends of Harding should applaud and not condemn "Revelry." Samuel Hopkins Adams has gone to great lengths to stretch a point in favor of the martyr President. In his book Mr. Adams has insisted that the man from Marion was not corrupt but merely dull-witted. The novelist seems to have overlooked the possibility that a Republican politician might conceivably be both.

Some have said that Samuel Hopkins Adams must be a dreadful man to say such terrible things concerning Harding. Those who hold this opinion also believe that any book by a monster must be monstrous. That isn't so. There ought to be more appetite for the brine of dissent. But "Revelry" will not make many converts in this cause, for Mr. Adams has shaken the top off the salt-cellar.

A Survey of the Season's Books

By MARK VAN DOREN

I HAVE heard more than one publisher declare that his list this fall was to be a weak one. But another glance at the lists of the season has reassured me—at least to the extent of making it impossible for me to say just wherein the times are slow. Publishers, of course, have their own ways of looking at literature, and it may be that fewer books than in other falls will sell into the hundreds of thousands. Many interesting books are announced, however, and as I am fortunate enough not to have to be concerned with sales, I am at liberty to go on checking with a pencil the announcements that seem most promising.

In the department of biography I am impressed once more with the activity among students of the American past, particularly that not very remote past which may be designated roughly by the term mid-nineteenth-century. Colonial and Revolutionary America have hitherto been better known than this America out of which a living generation draws its character. Victorian America is a weird enough land, and indeed one sufficiently remote, to need explaining, and doubtless in time it will be amply explained. Meanwhile we shall have in Gamaliel Bradford's "D. L. Moody," Paxton Hibben's "Henry Ward Beecher," Arthur D. Howden Smith's "Commodore Vanderbelt," Denis Lynch's "Boss Tweed," Harvey Root's "The Unknown Barnum," and Robert Warshow's "Jay Gould" some of the materials for the study of personalities significant in such a day. Meanwhile too the colonial work goes on with Katherine Anne Porter's account of "The Devil and Cotton Mather," Rupert Hughes's continuation of his "George Washington," Eugene E. Prussing's analysis of Washington's will, Phillips Russell's "John Paul Jones," and—something that has been long desired—Charles Beard's edition for the American Library of William Maclay's "Journal." And meanwhile too we are treated to memoirs picturing the contemporary American world as experienced by Will Durant, William Ellery Leonard, and Samuel Ornitz, as well as to "lives" of the living or lately dead—L. White Busbey's "Uncle Joe Cannon," George Harvey's "Henry Clay Frick," Walter Lippmann's "Men of Destiny," William Allen White's "Masks in a Pageant," and John K. Winkler's "W. R. Hearst." As was to have been expected, there are two volumes out on "Al" Smith: Henry F. Pringle's, reviewed elsewhere in this issue of The Nation, and another one yet to come by Norman Hapgood and Henry Moskowitz. All this, as must be apparent, without any mention of several most interesting biographies coming from abroad and dealing with such figures as Anatole France, Joseph Conrad, Bismarck, Hajim Mustafa Kemal, Edward VII., George Sand, and Joseph Scaliger.

In belles lettres we have an [illegible] in the form of a year-book of literature. "The American Caravan" may mean this or that to American literature—there will be debates as to just what it does mean—but its eight hundred pages of verse and prose by [illegible] varied authors ought to show something [illegible] shown by any or all of the magazines.

The season is rather richer than usual in [illegible] criticism and literary history and in collections of essays. Allardyce Nicoll's "Development of the Theater," Bernard Fay's "Since Victor Hugo," A. H. Quinn's "History of the American Drama," and the second volume of Legouis's and Cazamian's "History of English Literature" will be valuable surveys by experts. E. M. Forster will surely have something to say about "The English Novel." Miscellanies are to come by Aldous Huxley, Leonard Woolf, Ernest Boyd, W. C. Brownell, Ludwig Lewisohn, H. L. Mencken, and George Jean Nathan. Mrs. Bertrand Russell's "The Right to be Happy" is said to inhabit a classification of its own; and I am glad to see that Thoreau is remembered this fall with two volumes, one a study by J. Brooks Atkinson and one a compilation by Odell Shepard called "The Heart of Thoreau's Journals." Thoreau's journal, so important for an understanding of the complete man, needed this kind of notice even more than Emerson's did last year.

The fiction list is headed by great names from Europe, and first of all by that of Marcel Proust, the new instalment of whose masterpiece, called in English "Cities of the Plain," unfortunately is to be had at present only in a limited edition. Then come André Gide's "The Counterfeiters," Reymont's "The Promised Land," Sudermann's "The Mad Professor," Schnitzler's "Daybreak," and Alexis Tolstoy's "The Prince of Outlaws," with English novels by Bennett, Wells, Chesterton, and May Sinclair taking their customary places in the procession. Interest in new novels by Americans will probably center in those of Willa Cather, James Branch Cabell, Zona Gale, Glenway Wescott, Conrad Aiken, Thomas Beer, Louis Bromfield, Floyd Dell, and Ernest Hemingway; though here it is difficult to do justice beforehand to a season's list, since the chances are so great that good new writers will be missed.

With the exception of volumes by Padraic Colum, Countee Cullen, Amy Lowell, "H. D.," H. Phelps Putnam, Lizette Woodworth Reese, and Edith Sitwell, few of the new books in poetry promise very much—and some of these indeed promise very little. In Phelps Putnam, the freshest arrival, a remarkable talent will, however, wait to be discerned. And quite possibly the best contribution to poetry in 1927 will be that of Carl Sandburg in his "American Songbag," collected from many sources past and present by this poet who of late has taken to the road in order to listen and sing.

In history there will be the long awaited translation of Bernard Fay's "Revolutionary Spirit in France and America," once selected for the Pulitzer Prize but denied the award because it was not yet in English. Sidney Fay with "The Origins of the World War" and Hermann Lutz with "Lord Grey and the World War" will carry on the battle of the scholars for recognition of the truth concerning the subject now technically called war-origins. Mark Sullivan continues "Our Times," a piece of contemporary history in many ways unique, into its second volume; M. Rostovtzeff completes his great "History of the Ancient World"; and Hendrik Willem Van Loon comes home with pen and brush to "America."

Beyond this point I am unable to tread with much assurance. Yet anyone could remark that it is a distinguished season which offers works in philosophy by Santayana, Bosanquet, Unamuno, Russell, Dewey, and Whitehead; in psychology by Adler, Freud, Driesch, and Köhler; in physics by Eddington and Michelson; and in travel by Henry W. Nevinson, D. H. Lawrence, Captain John Noel of the Mount Everest group, Marmaduke Pickthall, and H. M. Tomlinson.

Paul Valéry and the Intellectualist Critics*

By JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

I

LONG before the vogue of Paul Valéry had reached its present proportions English and American readers were familiar with T. S. Eliot's "The Sacred Wood" and were aware of the existence of a widespread dissatisfaction among younger writers with the theories concerning the arts of composition and criticism prevalent among the more thoroughly established practitioners of both. They knew that Romanticism (of which Shaw and Wells were regarded as the most conspicuous contemporary exemplars) had been declared passé; that "impressionistic" and "interpretative" criticism, praised by the nineteenth century as the only sort which a man aware of the relativity of all things could permit himself, was by such men as Eliot regarded as no criticism at all; and they were aware, in addition, that this set of literary opinions was but part of a larger "intellectualist" movement whose aim was to reestablish metaphysics as an instrument for attaining truth.

Yet even those most hospitable to new ideas were somewhat at a loss to know where to turn for first-rate modern examples of intellectualist criticism. Mr. Eliot himself, though he discussed bad critics at some length, had to go as far back as Coleridge to find a good one, and though there were many young writers eager to tell one what the qualities and methods of a real critic would be, they were generally compelled to confess that that no one preeminent enough to serve as a satisfactory illustration could be found. Such a critic, they say, would not concern himself with the sociological implications, the psychological origins, or the historical place of an author; he would, on the other hand, "faire sortir" the essential qualities inherent in any particular work of art considered as a separate, self-contained entity. But they were not sure just who had accomplished this feat. And then, just when the desideratum was being considered, Paul Valéry emerged from his obscurity. Here was a man who not only shared the prevalent discontent but who had, in addition, an original force of mind sufficient to enable him actually to strike out in a new direction. Accordingly, and with no little eagerness, he was seized upon by those who had been crying in the wilderness.

The bulk of Valéry's prose is far from great; it has concerned itself with a rather bewildering number of subjects; and, for all the precision for which, upon certain subjects, he has striven, his work is hardly more than a succession of remarkable fragments. Yet all such defects are more than made up for by the fact that his mind works in an original fashion, and thus he owes his vogue less to any system which could be deduced from his works and presented as a précis than to the extraordinary suggestiveness of even his most fragmentary efforts.

Even when an individual piece seems, as often it does, tentative and incomplete it has usually the virtue of approaching the problem from an unexpected angle and of attacking it with weapons either new or, at least, half-forgotten through disuse. No matter how small or how great the progress which his mind may make in attacking any particular problem, it moves off in a fresh direction and that direction is usually one which the intellectualist delights to see taken.

Perhaps the most rounded and complete of his achievements are "Le Soiré de M. Teste," "L'Architecture," and "L'Ame et le Dance," none of which has been translated into English. But even among the less perfect pieces which are gathered together in "Variety" one can hardly find a page which does not touch somewhere some aim, effort, or ideal related to that attempt at a new orientation of the mind which is the concern of so many of the most interesting if not the most widely read of contemporary critics and writers. In, for example, the essay entitled "The Intellectual Crisis" he describes, better perhaps than it has ever been described before, that confused state of modern culture which its enemies have dubbed "Romantic Decadence"; in A Foreword (to a volume by Lucien Fabre) he pursues with consummate skill the phantom of Pure Poetry; in "Adonis" he dissects a poem of La Fontaine in a fashion which, however important or unimportant it may be, certainly succeeds in being concerned with no qualities except those of the poem considered by itself; and through all the essays the dominant ideal is a "precision" which is held up as the virtue of classic art distinguishing it from the suggestiveness of the romanticist. Valéry has, perhaps, no system, but his preoccupation is always with one or the other of the elements which make up the intellectualist complex.

II

He himself has told us that Poe's "Eureka" supplied him with his first ideas of science, and without quite confessing how unsatisfactory a textbook that volume is he has gone on to tell how it inspired him to worship precision—"confusedly, it is true, but with passion." Mathematics he thought of as the special province of minds incommensurate with his own, but literature, on the other hand, shocked him by "its lack of discipline, connection, and necessity in handling ideas." Hence he began to dream of an art which should be as exact as geometry, he took Leonardo as his hero, and he began to study words as symbols potentially as exact as those of mathematics.

Terminology aside, the effect of his enthusiasm was not only to alienate his sympathy from all the efforts of romantic literature to be suggestive rather than precise but, more especially, to disgust him with all that impressionistic criticism whose aim is to reproduce the effect of a work of art upon the critic by a description of it; and it led him to the enunciation of perhaps his fundamental thesis, which is that poetry is not, as has so often been affirmed, analogous to a dream, but on the contrary its antithesis. "The true condition of a true poet," he says, "is absolutely distinct from the state of dream. The man, even, who tries to describe his dream must be infinitely awake," and "whoever says exactitude and style is invoking the opposite of dream."

Perhaps it is worth while to point out that the effect of this thesis is not to controvert as directly as might at first sight seem the ancient assumption of an analogy. It does not say that the experience communicated by the poet to the submissive reader is not something pleasing for the same reason and in the same way that a dream is pleasing, but it does say that this communication can adequately take place only when the poet emerges from his dream in order to plan with his awakened consciousness the means which he will employ to render an experience of his own comprehensible to another. The difference between a poem and a dream may consist, then, not in content but in expression, but the effect of stressing the distinction rather than the similarity is to turn the attention of the critic from an effort to describe the effects produced by the poet and to lead him instead into an investigation of the technique of expression.

Such an investigation is exactly the thing which Valéry undertakes in the essay on the "Adonis" of La Fontaine, which constitutes his most successful attempt to put into practice the principles of criticism which naturally follow from all his discussion of method. In that essay he begins with a few paragraphs which invoke in a fashion quite Pateresque the image of La Fontaine which arises in our minds when his name is mentioned, and then, ceasing to concern himself with history, anecdote, or "atmosphere," he turns brusquely aside to fix his eye upon the poem itself, considered purely as a collection of words existing in isolation upon a series of pages. The result is something which a romantic critic would probably call "barren." No image is evoked, no mood created, no interpretation attempted, but there is instead as skilful and exact an analysis of the means of expression there employed as has ever been made of any piece of writing. Pater would hardly be interested; any rhetor would be compelled to admit that no completer or more subtle dissection of a style had ever been effected.

III

Our immediate concern is, however, not with the merits of this particular poem but with the method of criticism by which it is expounded and with the idea which it gives of the critic's function. Fortunately Valéry himself has made it possible to be precise on this point because he is himself precise, and after speaking of "the thousand difficulties overcome, and a thousand delights so caught in the length of an inviolable web that they touch and are forced to melt one into another," he defines his conception of the critic and his function by saying that it is "all this hidden labor which the lover of poetry considers, as it were, by holding the tapestry against the light, seeking what lies beneath its artifices, turned aside from his search neither by the movement of the hunt [in the poem] nor by the vicissitudes of love, and beginning by degrees to admire as his mind succeeds in reconstructing the poet's skill."

From this it is evident that the lover of poetry is, in Valéry's mind, one who takes his pleasure not in the effect of a poem but in a realization of the skill of the poet, and the critic, presumably, is one particularly skilful in detecting the evidences of such skill. Here in a few lines is the most clear-cut distinction between the intellectualist ideal and that of the nineteenth century. Then it was supposed that the reader of a poem submitted himself to the spell of the poet, that in the case of "Adonis," for example, he would do exactly what Valéry forbids him and strive to feel the "movement of the hunt" and "the vicissitudes of love." It was even supposed that at least one of the functions of the critic was to constitute himself an unusually sensitive and responsive reader; but here even the "lover of poetry" as distinguished from the critic of poetry is enjoined to concern himself less with the spell of the poet than with the means by which the poet endeavored to cast it, and we are to admire him not in proportion to his success in capturing us but in proportion to the ingenuity of the means which he employed in his effort to do so.

No one could wish to deny that Valéry performs his analysis with consummate skill or that the piece of criticism which he has produced is a valuable one, but the limits of his method are clearly defined by its aims and they are such as to constitute a sufficient confutation of the claims made by certain of the intellectualists that such criticism is the only true or valuable sort. The lover of poetry may legitimately delight himself with the communicated dream of the poet as well as with the means by which it is communicated, he may follow the "movement of the hunt" and "the vicissitudes of love" when these are the subject of the poem; and even the critic who sets out to enrich the reader's pleasure may concern himself, as the "interpretative critic" always has, with the emotional reactions which accompany his comprehension of the poet's meaning. Toward the end of the essay under discussion Valéry warns us not to think that "we are reading the same poem that was known to the contemporaries of the author. Perhaps the qualities they prized most highly are those which escape us; others which they hardly perceived may affect us deeply." Does not that admission of the fact that when we think of a poem as an aesthetic experience rather than as a series of words it is, potentially, as many different poems as there are readers for it, constitute a defence of even the impressionistic critic who endeavors to communicate his poem to the reader by surrounding it with whatever historical or other facts contribute to the total experience which is his when he reads it?

In the course of an extended essay on Stendhal, published in the Parisian quarterly Commerce, and more recently written than any of the essays in "Variety," Valéry makes reference to the fact that his concern is exclusively with the technique of an author: "I see the pen and he who holds it: I have no care, I have no need of his emotions. I ask of him nothing except instruction as to his methods." Such a critic is of no small importance, but the majority of readers will still go to literature in search of the very thing which he does not seek, and they will continue to find a use for critics who help them to find it.

Song

By MARIE DE L. WELCH

What shall we remember when we are old?
What shall we remember even when we are wise?

Softly, softly we shall remember
Love and love's mouth and love's eyes.

What shall we remember more beautifully than wisdom?
What shall we remember in our cold years?

We shall remember, we shall remember
Love and love's laughter and love's tears.

What shall we remember when we are lost in quietness?
What shall we remember? What shall be keeping?

We shall remember, forever, forever
Love and love's sigh and love's sleeping.

The Outlining of Knowledge*

A Debate on Popularization

By JOHN HAYNES HOLMES

"THE popularization of knowledge" is a phrase which explains itself. It obviously means the diffusion of knowledge through the mind of the populace—the deliberate attempt to disclose to the unlearned many what is known to the learned few. From one point of view, all education is popularization. The primary teacher writing the multiplication table on the blackboard, the college professor lecturing on Kant or Einstein, the scientific specialist explaining to his colleagues some new experiment or discovery, all are engaged in imparting information to the ignorant, in popularizing knowledge for the benefit of whatever large or small section of the public may in each case be concerned. But from the standpoint of this discussion, popularization means the diffusion of knowledge on a vast scale by methods uncontrolled by standardized instruction. Dr. Adler and I have in mind the business of distributing second- and third-hand knowledge by wholesale methods to the general public.

Popularization, as thus defined, involves one or both of two processes. On the one hand it involves, or may involve, translation. When a man sets himself down to translate Aristotle's "Ethics," or Aquinas's "Summa," or Spengler's "Decline of the West" into the language of his own place and time, he is obviously undertaking this task in the interests of popularization. The scholar needs no translation; or, if he needs it, he will not use it. Though his original sources be in Aramaic or Coptic, he will master that tongue, that he may have his knowledge at first-hand. But the average man, as Emerson suggests, cannot swim the stream; he has neither time nor strength to train himself for such a venture. If he is to cross, he must have a bridge; and a translation is a bridge thrown over the stream of an unfamiliar language in order that the trudging wayfarer as well as the well-trained athlete may reach the land of knowledge.

Secondly, and more commonly, popularization involves interpretation. Most men cannot understand the meaning, much less the significance, of a great and original work of knowledge. Aristotle's "Ethics," Aquinas's "Summa," Spengler's "Decline of the West" need to be not only translated but interpreted if the common man, even the well-informed man, is to comprehend them. What chance have I to understand Bertrand Russell's mathematical philosophy unless it be expounded by one who knows? What chance have you to know what Einstein's scientific discoveries mean unless they be explained in simple language? For most of us the intricate details of modern science and philosophy on the one hand, and the vast panoramic sweep of contemporary knowledge on the other, must be transmitted at second- and third-hand by a process of interpretation, as a kindergarten explains letters to an infant, if we are to understand at all.

This is what is being attempted by the authors of the various "outlines" and other works of popular knowledge which are flooding the book-stalls today. H. G. Wells's "Outline of History," J. Arthur Thomson's "Outline of Science," Dr. Will Durant's "Story of Philosophy," Lewis Browne's "This Believing World" are perhaps the most familiar recent examples. Jowett's immortal edition of Plato, with its translations and its elaborate interpretative introductions, is an excellent illustration of both processes of popularization combined in a single notable work.

Now what are we to say about this business of popularization in its twin forms of translation and interpretation? Is it good or bad, wise or unwise, justifiable or unjustifiable? Our answer to these questions will be determined, it seems to me, not by any theory of knowledge in itself, but by our theory of society. If we believe in the aristocratic theory of society—the subjection of the many to the few—then we will be opposed, as Dr. Adler is opposed, to the popularization of knowledge. We will argue that knowledge is for those who are fit to use it for their own enlightenment and for the guidance of the people. In India, for example, knowledge is the possession of the Brahmins, who pass on from generation to generation the lore which belongs to them alone. In a caste system of society there is naturally a chosen group of scholars or priests whose business it is to know the sacred mysteries. To impart this knowledge to others would be a betrayal of trust. Plato sets forth something of the same idea in his "Republic." At the head of society, as the responsible leaders of the state, are the philosophers who know and are therefore fit to govern. The other two groups in the community, the guardians who protect it and the workers who support it, have no need of learning. They would not know what to do with it if it was given them. So the popularization of knowledge in this utopia of the Greek philosopher would appear both abhorrent and unnecessary. Every objection to popularization is based on this aristocratic theory of society. If men oppose it, it is because they believe that the common people are incompetent to manage their affairs, and thus would only degrade a knowledge which they could not use.

But there are some of us who still believe in democracy—"government of the people, for the people, by the people"! To such the popularization of knowledge is as necessary and beneficent as education itself. Indeed, we regard popularization, as exemplified by the "best-seller" outlines of our time, as only the farthest ripples of that whole great educational disturbance, central in the life of a democracy, which starts with the placing of a child under trained instruction. The popularization of knowledge, as one phase of the enlightenment of a people for their own self-guidance in the affairs of life, is legitimate, and indeed must be considered wholly necessary, for two reasons:

First, a democratic society can survive—indeed, it can come into being at all—only by giving the people knowledge. What one event so surely marks the opening of the modern democratic era as Martin Luther's translation of the Bible into the vulgar German tongue of his day? This achievement, with similar achievements elsewhere, wrought the spiritual emancipation of the European peoples and therewith prepared the way for later political and social emancipation. And Luther's work was simply and solely a piece of popularization! Hitherto the Bible and all it connoted to the life of those times was the possession of the priests, who were the scholars of the medieval church. Only the man who knew Latin could read the Vulgate. But now Luther put the Bible into the hands of every humblest peasant by translating it into the vernacular—and the world was free!

Another example of popularization of this kind is Thomas Huxley's life-long work in interpreting Darwin. How many people have ever read the "Origin of Species"? How many, if they have read it, have really understood it? Huxley, himself a biologist of the first rank, called it an enormously difficult work. It was perhaps because of his realization of this fact that Huxley undertook the interpretation of Darwin's masterpiece to his generation. And what a job he did! Read his six lectures to workingmen on "Evolution," and behold a classic of popularization! Huxley, more than any other man, educated a whole people in the new and revolutionary knowledge of his time, and therewith served democracy.

Secondly, the popularization of knowledge is necessary in a democracy because knowledge itself can survive only by diffusing its light among the people. A parable! In New York City not long ago, an ignorant man slew a physician who had injected an antitoxin into the body of his little son too late to save his life. When this man saw his boy suddenly dead after the injection, he assumed that the physician had killed him with his instrument, and he murdered him in revenge. Here is an instance where knowledge was destroyed by ignorance, for lack of popularization. Had the physician explained to the father, in simple language, what he was doing to his son—popularized, that is, the theory of anti-toxins—the father would have understood and the physician be still alive.

What is the matter in Tennessee? Why are anti-evolution campaigns flourishing in this and other States? Because no Huxley has popularized evolution for this generation as the great Huxley popularized it for the last generation! We have reared up a nation which knows not Darwin, and the result is a threatened return of ignorance and superstition. Knowledge can survive in a democracy only by popularization. Make it a hidden, esoteric thing, and always there is the possibility of a sudden uprising or invasion of barbarians, to destroy they knew not what—of truth or beauty or wit—and thus to inaugurate once again a "dark ages."

The case for the popularization of knowledge is one with the case for democracy. Popularization is not always a lovely process, as democracy is seldom an ideal state of society. It involves the hazard of errors, perversions, dilutions, even degradations. But knowledge is made for man, not man for knowledge. Use must transcend beauty, and luxury give place to need. Popularization, if the scholars will, can be made itself an art. It can be done brilliantly, as Durant has done it in his "Story"; it can be done nobly, as Wells has done it in his "Outline"; it can be glorified, as Huxley glorified it in a literature that abides. Then will democracy be safe because it is enlightened, and knowledge safe because it is free; the two, like righteousness and peace, kiss each other in sign of unity.

II

By MORTIMER J. ADLER

THE question whether knowledge should be popularized tends to provoke rhetoric expressive of noble humanitarian sentiments on the one hand and of aristocratic distemper on the other. It may be that the question is itself rhetorical, and essentially evasive of any analytic solvent. But at least the attempt can be made. Reason may not have a silver tongue, but its labored accent should find an audience in those who prefer even silence to unclarity.

There is first a matter of definition, and second a matter of evaluation. What are the traits of the class of books to be designated as "popularizations"? And what value is to be placed upon them?

A popularization is here defined as a book whose subject-matter is other books, the latter being either primary or secondary sources of scholarship or theory, whether scientific, historical, or philosophic. It is not the subject-matter, however, but the method which is distinctive. A popularization of any subject-matter is (1) a simplified report of (2) the important facts in a given field, and its aim is (3) to educate a group of people with regard to whom it is assumed that (4) their training or intelligence is insufficient to a degree which renders the original sources inaccessible or at least so difficult as to be unattractive.

Inevitably correlated with the four characteristics mentioned are two further traits, to be stressed not only in themselves but because they are significant in differentiating the popularizations from two other kinds of books with which they are frequently confused. (5) A popularization is always a selection of the important facts in a given field, their importance being determined by some moral, political, or philosophic theory in the author's mind. This theory determines not only the selection but the organization of the material, and is, furthermore, insinuated as authoritative commentary into what pretends to be merely an expository text. It is here asserted that a popularization is distinguished by the fact that the theory of the work is never frankly stated and defended by its author; but rather is throughout implicitly assumed as justifying the eccentricities of the popularizer's scholarship, the partiality of his formulations, and as grounding the authority of his imposed and intruded comments. In other words, a popularization is always authoritarian and dogmatic in that it fails to exhibit, examine, or defend its necessarily assumed theses. (6) A popularization, finally, employs certain devices, stories, pictures, analogies, charts, jokes, and literary vulgarisms which are irrelevant to the subject-matter being treated. They are irrelevant in that they are adventitious to the direct understanding of the subject-matter, their function being an appeal to "human interest" and to mankind's inveterate interest in itself. These devices may in part be efforts at simplification, but they are always more than that. They are of the same order as the literary or pictorial expedients used by the tabloid newspapers, the Sunday supplements, and the journalistic magazines. That they are weapons of exploitation can be seen by a study of the content of the advertising copy which has made any given popularization popular in terms of sales statistics. Knowledge must not only be simplified in order to be sold; it must be exploited in the manner which the tabloids have discovered to be the way of increasing the number of people who read some printed page. The point here being made is that these devices are intellectually irrelevant to the comprehension of the knowledge which they are designed to make seductive and palliative.

The class of books under consideration having been defined, some of the members of the class can be pointed out. Each of the following exemplifies to a greater or less degree the specified traits: H. G. Wells's "The Outline of History," Hendrik van Loon's "The Story of Mankind," Will Durant's "The Story of Philosophy," George Dorsey's "Why We Behave Like Human Beings," and Lewis Browne's "This Believing World."

As before said there are two other classes of books, often thought of as popularizations, which should be distinguished therefrom. (1) Books which utilize simplified and selected knowledge to support or even to propagandize for a frankly polemical point of view. The distinction of these books is the explicitness of their theses and the frankness of their purpose. In this class belong Huxley's popular writings on evolution, J. B. S. Haldane's "Daedalus," and a book like C. E. Ayres's "Science the False Messiah." (2) Books whose effort is to present the general ideas of a given field of research or reflection, for which purpose evidence is selected to embody and illustrate the chosen themes. In this class belong Whitehead's "Introduction to Mathematics" and similar books in the Home University Library, Hart's "Psychology of Insanity," Shapley's "Starlight," Eddington's writings on relativity, T. H. Morgan's "Critique of the Theory of Evolution," Galileo's "Two New Sciences," and Boyle's "Skeptical Chemist." The distinction of these books is that they are critical simplifications of subject-matter governed entirely by a consideration of leading ideas. They are not summaries; they are generalizations of knowledge, often original contributions. Their authors are eminent scientists and scholars writing directly to a relatively small public, not journalists or publicists seeking to hold the market-place.

This is not a matter of arbitrarily calling names; it is a process of invoking distinctions that will define and differentiate. The term "popularization" certainly is deserved by books of the Wells-Durant-Dorsey class, for they alone are really popular in terms of circulation. The present argument is concerned with this class alone, for it is this class and not the others which have created the problem. No evaluation positive or negative is implied by the exclusion of the others from consideration.

It is now necessary to evaluate the books of the class defined. They are good either (1) in themselves or (2) as means to some end which is judged good.

(1) In terms of any standard of excellence, whether it be the criterion of scholarship, of intellectual form, or of literary merit, it is unlikely that any group of technically competent judges would commend these works. Prudence requires that this be asserted merely as a statement of probability and statistics. It is memorable, however, that at time of publication each of the recognized popularizations was charged by one or more competent specialists with gross inaccuracy, unrelieved dogmatism, and vulgarity of presentation.

(2) But the popularizations are seldom praised or defended in terms of their intrinsic virtues. Rather the defense is made by reference to the service they render in the realization of a democratic ideal of society. Popular education seems to be the unfortunate burden of democracy. Democracy, it is claimed, depends upon the dissemination of knowledge, and scholarship and science can survive in a democracy only in so far as the people are educated. This is not the appropriate place to argue such claims. It can only be suggested that they derive their force from a political theory, and not from an empirical survey of the situation. Our present discussion must turn to a question that can be more readily answered. Granted that the popularization of knowledge is important in a democracy as an instrument of public education, can it be maintained that the defined class of books performs that function effectively?

I assert the negative, not as a fact but as a suspicion, the grounds for which may be stated as follows: (1) It is assumed not only that all individuals have equal right to education, but that they are equally susceptible to its persuasion. Whether or not there are profound native differences in intelligence, the fact of a wide range of intellectual ability in the population cannot be disputed. Democracy may insist that all should be free to read, and that every effort should be made to render knowledge available; but it would be absurd to insist that all men be given equal opportunity to understand what they read. Either a drastic program of eugenics, or a fundamental economic revolution, might make this possible, but not popularization. (2) These books inform rather than educate, if education be conceived as the alteration of the intellectual process and not merely as the inculcation of factual content. (3) These books indoctrinate. They not only fail in the most crucial aim of education, the liberation of the individual mind to become autonomous and critical; but worse, they achieve the very opposite. The dogmatic and simplified presentation of the data of knowledge, unaccompanied by insight into the methods and qualifications of the actual research, develops the stereotypes of a new mythology of science as a substitute for the myths of the older tradition. Myths in themselves are not to be deplored when they are taken as poetry, but the popularizations spread their mythology as a gospel. It is the Truth which is being disseminated, and it is to be believed with the genuflections of unquestioning faith. On these grounds, too briefly stated perhaps, I offer that popularizations not only do not satisfy the ends of education but are instead instruments of a new bias and bigotry, and are clouds that obscure the dawning of "creative intelligence" over the land —the central hope of the democratic philosophy.

But the democratic philosophy itself, so insidiously prevalent in current American thought, is far from being above question. If, instead of assuming that social democracy is the most desirable state of affairs, one made the equally possible postulate of an aristocratic convention there would be no ground whatsoever upon which popularizations could be praised. Even if they served in some slight manner to improve the great masses of the population, that would be a totally irrelevant and insignificant item. For the great masses would not matter; the intellectual tradition would be properly the possession and the care of the few who, by economic or eugenic good fortune, were capable of the task imposed upon them. Popularizations would be denounced not as socially evil, but merely on aesthetic grounds as ugly, crude, vulgar objects. The aristocrat would not attack them with Comstockian zeal; he would merely consider them with contempt, along with the tabloids and the public prints in general, as the shadows which those who are chained within the cave perforce must view. With platonic detachment he might spend an idle moment dreaming of that city in the skies from which the poets and the popularizers would be banished; but he certainly would not seriously pursue that project on earth.

Summarily let it be said that the value placed on popularizations depends first upon whether one or another social philosophy is arbitrarily assumed, and secondly upon the analysis of the precise educational service which they are capable of rendering. It has been here suggested, not asserted, that in none of these relations has the popularization any great positive value.

It must be admitted, according to the law of probability, that a popularization may be good in one way or another—as a stimulant to research, as the germ of a desire for more and better knowledge, as provocative of reflection, and, even though it be the humble hedonic good, as a source of recreation and amusement. But it must be remembered at the same time that popularizations may do evil as well as good, if there be any who agree that dogmatic indoctrination, the conversion of the masses to a new mythology, and the cultivation of an obstinate religiosity toward science are evil, or at least no less evil than the state of affairs which already obtains. Finally, it is submitted that apart from their questionable educational value these books are worthless, having no intrinsic excellence, no scholarly or literary justification.

Were it not for the fact that the issue has been raised in social terms, the attitude of ignoring these books entirely would recommend itself. It is, moreover, very doubtful whether the issue as stated is genuine. It may be largely the indirect result of phenomenal advertising successes. The pedants having protested, the populace defended its idols of the moment, and the regnant democratic philosophy transformed an easily explicable disagreement in taste into a social question—"Should not, must not, knowledge be popularized?"—the answer, as far as the facts go, may be Yes or No. But those whose secret faith it is that knowledge cannot be popularized without a degradation of its value will conclude that it is after all merely a rhetorical question.

Books

First Glance

THREE volumes have recently appeared by poetesses each of whom in her time has been considered radical, or in some other manner perplexing, and each of whom has gradually come to be accepted for better or for worse. It should be interesting to compare not only their work as now represented, but also their careers, in so far at least as these throw light upon the question what it means to be radical in poetry, and what it comes to in the end.

In the case of Amy Lowell, whose third posthumous collection, "Ballads for Sale" (Houghton Mifflin: $2.25), makes still longer the row of short, stout, clearly printed volumes which she must have wished to be her monument, I am afraid the question has little positive significance. Miss Lowell did little more—at any rate she does little more in "Ballads for Sale"—than display her energetic personality. It was refreshing to have this personality come once upon the scene, but there is not much to say about it any more. Here again she names over the flowers, the poets, and the objects she loves, and crackles in wrath against the things she hates. The tale, however, has been told—and we are forced to wonder whether, if it seems inconsequential in this retelling, it ever was of the first consequence. Whether, that is to say, a poet has not something better to do than talk ever on and on about himself, identifying the whims of his vision with the rules of art.

Miss Edith Sitwell, whose "Rustic Elegies" (Knopf: $2.50) is, I believe, the third of her eight volumes to appear in the United States, has been damned in England for her difficulty, though latterly, it would seem, the cry against her has either died down or been put down. It ought still to be permissible to say that she makes hard reading. With all her sophistication and sensitiveness, with all her attention to details of imagery and rhythm, with all her finely, thinly perfected art, Miss Sitwell dares you to understand her—and you do not. You perceive, perhaps, that she is engaged through most of her volumes in constructing, shell by shell, a delicate remote world where her fancy can be at peace, and you may have heard how certain aspects of this world are to be comprehended only when it is comprehended that she writes without footnotes of the Sitwell family's very old and interesting past. But so much will not make you at home among her bizarre images or explain who her curious persons are. Now Miss Sitwell is barely in her prime, and time may render clear what she has not. I suspect, however, that her case will seem to be something like Amy Lowell's. Miss Sitwell too is capitalizing a personality—not an energetic one at all, and one enormously more subtle than Miss Lowell's, yet still a thing unique in its essence. She is hard to get at. When we do get at her we shall, I fear, merely be getting at her limitations.

"H.D" grew up, poetically speaking, with Amy Lowell, and came to fame as soon. She too, I do not doubt for an instant, has been all the while making poetry out of her character—indeed, a remarkable work in prose fiction which she published last year is proof of this. But it is poetry with a difference, since it ends not in character, where all good poetry begins, but in communication. And the result can plainly be seen in "Hippolytus Temporizes" (Houghton Mifflin: $5), her major effort to date. It is a lyrical tragedy dealing with that youth passionate after purity whom Euripides wrote his best play about. The story has been much altered to suit the author's lyric purpose, and the whole emphasis has been shifted from Hippolytus himself to Artemis, whose words begin and end the poem. Hippolytus, far from escaping Phaedra's love, is tricked into enjoyment of it—thinking that he embraces Artemis. The tragedy is in the mind of Artemis, thus violated, and even more in her mind when Hippolytus, restored to life for a moment by Helios, says in delirium that it was the Cyprian he had embraced. Of the whole conduct of the drama, or of the many passages wherein gods and mortals break their brains with song, it would be futile to speak in this space. My point simply is that "H. D.," while writing still for a small audience, writes in truth for that audience and not for herself. That is at least one reason why she has achieved passion in her poetry rather than sentiment, and why it is better to ask not why a poet is radical but whether he is good.

"Al"

Alfred E. Smith: A Critical Study. By Henry F. Pringle. Macy-Masius. $3.

THIS book is what it purports to be—a critical study. It is refreshingly free from "hunk," as Governor Smith mainly is free from that stock-in-trade of politicians and of our latter-day journalists. Mr. Pringle has really tried to give a correct portrait of the most interesting political figure of the day, and this is just as it should be. He has not written a campaign biography, if there is to be one. He could have dramatized "Al" but he did not; neither does he thank fortune after the worn-out story of the poor little fish-market boy who worked up from the sidewalks of New York. Probably his frank discussion of the Governor's shortcomings will make his text unavailable as a campaign document, so stupid are the usual campaign managers. To people of discernment this discriminating picture will be far more moving and convincing than any mere glorification.

Today, Mr. Pringle thinks, Governor Smith is unquestionably of Presidential timber. He does not believe that he was at the time of the Madison Square Garden convention in 1924, and as proof he quotes the Governor's dreadful speech at the close of that hapless gathering. He minces no words about that disastrous utterance, and throughout he does not suppress the fact that "Al" neither reads nor in any way cares for books—it is understood that nothing resembling a book is to be found in the Executive Mansion. In all frankness Mr. Pringle sets forth that "Al" has outgrown Oliver Street, and now prefers the Biltmore Hotel and the luxuries which he can now afford to buy. He also dwells on the Governor's ability to keep his mouth shut and lie very low—as he has been doing this past summer on all important issues which extend beyond the boundaries of his State. This biographer admits that there is a growing irritability in the once ever-genial subject of his book, and he is frank enough to admit that he is thoroughly scared lest the Governor allow himself to be talked into a pro-Volstead utterance. His tortuous prohibition record is here set forth in full.

Mr. Pringle admits that other people have written many of the Governor's public utterances for him and he has done a specially useful service in devoting a chapter to Mrs. Henry Moskowitz, "Al" Smith's guide, philosopher, and friend, who has done so much to educate him along the lines of social reform, has penned or edited many of his speeches, and, with her husband, has managed his later campaigns and generally sought to steer him in, however, the most unselfish and helpful spirit. The ordinary biographer would sedulously try to conceal these facts. Mr. Pringle has done well to bring them out, for if Mr. Smith should go to Washington it is most reassuring to know that he has such excellent taste in advisors and that his most confidential one is a Jewess known for her extraordinary ability, her social progressiveness, and her wise judgments. Mr. Pringle rightly praises Governor Smith to the skies for his admirable attitude in the days of post-bellum hysteria when he refused to be stampeded into thinking that Socialists have horns and that they should be denied Constitutional rights, and when he was brave enough to pardon Gitlow in the face of the whole 100 per cent American pack of baying hounds.

Altogether Mr. Pringle has done his job so well as to have made the case-hardened journalist who writes these lines think better of the Governor than heretofore. The only things he does not throw light on are just how many cocktails the Governor takes a day and whether or not it is true that his father's name was originally Schmidt and that he is, therefore, half Irish and half German. Mr. Pringle answers directly the doubts of those who think that this tobacco-spitting roughneck would be out of place in the White House by affirming a number of times that "Al" wears nice clothes, and the proper ones, and has learned how to conduct himself in the best society as well as on Oliver Street. He seems also to believe that "Al" has the equipment to deal with foreign problems. He traces religiously the man's evolution from a conventional tool of Tammany Hall to the four-term Governor who, many besides Norman Hapgood assert, is sure to win the Democratic nomination for the Presidency. He rightly stresses the superb fight made by Smith against William R. Hearst in the Syracuse Convention of 1922, which he thinks the high-water mark of the Governor's achievements, and as marking the man's final rising above Tammany Hall—incidentally it was the final coup-de-grace to Hearst's political ambitions.

It is refreshing to get hold of a political book by a realist and truth-teller. Mr. Pringle looks behind the scenes and does not care who knows that he is quite aware that the Republican Party in New York State is just as crooked as the Democratic Party, only vastly more sanctimonious and hypocritical—and infinitely stupider. He is correct in believing that the Governor owes a tremendous debt to the shallow pates of Republican leaders who, like Messrs. Miller, Mills, and Theodore Roosevelt, Jr., have done their best to improve "Al's" standing with the people by their extraordinary ineptitude and by the quality, or lack of any sound quality, of their opposition. Really Mr. Pringle's book is a picture of government in our Empire State as well as a biography, illumined by his own honest and caustic criticisms and comments.

The Life of Joseph Conrad

Joseph Conrad: Life and Letters. By G. Jean-Aubry. Doubleday, Page and Company. Two volumes. $10.

IN these stately volumes M. Jean-Aubry assembles materials that the future biographer of Conrad will find indispensable, but he has scarcely done a biography himself. His work is too chaotic to be called that, and there are too many gaps in it. He is meticulous about names and dates, but often quite oblivious to the facts behind them. When and under what circumstances did Conrad study navigation—a study plainly presenting bristling difficulties to a young man of his meager education? Who were his teachers, if he had any? And when he came up for examination for his mate's certificate, how did he surmount the difficulty of his Russian citizenship? These may seem to be trivial things, but they were surely not trivial to Conrad, and the reader made privy to his life is apt to have a natural curiosity about them. But M. Jean-Aubry has nothing to offer, nor has he anything properly describable as light to offer upon many other important episodes of Conrad's life, including his marriage. About all we learn about Mrs. Conrad is that Conrad met her "at his friends 'the Hopes' "—but even the Hopes remain very shadowy, though it must have been G. F. W. Hope who first heard those marvellous tales that were later to become "Youth," "Heart of Darkness," and "Typhoon."

The letters are far more satisfying. There are gaps in them too, and important ones, but even as they stand they present a dramatic and often somewhat painful picture of Conrad's slow and laborious struggles as a writer. More than once he was so discouraged that he thought of abandoning the pen and going back to the bridge. Even so late as 1905, with half a dozen masterpieces behind him, he journeyed to Glasgow in the vain hope of getting a ship: it was in that year that Sir Edmund Gosse and William Rothenstein began their heroic efforts to get him a pension from the Civil List. M. Jean-Aubry is not clear as to when that pension was actually granted. In 1909, judging by a letter of Conrad to his agent, the late J. B. Pinker, it seems to have been withdrawn. In that year, confronted by a bill from his eldest son's schoolmaster, he stopped work on "Under Western Eyes" long enough to write an article for the London Daily Mail. He was paid twelve guineas for it, but found that he needed $25 more, and had to ask Pinker to advance it. Down to his last half dozen years he seems to have been chronically short of funds. "Typhoon" went begging, and the American and British serial rights to "Under Western Eyes" appear to have been sold for $1,200. When success was upon him at last, he reflected sardonically upon the fact that "The Planter of Malata," an unimportant short story, written to boil the pot, brought him in "eight times as much as 'Youth,' and six times as much as 'Heart of Darkness.'"

551 FIFTH AVENUE

Conrad's domestic life was apparently very happy, but it would be greatly stretching the facts to call it placid. There was illness in the house almost continually, and the servant problem more than once interfered with the composition of masterpieces. Once the maid-of-all-work became so engrossed in twilight amours that she had to be discharged; this left Mrs. Conrad, who was ill, to cook and sweep, and Conrad, who was busy, to care for a sick child. That child remained ill for years. There was an endless succession of alarms and quarantines. Finally the French faculty at Montpellier advised mountain air, and the whole family moved to Geneva. But when whooping cough developed on the way, the Hotel de la Roseraie refused to take the pilgrims in, and for a couple of weeks they were imprisoned in some lesser hotel, "at the end of a corridor." It was all a great deal worse than the typhoons of the China Sea—nay, than the agues and poisoned arrows of the Haut-Congo. And in later years there were other and perhaps even more bitter afflictions, not mentioned by M. Jean-Aubry.

It would be silly, in a review of so homely a book about him, to offer any estimate of Conrad as an artist. The time, indeed, for such estimates is past. If he was not completely of the first rank, then all the literary standards that now prevail in the world are worthless. He will long outlast, I believe, his chief contemporaries. In his letters one encounters his generous and often lavish praise of Henry James, Stephen Crane, H. G. Wells, Arnold Bennett, and others. He was immensely greater than any of them. There was in him a surge and thunder that they could not hope to match. His strength was that of the old bards, but he remained preeminently a modern man—aloof, subtle, highly sophisticated, and wary of the very emotions that he evoked with such superb skill. Few greater story-tellers have ever been seen in the world. Consider "Youth," or "Heart of Darkness," or "Lord Jim," or "Victory." But it is too late to be considering them. They are massive and overwhelming facts. They belong among the permanent glories of the human species.

A Call for A Commentator

Something About Eve: A Comedy of Fig-Leaves. By James Branch Cabell. Robert M. McBride and Company. $2.50.

SOONER or later there will have to be a Commentary on Cabell. The various introductions to his separate works are not enough. Even his own Scholia merely tantalize, with their lineages and ground-plans and, when it comes to details, their dexterous evasions. Moreover, every treatise that has so far tried the theme is too slight for its purposes. The Commentary on Cabell, when it comes, must be a packed, extensive work, an insolent dictionary, a delicate encyclopedia. It must contain dissertations on the Cabellian geography, chronology, mythology, metaphysic, and critical doctrine. It must abstract the plots, analyze the characters and trace them from book to book, and subtly, stubbornly interpret the symb lism. What other country as visitable as Poictesme is without its Baedeker?

Yet the thought of Baedeker troubles the prophet who concerns himself with Cabell. Any commentator stubborn enough to do the work demanded is almost certain not to be subtle enough. And any commentator subtle enough will have creative plans sufficient to keep his hands busy. The best that can presumably be hoped for is that somewhere there will occur a writer with all the insight and none of the personal ambition possible to his tribe, and that he will take up what his reviewers will be sure to call, though he must of course blush at the term, a labor of love. Unless, indeed, Cabell himself, during some seventh day when he is resting from his labors, may have the helpful impulse to call in a Poictesme Moses and dictate a Dizain des Pentateuques.

"Something About Eve," which has suggested this need of a general Commentary on Cabell, embarrasses the hand which finds itself obliged to deal with the new comedy in a page or less. Like each of Cabell's recent additions to the series, the part is deeply complicated with the whole. Gerald Musgrave, leaving Lichfield in the year 1805, sets out on a quest which more or less resembles the quests of Manuel and Jurgen. He has grown tired of his natural body, which is bored with the love of a good woman, and he wants to visit Antan (Mais où sont les neiges d'antan?), where, his illusions tell him, he is to be Redeemer and Emperor. He is, however, waylaid by several women, some in the costume and all in the image of Eve, and eventually he collapses into a respectable career. This is the true Cabell cycle for a hero to go through, and Gerald goes through it with familiar paces. The novelties lie in the details, which are diverse and bold, but also occasionally mystifying. Honest plain men will blunt their teeth on some of the details. Cabell experts will wriggle with satisfaction. They may as well admit, at the outset, that "Something About Eve" is a learned book. The unlearned reader will ordinarily have to learn something about Cabell before he can learn much about Eve. And by that time he will no longer be quite so unlearned as he was.

It is a pleasure to point out, for the benefit of the unlearned, that the moral of the romance is edifying. Gerald is, in his fashion, of the species of Galahad. He wants to be Lord of the Third Truth, which will take him beyond the Two Truths of which the burden is that men copulate and die and have no other careers. True, Gerald does not quite tell what he knows when he has got at the Third Truth, but he is relatively faithful to it. He aspires, and aspiration is edifying. He in the end becomes content, and contentment is edifying. "Something About Eve" is sound at the core. If now and then it stirs the senses, that is only its high spirits.

Young America

The American Caravan: A Yearbook of American Literature. Edited by Van Wyck Brooks, Alfred Kreymborg, Lewis Mumford, and Paul Rosenfeld. The Macaulay Company. $5.

IF "The American Caravan" winds its way through the representative yeasty section of "fresh racy attacks" and an adumbrated "progressively broader expression of American life" in our contemporary letters, then it offers food for strange and conflicting conjecture. For instance, we are supposed to be in a poetic decline; yet half the 73 titles in this Leviathan of anthologies are poems (no less than 123 of them). We are supposed to have become critically self-conscious of our literary output; yet there is but one purely literary essay (and that a short one on Mr. T. S. Eliot) imbedded in the 843 pages of assembled material. The voices of women are supposed to be loud in our creative endeavors; yet there are but fifteen women represented to fifty-seven men. Of course, these hasty statistics mean nothing, for the only things that statistics prove are the birth and death rates and that statisticians are dull fellows.

Then, again, a number of causes limited "The American Caravan." There were the personal idiosyncrasies of the four editors, the scope of the material submitted to them, their evident determination, presumably, to keep out "established" figures (Robinson, Frost, Lindsay, Masters, Sandburg, Millay, Wylie, Eliot, Anderson, Dreiser, Cabell), their announced objective of making up for "the passive and recessive attitudes of the leading magazines toward new fields of reality and fresh racy attacks" and "taboos . . on the character of literary work." Accepting these limitations one may turn to the tome with some degree of expectation.

That there is much here that will arouse the interest and stir the faculties goes without saying, for it would be impossible to bring together seventy-two young writers without a few sparks flying. There is life in "The American Caravan," a pulsing undercurrent of freshness, and if more often than not it fails to achieve itself we may, perhaps, lay it to a condition in the American scene that the editors might indignantly deny. They, at least, reveal a valiant front through the purpose of their endeavor. Their faith is undiminished in the liberality of the American literary scene, for they apparently see it as but stemmed by the choking influence of the typical magazine. It would be purposeless to inquire as to whether the "passive and recessive attitudes of the leading magazines" are volitional on the parts of fearful editors or the reflection of the American cultural scene itself. At the same time one may ask: since when did a group of magazines retard "a progressively broader expression of . . . life" when the reading public demanded that very thing?

It is my earnest belief (and an extraordinarily obvious one, it seems to me) that a national spirit in letters evolves from a majority demand, and by that majority I mean readers of literature and not the devourers of lollipops provided by popular purveyors of pseudo-literature. That easily-satisfied class will always be in a physical majority. Several steps above them in the scale of intelligence is the audience that evolves from its more or less unified demand a national letters. It is this audience that will accept or reject "The American Caravan." The greater part of Messrs. Brooks's, Kreymborg's, Mumford's, and Rosenfeld's compilation will be accepted, for there is nothing iconoclastic or unusual to bewilder that audience in it. A small proportion of the material will aggravate it because of the rebellious spirit more suggested than posited.

Now why is this rebellious spirit more suggested than posited? It is here that the editors will disagree with me. I do not believe that the American scene tends toward rebelliousness; it is satisfied with a slower evolution; it is marked by a restraint. Its representative poets, for instance, are Robinson and Frost and Millay; not Pound and Cummings and Marianne Moore. When a young man grows rebellious in this country he gets rather shrill about it. He is like the frightened boy going through the forest at night; he whistles too loudly. And he doesn't quite comprehend the tune because his impetus is an urge and not a purpose. It is so that I find the few determined young writers in "The American Caravan." The undercurrent pulses there, the urge is manifest, but they are encircled by a scene that is evolutionary and not rebellious. Their bravery becomes bravado, then, and they smash a few surfaces, break up a few verse-forms, intoxicate themselves with the jazz-spirit, raise their whistle to a loud shrill where sex is concerned, and thumb their noses a few times at the bland scene that, for the most part, ignores them.

It is not the "fresh racy attacks" that are most successfully consummated in "The American Caravan." It is rather the evolutionary matter, if such a description may be used. It is Paul Green's Supper for the Dead and Elizabeth Madox Roberts's Death at Bearwallow and Phelps Putnam's Ballad of a Strange Thing and Lyle Saxon's The Centaur Plays Croquet, to select, almost at random from this matter, a play, a short story of tragic implications, a poem, and a fantastic bit of fiction. Here, it seems to me, is the natural evolution of the American spirit in letters, a growing integrity, a courageous abandonment of sentimentality and subterfuge and "nicety" of thought and the swaddling bands of the Women's Guild tradition. Perhaps, on second thought, this type of work represents the "fresh racy attack" as it is applicable to the American scene.

But what becomes of the more "rebellious young men?" What are they to do if they are sincere and determined and willing to stake their careers upon an urge? There is only one thing they can do and that is to work from without in, to amalgamate themselves with the free European urges and destroy in so far as they are able the evolutionary American spirit. In the end they will cease to belong to a national tradition (if, indeed, they belong to it now) and will form part of an international urge that overlays and partakes of all national urges. Meanwhile the American spirit will continue to progress in an evolutionary manner while those freer spirits, finding themselves out of the woods, will not have to whistle so loudly to keep up their courage. "The American Caravan," then, may be offered as a fair example of the younger American surge forward with all its flaws and most of its virtues, and in being offered as such it may be offered as an implied limitation to pure art. HERBERT GORMAN

"America"

America. By Hendrik Van Loon. Boni and Liveright. $5.

IT would be futile to think of applying to Mr. Van Loon's book any of the tests that are commonly used to evaluate historical writing. In the proper sense of the term he is not, it must be admitted, an historian at all. He has certainly studied history a great deal, and as certainly knows a great deal about it; but one of the last distinctions that he probably would claim is that of having added anything of importance to the kind of knowledge of the past which it is the particular business of the historian to accumulate and arrange. His place, if he is really to be classed with anybody except himself, is with the parti-colored aggregation of social philosophers and moralists whose function it is to explain what the human adventure, or this or that phase of it, is all about, and how mankind may possibly hope to escape making as great a fool of itself in the future as it has often done heretofore. Such philosophies and moralizings, of course, are always personal, whether their subject be the freedom of the will, the relation of alcohol to literature or art, or the ultimate fate of a people under the combined influences of capitalism and birth control, and Mr. Van Loon's observations about history are at least as personal as any, and immensely more entertaining than most.

Not more than twenty pages of the book are likely to be read by the type of person who can consume with relish the nine volumes of McMaster or the seven or eight of Rhodes, or who drinks in documents and calendars as the veritable wine of the kingdom. To such Mr. Van Loon and all his works are an anathema, and an anathema they will probably remain. Fortunately, however, for Mr. Van Loon and his economic prospects, most readers of history in these days seem to prefer generalizations to data, pungent criticism to orderly narrative, and genial humor or irony to scientific appraisal, and for them this book offers a full money's worth. There is no resisting its jolly flings at hoary traditions, or its sweeping judgments of motives and acts, or its dramatic word-paintings of men and their ways. As for keeping to the beaten track, that is one of the least of Mr. Van Loon's worries, and the slightest suggestion sends him off among the byways and hedges, over the prairies or across the sea, anywhere, in fact, that holds a dictum or a laugh. Then, when the breathless chase has ended, he usually comes back to something that resembles the starting-point, with a reminder that but for Allah the little journey might have turned out worse, and a kindly hint that some of the unsightly things that have been observed may look better next time.

The story begins somewhere this side of the age of the Pharaohs, comes down more or less consistently to the end of the Civil War, and closes with some observations and prophecies through which are woven a number of events of more recent date. Having already told the story of mankind, it is natural to find Mr. Van Loon dwelling at length upon what have been called the "European origins" of American history, and throughout his march he switches us rapidly from America to Europe and from Europe to America as he explores the chasm from which these present times have emerged. It would be superfluous to point out, at this late day, that he has no illusions about the loftiness of human motives or the plain honesty of much human conduct, but his spacious iconoclasm has mellowed since he first began striking out among the images and monuments, and if the priests and the Puritans still get their deserts, so also, but in fine and generous temper, do the Quakers and the Dutch, King George and "those Adamses," Washington, Jefferson, Jackson, and Lincoln.

In short, "America," for all its sprightly daring and its occasional intimations of swashbuckling, reveals Mr. Van Loon as an optimist. He confesses, in his final chapter, that he is not "an inordinate admirer of that state of mind," and admits that "nature is not interested in happy endings," yet it is with a happy ending that he takes his leave. America has floundered through materialism and found it wanting, just as Europe found it wanting in the World War, and for the moment the outlook is chaos, but the future of civilization is nevertheless in America's keeping, and the hope of America is its Younger Generation. To that Younger Generation, as to such of the elders as may be induced to join with youth in reading what Mr. Van Loon has written, these fifty-odd chapters and six score drawings (the latter a brilliant and often deeply moving commentary upon the text) may be commended as cheerfully and confidently as a rubric commended the once popular Ripans Tablets: "No matter what's the matter, one will do you good."

WILLIAM MACDONALD

Death Comes for the Archbishop. By Willa Cather. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

IN one of his literary essays Havelock Ellis drew a useful distinction between what he called the Nordic and the Celtic treatments of the past. The uninstructed reader of Homer might, he pointed out, very reasonably suppose that the poet was contemporary with the events which he described, whereas in the case of any Celtic epic it is always perfectly evident that the author is dealing with things which, for him as well as for the reader, are remotely picturesque. The Greeks, in other words, preferred to treat the past as though it were present because they were interested in a dramatic immediacy, but the Celts deliberately evoked the pathos of distance because that pathos was to them the essence of poetry.

Now I am by no means certain that this distinction upon the basis of race is valid; perhaps it would be safer to speak merely of the heroic and the elegiac moods; but certainly the distinction itself is of fundamental importance and it is, moreover, the one which serves better than any other to define the particular quality of Miss Cather's work. Though she is absorbed in what would be to another the heroic past of our continent, her mood is that which Ellis would call the Celtic. She has upon occasion evoked her own memories, and one would expect to find in them the softness of remembered things, but even when her stories are rather documented than recalled she manages to invest documents with the wistful remoteness of recollected experience and to make past things vivid, less because they are present in the heat and sweat of actuality than because some softened memory of them seems to be. Not Calliope nor Melpomene is her muse but rather she who was called the mother of them all, and she is always at her best when that fact is most clearly recognized.

Certainly her newest story—concerned with the life of a missionary bishop to the newly annexed territory of New Mexico—would be in the hands of another something quite different from that which she has made it. These were stirring, adventurous times; many writers might feel that they could be recaptured only in some exciting and dramatic narrative; but Miss Cather softens the epic until it becomes an elegy. In recounting the lives of her characters she chooses by preference their moments of calm reflection; when she wishes to throw the long tradition of the priesthood into relief against the primitive background of the new land, she seizes upon some contrast that is deep without being violent; and she sees everything as one sees it when one broods or dreams over the past. The tumult and the fighting reach us but dimly. What we get is the sense of something far off and beautiful—the picturesqueness and the fragrance of the past more than the past itself, pictures softened by time and appearing suddenly from nowhere.

In a garden overlooking Rome, a cardinal drinks his wine and discusses the appointment of a new bishop for a vague and distant see. That bishop, come all the way from the Great Lakes, struggles with the paganism of his priests, rides miles over the desert to perform a belated marriage ceremony over the Mexicans whose children he has baptized, or dreams of the cathedral which shall some day rise in the savage land; but at night he cooks himself a soup with "nearly a thousand years of history" in it and in the sense of these vanished contrasts lies the effect of the book.

> After supper was over and the toasts had been drunk the boy Pablo was called in to play for the company while the gentlemen smoked. The banjo always remained a foreign instrument to Father Latour; he found it more than a little savage. When this strange yellow boy played it, there was softness and languor in the wire strings—but there was also a kind of madness; the recklessness, the call of wild countries which all these men had felt and followed in one way or another. Through clouds of cigar smoke, the scout and the soldiers, the Mexican rancheros, and the priests, sat silently watching the bent head and crouching shoulders of the banjo player, and his see-sawing yellow hand, which sometimes lost all form and became a mere whirl of matter in motion, like a patch of sandstorm.

Even when Miss Cather strives most consciously to give to her books a narrative movement there is likely to be something static or picture-like about her best effects, and when she falters it is usually in the effort to carry the reader from one to the other of the moments which rise like memories before her. In the present instance she has nothing that could properly be called a plot, but she is wisely content to accept the fact and to depend upon the continuous presence of beauty rather than upon any movement to hold the interest of the reader. When things are recalled in the mood of elegy there is no suspense and they do not take place one after the other because, all things being merely past, there is no time but one. And so it is in the case of "Death Comes for the Archbishop." It is a book to be read slowly, to be savored from paragraph to paragraph, and it is quite the most nearly perfect thing which its author has done since "A Lost Lady."

Three Thousand Years of Civilization

History of the Ancient World. By Michael Rostovtzeff. Oxford University Press. Two volumes. $10.

"IN close connection with other departments of human knowledge, history tends to become more and more a science whose end is to define the laws under which the life of man develops, and the regular process by which one type of communal life is displaced by another." Professor Rostovtzeff in his preface has stated in simple and impressive words the difficulties and the problem connected with historical writing under the scientific requirements which, according to the statement above quoted, the historiography of today imposes upon its practitioners. The primary task is that of selecting out of many thousands of statements those which may safely be regarded as true and of eliminating those which are manifestly untrustworthy. This is difficult enough in itself because "the memory of man is short and his imagination fertile," as Professor Rostovtzeff has put it. To this primary difficulty two exacting tasks must be added, that of arranging in a comprehensible sequence the facts once established and selected for use; and that of expressing the delicate reactions and relations of one fact with another or with a given group. Thus it will be evident to the reader of Professor Rostovtzeff's introductory chapters that historical writing is today a technician's job.

The task which Professor Rostovtzeff has set himself in these two volumes is that of making intelligible to the reading public the course followed by the vigorous, productive, and brilliant civilization of antiquity from its Egyptian and Babylonian beginnings until a new type of civilization succeeded it. Obviously Professor Rostovtzeff regards the civilization of antiquity, when broadly conceived, as a unit, or at least as capable of presentation, for historical purposes, as a unit. In this aspect as a whole ancient civilization would stand in contrast with the west and north European civilization which has been developing since antiquity. Under the religious banner of Christianity the later civilization has produced different modes of thought and different types of cultural expression from the ancient. One must agree with Professor Rostovtzeff that the new forms which appeared in the centuries immediately following the period from 200 to 350 A.D., as compared with the old, were decidedly primitive. But the reader who has immersed himself deeply in the history of the early Middle Ages may not be willing to follow him to the point of believing that there was a "steady reversion of civilized man to the primitive state of barbarism," as the author has declared in the final chapter of his second volume. Probably we will move faster and further toward an understanding of the end of ancient civilization if we avoid all such terms as "decay," "decline," or "dissolution," and deal with the shifting of the centers of economic and cultural gravity from the Mediterranean littoral to the new geographic areas of western and northern Europe. These new areas were inhabited by peoples of different physical and mental stamp and of different traditions, which were of course primitive. This method of approach would approximate that established by Frederick Jackson Turner for American history—the movement of the frontiers of civilization and the results upon the new areas and the new peoples, and upon the old as well, of that movement.

This admirable survey of the entire stretch of ancient history was originally written in Russian. It has been translated in English by Mr. J. D. Duff—exceedingly well translated, as the directness and simplicity and clarity of the style indicate. It embodies the knowledge and the points of view gained through a lifetime of devotion to the problems of ancient history by a vigorous and penetrating intelligence. There are perhaps a dozen or more living men who could write an historical summary of these three thousand years which would be satisfactory in the mastery and the arrangements of the facts. There are certainly not more than three men who could do it with so complete a control of all those many factors which go to make up civilizations, who could so well balance the political, social, and economic factors involved, or carry the reader through the long vista of years and events with a vigor so constantly sustained.

Two elements of Professor Rostovtzeff's method of presentation are particularly striking. He is a believer in the use of handiwork of men in the arts and crafts, commonly called archaeological material, as a powerful aid to the understanding of the life of antiquity. His knowledge of the museum materials in all parts of the world is vast. The publishers of these two volumes have been generous in their allotment of space to this end. The author is a past master in the art of applying and interpreting the many full-page illustrations which appear. Each of these has, facing it, a clear explanation of the subject presented. None of these plates contains trivial or useless pictures; and the reproductions are unusually clear. It is pleasant to note that Professor Rostovtzeff has made use of the materials which are to be found in increasing amount in the larger museums of the United States.

It has become a commonplace of historiography, as it is practiced nowadays, first to present the political development of the various peoples who must appear for consideration in a given series of years, a century perhaps or more, and to follow this by a summary of the greater social and economic trends which distinguish the period thus treated as a unit. This method Professor Rostovtzeff has already used in his splendid scientific book of two years ago upon the "Social and Economic History of the Roman Empire." The same method is employed in his present summary. He accentuates the similarities of social movements in the various areas which must be treated. This he follows by an evaluation and explanation of the local variations from the general tendencies already laid down. Thus he avoids the danger of generalizations which may be true as generalizations but blur over one-half the truth lying in the detailed divergencies. The author of these volumes is not a sociological impressionist.

The work is dedicated to the University of Wisconsin, where the author for five years held the chair of ancient history. In the preface he pays, in simple words, a tribute to his former colleagues and to his former students of that university. It does great honor to all the parties concerned, and it is particularly useful just now to note that an eminent scholar of foreign training and experience has met with a sympathetic hearing from American college students. They have indeed many sound qualities. Among these is a ready appreciation of ability and of any sincere devotion to the task of teaching them.

WILLIAM LINN WESTERMANN

Upton Sinclair

Upton Sinclair: A Study in Social Protest. By Floyd Dell. George H. Doran Company. $2.

ALL real biographies are epitaphs. One must die to enjoy the luxury of biographical renown. Great biographies are experiments in dissection, and both law and morals forbid the vivisection of living people. This thought, I am confident, was in Mr. Dell's mind when he wrote his biography of Upton Sinclair, and explains, perhaps, why it is so formal and literary. He says, indeed: "The biographical details in these pages are intended to be subordinate to the critical study of his development as a certain kind of writer—a describer, critic, and prophet of modern industrial America."

In other words, Mr. Dell's study of this great and forceful critic of our civilization is essentially an extended literary review, an essay on Upton Sinclair's intellectual development and literary achievements. With these limitations it is a book of excellent qualities, not only in style and manner, but also in perception. Mr. Dell does not tell his readers much about Upton Sinclair as a person, but what he does tell is extremely informative, even to those who, like myself, have been reading Upton Sinclair's books for twenty years. I never knew, until Mr. Dell told me, that Upton Sinclair was the son of a whiskey salesman, although I knew that he was a Southerner by birth, and that his uncle had been in the Confederate navy.

Nor did I know that part of his boyhood was spent in New York boarding houses, waiting with his anxious mother for his father to come home. At that time the elder Sinclair had begun to consume his own merchandise in large quantities, and his home-coming was entangled in the myths of numerous barrooms. These facts are instructive, and through Mr. Dell's story I see Upton Sinclair much more clearly than I had ever seen him before.

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY ~ NEW YORK

As a youth he was highly strung—neurotic, in my opinion—vivid, intelligent, sensitive, poverty-stricken. The component of these spiritual forces is the impulse that makes great men or little ones. People who are so tortured are never mediocre and complacent. They either take wings and soar away into dangerous skies—or, if they are too weak to fly, they are ground to dust under the heel of civilization.

At that time—in Upton Sinclair's early maturity—American literature lay becalmed in a sort of Sargasso Sea of the intellect. Books were on a level with needle-work. To write for respectable people it was not enough to be merely light and mushy; one had to be sweet as well. It was in this period that Hamilton Wright Mabie published his carefully prepared "White List of Books," and his standard was sweetness and light. The successful novels of the day were concerned mainly with sexless young ladies of the best families and well-bred youths who made good enormously in business and then sought the colorless virgins as their wives. Courtship and lovemaking were expressed in the literature of the time as a progress through a net of childish difficulties. Sometimes kind old gentlemen appeared in these books, fatherly dotards full of platitudes passing for aphorisms; and now and then one encountered in them a sensible dog, with eyes that were almost human.

In 1906, Upton Sinclair, then grown into a rebel devoid of fear, and without respect for tradition, came upon the scene with a novel called "The Jungle." This tremendous book said something, and it stood out like a muscular and hairy fist among the current literary confections. I remember reading "The Jungle" at one gulp, with an interest that I can only describe as breathless. It caused me to turn to a prolonged study of socialism. In the end it made me a radical socialist, which I have been from that day to this. In the twenty years that have passed since "The Jungle" first appeared I have read it several times again; and in my judgment it is one of the few really great novels that have been written in America.

Strange to say, "The Jungle" became an immediate best-seller, to the surprise of its author and everybody else. Its success was due not, however, to its great literary merit, but simply to the revelations that it made of conditions in the meat-packing establishments of Chicago. Upton Sinclair had worked long enough as a laborer in a packing establishment to learn conclusively that diseased and contaminated meat was sold in handsome tins bearing labels on which the words "tasty" and "delicious" were displayed in advertising splendor.

The book entered the most velvety homes. The respectable readers of the "White List of Books" laid down "Beverly of Graustark" and picked up "The Jungle," delicately and with gloves. The poignant tragedy of the immigrant community which Sinclair described was lost on them, and his socialistic pages were doubtless skipped, but they read what he said about those shiny cans of potted ham they had in the pantry; and when father came home they showed the book to him. Father read it and wrote to his Congressman about the poisoning of a whole nation, nefarious traffic, and so on—unless he was financially interested in meat-packing himself. The uproar could not be stopped. There was a Congressional investigation, and in the end grudging improvements.

Upton Sinclair had become an author of world-wide celebrity, though even then in discussing him in bourgeois circles it was usually agreed that he was, after all, a fanatic; and that the whole thing should have been handled more quietly; that is, with more regard for investments.

Since then he has been called everything from a publicity seeker to a plain liar. He admits that he is a publicity seeker—and with reason, for the only way a radical of his vehemence and indignation can be heard at all is by doing something that gets him on the front page of the newspapers. As to his being a liar, no one has ever proved it, though many have tried. But as his reputation and influence are growing, no doubt more determined efforts will be made in the future.

He stands today as one of the great and heroic figures of our time, and I do not use these words loosely. One of the chief elements of greatness is the courageous handling of great, though forbidden, ideas—and Sinclair has spent his life in doing that. It is this quality that distinguished Savonarola, Spinoza, Samuel Adams, and William Lloyd Garrison. He is a great literary man because he deals habitually with great causes in a masterly manner; and he is heroic because he has not flinched at contumely and poverty in a land where success is a religion and poverty is a disgrace.

One is impressed, in reading Mr. Dell's biography, with the amazing industry of Upton Sinclair's career. He has produced thirty-eight books—some of them called pamphlets—on all kinds of subjects. He is irrepressible, indignant, and bold. His books have been censored, vilified, banned, and burned by the common hangman. Even today, after he has become a celebrity of whom the nation ought to be proud, we hear of the Watch and Ward Society of Boston attempting to keep his latest novel, "Oil," from spreading its radical virus among the prim and timid citizens of a commonwealth that has recently degraded itself by executing two men in the face of the enlightened opinion of the world.

Among the Arabs: Traveller and Tourist

Oriental Encounters. By Marmaduke Pickthall. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

Adventures in Arabia. By W. B. Seabrook. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

TO evaluate properly these two books it is well to emphasize that now, as in Pickthall's time, as improper a conception of alienage has prevailed among the Arabs individually as in a different way prevails collectively often in our own State Department. The Arabs are suspicious one hundred percenters, and often the police power has been largely inoperative in large parts of the Near East. In the more inhabited parts of Syria, Irak, and Mesopotamia in the vicinity of the greater cities there is comparative safety, but there are still stretches of the Arabian peninsula proper which remain terra incognita despite a long line of explorers from Niebuhr and Burckhardt and the tempestuous Burton. The Near East thus demands something of a true adventurer and traveller. It still remains the inspiration of a literature of escape—as much for the sophisticate who wants his "Arabian Nights" straight and unexpurgated as for the hundreds of thousands who thrilled to the late Valentino. A more or less sedentary Westerner will judge a book about the Arabs rather more as literature than as document. He simply has to know what he likes.

Marmaduke Pickthall did not perhaps venture into the more inaccessible places, but he did penetrate into the innermost recesses of the Arab mind. The casual sketch book of his adventures which he modestly calls "Oriental Encounters" is literature of a high order. He belongs indeed to the long line of Englishmen, adventurers and men of letters, who have been attracted to the East and established almost an Arabian tradition in English literature. They are, perhaps, in Divine Providence, one of the justifications of British imperialism, which has turned the minds of Englishmen generally toward the East. Like the poet Flecker, Pickthall had dreamed of the East in his boyhood, and he experienced no disillusionment after he reached the scene. "Oriental Encounters" recounts his wanderings in Syria and the Palestinian hills from 1894 to 1896, when he came to love and intuitively to understand the Arab psyche as few have done. His method was that of the true traveller: it was simply to loaf and invite his soul. At an early stage he picked up the zealous Raschid, securing his release from the Turkish Army, and with him as a retainer and with the more occasional company of his wise friend Suleyman, the Dragoman, whom every incident reminded of a story and who never paused to say "Stop me if you've heard this one," he spent his leisurely days among town and desert Arabs, avoiding his own countrymen. He spoke a fluent Arabic and his encounters were productive of tales that are rare and perfect in the manner they hit off Arab character and customs. In tone they are quiet and intimate and with no traces of usual oriental cliches, nor dependent upon usual tricks of local color. "Oriental Encounters" will enlarge the Pickthall cult which arose locally with the publication of "Said, the Fisherman." When there are no longer such Arabs as Pickthall's, it will be necessary to invent them.

Mr. Seabrook and his book are remarkable, too, but in a much different way. "Adventures in Arabia" is the sort of book which will knock Main Street off its feet. Mr. Seabrook, too, dreamed of the golden road to Samarkand, and in his youth made a futile attempt to get there as a stowaway. He vowed when he was caught in Naples and beaten that some day he would make the journey in comfort and style. The moment of that oath the adventurer died. He subsequently married and opened a coffee-shop in Greenwich Village, where he prospered. In his leisure he studied Arabic, and as luck would have it, into his place one night walked Daoud Izzedin, Arab and Druze. He knew, it appeared, just the right Sheiks of Sheiks. We next find him discharging the obligations of the Bohemian life in the tents of the wild Beni Sakr in the desert! He was almost robbed on the way but his letters of introduction saved him. After leaving the Beni Sakr he spent his time in Syria and Mesopotamia from Beirut to Baghdad rushing breathlessly about among the Druses, Whirling Dervishes, and Yezidee Devil-Worshippers. With the exception of his rather more perilous visit to the Beni Sakr, he always had his wife Katie at his side. Everywhere he kodaked as he went and his book is full of gorgeous photographs. He never tires of paying his tributes to Arab hospitality, and he collected innumerable souvenirs and trophies. He risked his life several times, but mostly through mismanagement. In short, he accomplished the remarkable feat of being a tourist in Arabia! His book is full of the spectacular and weird and contains some passionate Arabian love stories as interludes. But for him were not the austerities of a Doughty or the intimacies of a Pickthall, and always, alas, he remained outside looking in.

WILLIAM S[illegible]

Strangely American

The Grandmothers. By Glenway Wescott. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

THE creators of the civilization of the Mississippi Valley have furnished a consistent stumbling-block in the way of artistic interpretation. The difficulty has been the usual American difficulty—that of securing the necessary detachment. The obvious trouble with Cooper, Bret Harte, Hamlin Garland, Mark Twain was that they were themselves too clearly marked with the tar-brush of the frontier. This unhappy incorporation of themselves with their subject-matter forced them to schematize the pioneer spirit with which they dealt. They envisaged it sentimentally in terms of courage, kind-heartedness (or brutality), stoicism, rough humor. With the epic simplicity inevitable in all primitive recording, they projected the frontier in terms of action, incident, and adventure. The result of this elementary approach has been clearly indicated by a number of critics: we have been presented with a gaudy melodrama which arose largely as a defense reaction against the possible sneers of cultured European critics. They dared to call us a rough people! We would show them that we were even rougher than their feeble imaginations could conceive, magnificently rough, with all the extravagant virtues pertaining to a complete state of roughness.

Posed against this traditional interpretation the importance of "The Grandmothers" becomes clear. Mr. Wescott's very beautiful and moving chronicle (for only out of courtesy to the rules of the Harper Prize Contest can it be termed a novel) is possibly the first artistically satisfying rendition of the soul of an American pioneer community and its descendants. Native intelligence and a receptivity to the subtleties of the continental novel-aesthetic combine in him to make his chronicle delicately psychological rather than rudely narrative, despite the fact that on the surface the book is but a compound of a dozen short stories. These same qualities exclude the possibility of sentimentality; although this is presumably a history of the author's own ancestors there is not a single apologetic or lyrical note in the volume. Finally, by grouping his stories about a family, or rather two families, the Towers and the Duffs, he is enabled to express what no history with an individual hero could ever express—the spirit of a people who, existing among primitive conditions, were forced as a preservative measure to emphasize loyalty to the clan.

Nevertheless the delicacy of Mr. Wescott's perceptions prevents him from committing Galsworthy's error. There is no insistence on "family traits." Here we have the seemingly irreconcilable stories of a dozen individuals whose careers extend from about 1830 almost to the present. Loosely connected by the fact that their protagonists are related by blood or marriage, these stories are superficially unified in that they are all seen through the eyes of young Alwyn Tower, to whom the stories are told by his grandmother. Yet despite this apparent structural vagueness something emerges at the end which is convincingly the spirit of the Anglo-Saxon Protestants who moved westward from New York and New England and settled the Mississippi Valley.

They were all aristocrats, these Duffs and Towers, possessing the fundamental characteristic of all aristocrats—sensitivity. Grand-aunt Nancy, married to a husband who smelt of cattle, could go mad; Uncle Leander could consume himself with life-long remorse because his brother Hilary had quarrelled with him in a Civil War camp and then disappeared forever; Grandfather Tower, remembering the early days of peril and physical labor whose quality he could never hope to communicate to his posterity, could shut himself up in a strange relentlessness and reticence. They were a passionate people, but a people whose passion was curbed by an austere Puritan morality. Those who rebelled against that morality, like the deserter Evan Tower, rebelled greatly and paid for that rebellion with the loss of their communal heritage. Those who obeyed the morality obeyed it at the cost of profound inhibitions, living ultra-vivid interior careers which were denied outward expression. All of them were strange and lived strange lives; yet all of them were strangely American and lived strangely American lives, conditioned by farm and forest, Bible and Mayflower compact, a common unexpressed faith in the future of a new continent.

The stories of these lives, carefully and simply set down, acquire a saga-like poetry because they are not so much told as remembered, seeming to have passed through the minds of many generations before they are recorded by young Alwyn; and in that slow migration they have taken on the incalculable richness and color that come with the passage of years. The author tells us that one of the elements leading him to write this book was the spectacle of contemporary America, a country where "no tragic arts might flourish." This melancholy description is happily contradicted by his own work—a chronicle, beautifully tragic, of a race which has, in the year of grace 1927, all but vanished from the soil it tilled and the broad country to which it gave birth.

appeared in print. But it is more than that. It is a rousing militant challenge from a pacifist to his fellow pacifists to support the "American" plan of the outlawry of war as the way out of the frustration which has come upon them in consequence of their devotion to various "European" schemes for preserving the peace. (This appeal to American patriotism has at times a naively chauvinistic sound which the author scarcely intended but which will hardly recommend his book abroad.)

Everybody knows, who is likely to read this review at all, that the essence of the Levinson plan of which Dr. Morrison makes himself the lusty champion is that it would make war as an institution illegal, put it outside the pale of civilized usage just as dueling is now outside the pale in individual conduct. The right of self-defense for nations as for individuals would remain. The process involves three steps: A solemn treaty outlawing war, another treaty setting up a code of international law drafted by experts, and a third establishing an international court of justice. The effect will be revolutionary but not, in the opinion of the author, impossibly revolutionary. One nation might successfully take the initiative, especially if that nation were the United States. Even failure in the first attempt would have a tremendous educational value and give us a far more realistic knowledge than we now possess of the difficulties in the way of peace.

For the most part Dr. Morrison is constructive and convincing in building up his case for the practicability of the Levinson plan. He builds no mere castle of dreams. And certainly he lays about him vigorously and effectively to destroy the dream castles of advocates of rival plans. He is both caustic and convincing in discussing the inevitable weaknesses of every plan to enforce peace by military sanctions. Such plans, no less than the outlawry of war, rest upon the good faith of the nations which adopt them. And good faith is more likely to work in the expectation of peace than of war.

I finished the book with real gratitude to the author and a new conviction that the outlawry of war furnishes the most practicable single plan for the furthering of peace. Nevertheless, although the outlawry of war may be the best medicine for the sickness of the world, it is by no means a panacea. The inestimable blessing of peace cannot be bought at so cheap a price as Professor Dewey in his thoughtful foreword and Dr. Morrison suggest. They trust far too much to law, or to what Dr. Morrison calls the "juridical approach." In consequence he minimizes unduly the importance of the moral aspect of the peace problem and popular feeling on wars of self-defense. He deals cavalierly with the search for the causes of war. He says with some truth that the existence of the war system is itself the most important cause of war. But to dismiss the whole problem of the causes of war by this suggestive statement is dangerously inadequate.

Nowhere does Dr. Morrison recognize that international law based on existing treaties by no means conforms to justice. It is the moral code of the strong. The grievances of exploited peoples are imbedded in treaties and customs which any code and any court would have to recognize as legal. To find these injustices frozen into a solemn code of law might serve to increase the bitterness of the victims out of which in time violent revolt will arise. The vague assurance that the code can be revised from time to time will not be enough—for instance, for the Chinese in their struggle against the Western Powers. I can see nothing in the outlawry of war which will automatically solve the problems of imperialism or deal with such shameful acts as America's recent intervention in Nicaragua—an act which we have never even recognized as war.

Dr. Morrison thinks that we would let Nicaragua and Mexico alone were it not for the existence of the war system which makes us anxious about our own defense. He is only partly right. The removal of the war system would indeed remove the argument that to defend ourselves we must subdue our neighbor. It might also lessen the urge of strong nations to acquire under their own flag every sort of raw material so that they may be self-dependent in time of war. In other words, the outlawry of war is distinctly useful in the struggle against imperialism, which is the fruitful cause of war. But of itself it will not end that greed for profit and that sense of superiority which have more to do with the presence of our marines in Nicaragua than the protection of the Panama canal against hypothetical enemies. Nations which are content to accept a politico-economic system which legalizes the constant, systematic, and often violent exploitation of certain groups and classes of men by others cannot expect to exorcise the demon of war by any mere juridical approach. Just as the Dred Scott decision of our Supreme Court was in itself a contributary cause of the Civil War, so may some similar decision of a world court precipitate violent and passionate revolt in years that are to come. To say that such a revolt will not be "legalized" as our present war system is "legalized" will be cold comfort to those who want to get rid not only of a legal institution but of a tragic reality.

This undue dependence of advocates of the outlawry of war upon legal processes is strikingly illustrated by the fantastic extreme to which they press the analogy between war and dueling. Actually the analogy is very imperfect. Duels as distinct from the earlier judicial combats from the Middle Ages down into the nineteenth century were seldom resorted to as a means of settling tangible grievances for which legal processes might have been a substitute. Men would have died of ridicule if they had carried before judges most of the ridiculous disputes for which they faced death on "the field of honor." Moreover, a decree in France, the classic home of dueling, made it punishable by death as early as 1602. Laws against dueling were far more ineffective than any Volstead Act until a different public opinion, due mainly to the economic fact of the rise of the bourgeoisie, made law at once effective and relatively unnecessary. The history of dueling proves the inadequacy not the adequacy of Dr. Morrison's juridical approach.

To point out these weaknesses in a strong case is not to detract from the merit of "The Outlawry of War." It is only to urge that if the outlawry of war is to be made possible or effective it must be treated as one move in a great campaign against not only a legal institution of war, but a politico-economic system of which war is the natural fruit. I should be willing to cooperate gratefully and gladly with the powerful advocates of the outlawry of war, but I should always reserve the right to remind them that our gigantic American empire will have to pay a bigger price for peace than mere consent to the Levinson-Borah plan for the outlawry of war. That plan, I repeat, remains the most practicable immediate step before the country.

NORMAN THOMAS

Master of Marine

Navigator: The Story of Nathaniel Bowditch. By Alfred Stanford. William Morrow and Company. $2.50.

TWO or three men have given their proper names to books of information or reference. Euclid means geometry. Every American knows what you mean when you speak of looking a word up in your Webster. Every English-speaking officer on sailing-ship or steamship knows his "Bowditch," the title of which is "The American Practical Navigator." And versions based on this classic exist in other languages. Mr. Stanford in a fascinating narrative, which is part fact and part the kind of fiction more illuminating than fact, has reconstructed Bowditch's character and given the spirit which animated his extraordinary epoch-making work. For Bowditch revolutionized the art of sailing and made the supremacy of the American navy, merchant and fighting, a hundred years ago. Stanford has done a beautiful piece of work; there are passages in this book which are as vivid and essentially poetic as anything in Loti or Conrad.

And—more important—this extraordinary genius comes alive.

What Bowditch did, if a landlubber can explain it, was to put sailing, course-directing, steering, the map of the sea on an accurate, scientific basis. Before Bowditch navigating was haphazard guess-work. Since Bowditch an officer (or a common seaman) can figure out by Bowditch the spot on the ocean where he is at any moment; he can tell within a few minutes when he is due to make port, and with the recent developments of wireless telegraphy, he can report an accident to himself or other ships and the location and drift of icebergs.

Bowditch was a strange fellow, a born genius, persistently, obstinately, doggedly carrying out the work that he had determined to do. I know of no character in biography or fiction more convincing, more human than the person that Stanford has recreated. I shall not tell the story of Bowditch because I want to be a literary navigator and steer a whole ship-load of readers on Stanford's ship to port. The reader will find not only the man admirably drawn, but his friends and family and others not so friendly, the "atmosphere" of old Salem and the Yankee and his awful limitations done to perfection.

Bowditch was not a very lovable person. He was self-centered, independent as a hog on ice, very sensitive, close at times, as I gather from Stanford's book, though he does not say so, to attacks of neurosis, but with a perfectly terrific will in a weak body. With no training, no schooling beyond the primary grades, he made himself a master of mathematics, that is, the kind of mathematics that he needed to teach people how to sail ships. He found his townsmen—almost all the more prosperous ones of course, were captains, mates, or owners—ignorant of their job, which was steering a ship. And with his logical arithmetical mind Bowditch said that the simplest way to get from one point to another is by a straight line. So he taught the world of seamen how to draw a straight line, as straight as you can get it on our bulging globe. It sounds simple. But it was not simple as a theoretical or practical matter. For Bowditch had nothing to go on except the astronomy, general mathematics, and geography of the time, and his neighbors thought him an unpractical dreamer and fool. Toward the end of his life he was recognized and duly honored. But that was after his work was done, and he might have said with Johnson, had it been early it had been kind. But the man, for all his difficulties and a sort of sadness that pursues him and his loves to the end of his days, was not unhappy. For he was possessed by his idea. And he literally lived in figures, even the figures of business, in which he was not unsuccessful but rather shrewd.

His final triumph, the local victory in Salem, not his world fame, is somewhat comically dramatic. He was master of a ship, being a practical sailor as well as a man of figures. When his ship was due in Salem there was a terrible storm and everybody thought it must be lost. But he sailed in quite calmly and explained to his anxious wife and friends: "I simply was fortunate in having unusually good observations before the storm closed in. That and a fine compass served me." So Bowditch who filled countless reams of paper with calculations saved his life because the calculations were facts. And it is not too much to say that thousands of sailors have owed their lives to Nathaniel Bowditch of Salem.

I cannot do more than suggest the beauty of this book, its literary charm, its style (I am told that Mr. Stanford hates style and art and wishes to be known only as an honest workman). But I can give a taste of it by quoting the last paragraphs, at which the reader will arrive if he opens this book at all:

> Then he would go on, his footfalls hushed by the [illegible] in the air about him. His heart warmed the blood in him at this friendly touch.

Bowditch, so many years ago in the meadows, the world that had given him his life to lead with such intensity and conflict, had at last offered him achievement, and through that achievement, peace and a degree of understanding from his fellowmen.

I submit that that kind of writing has the right kind of eloquence, of beauty. Anyhow, read the book. It is a lovely story. Amazing material handled by a writer of fine imagination.

JOHN MACY

Genghis Khan

A Servant of the Mightiest. By Mrs. Alfred Wingate. Brentano's. $2.50.

Genghis Khan. By Harold Lamb. Robert W. McBride and Company. $3.50.

THESE books were bound to come; the only marvel is that their appearance has been so long delayed. In an age when every "colorful" individual, from the most ermine-bedizened prince to the dirtiest ragamuffin, is being hastily slapped between the covers of a book, Genghis Khan could hardly have been overlooked. Each of these volumes is relatively successful. Mrs. Wingate's historical romance is historical enough to serve for a college class, and sufficiently romantic to please strap-hangers and servant girls. The trouble with her book is that it tries to bridge the impassable gap that divides austerity from sentimentality. At times she writes with superb detachment; but more frequently she endeavors to idealize her subject by representing him as a superman who combined the various traits of Torquemada, Napoleon, and Lon Chaney. This attempt to put frills and furbelows around the shaggy neck of her hero causes one to reflect on what would happen if one were to dress up Grendel in a Little Lord Fauntleroy costume, or try to make Vesuvius more impressive by popping firecrackers in its crater. From the many accounts of the great Khan's death, she chooses one "in preference to any other, for the mystic significance which probably underlies it," whereas Mr. Lamb allows the dying warrior to depart after making this plain speech: "It is clear to me that I must leave everything and go hence." She is also fond of breaking her narrative by inserting windy preachments and dissertations on history—in brief, she should read less of Jane Porter and Walter Scott, and more of Dumas.

Mr. Lamb essays a less lofty flight. Basing his compact narrative upon the best authenticated chronicles, he has wisely followed a simple chronicle form; and if his presentation thus seems a bit flat and undramatic, it at least avoids the hectic melodrama, the depressing sprightliness, and the appalling determination to "humanize the subject" that characterize the —so-called—new biographers. Whatever his defects as a modern biographer may be, Mr. Lamb is too wise to try and humanize a man-eating tiger.

Although these two books probably tell as much truth about Genghis Khan as will ever be known, one lays them down speculating on what the grisly old fighter was really like. A transparently simple and primitive soul, probably, and as ruthless and elemental as the sands of the great Gobi Desert whence he sprang. Did such a person ever utter these flamboyant words which Mrs. Wingate puts into his mouth? "Forward! I am Chingiz! In my right hand I carry the flaming sword of justice and at my left hand, as a councillor, rides Death. These are the gifts of the Mightiest Whose servant I am. Praise to the Mightiest Who has answered my prayer! Forward, to the conquest of the world!" Such sentiments smack too much of opera bouffe—they might almost have been spoken by Gilbert's Mikado. There is a more authentic ring in some of the sayings which Mr. Lamb attributes to him. "To crush your enemies, to see them fall at your feet—to take their horses and goods and hear the lamentations of their women. That is best. . . . Get drunk only three times a month. It would be better not to get drunk at all. But who can abstain altogether?"

His contempt for philosophers, too, is refreshingly pungent. "I have perplexed the wisdom of the sages. I see now I have slain without knowledge of what to do rightly. But what care I for such men?" Perhaps a man who had conquered more territory and sent more soldiers to their deaths than any other general who ever lived might have been pardoned for bragging a little; but it seems doubtful whether Genghis Khan cared enough about setting up empires and over-lording the world to be very boastful. No, it was enough to take what he wanted —whether it was a slant-eyed girl, a leopard, or half a dozen mighty nations—and then let crazy fellows who could do nothing but write burden him with such high-sounding names as Mighty Manslayer, Scourge of God, Perfect Warrior, Master of Thrones and Crowns, Emperor of All Men, and so on. It was better to fight just for the fun of seeing blood flow than to lure men to death by emitting fine phrases about making the world safe for the Gobi Desert. And instead of torturing defeated foes by depriving them of their territorial possessions, burdening them with impossible war debts, or causing panics in their stock markets, it was much more dignified to translate them speedily to another world by pouring molten silver in their ears. Genghis Khan was too old-fashioned to enjoy the refinements of cruelty.

Books In Brief

The Romance of Villon. By Francis Carco. Translated from the French by Hamish Miles. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

O Rare Ben Jonson. By Byron Steel. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

The problem of making the novelized biography as interesting as fiction and yet as convincing as history is better solved by Mr. Carco than by Mr. Steel. The trouble usually is that we have to hear a great deal about what the subject thought or felt on this or that famous occasion. The bare record of what he did is better. Both of the present authors give us lively books; the first gives us the truer and the more distinguished.

The Three Sitwells. By R. L. Mégroz. George H. Doran Company. $3.

Rather chaotic criticism of an interesting English literary family.

The Search for Atlantis. By Edwin Bjorkman. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

Mr. Bjorkman in an erudite and entertaining little essay finds Atlantis to be identical with Scheria, the home of Homer's Nausicaa, and in turn with Tarshish or Tartessos.

Builders of the Republic. By Frederic Austin Ogg. The American Spirit in Art. By Frank Jewett Mather, Jr., Charles Rufus Morey, and William James Henderson. Volumes VIII and XII of The Pageant of America. Yale University Press.

The excellence of this series is excellently kept up. Mr. Ogg has naturally more difficulty in telling the story of politics in pictures than the authors of the other volume have with painting, sculpture, and the graphic arts. Mr. Mather's account of painting is particularly pungent and full; his record of illustration and caricature especially suits the purpose of the series, which is to describe all past American life.

Harper's Literary Museum. A Mirror of American Manners and Morals from Pocahontas to the days of Dolly Madison. Compiled by Ola Elizabeth Winslow. Harper and Brothers. $4.

A particularly amusing and revealing collection of Americana titbits, including in a final section representative advertisements from newspapers and handbills from the earliest times to well on into the last century.

Domestic Manners of the Americans. By Frances Trollope. With an introduction by Michael Sadleir. Dodd, Mead and Company. $4.

A long overdue reprint of one of the most caustic of nineteenth-century books on America.

The Diary of a Country Parson, The Reverend James Woodforde. Volume III, 1788-1792. Edited by John Beresford. Oxford University Press. $4.25.

The resurrected records and confessions of this hitherto unknown Englishman are here continued in one more inimitably charming volume.

The Indians of North America. Selections from The Jesuit Relations and Allied Documents. Edited by Edna Kenton. Harcourt, Brace and Company. Two volumes. $10.

Miss Kenton continues the excellent mining operations she began a year or so ago in the priceless treasures of the "Jesuit Relations." The Indian material here gathered is of course restricted for the most part to the territory east of the Mississippi; but within those limits a very rich yield is achieved.

Pomes Penyeach. By James Joyce. Paris: Shakespeare and Company. One shilling.

The thirteen poems which James Joyce has put together cover a period extending from 1904 to 1924. It was in 1907 that "Chamber Music" appeared and in the years that followed the poet was immersed in his various prose volumes. Poetry, then, was no more than a passing phase with him, a brief flowering of sensitive youth into what was, for him, a sturdier growth and a profounder metier. The few lyric snatches that evolved from his consciousness were (and are) unimportant except in so far as they predicate a disposition enamored of delicate sound and fragile rhythms, for the prime value of Joyce's poetry is implicit in a fastidious arrangement of vocables. Of the thirteen short pieces in "Pomes Penyeach" not more than three are dated to any one year. They are manifestly casual impulses, brief sublimations. Three of them, She Weeps Over Rahoon, On the Beach at Fontana, and Alone, appeared in Poetry: A Magazine of Verse for November, 1917. She Weeps Over Rahoon, with its softly falling pattern, is the best piece in the little book. It is to be suspected that this tiny booklet is a cleaning-up of unconsidered trifles, that it marks the end of Joyce's appearance as a poet, that his poetry hereafter will be found (as most of it has been found in the past) imbedded in his prose.

Black Stream. By Nathalie Sedgwick Colby. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

New York society, if one is to believe Edith Wharton and Nathalie Colby, is dark and turbid. The material of Mrs. Colby's book has points of resemblance to "Twilight Sleep." But where Edith Wharton's style flows along lucidly and naturally, Mrs. Colby's is choked by an impressionism that is sometimes interesting, but more often artificial. In "Black Stream" Jim Brazee juggles with Wall Street for the greater glory of his adventuress of a wife, and Dr. Farraday sacrifices his research work and cultivates a fashionable practice that his oldest daughter may buy herself a prince. Lust, greed, and pride of power move most of the characters in the novel. The ugly pessimism of ignoble desires underlies it, rather than the beautiful pessimism of defeated aspirations.

Knock Four Times. By Margaret Irwin. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

Here is a whimsical tale of London's Greenwich Village, of Celia from an impeccable, conventional family, of Dicky, a young writer with an impossible Greek name who afterwards becomes world-famous. The book is populated with struggling young artists who throw so many parties and behave in such a charming, scatter-brained way that one wonders when they do their work in the world. The love affair of Celia and Dicky is light, gay, irresponsible, and never comes to fruition. Style and atmosphere are correspondingly kittenish. A twist at the end of the book links it neatly to the beginning in a short-story manner. Indeed, "Knock Four Times" would have made an excellent short story if weeded out and compressed. As it stands, it has too much meat on its delicate bones.

Women and the Miners' Lock-Out. By Marion Phillips. London: Labour Publishing Company. 2/6.

Every industrial conflict has its unsung heroes and heroines. This little book is a graphic account of the part women played in the great miners' strike in England. Organized into committees throughout the length and breadth of England, these women raised money to feed and clothe the wives and children of miners. In every imaginable manner, from house-to-house collections to the selling of miners' lamps at auction, was money painfully but persistently collected for relief purposes. Dr. Phillips has given a helpful recitation of how the domestic side of a great economic battle must be handled.

The author's constant attempt to weave glamor around his subject is not over-successful; and neither the fact that Jacques Cœur has been compared with Joan of Arc nor that he died fighting in the crusades makes him worthy to appear in a full-dress book.

Music

Music and Its Re-creation

SINCE music is known and meant to be known only through performance, real or imagined, performance itself has grown in importance as its technique has grown in power. Thus, a sufficiently competent conductor can make spurious stuff sound all but genuine, and this only because his command of re-creative technique enables him to create an appearance, in the music, of the significance which the technique would ordinarily be used to emphasize in good music. Occasionally, then, performances of good music or bad are notable, not only for their service to the music, but for the light they throw upon the entire art of re-creating music.

Whatever music conveys it conveys through sound which is articulated by rhythm—i.e., by durations of time and stresses—very much as color is articulated by lines or outlines. The lines or outlines constitute a design in space, the durations and stresses a design in time which, because it is more extended and complicated, and because it is intangible and is revealed in motion, is more difficult to grasp—the design, say, of a phrase which repeats or adds to itself to produce a larger and larger design, or musical form.[1]

It is, then, the job of the performer who actually produces the sounds to make evident the design in which they are arranged, which he does by emphasis, i.e., by distortions of the given durations of time, and by changes of loudness, both similar to those in speech. Where, as in the first movement of Brahms's Fourth, the music does not permit much change in speed, the performer relies on change of loudness; on the other hand, Mengelberg's performance of the first movement of Brahms's Third demonstrates the power, perhaps even the greater power, of change of speed.[2] Within a single phrase he extends the durations of some notes to make the outline of the phrase more definite, of others to indicate the transition to the next phrase, or of the entire set to indicate that it is a more emphatic repetition of the phrase preceding. And having established a slower tempo in this way he retains it as the tempo (to be modified within phrases) of the transitional passage which leads to a new section in a still slower tempo. With this procedure he seems to carve out the shape of the movement as nobody else seems able to do.

On the other hand, the performer may emphasize the mere movement of music,[3] using the changes of speed and loudness for this purpose. In this, their sweep, their waves of motion, lies the greater effectiveness for ordinary listeners of Stokowski's performances of the same Brahms symphonies. And it is a measure of Mengelberg's artistic stature that, incapable of this easy effectiveness, he can instead give interest to the inner logic of the music. He plays the first movement of the Fourth Symphony in a tempo that shocks one at first with its uncustomary deliberateness, unrelieved until a slight but doubly potent acceleration at the end; but holds one taut as he fills out the structural design. This for the first time, one feels, is the authentic Brahms style, superficially ineffective in its sobriety and architectural solidity; this is great performance, to reveal in such a style its own inherent effectiveness and power. And his, therefore, were the most notable and memorable performances of the seasons in which they were given.

[1] This, however, should be noted: that design can exist without color as a line drawing, but that rhythm has only a limited effect apart from sound. For example, the significance of a rhythm that is repeated—the mere recognition of the fact that it is repeated—depends on the two series of pitches articulated by the repeated rhythm, and varies according to whether the two are identical, slightly different, or entirely different. We have here a reciprocal relation best illustrated by an extreme example: pages of Mozart's or Beethoven's piano compositions are no more than a few chords that would not hold attention if they were not broken up and spaced out in the form of rapid figuration, the rhythmic figures of which in turn would not hold attention if they were not differentiated by the notes of the chords. Here I can only allude to the bearing of all this upon music like Antheil's "Ballet Mécanique," which for its purpose uses only a limited number of noises in rhythmic patterns.

[2] One can try for oneself the experiment of omitting the changes of loudness but retaining the changes of speed: one will hear every change of loudness as an implication of the change of speed. And Moiseiwitsch, in a performance of Chopin's B flat minor Sonata, achieves a shattering climax by manipulating time values up to a final distended tempo that implies twice as much force as the sounds actually have.

[3] Since completing the article I have found that Frank Howes, in "The Borderland of Music and Psychology," calls attention to "the close connection between emotion, bodily movement, and the movement of music."

Now a conductor only makes more evident what is already present in the music and, to this extent, self-evident; and even in this he starts with directions from the composer telling him what to emphasize and how. But his technique, like that of the actor, is not exact or approximately exact reproduction; it is deliberate, if discriminating, distortion. Most of his activity consists in repeating a fairly large but nevertheless limited number of accepted masterworks. With each repetition of such a work he feels the insufficiency of previous performances, his own and other conductors': even the same structural relations must be indicated more clearly, and there are newly perceived relations to indicate. Eventually he reaches the point reached, say, by Mengelberg with the Brahms symphonies: he reveals everything there is to be revealed, and makes it as clear as it can be made. But there is no stopping; and going further he obscures the total design with too many details underscored too heavily; and so he ends by ruining the performance as, again, Mengelberg has ruined his performance of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony. At this point the maximum of effect is achieved by a reversion to the minimum of means; and the listener's ear is held by the simplicity and sublety of say, a Karl Muck.

Oyez, Oyez, Oyez

THE young season has not yet revealed any new masterpieces of dramatic literature or even any plays likely to be singled out as rich in that rather plentiful commodity called promise, but it has, on the other hand, been more than usually prolific in "hits." Musical shows aside, there are already at least half a dozen productions intended to entertain the more intelligent and less completely exhausted sort of tired business man; they are pretty certain to go on for many months to come, and another—perhaps the best of the lot—has just made its appearance at the National Theater under the title of "The Trial of Mary Dugan." The author is the same Bayard Veiller who made history in the show shops fifteen years ago when "Within the Law" not only set the tone of the crook play but started Jane Cowl on the road to fame, and though it would not do to say that fifteen years have either deepened Mr. Veiller's vision of life or in any way affected the aims of his writing, those years have increased rather than diminished that grasp of popular psychology and that sense for theatrically effective construction which, taken together, make the fortune of the commercial playwright. Few men retain for more than a decade the trick of writing popular successes, but "The Trial of Mary Dugan" seems as good as "Within the Law" once seemed, and since audiences, even if they are no wiser, are at least quite a little more sophisticated than they were in 1912, that means that it is really a good deal better.

Mary is a Follies girl accused of the murder of her "sugar daddy." She has really been his mistress, though that was only in order to supply money for the education of a younger brother who has always thought that he had been left a legacy and—but why tell a gaudily preposterous story when the whole effect of the play depends upon the fact that the spectator becomes so absorbed in the way in which it is told that he forgets to care whether or not it would be credible in any other form? Mr. Veiller has chosen, to begin with, a novel form. His entire action takes place in the court room, the duration of the play is identical with the duration of the trial, the entre-acts are only reasonably managed recesses, and even the doorman wears a badge and swings a billy in order to promote the illusion. Reinhardt turned the theater into a cathedral; why should not Mr. Veiller turn it into a supreme court? Such an initial conception is, however, only a beginning; the author's skill is far more impressively demonstrated in his working out of the idea, for not only has he taken full advantage of the dramatic opportunities naturally afforded by the form of a trial but he has, in addition, been remarkably fertile in devising all sorts of unexpected turns of events and in managing various surprising eruptions of action which might conceivably interrupt the formalized procedure of the court. Doubtless it is only in a judge's nightmare than any trial was ever marked by so many unusual incidents or ever ended with the revelation that the attorney for the defense really committed the murder; doubtless any decorum-loving judge who ever had the misfortune to preside over such a trial would, unless he were himself first carried shrieking to Bellevue, sentence all the parties concerned to be boiled in oil or to suffer whatever other penalty he could devise as a fitting punishment for proceedings so little in accord with the sacred atmosphere of the courtroom; but the important fact is that Mr. Veiller has made everything acceptable by the skill with which it has been handled and in particular by adroitly following the sound melodramatic principle that if you can win the confidence of an audience by a reasonable beginning the limit to what it can be made to accept as the action proceeds is set only by the amount of tension which can be generated.

"The Trial of Mary Dugan" is superb melodrama which makes, so it seems to me, but one mistake. Perhaps it would have been just as well to fasten the murder upon someone a little less unlikely and hence, in melodrama, a little more unsuspected, than the attorney for the defense. It is true that by the time the revelation is made the audience is excited enough to believe anything, but the fact remains that this particular turn follows the pattern of the mystery play a little too closely, that it is—well, too expectedly unexpected, too tritely novel. That, however, is a very minor point and is much more than made up for by the fact that Mr. Woods, the producer, has given the play one of those unstinted productions which astute managers make when they are perfectly sure they will get their money back. Rex Cherryman is a sympathetic young brother, Ann Harding is so blondly tearful that only a professional prosecutor could possibly imagine her guilty, and Cyril Keightly (as the attorney for the defense) is admirable as one of those handsome, gentlemanly men who speak such good English that most audiences of the sort one finds in New York are secretly pleased to have him turn out not all that he should be.

No less adroit in its own way and destined to hardly less of popular success is the highly entertaining and suavely scabrous comedy "The Command to Love" (Longacre Theater). It deals with some of the embarrassments suffered by a young French military attaché at the court of Spain whose chief function is to make love to the more influential Spanish ladies and who is expected to serve his country jusqu'au (petit) mort. It skates continually over thin ice and, occasionally breaking through, it falls—if the paradox be permissible—into hot water. But though translated from the German it is all that "French farce" is generally supposed to be but so seldom is. Nothing more amusingly or tastefully indelicate has been seen here in some time. Basil Rathbone is the patriotic lover and Mary Nash, who gives perhaps the best performance of her career, is so seductive a lady that she makes his duty a pleasure.

For a series of special Tuesday and Thursday matinees the Grand Street Follies company is presenting at the Little Theater "Lovers and Enemies," a tragi-comedy by Artzybasheff previously known in translation simply as "Enemies." It is an interesting piece and would be worth seeing, even if for no other reason, on account of one magnificent piece of acting by Leo Bulgakov and another, almost as remarkable, by Eva Condon.

by Paxton Hibben.

The biographical sensation of the year is this powerful study of America's most striking man of religion. About his spectacular figure has centered much speculation and doubt, and Mr. Hibben, pursuing an elaborate psychological method, reveals him as a figure somehow heroic, infinitely tragic and everlastingly human. DID MAYOR THOMPSON ask King George's permission to run for Mayor of Chicago? Did a French presidential candidate ever go to Berlin to see if he was regarded with favor? And how would American editors comment if Mr. Cosgrave publicly went to London for advice and approval before conducting a campaign in Ireland? They would hoot at him. And they should hoot at the present spectacle in Nicaragua and Washington. General McCoy is on the spot, preparing for an "honest election," with United States Marines supervising the free expression of Nicaraguan opinion all the way from registration to vote-casting. Ex-President Chamorro has done the natural thing under the circumstances. He has gone to Washington frankly to "seek permission to run for President of Nicaragua." The New York Herald-Tribune's Washington bureau reports cryptically that

> This government is not going to say that any man shall not run for the Presidency in Nicaragua. However, it will not recognize any man elected who is unable to qualify under the Nicaraguan constitution. General Chamorro was former President of the Republic and it is alleged [by the State Department] he is ineligible for President under the Nicaraguan constitution.

When one recalls what the Marines did to the last man whom Washington refused to recognize the cryptic report loses its obscurity. We will not say that any man shall not run for the Presidency, but if a man we do not like is elected we will not "recognize" him—we will merely disarm his soldiers, seize and dump his arms into the river, and declare "neutral zones" wherever opposition troops are in danger of attack. Will Rogers only mildly exaggerates when he says "if necessary the marines would do a little voting on the side themselves."

WHAT IS NEWS? It's an old question and there are many answers. We offer this sample of the foreign correspondence of the Associated Press, culled from its setting, between the fight films and a bomb plot, on the front page of the New York World:

> In the white uniform of a nurse, with the red cross on her forehead and chest, the "slim gray Princess," as the Rumanians call her, makes a striking figure of beauty, benevolence, and benignity, her beautiful bobbed blond hair growing in such profusion that it covers even her sad, blue eyes and her deep dimples.

DREADFUL NEWS comes out of New York. One hundred per cent Americanism and the bolshevik menace are a drug on the market. Please don't take our word for it, for we have high authority for this calamitous state of affairs. It was Mrs. George E. Owens, the president of the Government Club in New York who rose and said to the members of her club: "This year you won't hear anything about the red menace. It is a horrible commentary, but women seem to be fed up with patriotism and bored by talk of our nation's security. This year we are going to stress municipal government." And so this loyal and devoted club, which since its foundation has been devoting all its precious energies to the combatting of bolshevik ideas, the further restriction of the immigration which is "ruining" America, and the inculcation of aggressive Americanism in the public schools had to step down from this noble pedestal, and was compelled to spend an afternoon listening to the Commissioner of Parks of New York City denounce the Americans who scatter newspapers and trash all over the public parks. But their fall in the scale of true Americanism did not stop there. They actually let a full-fledged general come before them and advance the bolshevik idea that there should be no further amendments to the Constitution unless they are submitted in advance to all the people to be voted on in a nation-wide referendum. Only one thing revived our drooping spirits as we read of this happening. Mrs. Owens saved the day by denouncing the nation-wide efforts to save Sacco and Vanzetti, and demanded that "when citizens of the United States try to intimidate governors, judges, and juries, they should forfeit their citizenship." Fortunate the republic that has a Mrs. Owens still on guard!

LOUVAIN'S LIBRARY is being restored. Its destruction was deplored all over the world; Americans have been largely instrumental in rebuilding it. Yet because Cardinal Mercier, now dead and unable to speak for himself, agreed, during the stress of after-war emotion, to a certain inscription over the new building, Whitney Warren, the architect, refuses to have the inscription changed, even at the suggestion of the president of the Carnegie Foundation for International Peace, Nicholas Murray Butler. The inscription now reads: "Destroyed by Teutonic Fury; Restored by American Generosity." The bad taste of the second half of the sentence is hardly debatable—it is typically "American" to take all the credit for what may not be solely due to American efforts; and of the unwisdom of the first phrase there can be no question. Dr. Butler suggests the obvious emendation: "Destroyed by War." Destroyed by war—that it was. In war men do not think of rare books, of fine libraries, of priceless cathedral glass, any more than they consider human life. War is war. And peace should be permitted to be peace.

AFTER STRIKES lasting since April 1 the miners in the bituminous coal-fields of Illinois and Iowa have won. Just what they have won is not so certain. The truce which was recently signed grants to the 72,000 miners in Illinois and the 9,000 in Iowa the same old wage scale. This is to last until February 7. In the meantime it is hoped that a joint commission will have discovered some plan that will be acceptable to both sides. But if it does not, then what? If a suitable plan is not drafted by February 7, the coal miners will again face the choice between a six-months' strike or starvation wages. They will again have visions of the destitution that has prevailed in Illinois for months. Furthermore, it should be remembered that the miners in Ohio and Pennsylvania are still on strike and facing daily worse conditions. As long as the miners are forced to make separate truces like the ones in Iowa and Illinois they will be faced with the possibility, if not probability, of more strikes and tie-ups. There is no local solution. The chaos that has prevailed in the bituminous coal industry throughout the summer, which still exists in Ohio and Pennsylvania, is ample evidence that something far more thoroughgoing than these simple truces is required.

A CENTURY OF SANCTUARY in the United States having been rudely broken by the World War, the non-resistant sect of Mennonites has been compelled to seek refuge elsewhere. In Paraguay they have found their new paradise, and more than a hundred thousand are expected to migrate there within the next few years. The Paraguayan Government has been generous in its protection of and concessions to these new citizens. A charter has been granted the Mennonites which provides, among other things, for complete and perpetual immunity from military duty and exemption from participation in a war, even as non-combatants; the Mennonites are also to be relieved from the obligation of taking an oath. They are to be permitted to have their own churches and schools conducted in their own language—German; they are to be exempted from all national and municipal taxes, immigration laws, and tariffs—in short, the Government of Paraguay is making a gesture of welcome, without any strings to it. In this year of grace, with echoes of war persecution still ringing in our ears, these unheeded protests of religious objectors to military service [illegible] A description of the three-million-[illegible] > uncultivated prairies and meadows into a paradise. There are all resources for the creation of wealth, coupled with the most wonderful climate which can be found anywhere on the globe.

Which, except for the extravagance about the climate, might have been written of our own Mississippi Valley a century ago. In those days we, too, had not yet learned that every man who has scruples against killing in war must be a lying blackguard, a coward, and a murderer, obviously desirous of overthrowing the Government of the United States.

WE CHARGED GOVERNOR FULLER of Massachusetts, in our issue of August 17, with having demonstrated his inability to rise above class and political prejudice as early as the red hysteria of 1919. He was then a member of Congress from Massachusetts, and in the debates over the expulsion of Representative Victor Berger he violently attacked "the red scum of Europe," "the wolves of anarchy," "the enemies within," and "the whole brood of anarchists, bolsheviks, I.W.W.s., and revolutionaries." We stated that he had called for the "execution of the whole scum and brood." This was a misquotation, and we owe Governor Fuller an apology for it. We based our statement on an apparent quotation from his speech reported in the New York Evening World of August 8. The World, in condensing a statement sent out from the Socialist Party headquarters, made a confusion of terms and substituted the word "execution" for "crucifixion." Governor Fuller did not suggest execution. He demanded "the crucifixion of disloyalty, the nailing of sedition to the cross of free government, where the whole brood of anarchists, bolsheviks, I.W.W.s, and revolutionaries may see and read a solemn warning," and the context shows that by "crucifixion" he meant such action as the expulsion of Berger. But the whole speech proves his complete lack of judicial quality.

THE UNITED STATES is the workers' paradise, according to figures taken from the Monthly Labor Review of the Department of Labor. That is to say, skilled union labor in this country receives wages that would make most European workers in a corresponding job faint with surprise. In New York City for an eight-hour day in the current year bricklayers receive $14, carpenters $12, painters $14, plasterers $14, plumbers $12, and the humble and once derided hod-carrier $9. Compare these figures, which are by no means an indication that workers in these respective occupations are rolling in wealth, with figures in other parts of the world; in Great Britain in 1924—and there is no reason to suppose that since that time wages have been greatly increased—workers in building and allied industries received for an eight-hour-day approximately $2.40. Bricklayers in Brazil in 1927 receive a daily wage of from $1.53 to $2.36; carpenters in Japan in October, 1926, were paid $.91 daily, plasterers $1.42, bricklayers $1.63, and painters $1.69; for an eight-hour day in Latvia carpenters now receive $.86, masons $1.11, and skilled building-workers an average of $1.08; in Warsaw masons are paid $.99 for an eight-hour day and carpenters $.96. It is plain to one who knows America that carpenters' wages here are not twelve times as large in purchasing value as wages in Poland, but it would be difficult to make a Polish carpenter believe it. And allowing for the difference in price levels, the American standard of living is so much higher as to justify envy among workers in other countries.

WHEN THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MANUFACTURERS starts gunning against child labor the battle is half won. That stalwart band of hard-boiled contributors to Republican campaign funds, having gloriously defeated the child-labor amendment to the federal Constitution, have now come out with a "program for the further protection of employed children fourteen and fifteen years of age." This amazing and encouraging document demands a medical examination of working children, a minimum sixth-grade educational requirement, provision for continuation schools, a 48-hour week, and no work after 9 p. m. The National Child Labor Committee hails the program as "one of the most important events" in that field for many years. It would, of course, like more—it wants a specified eight-hour-day and six-day-week, an earlier closing hour, and an eighth-grade minimum. But it hails the program as evidence that public opinion against child labor has worked through into the citadels of industry. And it is ready to cooperate with the manufacturers in an aggressive campaign to realize their program. Only six States (Illinois, Iowa, New York, Ohio, Oregon, and Wisconsin) now have legislation measuring up to the manufacturer's standards. Seventeen do not require physical examination of children applying for work permits; 19 do not require the completion of the sixth grade; 21 have no continuation-school law; 13 permit more than a 48-hour week for factory children between 14 and 16 years; while 32 States permit children to work in factories before seven in the morning and 5 after nine o'clock at night. What will the manufacturers do to realize their program?

THAT A GOOD JUDGE ought to be reelected regardless of his party is accepted today in both major political camps of New York City, and the fact is another evidence that political progress is not impossible. But recently a new limitation has been set on this principle—the Democrats and Republicans are fighting to defeat Judge Jacob Pancken for reelection as Judge of the Municipal Court. He is a Socialist, elected in 1917, and it seems that the party truce does not apply to Socialists—although at one time the Republicans, weak in his district, talked of making him their candidate in order to defeat the Democrats. "The poor man's court" does not often get judges of Mr. Pancken's caliber; it is one of the easily-awarded political plums. But Judge Pancken has given it distinction. He has cleared his courtroom of "steerers" and other parasites; he has talked to witnesses in their own foreign languages and made them feel at home; he has adjourned court again and again in order to inspect tenant-homes in rent cases which came before him. Despite his avowed sympathy for the underdog, he has won such a reputation for fairness that landlords have suggested his name as arbiter in difficult cases. The municipal courts need such men, and party considerations ought to play no part in choosing them. That a group of nonpartisan lawyers is supporting him is encouraging.

NO MORE IMPORTANT ART EVENT can occur here this winter than the return after twenty-eight years of Jacob Epstein, the sculptor, to America his native country, and the exhibition of some fifty of his works in New York and, we hope, other cities. Mr. Epstein is another of those products of free immigration, which, as every patrioteer proclaims, has done such infinite harm to us as a nation and to our standing in the world. For a quarter of a century he has been living in London and hypnotizing the English art world into declaring him to be, as the Manchester Guardian puts it, an "artist of deep and curious genius." Under the spell of that belief his work has been purchased not only for the British national collection, for the Tate Gallery and the Manchester, Glasgow, Dundee, and other municipal collections, but he has been commissioned to make portrait busts of Joseph Conrad, Admiral "Jack" Fisher, Ramsay MacDonald, C. P. Scott, the Duchess of Hamilton, Lady Gregory, and other distinguished persons. True, there have been discordant voices, as when his memorial to W. H. Hudson was erected in Hyde park—good, old-fashioned, British protests against anything so unconventional and original. Now he is back on the spot where his Russian-Polish parents landed from the Old World. So far America has let him see by its indifference that it knows how to treat him. We wonder if this superior attitude will be maintained or whether America can be induced to forego its prejudices long enough to follow British example and honor a man who as much as any other living has convinced England that art did not die with the last century.

THE ACTION OF JUDGE KNOX in refusing to hear "experts" testify to the literary value of John Herrmann's novel "What Happens," 300 copies of which, coming from France some months ago, had been seized by the customs authorities as obscene matter, in a sense does not disturb us. We heartily wish that the book were allowed to circulate, as now it is not to be, but we do not recognize "experts" in such cases. We look to the time when any book whatever may be allowed to find its audience without interference from the courts. Meanwhile we should like to spare such citizens as Messrs. Broun, Mencken, and Hansen the embarrassment of having to stand before a jury and speak as if their personal judgment were relevant to the right of books to live. In another sense, however, the refusal of a judge to hear an author's contemporaries attest the value of his work is highly regrettable at this stage of the war against censorship. The courts have a ruling that the classics are admissible, however obscene, because the verdict of the ages is in their favor. But how is a living writer to prove that his books are admissible if his own age first of all does not have a chance to approve or disapprove? The law here is not only unfair but foolish, and we hope that counsel for Mr. Herrmann and those who come after him will be able to make this clear.

THE RIGHT OF BOOKS to be read by high-school seniors is being decided in Grand Rapids, Michigan, by parents and officials. Albert Marckwardt, teacher in a Grand Rapids high school, asked his class in English to review George Jean Nathan's "Land of the Pilgrim's Pride." The mother of one of the girls saw the book at home, and protested to the superintendent, which led to Mr. Marckwardt's disappearance from the Grand Rapids school system. The offending section of Mr. Nathan's book dealt with the thing once celebrated by The Nation as "Our Changing Morality"—a thing upon which Mr. Nathan, ironically enough, has Tory views, though he speaks plainly in expressing them. For that matter, many of the students may have had Tory views which their parents would be happy to hear. In the interests of "morality" these, it appears, are not to be expressed at all.

Mexico's Election

MEXICO has been repeating her blood-stained history. Another revolution has died aborning; several score of rebels, "court-martialled" in the fields where they were captured, have been shot dead, and the election of 1928 seems to have been decided with guns.

It isn't pretty. It is Mexico. And, since the issue had to be fought with guns, one may as well be glad that the Calles-Obregon group won. It is, of course, nonsense to suppose that the electoral campaign could have been fought with Anglo-Saxon parliamentary rules. When, four years ago, President—or General, for all presidents in Mexico are generals—Obregon paved the way for his friend Calles to succeed him, Mexico came nearer to having a real election than she had ever come before; but even Boss Tweed would have chuckled at some of the things that happened.

This year Mexico was approaching the electoral battle with three leading candidates. In the Calles camp there was no one but Obregon strong enough for the succession. It required tinkering with the constitution to open the way, for in 1917 the revolutionaries had prescribed that no man might sit twice in the Presidency. The memory of the long dictatorship of Diaz was then still strong in men's memories, and the constitution-makers pathetically hoped that a legislative phrase could change Mexico. It is a tribute to President Calles, and to the progress really effected in the sixteen years since Mexico's revolution began, that neither Obregon nor Calles has sought to succeed himself directly as President. They have tampered with the constitution only in a Rooseveltian sense, altering it to permit a second term but only after an interval. So Obregon, who has not always seen eye to eye with President Calles but stands on the whole for the same progressive agrarian policy, became the government candidate this year. Calles did not openly support him, but his attitude was well understood, and some of the generals who supported his rivals found themselves shifted to more modest positions.

His opponents campaigned on a platform of high-minded devotion to the principle of "No reelection," but no one suspected that their affection would survive a personal test. Both were military men pure and simple. Arnulfo Gomez, long military governor of Vera Cruz, used to boast that he had executed more "criminals" than any other governor in Mexico. He was a famous strike-smasher; and it was generally believed that foreign oil companies in Vera Cruz were contributing to his campaign funds. In his electoral platform he included, along with "No reelection," a plea for religious freedom, by which he meant amending the constitution to favor the Catholic Church; "collaboration of classes," by which he meant abandoning Mexico's attempt at a modern labor code; and "non-retroactivity of Article 27" of the constitution, by which he seemed to mean all that any American oil company, or even Mr. Kellogg, could wish.

Francisco Serrano was a better man. He was long Obregon's chief of staff, and, although only 35, had the reputation of being one of the ablest military strategists in Mexico. Unfortunately he also had the reputation of being one of the heaviest grafters in a country cursed with Doheny standards. His administration of the Federal District was said to be extremely remunerative. Before Obregon decided to run for office again himself, Serrano was regarded as his candidate—and the history of Obregon's rise from small land-owner in Sonora to one of Mexico's wealthiest men does not make the alliance seem strange.

Gomez and Serrano—they acted as partial allies—knew they could not go far without resort to force. Despite the Catholic unrest and the local feuds they had little mass support. Neither of them was in a position to attack official corruption or military rule, the twin curses of Mexico; and their objection to reelection would have come with better grace from men who had made some attempt to develop democratic institutions in the territories which they governed. At any rate, instead of attempting a popular appeal—which would, indeed, have been quixotic in present-day Mexico—they plotted among the myriads of ambitious generals who infest every province of Mexico. Probably they did not intend to take the field so soon—certainly their effort at rebellion proved dismally ill-prepared—but, apparently, the reaction to General Serrano's charge that Obregon was responsible for the murder of Carranza in 1920 made it necessary to act now or never. Gomez took the field in Vera Cruz; Serrano persuaded a portion of the garrison of the capital to join him in an effort to oust Calles.

They failed. Within forty-eight hours Serrano and thirteen of his aides had been captured and shot; and Gomez is fighting for his life in the mountains of Vera Cruz. The local military commanders proved unexpectedly loyal to Calles, and the Associated Press correspondent in Mexico says that "everywhere" Calles is being called "the strongest man Mexico has produced since the days of Porfirio Diaz."

The praise is too true for our taste. Calles is strong—undoubtedly—and certainly Mexico has never had a strong man who used his strength so frequently for his nation's good. His support, colored though it has often been by minor political fluctuations, of the great movements of agrarian reform, mass education, labor emancipation, and conservation of natural resources, his rigid opposition to the attempts of American capital to interfere with Mexico's domestic legislation, have commanded our enthusiastic support. The suddenness and violence of his anti-clerical movement, and the extremes of his anti-Catholic legislation, seemed to us to go beyond the necessities; and this business of assassinating one's political opponents, deep as it may be rooted in Mexican tradition, is to us wholly indefensible.

The Indian has held his ground in Mexico as nowhere else on this Continent, and one cannot explain Mexico merely in terms of Spanish colonialism and American contiguity. The tom-tom still beats in the Sonora mountains, and in the hearts of many of the "strong men" who have come down from the North to govern in Mexico City. Government there betrays its primitive origin in war. The patterns of European democracy and parliamentarism have not sunk as deep as we had fondly hoped. The election of 1928 will be an expression of the will of the people only in so far as the people in indirect ways have affected the success and strength of the successful group of generals. Obregon and Calles won the battles because they commanded the support of the majority of the lesser generals; but it has become true in Mexico that every general feels compelled to proclaim revolutionary ideals, and fears to fight against the growingly self-conscious peasantry.

Text: The World's Series

FROM presidents and other preachers, America has seldom lacked congratulations upon current idealism and earnest propulsion toward further sacrificial triumphs. Unfortunately, local and foreign cynics have complained that specific instances of our national unselfishness were a little obscure and remote. Help has just come from a quarter once despised. Baseball, the national game, has gilded the national honor in a manner to make the world blink with surprise and pleasure. A commercialized sport has proved beyond quibble its immediate, scrupulous honesty. By winning the championship in four straight games the Yankees have removed the reproach that New York is a metropolis given over wholly to thoughts of gain. The owners of the contending clubs will be compelled to return more than $200,000 because of the expeditious manner in which the series came to a finish.

It is easy enough to say that this is no more than common honesty and that to prolong the contest would be rank knavery. Yet even in amateur sport, in lawn tennis, for instance, a winning competitor has been known to let down under the theory that his ultimate triumph may be the more certain if he loafs a little and allows his adversary to take a set at the price of exhausting effort. Dwelling wholly in the shadowy domain of good tactics, the executive forces of the New York American League baseball club might have said, "We will save our best pitcher for a fifth game and try to win with a less gifted performer."

Granted all the good will in the world, it is hard for any organization to put forward its best efforts to achieve financial disaster. To return money already in hand closely approaches the heroic. Before the crucial struggle began all cynics said "There will, of course, be seven games, or six at the very least. Professional promoters cannot be expected to neglect the opportunity of harvesting dollars in great number." Yet when the day of the fourth game dawned bleak and chill Miller Huggins, manager, chose Wilcy Moore, the best man available, to turn back the Pittsburgh Pirates and check the flow of gold into the respective box offices. Wilcy bore down and with his "sinker" saved the honor of the pastime.

Further analysis will show that the baseball series bloomed throughout with moral lessons. The Epworth League could have furnished no greater number of shining texts in celebration of good conduct. Possibilities of international cooperation were made manifest and even the most casual examination of the box score shows the fallacy of those who hold that it is impossible for the United States to assimilate the foreigner. Grabowski, Lazerri, Koenig, Groh, Cvengros, Miljus, and Gehrig—all these are names to shake the confidence of believers in exclusion. And it is not too much to hope that hundred percenters may have observed the fact that the final play of the series occurred when a Serbian threw wildly in his effort to deceive an Italian, thereby permitting a Kentucky mountaineer to come home with the winning run. Whether or not the fact is of political importance, it might be added that Babe Ruth, the hero of the contest, is not only of German ancestry but most flagrantly a Catholic.

In these baseball games between New York and Pittsburgh the old familiar battle of democracy against autocracy was waged again. It was the democrats who took the four straight games. Miller Huggins of the Yankees is reckoned as a liberal among the martinets of the big leagues. Unlike other managers he imposes no curfew hour, and few training rules. Often he permits a player to think for himself. Donie Bush, the Pittsburgh leader, is classed with the little Napoleons. Under his regime it is no portion of an outfielder's privilege to reason why. The brilliant Kiki Cuyler asked to have his place in the batting order changed, and Bush, forgetting the inalienable right of petition, benched him. He was on the wood, as the players say, all through the series and watched lesser men perform in his place. Eagerly the multitude espoused the cause of the exiled athlete, and once in Pittsburgh 60,000 spectators joined in a great chorus of "We want Cuyler." Bush remained obdurate in the face of this clear mandate of the multitude. To him a popular referendum was less than nothing and when the people asked him for Cuyler he gave them Brickell.

If the strategy of the manager had succeeded we would probably have been told that Mussolini had the right idea. Dictatorship always inspires admiration as long as it seems to work. But this time it failed. And in four straight games!

Tariff Tangles

AT last with the publication of the recent tariff notes exchanged between Paris and Washington there are signs that some good may come of the whole controversy. There are indications that the present Franco-American squabble may force the great minds in the State Department to think the tariff problem through, something which their shallow and inconsistent statements would indicate they have not yet done. Already President Coolidge and Secretary Kellogg are worrying over the weak position in which the French notes have put the American case for high protectionism. And what the French notes have not done Assistant Secretary Lowman has, in his public statements that the higher the French rates went the higher we would push the American rates, under the provisions of Article 317—thus showing that we have a "reciprocity" clause in our tariff act and that Secretary Kellogg was either unfamiliar with it or trying to conceal it. Clearly, Article 317 embodies the reciprocity principle as much as do the European treaties, with the great difference that the European countries use the reciprocity treatment for bargaining while we use it as a penalizing measure.

So the tariff experts of the Coolidge Administration are scurrying away from the boomerang effects brought upon the entire Republican tariff scheme. The notes of Secretary Kellogg, which were intended to convince the world of the inherent righteousness of high American trade barriers, have done nothing of the sort. Rather they have shown with remarkable clearness (considering that it was done unintentionally) that the Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act is inconsistent not only with a peaceful foreign trade but also with itself. Even the New York Herald-Tribune, in an editorial that cannot be described as other than treason in the innermost citadel of protection, has turned against the Fordney-McCumber Act. This change is decidedly encouraging and shows that economic truth is mighty and will prevail. With astonishing rapidity the Administration has executed a volte face, hoping thereby to settle the dispute quietly before Congress meets and to prevent it from assuming sufficient proportions to become a campaign issue. The wailing protests and indignant lamentations that issued forth from Washington a few weeks ago have stopped; France is to be permitted to refund her $78,000,000 loan on a 6-per-cent basis, 2 per cent less than she is now paying. Official impudence is thus replaced by conciliation.

Yet it is difficult to believe that France will be so easily placated. The fundamental differences that started the dispute remain untouched. The fundamental fact is that our tariff wall is too high. For us merely to say that it is uniformly high for everyone and therefore theoretically non-discriminatory is so much nonsense. Yet it is to this point that our note of September 19 attributes much importance, totally ignoring the fact that the discrimination lies not so much in the uniformity of the rates as in the character of the goods so taxed. When the rates are excessively high on perfumes, cosmetics, and other products which go to make up a principal part of the French export trade to the United States, it is plainly France that is being discriminated against. In her note of September 30 France, citing logic and facts, made this point quite clear—clear enough for even our State Department to understand. French exports to the United States in 1913 were $136,877,990. Now, according to the French note, if one takes into account the world-wide rise in prices, the increase which dollar prices have undergone, and the new possibilities of French trade, the French exports to the United States in 1926 should have been $200,000,000. They were, however, only $152,030,000. This would seem to indicate a very serious restriction of French exports to the United States and a restriction fraught with serious consequences.

With France in the position of a debtor nation to the extent of over 25 billion gold francs there is only one way in which she can pay off her present debt and keep from going further into debt: by enlarging her exports. Since the French owe more to the United States than to any other nation, it is extremely short-sighted for us to restrict the one way she has of paying us. Practically the same may be said for the trade relations of Europe in general to the United States. To a very large extent at present Europe is able to buy only by borrowing from America, these sums running into billions of dollars each year. Though America may be temporarily benefiting by this situation, there are signs that the tide is turning. And as soon as American loans cease, European imports must fall and American industry will slump as a result. The natural reaction of Europe is evidenced by the recent Franco-German trade treaty in which each party grants special favors to the other. By extending similar reciprocity treaties Europe can seriously restrict American exports.

The United States may yet be forced to change the stubborn Fordney-McCumber [illegible] statement in the Herald-Tribune urges. It may be true, as Secretary Kellogg contends, that the reciprocity treaties of the European countries involve much negotiation and some discrimination. But what tariff system does not? What tariff system does not subordinate high principle to commercial advantage? Whether or not the present controversy results in a wholesome downward revision, it has at least done some service. It has brought the tariff [illegible] out into the open light, and there is nothing quite so unhealthy for specters as pure, unadulterated illumination.

Celluloid

SOME time ago a Broadway theater was given over to a movie version of "The Prodigal Son." The director who made this celluloid masterpiece was one of those hardy adapters who are sure that they can improve upon the work of any author even if he should be—as in this case he was—Jesus Christ himself, and so he set out to realize those possibilities of the story which had been muffed in the version hitherto considered the standard one. Since to him, as to any movie director, it was obvious that the simple statement that the erring young man "took his journey into a far country and there wasted his substance in riotous living" slurs over the only really effective action in the whole story, this phrase was quickly seized upon and elaborated con amore into such a highly colored picturization of night life in the oriental cabarets as Hollywood conceives it should have been. But the publicity man was not to be outdone by the director, and in order that the public should not be misled into staying away by any memories of the Sunday School he caused to be proclaimed in electric letters across the theater-front the interesting fact that the parable of the Prodigal Son is a story "Glorifying the Babylonian Girl."

Not even the movies often achieve such perfect bathos as this, but that is merely because they do not often have such a height from which to fall. Whatever story they may seize upon undergoes some change in the course of which whatever meaning it may once have had is perverted into the platitude, sentimentality, or carefully guarded lasciviousness which alone constitutes what is euphemistically called "available movie material," and the extent of the desecration involved depends entirely upon the original value of the thing desecrated, since the directors may be depended upon to do their worst. Here, for example, is a quotation from the press story which accompanies the picturization of "What Price Glory," and illustrates how a bitter satire on war can be made into "available movie material":

> Every soldier will tell you that he had a lot of fun out of the war. Ask any reminiscent veteran of the A. E. F. or some erstwhile gob of the U. S. N. and they will smile and say "betcha." But ask a leatherneck—and your answer will be "hot dog." . . . The comedy end of war was what impressed Winfred R. Sheehan, general manager of Fox Films, when the job of making a screen story of the Stallings-Anderson play was undertaken at Hollywood—and Sheehan knew because he was a sergeant in the U. S. A. . . . Then, Director Raoul Walsh took battle as a background, gave it plenty of clash and conflict, tragic touches, and pathetic pulses, but he let his soldier man overseas just have the time of his life—in which director Walsh was right and followed form. So laughter of the uproarious, deep-down kind is promised when the picture "What Price Glory" has its premiere at the Blank Theater.

We wonder what the original authors of the play think of this and we wonder still more when we remember that one of them was also the author of a novel called "Plumes," which had a bitter honesty about the war and refused to stoop to the claptrap devices of cheap laughter and of easy sentiment. The cinema has certainly made satire out of the old saying that "The camera can't lie," and the Hollywood school of cinema art has assuredly given new point to a modified version of another: "He who touches celluloid shall be defiled."

HENRY MENCKEN has been appraising, in the last few weeks, the artistic achievement of the Negro in America. "Not so much," is the substance of Mr. Mencken's verdict. The task of setting down to a penny-weight the ponderability of an individual contribution is difficult enough and a complete survey of the trophy room of a race falls beyond the powers of any critic. Naturally enough Mr. Mencken has overlooked a certain number of events.

Once, at the home of a Broadway star, we played the game of twenty questions and with the aid of only a small proportion of my allotment I narrowed the field down to the fact that the unknown person was living, American, and a practitioner in the arts. There I bogged for they said "No" when I mentioned literature, music, the graphic arts, and oratory. "There are no other arts," I pleaded and gave up, which earned me the lifelong enmity of my hostess.

"I suppose," she said with bitterness, "you never heard of the art of acting?" And to my amazement and indignation Walter Hampden turned out to be the name I was supposed to guess.

There was some justification for my failure to remember, but if one forgets that actors may be artists the fault lies partly with the players. They have thrown the word about with such indiscrimination that the definition of "artist" has been reduced to "everybody on a vaudeville bill except the trained seals."

However, they also serve who interpret, and Mr. Mencken errs when he omits from his catalogue the name of any Negro singer, orator, dancer, or actor. Surely there are half a dozen Negro concert performers who should be called "artist" even in a community chary in the use of the word. Probably Mr. Mencken is right when he says that at the moment there is no Negro composer, novelist, painter, or poet deserving the first rank. But Roland Hayes may not be brushed aside, nor Paul Robeson, nor Taylor Gordon. Indeed I would not limit my list to those who appear with serious intent in concert halls. One must look to the cabarets and varieties. If Raquel Meller is an artist then so are Clara Smith and Ethel Waters. And not to stress the point unduly "St. Louis Blues" is a ballad infinitely finer than anything which the Spanish woman ever consented to sing. "Feeling tomorrow just like I feel today" is a line worthy of any contralto's sob. And if monologists belong among the Lord's annointed I would like to put the late Charlie Case within the Hall of Fame.

But I am not competent to make any complete list of notable Negroes engaged in various interpretive arts. I would like to beg the question by a few degrees and discuss the artistic potentialities of the Negro in the mass rather than pick out certain individuals. History will not record the names of thousands of brown men and women in choirs, cabarets, and music halls. That they are all geniuses born to bawl unheard I do not say. My point is merely that the average aptitude of the Negro for musical interpretation far transcends that of the white. There used to be a saying among vaudeville patrons that no Negro act was ever wholly bad. Into any dark-skinned throng you may toss a piano or a banjo and be sure that there will be one to catch it and give you music. And in Harlem when the nights are not too white there will be spontaneous and amateur dancing of a sort to ravish the eye of any sculptor or painter.

There could be, perhaps there is, a Negro advance toward beauty conducted without the help of any very conspicuous leaders. Perhaps they charge like well ordered cavalry, huddled, knee to knee, all in a cluster. Not all the bluesey ballads which sweep the country now are African in origin. Henry Mencken has pointed out that the best of current mammy songs are composed by Jews. Still there was a Cole and a Johnson before the Gershwins and Berlins and surely the Negro has a right to take to his heart the continuous compliment of imitation which is tendered to him in popular music.

Mr. Mencken did not take up the difficulties which afflict the Negro artist. I do not speak of obvious and to some extent superficial things. When Hayes sang last in Detroit the house was thronged with carriage trade. Enraptured by his singing the audiences called ceaselessly for encores. Everybody applauded madly and a few whistled. But when the lights were down this man hailed by the multitude as a great artist found that his own coach must be a pumpkin shell. The Nordics of Michigan were wholly willing to tingle spinally while a Negro sang, but letting him into any hotel was something else again. I have never understood why it was supposed to be a casual thing to give a man some small piece of your immortal soul and terribly intimate to sit in the same dining room. But factors such as these, though monstrous, constitute no more than an annoyance in the pathway of the Negro artist. You cannot kill a talent by sowing it with salt.

Every now and then some Sunday magazine section digs out the story of the possibility of shaking down bridges and great buildings by some insistent vibration upon the violin. Whether mortar is actually so susceptible to music I do not profess to know but I have seen the whole edifice of white superiority totter when Roland Hayes sang "The Crucifixion."

The Negro musician escapes one reproach which dogs his brother novelist or poet. "This," the critic is fond of saying, "may be excellent propaganda but for that very reason it can't be art." To get enmeshed in the debate about the function of art and propaganda would be unfortunate. For my readers I mean. I merely want to make mild protest against the manner in which the Negro is often cut down by both the direct and richochet fire reviewers. When Countee Cullen puts into a poem the bitterness belonging to anyone who lives within a walled city, critics are likely to say that they wish the young man were less race conscious. It will be remarked that lyric fervor and a passion for reform team up indifferently. But there are times when Cullen changes his note and speaks of flowers wholly white and clouds and brooks and possibly a few trees. And when this happens he finds himself attacked upon a new flank and now the charge is that he has confused himself with Keats and Shelley and would do well to draw his themes from subjects more peculiarly Negroid. Allow a critic two assorted damns and he can handcuff any minstrel.

Mr. Mencken and many others feel that the Negro has had rather more than just treatment from the commentators. It was George Jean Nathan, as I remember, who voiced the theory that Bert Williams had been puffed far beyond his deserts as a stage comedian because he was a "colored man." I agree, but it is careless to assume there is any tonic quality in praise bestowed with condescension. The most punishing blow in the quiver of the critic is not the right hook to the jaw. It is the pat upon the head. Writers knocked down by reviewers have been known to rise again before the count of ten, but what can a man do if he is met by the comment, "Why that's really very good for a Negro." Most certainly the darker artists have not asked for critical opinions padded like gloves in training camp. Indeed I believe that they will and should welcome Mr. Mencken's articles because he has said in effect that he purposes to be no more kind to Negro authors than to any others. Some of our book sections have carried Jim Crow cars. Jim Crow remains Jim Crow even when the seats are plush and velvet. Almost I would be ready to depart in peace upon that morning when a musical critic writes, "Roland Hayes, the tenor," and not, as is the unbroken custom, "Roland Hayes, the Negro tenor."

It may be that artistic stature of the Negro is somewhat less than Henry Mencken has a right to expect but if this is so it should not be laid to natural perversity. He will grow faster when people cease to smile, and stoop, and blight him with, "There, there."

It seems to me that the reputation of Warren Gamaliel Harding suffers greatly at the hands of Nan Britton in "The President's Daughter." And to my mind the incident weighing most heavily against him concerns an evening upon which he offered to go out into the streets of New York and procure for Miss Britton a bottle of champagne. Mr. Harding was at this time the Republican nominee for President of the United States. But this is not the limit of his shame. Miss Britton reports that he came back after several hours and confessed that he could not get it.

Presidential Possibilities

I.

Charles Evans Hughes

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

The first in a series of studies of the candidates

"DO you recognize anything about this man Hughes as pertaining to the Hughes that you and I supported more enthusiastically and loyally than any Republican editors when he was Governor?" asked Frank I. Cobb of me the last time I met the lamented editor of the World. I replied that I could not recognize anything about him as belonging to the Hughes of the insurance investigation and the governorship. "Nor can I," said Mr. Cobb. So it is with two Hugheses that one has to deal today. That is not unusual in politicians; there were two Woodrow Wilsons and two or more Theodore Roosevelts. In this case, however, the two Hugheses are not coterminous. The one existed, withered, and died before the Secretary of State was born. It was during his service on the Supreme Court, apparently, that this metamorphosis took place. Must that august body shoulder the responsibility for it?

It is easy to recall the thrill that came to New York when Mr. Hughes was chosen to conduct the insurance investigation and speedily made it clear that he cared not at all where the chips might fly. He displayed at once courage, resourcefulness, mental quickness, the ability to meet any situation as it arose, and a genuine sense of dramatic values. At last, it appeared, New York had found a fearless man of extraordinary ability, the kind of uncompromising reformer for whom city and State had been longing. But not big-business circles. They were all but speechless with indignation. He was laying ruthless hands upon an old-established private business, interfering with customs of long standing, with the right of the heads of the insurance companies to line their pockets and to provide sinecures for all their relatives at the expense of the policy-holders. When he attacked men like the McCalls and McCurdys, pillars of the business world and of the Chamber of Commerce, he was striking at the very foundations of society. More than that, he stood early for greater interference of the State with private business—one of the deadliest sins. If the term Bolshevik had been invented then the business community would have applied it to Charles E. Hughes.

As it was he was declared to be a notoriety-seeker, ruled by political ambition, grossly unfair and unjust in his cross-examinations, which were, it was said, deliberately spectacular and sensational, without giving the other side a chance to get its case before the public with similar space and a similar newspaper "spread." If he was not accused of advocating free love, it was merely an oversight. The other side went so far as to send out bogus news of the inquiry, for printing which a number of our press champions of honesty in public life received a dollar a line. It was typical of the man that when he heard about it, he put some of those high-minded publishers on the stand, including those of the Boston Herald and St. Paul Pioneer Press, and proved the whole conspiracy. That was the way he fought, the way he inspired terror among his adversaries—and victims; and the way he fairly earned the governorship. The rotten Republican machine which, about as much as Tammany Hall, lived on the contributions of corporation magnates, traction-company highbinders, and business seekers after special favors, did not want him any more than they had wanted Theodore Roosevelt to be Governor in 1898. Public opinion made the Old Guard bosses swing to him; they saw he was a winning card, and he won.

He made an excellent Governor, clean-cut and challenging, and earned early the cordial dislike of the machine. Throughout his nearly four years he had to fight his own party associates in order to achieve the reforms he desired. The insurance bills were easily put through; the public-service commissions, which confirmed Wall Street's dislike of him, since they interfered with the exploiting of the city by the transportation companies, not so easily; the direct primary with still greater difficulty. It is an interesting fact that the public-service commissions have long since disappeared and that the direct primary has proved anything but the protection to the people it was hoped. Other Hughes reforms have proved to have been built on sand. But the hour seemed to call for them and they in turn gave every promise of achieving the desired reforms. Behind them he put resistless energy and determination, tireless industry, direct, forceful, and most effective public presentation of his views, the years being marked by a growing selfconfidence and personal power. Between Grover Cleveland and "Al" Smith no other Governor stands out as does Mr. Hughes. While far inferior to "Al" in his mastery of the public business—quite naturally, since he had had no such apprenticeship in Albany as the pride of Tammany Hall—he nevertheless wreaked himself upon it, and he received all the abuse which comes to a reformer who, among other things, stopped race-track gambling. He was holier-than-thou; he was "Charles the Baptist"; he was the "animated feather-duster"; he was a Pecksniff; he was that awful thing, a reformer with morals and principles.

Perhaps the greatest of his public services was his defeat, after his renomination, of William R. Hearst, then at the height of his noxious career. If Hearst had not been stopped then he would unquestionably have been a serious candidate for the Democratic Presidential nomination—indeed he had been in 1908. Mr. Hughes handled his adversary admirably, sparing his private life, while the Hearst newspapers piled one abuse after another upon the Governor. Fortunately, their ridicule and their bitterness did not avail. But one thing Mr. Hughes did dwell upon—the shameful way in which Hearst sought to avoid responsibility for reckless reporting and bold-faced libelling, by organizing one company within another for the purpose of dodging judgments, so that a litigant might sue for several years only to find out that the company he was suing was really not the owner of the particular Hearst paper in question at all. Mr. Hughes promised during the campaign to rectify that, and he did so; it is to him that we owe the law requiring newspapers to publish the names of their responsible owners and editors.

Reelected, Mr. Hughes went at his task with renewed vigor, with a ripening understanding of where the real enemy lay within his own party's ranks, and by 1910 he was well on his way to a position of complete dominance and control. To this it was my good fortune to make a contribution, in that I was able to publish the charges of bribe-taking against Senator Jotham P. Allds, then Acting Lieutentan Governor, which resulted in Allds's resigning just in time to avoid being expelled from the Senate. That session of the Legislature was entirely absorbed by the Allds trial, save for the necessary passing of the supply bills. It is just to add that it was in part due to Governor Hughes's counsel and aid—still in some respects unexplained even to me—that Allds's misconduct was brought into the open in what was probably the most sensational publication ever made in the old Evening Post. The Legislature adjourned, leaving Mr. Hughes with heightened prestige and power. It seemed as if he had at last arrived at the point where the Republican machine could be cleaned up once and for all. Suddenly, without the slightest warning, like a bolt from the blue, the Governor was laid by the heels and the whole structure built up during three and one-half laborious years collapsed; the old order came back.

The man who did this to Charles Evans Hughes and the State of New York and for all time ended Mr. Hughes's career as a militant reformer was the President of the United States, William H. Taft. He offered Mr. Hughes a seat upon the Supreme Court of the United States, and Mr. Hughes accepted. Mr. Hughes's Puritan conscience would not permit him to ask Mr. Taft to let his acceptance of the office remain a secret until he was ready to take office in October or December. The announcement was made in May, 1910, and at once Mr. Hughes's power left him as Samson was shorn of his by Delilah. The Legislature had adjourned; the Old Guard knew now that Hughes was done and that they had only a few months to wait before he got out. From that moment not a politician cared what the Governor did. It is a fact that Mr. Hughes was tired and worn after three and a half years of steady battling; that he was unduly depressed; that he had made up his mind not to run again for the Governorship. I have before me as I write a long letter in which he set forth the reasons, convincing to him, why he felt that he must accept. After seventeen years I am still unconvinced, and my position is confirmed by the fact that so much of the Governor's achievements went for naught. It is, in consequence, just about the same old Republican elephant we have to deal with, just about as spotted, but a little more respectable, a little less corrupt, and infinitely stupider, as witness its campaigns against "Al" Smith.

The years that passed while Mr. Hughes was on the Supreme Court profoundly affected him in more ways than one, but did not still his ambition. It was early made clear that Mr. Hughes would not say no to an attempt to call him back to political life from the highest bench in the land. Other jurists and lawyers in plenty might feel that it was a mistake to establish a precedent that politicians might go to the Supreme Court and lure therefrom a justice to stand in the public forum and bid for the favor of the populace. Mr. Hughes felt differently, and his nomination filled with high hopes many who had fought under his banner in his active years. But it soon appeared that this was not the same man at all, that it was a changeling who wore the name. His campaign lacked inspiration, issues, and fire; it lacked conviction. It in no wise conformed to what he at first said privately that it was going to be. There was nothing whatever of the militant reformer about him, and his tactlessness in California, as everyone knows, cost him his election. He seemed to have grown colder, more austere, and suspicious. Wall Street after a brief period rallied to him; with its extraordinary intuition it sensed the change long before others did and realized that it had nothing further to fear from the man who had once defied the most powerful forces in American business life, and that at a time when the muck-raker was still abroad in the land. The editors of the Evening Post hoped until the last that one single word, one bit of righteous flaming indignation, one far-reaching and constructive appeal, one hopeful stimulating word about the horrible plight in which the world found itself might emerge from those once frank and outspoken lips. None came; at the last moment, disillusioned and disappointed, they reluctantly turned again to support the candidacy of Woodrow Wilson. The independent vote, which had been Governor Hughes's chief support and greatest power, was his no longer. True, he carried New York, but not the Union, and the bitterest disappointment that could come to an American citizen—to believe himself elected to the Presidency and find that this was not the case—was his.

The old fighting Hughes would have taken that dreadful disappointment like a man. But it was days, in 1916, before Mr. Hughes could bring himself to congratulate Woodrow Wilson, and then he did so with a lack of grace, of cordiality, and of sportsmanship that told its own tale of the inner change. Now the darling of the corporation gods, he went back to the practice of the law, and earned yearly what would be a fortune, indeed, to the bulk of the people of the United States. They know how to draw a reformer's teeth in Wall Street; they know how to make him the bulwark of all the things that be, the defender of family life, of the sacred right of private property, of the sanctity of great wealth. And there Mr. Hughes remained, admittedly the head of the American Bar since the death of Joseph H. Choate until he, "Charles the Baptist," the flaming apostle of personal righteousness in public life, accepted the invitation of President Harding to enter the crookedest Cabinet that has ever disgraced the United States of America. There he sat, the brilliant and able associate of, to put it mildly, the weakest and most vulgar of Presidents, of Daugherty, of Fall, and of the Denby whom the former associates of Mr. Hughes on the Supreme Court branded as recreant to his trust. What an irony of fate!

Of course, he kept himself intact. He was not one to join the Cabinet poker parties with the Ohio gang; he shared their drinks no more than their cards. But few can measure adequately the blow that it must have been to the pride of this extremely proud man to know the true character of the Cabinet at the head of which he sat on the right hand of the President. Never once has he, however, referred to it. Nor, as far as I can recall, has he ever scored faithless public servants in the abstract. Not as president of the New York Bar Association has he lifted his voice to denounce public corruption; thus reformer's lips are sealed. The technique of his own job he mastered quickly and in conventional style. Every one of the outworn shibboleths of the statsmanship which went on the rocks in 1914, he made his own. With him the flag everywhere followed the dollar. Under him the powerful cliques in the State Department became more powerful, dollar diplomacy more firmly established, the aggressive imperialism of the country more marked, the dislike of the rest of the world for us stronger and stronger. Able, wrapped in self-righteousness, absolutely satisfied that neither he nor his country could do the slightest wrong; not open to argument; unyielding in the face of all protests; as ready to doubt the Deity Himself as his own wisdom.

There is something profoundly alarming in this type of mind when it reaches high office deeply inoculated with the virus of office-holding and of political ambition. That very self-righteousness makes for a ruthlessness that thinks nothing of sacrificing thousands upon thousands of lives of the youth of one's country to achieve one's ends—you invariably under these circumstances identify yourself with your country. "I and the country," "I and God," as the Kaiser put it, become the same thing. You meet any protestant with pity that he knows so little, that his arguments are so weak, that they make not a dent upon the armor of your right-thinking. You ponder with pity, as did Woodrow Wilson, that there are only three or four other minds comparable to your own. You are the court of final resort, and you pass upon all problems with the same competence, the same confidence, the same directness, and the same power dispensed by justice upon the Supreme Bench of the land. You have only pity for the reformer or idealist, who in his ignorance of official dispatches from official representatives upon the ground, dares to preach to you forbearance, patience, good-will on earth. It is for you, in your wisdom, to say what is right and to outline your policy, knowing that you have the force to make might right.

A brilliant Secretary? Yes. That was a brilliant performance, indeed, when Mr. Hughes opened the Washington Conference for the Limitation of Armaments, and stunned the Conference and thrilled the country with the concrete, business-like proposals for the reduction of armaments—proposals which went through, saved the taxpayers millions upon millions of dollars, and added enormously to the prestige of the United States. Few men are capable of a stroke like that—witness the disaster of a second-rate man and a disloyal admiral at the abortive Coolidge conference in Geneva. Both President Harding and Mr. Hughes looked and acted their parts admirably on that memorable day in Washington. The former Secretary of State wears well the frock coat of statesmanship, and uses ably the "right hand of oratory." The Washington newspaper correspondents testified to his accessibility, to the extraordinary lucidity and ability with which he expounded his ideas—and the skill with which he overwhelmed those who dared to doubt the completeness and the correctness of his creed that the sacred right of private property is the foundation of the family and the family the cornerstone of the state. The United States, he maintained, had always stood for this principle; how could we recognize Mexico or the Soviet Republic—that profane, wicked institution that had laid bloody hands upon private property? Against that profound conviction nothing whatever could make headway. You might, if you dared, and if you were not overwhelmed by the torrent of words with which the Secretary of State always defended his position, point out that the United States itself never made compensation for the property stolen by the revolutionists of 1776 from those who remained loyal to King George; that it never compensated the foreign owners of slaves for their slave property of which Emancipation robbed them; that it offered no redress to the foreign stockholders in distilleries and breweries and wine-making companies whose private property was destroyed when prohibition came; that the story of the United States Government's relations with the American Indian is a tale of incredible theft of private property, violation of a sovereign's word, the breaking of close to a hundred treaties that should have been as sacred to us as her treaty with Belgium to Germany. Against Mr. Hughes's armor of self-righteousness facts like these struck as uselessly as the arrows of old against the armor of the Crusaders. Others might fail; others near him might steal and take $100,000 bribes in black bags, and still others prove recreant to the trust placed in them by 115,000,00 people, but Charles E. Hughes stood up straight and strong and adamant, and just, and good—so good one longed for one little touch of human frailty, one little tiny proof—never afforded—that underneath his polished and suave exterior, within that intellectual machine, directed with completest self-control, there is an organ known as a heart. One wonders whether what is needed here is not the lubricity of a few simple sins. Certainly something of the warm sympathy, the rich understanding of plain human beings, which was the one noble quality of Warren Harding, is lacking; something that Harding gained out of sordid experiences in the back-rooms of Ohio saloons and of Ohio newspaper offices, out of his knowledge of the men with their wives and their mistresses who ran the machine that elevated Mr. Harding to the point where the Old Guard and Wall Street decided that he was to be the first citizen of the Republic.

Mr. Hughes in the White House? It's hard to vision it and to believe that it would mean anything to the plain people of America but a rigid, able, supremely self-righteous government imposed from above by one who must admire with all his unusual intellect the blood and iron of Otto von Bismarck. It would not mean one genuine reform, see not one of those radical progressive proposals enacted into law for which Roosevelt and Wilson contended in 1912. There would be the same old imperialistic dollar-diplomacy, no such foolishness as a direct presidential primary, or the establishment of a referendum; no raising of the issue as to whether the courts or the people rule this country, no plan whatever to interfere with the Big Business over-lordship of America, but the steady upbuilding of the might of the state and the executive power as against the people, and the crushing of all opposition—opposition would quickly be lese majesté as it was to Woodrow Wilson. Certainly it is to the old world of what passed for statesmanship and power and righteousness, and narrow conventional religion—to be worn as a cloak but not applied—that Mr. Hughes belongs. And the new world? It may lag far around the corner, and yet it can be achieved, and some day it will be achieved by some young man using his God-given talents to tear the veils from people's eyes, to place something human and divine far above the worship of private property and riches and power and, yes, big business as we know it in America, the "land of the free." Just as once a young lawyer in New York went forth to defy the concentrated power of wealth and business and of wealth-controlled politics, to rescue the invested insurance savings of multitudes, savings that meant to hundreds of thousands the entire product of their lives of toil.

Today the question is whether the Big Business of the East, backed by Andrew Mellon, will nominate for the Presidency of 1928, Hughes the wrecker and Bolshevik of 1906, or whether the Big Business of the West will insist upon Charles G. Dawes of Chicago, who, so rumor has it, was once a dues-paying member of the Socialist Party of Illinois. Times, yes, and men, too. . . .

Is This America?

Paris, September 19

MOBILIZATION day—for the church, the army, the fascists, the police, Montmartre, and Montparnasse—for everyone in fact who for reasons personal or political has determined to give the American veterans a rousing welcome. Many of those whom the war robbed of their dearest affections have turned out to cheer the "pious pilgrimage" of their brothers in arms. But it is the political element that dominates.

Welcome to the Legion!—to show that, for all their noisy demonstrations, the radicals do not yet rule in France. Welcome to the Legion!—to show that we can be hospitable even to our creditors. Tomorrow, who knows? you may be our bulwark against the advance of bolshevism. Tomorrow, who knows? you may help us to arrange a little matter of war debts. (When one asks a man to dinner, he may find it embarrassing to present a bill.)

The stage is set. The boulevards are flooded with electricity. Every public building wears its tiara of gas-jets. Fountains play. Colored projectors flash across Paris. Autobuses and taxis, churches, monuments, banks, and shops, marry the tricolor and the starry flag.

Each of the twin towers of Notre Dame bears its red-white-and-blue, blue-white-and-red banner. At yesterday's ceremony within the vast nave, hung with red and gold and bristling with flags, the Legion made its first official bow to Paris, presented by the Reverend Joseph Wolfe, national chaplain. "The ideals of our country have never been surpassed in the history of any government in the world. . . . An ideal that never goes to extremes or radicalism. . . . An ideal that has given us . . . a violent hatred of oppression and injustice, and an ardent sympathy for the weak, the disinherited, and for all those who suffer." Organ, orchestra, Star Spangled Banner and Marseillaise.

This morning in the Trocadero the congress opened its first session—a little behind schedule, as the congress (insinuates les Débats) is "doubtless not the main attraction." More red and gold. An orgy of banners. Organ and brass in crashing, conflicting tumult. Hymns, Madelon, Tipperary, speeches in two tongues, prayers and hurrahs.

The air of a football game in a church. A single voice piping "Vive Sacco et Vanzetti!"—promptly suppressed.

And now at last—the grand parade, source of considerable apprehension on the part of its sponsors—in spite of the carefully restricted itinerary and the elaborate "precautions" of the Prefecture. At noon, the Place d'Iéna is martial with bugles and drums. Regiments of horizon blue. Gold- and silver-braided officials. Shoals of police, mounted and on foot, parked in truck-loads in the adjacent streets. The Legion gathers, flushed and boisterous, from a thousand noisy lunch-tables. In the Place de l'Etoile they have taken down the chains that bar the Arc de Triomphe. After the Germans in '71, after the troops of the victory in '19, the way to glory is open for the passage of the "pious pilgrims." All down the Champs Elysées a double line of soldiers. Agents de ville, holster on hip. Plain clothes men, moustached and derby-hatted, circulate uneasily through the crowd. There is nothing in the crowd to warrant their attention: strolling bourgeois, well-dressed foreigners, employees from government offices closed for the day. Jeunesses Patriotes in determined groups. A triple row along the Champs Elysées, denser masses at the Concorde, the Opera, and the Place de l'Hotel de Ville. A Sunday atmosphere rather than that of a holiday. No electricity in the air.

There is a stir at the Etoile, an eddy of flags. The procession is under way. The helmets and switching horsetails of the Republican Guards, their band—playing a brisk and martial Sambre et Meuse—open the way for the most amazing cortege that the gray avenues of Paris have ever witnessed. Whatever the Parisians may have anticipated, they were far from expecting this. Uniforms—every shade of the rainbow. Brandenbourgs and pyjamas, cowboys, knights, monks, feathered Indians, flappers in blue and yellow, Columbia draped in a flag, two lonely Negroes drowned in the mass. A forest of banners. Bands and bands and bands. Saxophones, trombones, fifes and bass drums, accordeons. Giant drum-majors. Real silk, real leather, real gold, brand new, flashing, triumphant. A street fair, a circus, a Rotarian carnival. The grand parade. La guerre, madame. The Greatest Show on Earth.

The crowd, stunned at first with astonishment, is carried away by the color, the noise, and the movement. Men push and tug, play elbows and shoulders for a better view. Women clamber on chairs. Their audible comments are admiring: "That drum-major—qu'il est beau, qu'il est beau!" "My dear, such marvelous jazz!" "Think what it must have cost!" "In dollars . . ." Or, in undertones: "Are there no mutilés among these—veterans?" "Have they lynched all the other Negroes?" "They've forgotten the electric chair!" That for the passage of Massachusetts.

Now and then the anticipated cry flung from a score of frenzied throats: "Vive l'Amerique!"

Is this America?

September 27

The grand parade is over. In the Court of Honor of the Invalides four thousand pious pilgrims have consumed 1,000 quarts of consommé, 60 hams, 1,200 pounds of salmon, 1,200 pounds of beef, an equal quantity of vegetables, salad, cheese, and fruit, 4,500 bottles of wine, and 800 of champagne. They have been dined and fêted, singly and in groups at hotels and palaces and ministeries. They have Charlestoned at the Opera and black-bottomed in the rain on the Place de la Bourse. (With hundreds of Agents de Ville on guard.) Total, two millions of francs. Up at the Trocadero, the business of the Congress goes on—ceremonies and speeches, prayers and jazz, with an attendance that diminishes daily.

The Legion may well be satisfied with its official reception. The officials themselves are doubtless rubbing their hands with satisfaction. Not a hitch anywhere in the whole brilliant program. Paris has seen the Legion. The Legion has seen Paris. But to what extent have the people of France taken part in the festivities?

"There has been no fête—only ceremonies," states the Quotidien, liberal organ representing the solid petite bourgeoisie. "Curiosity, occasional clamors, but no enthusiasm. . . . A strange national festival in which the nation refused to participate." Why?

It is an open secret that until last May Americans had been growing steadily more unpopular in France. Their popularity dropped with the franc. Anyone in France a year ago remembers the atmosphere when the dollar stood at 45. But that was before Lindbergh. Lindbergh worked a revolution in public sentiment. His achievement first; his personality afterwards—not wholly understood (when do Latin and Nordic completely understand each other?) but none the less admired. Lindbergh—modest, daring, young, drinking water—for once prohibition did not appear ridiculous to French eyes—scorning offers of money and publicity. He was a revelation. A new America whose "ambassador" effaced in a night the war-time and post-war-time impressions of Americans—neither of which was too flattering. With disinterested enthusiasm, Paris—all France in fact—forgot its grudge against the dollar citizens and took Lindbergh, and with him the country of his origin, to its bosom. Perhaps the enthusiasm would not have lasted; perhaps the transition was too rapid to have endured. The fact remains. Then was the time to hold a congress of Americans in Paris. But not after Sacco and Vanzetti.

Few Americans realize how deeply that affair penetrated every layer of French society. No case since the days of Dreyfus has aroused a more wholesale interest. This time, however, there was no divergence of opinion. While Socialists and Communists viewed the affair from the standpoint of the class struggle, and the rest of France from a purely "human" angle, the conclusions were identical: to execute the two Italians after six years of mental torture was nothing less than criminal. What shocked French sentiment more than all the rest was the final postponing of the execution. At the news of that last delay, all France gave a sigh of relief. On every hand one heard the same comment: "Now they are saved. No civilized nation would torture human beings with vain hope up to the last minute. It would be unthinkable." Then came the news of the execution. Stupefaction and horror. It was inconceivable, savage, barbarous. After the demonstrations that took place all over the country on August 23, the reactionary press did attempt a belated defense of American justice. But it was timid and faint-hearted. Public opinion as a whole remained unchanged, however bitter the hatred, on the part of French reactionaries, of the "red" champions of Sacco and Vanzetti. There can be no doubt that their execution planted a knife in the newly born enthusaism for America and Americans. Lindbergh was forgotten—or considered a glorious exception. Frenchmen remember their antipathies, their apprehensions. No mercy over there; today, the pound of flesh, tomorrow—the ducats. Once more America stood in the limelight with all her faults magnified.

Then came the grand parade. For France—who can doubt it?—the war was not a "grand parade." Though certainly much has been forgotten, still the war remains to France today an experience too terrible and too tragic to be evolved with the color, the noise, and the place of a carnival or a circus. And in spite of official gravity, of solemn talk about "serving God and the nation," of prayers and special services in cathedral and synagogue, the spectacle offered by the Legion in Paris has been on the whole as tactless and as shocking to French sensibilities as would be [illegible] on the battlefields.

Undoubtedly all the Legion was not given to carousing. There were those who did attend ceremonies and church services, who did listen religiously to innumerable speeches in a tongue they did not understand, and who presumably did go to bed at ten after a profitable day in the museums. But this was not the Legion that Paris saw. Paris saw the Grand Parade of an imposing military organization. Paris saw the Legion—in tens of hundreds—crowding the dance halls and night restaurants of Montmartre, with rows of police standing by; painting the boulevards a deep alcoholic red; parked in long rows of taxis before the houses with the big numbers; and toted home at four in the morning too far gone to remember its address. Peace-time Paris saw what war-time Paris had already seen: the obviously arrogant, the obviously drunk, giving vent to the opinion that all [illegible] and that the town is ours!

Already this impression is finding a reflection in the French press. Not only in the papers of the extreme Left which have been outspoken from the first but—very discreetly, it is true—in the [illegible] nified Temps, while relating in an admiring key its "strange impression" of the Big Parade that combined "pious duty" with "joyous extravagance," discovers that America, like the land of bolshevism, is confronted with two grave dangers; the "devalorization of the intellectual" and the "dissociation of the family." In the satiric press—unsubsidized—the criticism has already taken on a chauvinistic tone. La Fouchardière, the Mr. Dooley of France, concludes a paper on the Legion that begins—"When are they going home? I don't like their looks anyway and we've seen too many at a time"—with the following paragraph:

> I met my daughter Charlotte out walking with an American. A real American with eyeglasses. There was one who couldn't deny his origin. I didn't say a word . . . but I avenged Georges Carpentier. I knocked him down. . . . And my daughter Charlotte, she said "But papa, he isn't an American, he's only a little salesman from the Galeries Lafayette." But I didn't for an instant regret. . . . When you have the honor of being a Parisian, you don't dishonor yourself by making up like an American.

The Legion—4,000 unofficial "ambassadors," according to the press. But what America do they represent? Is it the old America France had learned to honor; pioneer America, generous, brave, simple, sincere in faith and modest in achievement? America, where the very word militarism was anathema? The America she thought she had found in Lindbergh? For Lindbergh was an "ambassador." Roger Baldwin, speaking words of fraternity at the inauguration of the Place Sacco-Vanzetti at Clinchy, while the grand parade pranced down the Champs Elysées, was also an ambassador. But not the "American Legion." Better keep it at home.

An Anti-Trust Law Fiasco

By DEXTER M. KEEZER

WHEN former Attorney General A. Mitchell Palmer, in the austere setting of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, faced a battery of motion p[illegible] cameras, skillfully focused to exclude the fact that no judge was seated on the bench, and read to a humbled and contrite little group "The Packers' Consent Decree" of February 27, 1920, the event was widely proclaimed as a glorious victory of justice over sinister forces. After this striking demonstration, pictures of which were flashed to all corners of the land, a justice of the court was led in to sign the decree about which, it is said, he knew nothing more than that the parties seemed reasonably well satisfied.

Slightly more than five years later, under much less histrionic circumstances, an order was entered in the same court, declaring that "the decree as a whole is suspended until further order of the court, to be made, if at all, after a full hearing on the merits;" and the presiding judge asserted in his opinion that "there seems to be little difference in effect between vacating the decree and suspending its operations." Government appeals from this order have since been dismissed. The packers are seeking to have the suspended decree wiped out entirely. Arguments on this subject will be presented to the United States Supreme Court at the present session. Regardless of the outcome of this case the Consent Decree will at least remain suspended and subject to a "full hearing on the merits" before it can be reinstated. Thus after seven (it may develop into ten) years of legal wrangling, the 1920 "victory" over the great meat packers as anti-trust law violators amounts to little more than an original complaint which, to be sustained, must be supported by evidence to be gathered anywhere from seven to fifteen years after the alleged offenses were committed.

While the force of the decree has been reduced from the mighty roar of an outraged conqueror to little more than a plaintive voice in the wilderness, the record of this strange development is perhaps as important in its implications as that of any major proceeding under the Sherman act in recent years, and is strongly suggestive of a restatement of the entire problem of "trust-busting."

In drawing up the decree Attorney General Palmer followed, as closely as the post-war withdrawal of the government from extensive participation in industry would permit, the recommendations made by the Federal Trade Commission as the result of an extensive investigation of the so-called "Big Five packers," since reduced to the "Big Four" as a result of the merger of the Armour and Morris interests. The other interests involved were those of Swift, Cudahy, and Wilson.

With the stipulation that they should not be presumed to have violated the law these packers accepted a blanket mandate to obey it, and more specifically agreed to divorce themselves from the ownership of stockyards, terminal railroads, market newspapers, and public cold storage warehouses, except when necessary for their own products. They also consented to disassociate themselves from the retail meat business, a type of activity in which, it was observed after the entrance of the decree, they had never been engaged; and to discontinue manufacture and commerce in a group of "unrelated" commodities, constituting a rather complete catalog of a wholesome grocery stock. The provision in regard to the so-called "unrelated" lines was inspired largely by the trade commission's finding that "not content with reaching out for mastery as to commodities which substitute for meat and its by-products, they have invaded allied industries and even unrelated ones," and that "at the present rate of expansion, within a few years the big packers would control the wholesale distribution of the nation's food supply."

A sweeping decree was obviously needed to meet such a menace as this, but Attorney General Palmer was equal to the task, even if the law was not. When, appearing before a congressional committee on April 3, 1920, he was asked, "The decree goes beyond the law, does it not?" he replied, "In some respects," and when pressed further agreed, "in a great many respects."

But clearly it was no time for technical legal details and such pedantic questions as whether one can be prevented by law from engaging lawfully in the legally approved business of distributing groceries. Mr. Palmer had an engagement in San Francisco to be hailed as the presidential standard bearer of the Democratic party; and he hurried away to participate in his triumphal march, taking with him as one of his most prized trophies the evidence of his victory over the packers which compensated in vigorous rhetoric for what it may have lacked in legal exactness.

When he arrived in California, however, he found that the consent decree involved much more than a few liberties taken with the anti-trust laws. It seemed to a persistent group of California fruit growers engaged in conducting canning enterprises to be a matter of economic life and death. They contended that when the packers, particularly Armour and Company, were barred from the distribution of "unrelated" commodities, including canned fruit, they—the fruit growers—were deprived of an efficient distributive system. Without these distributive facilities they said that their infant cooperative industries would fail, particularly because the wholesale grocers' associations were not sympathetic with their industrial endeavors and were irritated to the point of threatened boycotts because of their advocacy of packer distribution. These farmers were much more persistent in their attentions to Mr. Palmer than were the delegates to the convention, and it is reported that when he left the city of San Francisco without the nomination, he also left little farmer vigilance committees waiting at all places where it was expected he might pass.

Advised that this group of California fruit growers was on the rampage, the National and American Wholesale Grocers' associations obtained permission from the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia to be heard in case of an attempt to modify the decree, and then an April 22, 1922, the California Cooperative Canneries asked permission to intervene in order to seek a modification of the decree which would permit them to enjoy again the use of the packer system of distribution. In its petition, which was vigorously opposed by the wholesale grocers' associations, the cooperative canneries alleged as the reason for this opposition "that the direct and immediate effect of the decree was to create and continue an absolute monopoly in the unrelated commodities in their members' favor." Besides suggesting that its opposition to the decree was bringing upon it the commercial wrath of these powerful trade organizations, the canneries company urged that "if the decree in this cause be not promptly vacated or modified, the very existence of the efficient and economic facilities of the packers for food distribution will entirely disappear, and the producers will be left entirely at the mercy of the wholesale grocers."

The right to intervene, which had been extended to the grocers' associations, was denied to the canneries company by the lower court. The argument, however, that "the consent decree is an outstanding document in the history of this country, and bears the unique distinction of being a palpable violation of the anti-trust laws under the guise of preventing such violation" seemed to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia to be worthy of investigation. In his opinion of June 2, 1924, granting permission to the cooperative canneries to intervene, Justice Van Orsdel said, "If the contention . . . is true that the wholesale grocers are using the decree against the packers to strengthen and build up a giant monopoly in their various and varied lines of business, there would seem to be demand for a searching inquiry as to whether or not the court is being used as an agency to restrain one monopoly and thereby promote, strengthen, and build up another. Clearly it is not the policy of the act to accomplish this result."

Although the legal proceedings, which resulted in the suspension of the decree, have not completely run their course, several questions of real public importance would seem to emerge from the legalistic maze.

The first is whether a system of food distribution, admitted by all parties concerned as well as by the Interstate Commerce Commission to be the most efficient yet devised, should be arbitrarily curtailed in order to preserve the vaguely defined blessings of competition. In testifying for the wholesale grocers in one of the many proceedings concerned with the decree, Clifford Thorne said, "the packers have developed, and they deserve the credit for developing the highest type of transportation service that we have." And in reviewing the question of private railroad car lines the Interstate Commerce Commission declared that "no class of cars in railroad service is used more effectively than the cars owned by large shippers," and observed in the case of the large meat packer that he "could no more do business on an efficient and economical basis without his private cars than he could without his modern equipped packing plant."

On the specific complaint of the wholesale grocers' associations that the use by the packers of their private car lines for the distribution of grocery products involved undue discrimination against the grocers who are dependent upon regular railroad freight service, the commission held "that the practices of the defendants (certain railroads) in permitting the meat packers to load certain articles of groceries in their peddler and branch-house cars is not shown to result in undue prejudice to complainants (the grocers' associations) or unduly to prefer the packers."

It would seem that any competitive advantage which the packers enjoy with their system of distribution is that based upon superior efficiency; and in the bulky record compiled concerning the consent decree there is yet to appear a coherent statement of how the public interest will be served by destroying that efficiency insofar as it is directed to the distribution of "unrelated" commodities.

The controversy ranging about the consent decree, while primarily concerned with the question of packer distribution of certain lines of groceries, brings into sharp relief a much larger question, involving many of the assumptions underlying the anti-trust laws. Although during the five years in which the decree was operative the Federal Trade Commission found that little progress had been made in carrying out its more important provisions, enough was accomplished to arouse the complaint that it served to foster one monopoly while attempting to destroy another.

This complaint, viewed in connection with the current trend of industrial development, would seem to suggest a real limitation on the effectiveness of the negative type of procedure called for by the anti-trust laws. With the increasing change from competition between individual establishments to competition between large consolidations of related enterprises—a movement surely aided and abetted by the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the United States Steel Corporation case—how much can be done in the way of breaking down restraints of trade and monopolistic conditions in one quarter without playing into the hands of another comparably powerful consolidation?

The anti-trust laws are directed toward a restoration of competitive conditions, and assume that by eliminating certain obstructions to competition that end can be gained. What of the case, which is tending to become the norm, when the competition is between great consolidations and associations which are able to absorb such advantages as are taken from the large scale competitors? Is the policy, under the anti-trust laws, to be to proceed progressively against these various giant competitors as preferential advantages are tossed back and forth among them? To these questions there is no ready answer.

Incidentally, however, it should be noted that the Packers' Consent Decree was not without effect, and a delightfully ironical one at that. It gave the packers, who have probably enjoyed public disfavor during the twentieth century more consistently than any other set of industrialists, their first thoroughly respectable political ally—a group of farmers. The full significance of this odd bit of Mr. Palmer's handicraft is for the future to tell.

In the Driftway

THIS is the season of the year when one hears long sad stories about "how I was robbed in Europe." Gradually one gets the impression that all Europeans are thieves, with Frenchmen and Italians heading the list. And the American Legion convention in Paris has given the old story even wider circulation, for since most of those legionnaires probably never saw France until a month ago, they were easy marks for the most artless Frenchman.

* * * * *

IT is true that when one ceases to be a human being and becomes an "American tourist" one enters a game in which the odds, financially speaking, are heavily against one. To the European, all Americans are rich, and he can hardly be blamed for getting as much as he can out of a golden opportunity. The Drifter has been overcharged in various languages and he has come to care less about the overcharge than about the method in which it is administered. He much prefers, for instance, to be overcharged in Italian to being mulcted in Austrian. He still shudders at the thought of the surly hotel keeper in Innsbruck who not only collected an outrageous price for a cheerless room but was so consistently unpleasant that the Drifter cut short his visit and hurried on to Italy. And then, what a difference! He arrived in Verona late in the evening loaded with two heavy bags. He started for the tram car which he was told would take him to the city. (The new station at Verona is half a mile outside the city gates.) At the door of the station, he encountered a smiling gentleman who stopped him with a magnificent gesture and pointed at his bags. Through the door the Drifter could see the tram, but the courteous smiling one was telling him that his bags were too big to be carried on the car. Further, the Drifter learned that the gentleman was the motorman of that tram.

* * * * *

IT was distressing. The hour was late. The Drifter was very tired—and his bags were too big. Yet the little man was smiling so gaily that the Drifter couldn't help feeling that it was all a great lark. It warmed his heart and he forgot all about Innsbruck. Suddenly the motorman, perceiving that the Drifter was either stubborn or stupid, indicated by certain unmistakable signs that money—a lira or two—might make his bags less of a problem. So the Drifter was allowed, amid much bowing and smiling and many knowing looks, to enter the tram along with the bags, which the motorman seemed to have no difficulty in stowing. On the way to town, the Drifter inquired for a good hotel and the motorman was voluble in his assurances of help. A few minutes later the car stopped, the motorman picked up the Drifter's bags and graciously led the way to a hotel, while his other passengers waited. Of course this service cost the Drifter something, too, but was not such a welcome worth the price? THE DRIFTER

Brandeis, Holmes, Sacco, and Vanzetti

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The pleasure I had in reading Norman Hapgood's article on Justice Brandeis in a recent issue of The Nation was marred somewhat by the memory of a passage from a letter written by Bartolomeo Vanzetti to Professor Harry Dana, bearing the historic date of August 22, 1927:

> Judge Holmes repelled our appeal on the ground that the State Supreme Court had passed on the case and he does not want to invade the State court ground.
> Yesterday, Justice Brandeis repelled our appeal on the ground of personal reasons; to wit, because he or members of his family are favorably interested in our case, as demonstrated by the fact that after our arrest Rosa and her children went to live for a month in an empty house of Justice Brandeis, in Dedham, Mass.
> These two justices are the symbols of liberalism in the Federal Supreme Court and they turned us their shoulders.
> Now our lawyers are presenting the appeal to Justice Stone. Since the other federal supreme justices are reactionary, well, that will be a good ground on which to repel our appeal. So that it is coming to pass that some justices repel our appeal because they are friendly with us and the other justices repel our appeal because they are hostile to us, and through this elegant fouche caudine, we are led straight to the electric chair.

New York City, October 7 CHARLES YALE HARRISON

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I return herewith various letters, drawn out by my article in The Nation of October 5, all to the same effect. The writers charge that Justice Brandeis, and likewise Justice Holmes, are false to liberalism because they refused to intervene in the Sacco-Vanzetti case.

Justice Holmes refused, after a hearing, to interfere in the case on the ground of lack of jurisdiction. Justice Brandeis would, in my opinion, have reached the same conclusion as Justice Holmes, but he never got that far. He was prevented by a personal disqualification. He has always acted strictly on the principle that he would not sit in any case where he had any personal interest. He kept out of a minimum-wage case because one of his daughters had been working on a minimum-wage board. He looked upon himself as disqualified in the Sacco- Vanzetti case because his family had been actively interested in getting the men off. He might have added also, had he thought it best, that the woman who is perhaps the oldest and closest friend of the family had been for seven years the backbone of the effort to free the defendants, and had made far more sacrifices for that cause than anyone else.

The people who wrote the letters to The Nation are not lawyers, and do not understand the obligations of a judge not to usurp power merely because he wishes that a different outcome had been reached. They do not understand that if Justice Holmes or Justice Brandeis would have been justified in exceeding his powers in order to accomplish one result, then Judge Thayer was justified in abusing his opportunities, as he did, in order to send Sacco and Vanzetti to the chair because he happened to think them guilty. President Lowell would then be justified in his inaccurate and personal use of the record to reach a result he wished to reach. It is a poor way to get ahead, to meet one judicial lynching by a state by clamoring for another kind of judicial usurpation. The two greatest judges in America would not be the men they are if their conception of their powers and duties changed because their personal sympathies were involved.

While Thayer is entirely unfit, the basic evil of the Sacco-Vanzetti case is not in the law, faulty as the Massachusetts law is. It is in public opinion. That the war made us wish to lynch dissenters was inevitable. If we are going to have wars we are going to lynch those who oppose the majority. The Sacco-Vanzetti case started in the post-war frenzy. A sadder fact is that nine-tenths or more of the people of Massachusetts are still in a lynching mood toward alien revolutionary theorists. While that remains the situation, no change in the law would mean much. I fear that readers who seek a cure in asking our most conscientious judges to ignore their prescribed duties in order to bring about what they deem moral results are encouraging the disregard of permanent principles that is the very thing from which we suffer.

New York, October 6 Norman Hapgood

A Christian Bishop

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The following is taken from Bishop Lawrence's "Memories of a Happy Life." In other matters Bishop Lawrence really has proved that he does possess moral courage. It reveals the subtle poison of the South's Bourbonism acting upon a man who in the North undoubtedly looked upon himself as a leader of men:

> To show how stupid we Northerners can be, I will tell a story of how by one sentence I came near breaking up the whole trip. [He refers to one of the late Robert Ogden's trips into the South, visiting the schools for colored people.] It was at Tuskegee. The chapel was filled with hundreds of whites and Negroes. Booker Washington called me unexpectedly to the platform to say a few words. In order to give myself time to think what to say, I began, "When Dr. Washington comes to Boston, my children always want to have him come to lunch or dinner; it is a pleasure, therefore, to me to be entertained by him here." Then I began a short address, but felt that something—I did not know what—had dropped with a thud; and after a few feeble sentences I sat down. . . . I suspected nothing until the next day, as a few of us were sitting on the piazza . . . the wife of the Governor said to me, "Bishop, if you lived in the South would you entertain Booker Washington?" I looked at her, and the truth dawned on me as I said, "I did make a fool of myself yesterday, I had no idea." "Oh," she interrupted, "I did not mean that. I want to know." "If I lived in the South [the Bishop replied] "I am sure that I should do as Southern gentlemen do and should not entertain him. But living in the North, I feel as a Northern gentleman at liberty to do so."

Evidently he felt that he had met the situation admirably, and he goes on to talk of other things. It seems never to have occurred to him that he had missed the opportunity to reply that Dr. Washington was one of the greatest educators of the country and one of the two or three greatest orators, and that he would feel honored to entertain such a man wherever he happened to live! The Governor's wife had not asked the Bishop what he would have done had he been born a Southerner, but merely if he had been living in the South. Also note the manner in which the Bishop himself introduces the episode—"To show how stupid we Northerners can be," Therein lies the significance of the entire story. It is considered a social solecism to mention the Negro question in the South. One is looked down upon (and this is what gets under the skin of the Northerner and makes him lose his Northern viewpoint) as one who is not acquainted with good social usages, and is not quite a lady or a gentleman. The consequence is that the growing number of liberals in the South receive no support at all—not even from the majority of the liberals who visit the South.

Who'll Help?

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: May I suggest, through the columns of The Nation, that all who can, be they editors or private folk, reprint Romain Rolland's remarkable article in The Nation and let it be known where the reprints can be secured for distribution.

There could be no better beginning for the movement to clear the names of Sacco and Vanzetti. Massachusetts people particularly should be bombarded with copies of this splendid expression of opinion.

Rosicrucianism

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: A copy of The Nation, dated September 14, has found its way to my desk, and I note an article written by Aldrich Blake entitled Oklahoma Goes Rosicrucian, in which he hints at the fact that Governor Johnston's political enemies seek his removal because he has adopted the religion of the Rosicrucians. . . .

Mr. Blake admits that in the earlier days of Governor Johnston's life he was known as a good fellow and upheld the liquor interests, but that he has now become a teetotaler, a churchman, and a clean man generally. This should be greatly in his favor in the eyes of the general public. If Governor Johnston has become a vegetarian he has perhaps realized that a clean diet is conducive to health and to clear thinking, which is a very necessary thing in his executive work. As to his membership in the Rosicrucian Fellowship which has its headquarters at Oceanside, California, Governor Johnston has at no time been a member of our organization, neither has his assistant, Mrs. O. O. Hammonds, been ever directly associated with the Rosicrucian Fellowship.

If the interest which has been displayed by the above two people in the science of astrology is held against them it is a pity, or if Governor Johnston was perhaps a little over-zealous in the signing of the bill for the hospital for crippled children, and endeavored to use this science when the planets were propitious for the best of the work, he did this for the good that might arise from the benefic aspects of the planets, but this should be a very lame excuse for his enemies to attack him.

It would be a pity if the Christian people in the State of Oklahoma would permit the removal of so worthy and so clean a representative as Governor Henry Johnston simply because he is interested in or has spoken favorably of the Rosicrucian teachings.

The Gandhi Relief Fund

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Recent newspaper dispatches have told of disastrous floods in India. Private letters have now brought full details of a colossal calamity. A fall of fifty inches of rain in four days over an area larger than Great Britain engulfed hundreds of villages, rendered more than 500,000 people homeless, destroyed crops, cattle, and all means of livelihood. In Ahmedabad, Gandhi's home, more than 5,000 houses were swept away and the people left destitute. Gandhi's famous school, the Ashram, was under water for days and all the buildings have been left in a precarious condition.

A Gandhi Relief Fund is being raised by the undersigned, and appeal is herewith made to all friends of India and of India's great spiritual leader to render aid. An initial contribution of $100 is already on its way and a steady flow of gifts is now besought. Money in any amount sent to Mr. Holmes, at 12 Park Avenue, New York City, will be forwarded at once.

Eavesdropper

By DAVID MORTON

The talk among the poplars is of rain:
From leaf to leaf the eager gossip goes,
Out in the dark, low-pitched and very plain,
Tree unto tree telling the thing it knows.
This delicate and silver sound they make
Would seem tonight to have no league with sorrow,
Yet all my thought is saddened for the sake
Of poplars that will strip their leaves tomorrow.

For I who lie here listening in the dark
Learn in this wise how rain will fill the dawn,
And how the slow, uncertain light will mark
Their hammered-silver shining from the lawn,—
One listener, secret as the gnomes and elves,
Who heard the poplars talking to themselves.

First Glance

IF one did not already suspect "The Story of Philosophy" one would have to suspect it after reading its author's "mental autobiography," which appears now under the pretentious title "Transition" (Simon and Schuster: $3). Is this all the philosophers could do for Dr. Durant? It is a vulgar, barren, and simple-minded book, this autobiography, and I blush for the philosophers who have made the reputation behind it. Doubtless they are guiltless. Doubtless it is true, as the minority report on "The Story of Philosophy" has it, that Dr. Durant never proved his right to be clubby with Plato, Spinoza, and the rest. Still I blush for them.

Take the hero's love affairs—and it is proper to do this since he makes so much of them himself, and tells us with such a lack of passion how as a very young man he yearned to bite the flesh of girls. There was Irene, for instance.

> Where is Irene now? What a shame it is that I do not know, that I allowed the chaotic currents of our diverse lives to make us strangers in the world! I am told that she became a nun, and disappeared into the anonymity of the convent. Perhaps if I saw her now I should not recognize her—though I am sure that she is beautiful still. No doubt these profane pages will be hidden from her pious eyes, lest she should remember that she once had kissable knees.

And better yet there was Rose.

> Alas, poor Rose, I helped to wither you, did I not?—sipping your honey greedily and then passing on as coldly as the wind that blows a petal from a flower. I did not hurt you, and I left you as when you first discovered love; but I was shamefully unkind to you. When I met a lass fairer than yourself, I tired of you, not understanding yet the joy of honor and fidelity; and to free myself I told you that I was an unbeliever, so that you might send me away. You did what I wished; but I know that you would have come with me had I asked you even once more; and it was brutal of me not to ask that once again. I wonder where you are now, and if you are happy? Perhaps in your modest way you are happier than I, happier than any man can be who has read the books of the philosophers.

Dear, dear, it is all so beautiful and melancholy—these Girls Who Have Influenced Me, and in their humble way left me a finer and a wiser man. Dr. Durant, I imagine, has thought to forestall criticism of such passages by admitting on the title-page that "Transition" is a "sentimental story." In my opinion it is not even that. It is a work of perfectly cool and commonplace conceit, written in the very language its author must have been using when the city editor of the New York Journal said to him one day: "You're not the man for newspaper work. You're too soft and literary."

Soft and literary. There you are, and if you want more evidence read the book, which is amusing for its badness when it is not shocking in its simplicity. It pretends—hence its title—to be the story not merely of a mind but of an age; and we are expected to find in it the fable of a generation which, losing its faith, fell into confusion. But there is no confusion; the book is all too clear. The hero falls from religion, rises to radicalism, falls again to cynicism and despair, and at the end rises once more—having become "a daddy"—to heights whence he can reflect that progress after all is possible in a world of parental love—see "how it lifts the children upon the shoulders of the parents, generation after generation, and raises life to higher levels of enterprise and thought!" Our age never enters, except to be travestied thus. Soft and literary.

MARK VAN DOREN

Man as a Mechanism

The Human Body. By Logan Clendening, M. D. Alfred A. Knopf. $6.

THERE is in this somewhat formidable tome (it weighs more than three pounds) a mellow and amiable wisdom which lifts it far above the level of its kind. It is devoid alike of the evasions and obfuscations which make nonsense of the school physiology books, and of the propagandist fervor which botches most of the handbooks for older and more wicked readers. Dr. Clendening, who is a successful physician in Kansas City and an author of standard medical texts, is quite innocent of evangelical passion. It seems to him to be quite natural that men should abuse their bodies and get into trouble; he is philosopher enough to view disease without growing indignant. What he has to say about the dreadful subject of sex, for example, will probably cause uproars among the sex hygienists, and what he has to say about exercise will shock every golfer in the land. But it is hard to read his book without gathering the impression that he knows precisely what he is talking about. A background of hard experience, at the bedside and in the laboratory, looms behind him. When he describes a bone, it is obvious at once that he has seen, handled, and (in his aloof, scientific way) loved that bone, and when he speaks of a disease it is with the authority of a man who has actually wrestled with it. A good deal of the charming humanism of the late Sir William Osler is in him. He writes gracefully and clearly, and he never forgets that the human machine is also a man, and that the man has hopes and dreams as well as liver and lights. Most medical men write atrociously, especially when they address the layman, but not Dr. Clendening.

The plan of his book is simple and excellent. He assumes, first, that his readers are intelligent and that the basic facts of anatomy and physiology are thus within their grasp, and he assumes, second, that they are seldom interested in those facts save when they have a pain somewhere, or are otherwise out of kilter. This last assumption, it seems to me, is a sound one; I myself, though I am excessively educated, had never heard of the synovial membrane until the dissipation of laying bricks brought me synovitis in the wrist. But it is one thing to explain to the layman the mechanics and chemistry of his frequent infirmities, and quite another thing to set him insanely to doctoring himself. This unwisdom Dr. Clendening very adroitly avoids, and without any gloomy warnings and alarms. What he exhibits constantly is the fact that disease is usually a very complicated matter—that there is no curing it without a thorough study of its nature, its seat, and its causes. He makes that fact plain without any punditic eye-rolling. The reader, made privy to the chief landmarks, comes away with a cautious respect for the jungles intervening. If, having read and attended, he yet essays to cure himself, then it is a sign that God, having marked him for early bliss, has not bothered to give him sense.

Dr. Clendening begins with a chapter upon what might be called human normalcy: he describes the ideal human body, and shows how far an individual may depart from that ideal without being a pathological case. Then, after a chapter on heredity and environment, and another on the cell, he follows the classical course through the bones, the muscles, the skin, the digestive system, the respiratory system, the blood, and the nerves, ending with chapters on the relations of the body to the mind, the reproductive mechanism, and the elements of general pathology. At all points he offers clear and effective drawings: they show all that is necessary, and nothing else. And at all points he illuminates his discourse with apposite parables and anecdotes, many of them from medical history. Describing the cell, he does not forget old Theodor Schwann, and dealing with the heart and its disorders, and the effects of digitalis thereon, he pauses long enough for an eloquent and fascinating account of the debt that humanity owes to William Withering and James Mackenzie. The book is immensely readable; it was made to be read. The grisly flavor of the average medical work for laymen is not in it. There are no horrors, and there is no preaching. Dr. Clendening is too busy explaining things that obviously interest him enormously to stop to argue anything.

In his chapters on sex, at the end, there is more sound sense than you will find in all the so-called sex hygiene books ever written. He simply refuses to give any credit to the conventional horrors. For the teaching of "the facts of life" by scared schoolma'ms and bawdy lady doctors he has only derision. The gutter, he maintains is a better school. But the gutter views sex as a joke! Well, to a large extent that is precisely what it is. The effort to convert a fascinating mystery into a horror comparable to hydrophobia or Calvinism has only piled up obscenities: the teacher, no doubt, gets a thrill out of it, but the pupils get only bad dreams. Nor is Dr. Clendening deluded by the current pother about the venereal diseases. As a practical medical man, he is well aware that syphilis and gonorrhea, if taken in time, are quite amenable to treatment—that many other diseases are far worse. He describes their symptoms simply and decently, and tells what may be done about them. He describes all the other common distempers of man in the same way. His book is sound in its facts, admirable in its clarity, and very charmingly written. It is, by long odds, the best work of its kind that has yet come to light in America.

The Biography of a Complex

The Locomotive God. By William Ellery Leonard. The Century Company. $4.

In June, 1911, William Ellery Leonard, poet and philologist, went for a walk with a friend. The tragic death of his wife and the hostile attitude of some of that wife's friends had reduced him to a state near nervous collapse, but when he turned with his friend into a little road house he was not, so far as he knew, the victim of any definite psychic disorder. Then his eye fell upon a map, advertising the Northwestern Railroad company, in the center of which was pictured an on-rushing locomotive. Without his ceasing to realize the real nature of the object it suddenly became a symbol—the locomotive was an avenging God sweeping forward to destroy him and his guilt.

Struggling to gain possession of himself he lit a cigar and began to make random sketches upon a piece of paper, but the odor of the cigar intensified his terror and the sketches were sketches of locomotives. As he left the door of the road house, a train, horribly like that upon the wall, was passing across a meadow and in spite of the fact that the meadow was empty he was oppressed by an unreasonably intense conviction that boys were playing baseball near by. A few minutes later he begged for a moment alone and, walking four or five hundred feet away, stood looking out from the edge of a bluff. Premonitions of terror came upon him. He called to his friend but received no answer. The whistle of a freight train came across the fields and suddenly diffused premonitions became acute panic. The train, half a mile away, was about to bear down upon him, and then from out the sky a chariot drawn by two shining horses rushed upon him. Mad with terror he got back somehow to his friend, the panic subsided for a time, only to return a few minutes later and in a commandeered automobile he was taken home. Since that day he has never "walked or ridden, alone or with others, as a normal man." He has taught his classes, written his books, and, upon one or two occasions, made brief agonizing journeys in a train; but he cannot, without running the risk of utter and unmasterable panic, go further than the distance of a short walk from the apartment where he lives and the university where he teaches. The safety of home must be always near.

Such cases as this are, of course, the commonplace of all text-books in abnormal psychology, but Mr. Leonard's book is unique as a frank, first-hand account by a man whose mind is of the first order and who is gifted with extraordinary powers of expression. It tells the story of a life very much worth the telling for reasons which have nothing to do with the phenomenon which has come to play a disastrously large part in that life, and it tells besides a fascinating story of the quest for forgotten memories which might throw some light upon the origin of his Locomotive God. That quest leads him first to an incident in boyhood when a mob of derisive school boys chasing him home were half hallucinated into an on-rushing locomotive and it discovers the ball-game as part of that incident, but it reaches its end when the mind gradually recovers an experience, totally forgotten but verified in the memory of others, which occurred when the author was two and a half years old. On the platform of a station he gets his first terrified sight of a locomotive. As it roars past a jet of steam scalds him slightly and in the presence of a little girl before whom he has been playing the dominant male he rushes screaming for mother, home, and safety. A man with a cigar diffuses the pungent odor of tobacco. The boy wonders if Mary thinks he is a fool.

Mr. Leonard does not attempt to make magic out of psychoanalysis. His childhood memories were recovered by himself with the aid of two members of the psychology department at Wisconsin, he is not cured, and he does not feel sure that he ever will be. He is well aware of the fact that an orthodox analyst would be inclined to deny that the ultimate cause of a neurosis can be found by the victim since it is protected and cherished by him; but he has no great faith in either the specific theories or the therapeutic methods of the orthodox analyst, and he is content to find at least a partial explanation of his predicament in the incident just recorded. His book does not pretend to settle the problem with which it is concerned, but it does consider thoughtfully all the questions which arise in connection with it. Was, for example, this childhood fright in itself a sufficient cause of the phobia and to what extent has that phobia influenced the direction and character of his work?

Mr. Leonard finds no evidence of any hereditary disposition toward nervous disorders, but he does not minimize the effect of the abnormal strains to which he was subjected after the death of his wife and which made him succumb to the effects of a suppressed memory which might never have seriously disturbed a nervous organization not already subjected to unusual stresses. Nor is he inclined to make too close an identification between his obsessions and his creative impulses. Admitting that "The Lynching Bee" probably owed something to a subconscious memory of the mob of urchins which had once pursued him, he nevertheless refuses to identify poetry and neurosis. "I could have become a phobiac without becoming a poet or half a poet, and vice versa. But there does remain a connection; a sensitive, imaginative, emotional organization is the prerequisite for becoming either half a poet or a good phobiac. The poet is by constitution more exposed than most mortals to initial shock; the poet is more exposed to the subconscious effects of initial shock; but all men are exposed in some degree. And the poet may escape this exposure or the calamities of this exposure as most poets or other artists have in fact escaped. I was one who did not escape." "My . . . incomplete science," he adds, "can get no farther." And that, indeed, is about as far as anyone's can get.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Blood and Banners

The Black Douglas. By Donald Douglas. George H. Doran Company. $2.50.

IN most historical romances you keep thinking all the time of reference books and the author visiting ruins with a pair of field glasses or working in a library reading up on costumes. And usually there are footnotes and in the back an enormous bibliography destroys most of the imaginative content of the book. Usually a peasant is set aside to be rustic and humorous in dialect that is never completely translated and his costume is so minutely described that you imagine it is to give the "feel" of the period. But those are bad books and this is a good one.

Here a dog is completely evoked simply by saying "the hound broke through the trees" and the five men who follow him are described as having "faces rough as bark"—no more than that, and yet you see their thick legs and necks and hear their panting. There are old peasant hags who "mutter as if their mouths are filled with oats" and there is a language that is described as the "glug of apes." All through the book are vivid words that evoke not only a face or a figure but the background, the country, the house, the particular room and chair, all with a mysterious power.

There is the shock and mystery of meeting people face to face as if they had never died. You see the past as if it had never faded or turned to earth. You meet the Black Douglas and Robert the Bruce in the flesh, they walk into your room to rest between battles. You know their horses and can pick them out in battle and you know how they look as they pull themselves on their stomachs through a dangerous wood. You watch the English ride down a hill with a hound in front. "He saw their basnets flame in the sun and the field shone with pennon and shield and spear. Bright banners flapped in the wind and hauberks gleamed white as flour and coat-armor ran to a knot of color so that they rode like a troop of bright angels let down from the thrones of the sky."

But none of this means that the book is pleasant or that women will sit up all night reading it. There is only one woman in the story, a creature too patient and agreeable to be real, and none of the men want to die for her and they don't even pretend that they want to—they are all pledged to their King and to saving Scotland from the English. (Should a good historical romance be so realistic?) The good creature never comes to life. She marries the Black Douglas while she is held in a castle for ransom. He endangers his life to see her, goes through the slime, climbs a castle wall, but all of that occupies a very small portion of the book, a dozen pages or so. She has a child and tries to escape with it and the Douglas and is killed in a meadow near the castle.

The saddest part of the woman's brief story is that her husband appears to feel the death of the King (who gives him his heart to take to the crusades) more than he does her death. He speaks to the contrary and falls into blackness but you don't believe him. His happiness is in a world of men and war, on plains that surge with blood and where heads float with tongues straining out and necks show cords turned soft and black. Here his will is his own even though he serves his king, and he is forever free from women and the responsibility of their love.

But women played the important roles in Mr. Douglas's first book, "The Grand Inquisitor." They were simple, tragic women who wanted to be biological and permanent and secure. They were present all through the book in some form; sometimes they lurked in the background like stealthy cats with incredible claws unsheathed, sometimes they were huge spiders with green eyes, or witches who were reaching for the souls and wills and manhood of the men they intended to own. These women wanted to draw men into their world, they could endure no separation, and the men fought to remain separate, in possession of themselves, free to seek beyond fulfilment in love and sex. The book had a fiendish nightmare quality. The whole city was crowded into it and you saw it shake and groan and dissolve before your eyes. And one man freed himself by killing the image he had made of the woman he loved and the other sank down in madness. In this new book the hero is happier but the woman, though more ideal and noble, less real. And their worlds are separate and miles apart.

There is a man in "The Black Douglas," William Francis by name, who talks with Randolph. Francis is to climb the wall and it suddenly reminds him that he used to climb out of his father's house at night with a rope ladder twelve feet long and go to see a girl in the town. He stares ahead with a fierce look and then says to Randolph: "Ah, my lord, one's love for a wench is a thing of one year. One's love for the King . . ." And Randolph replied: "Your love shall not bring you death."

Besides Douglas and the King there is a third figure in this book who is not forgotten, who stays around even though he was slain by the Black Douglas, and whose meaning is buried. With all the brightness of banners in the sun and hoof beats and victory this awful figure stays. "He saw a cowl shield a face sallow as mud in a robed man that came in a slow creep over the floor. He saw hands yellow like bilge and the fingers dried like stale claws. He saw black eyes that fell at his look . . ." He gets a dagger through him and spills on the floor "like a yellow worm," but even at the end he is alive and the Black Douglas and the King are alive.

MARGERY LATIMER

Jim, Slim, and Bill

Circus Parade. By Jim Tully. Albert and Charles Boni. $2.50.
The Main Stem. By William Edge. The Vanguard Press. Fifty cents.

LIKE most parades "Circus Parade" is a gaudy and vulgar spectacle, only here the clowns wear no masks, the ladies no spangles, the tent-stretching crew no gloves. No species of the class is omitted from the human menagerie which travels with "Cameron's World's Greatest Combined Shows." The mean, lean, taloned, competent Cameron, owner; his woman, Baby Buzzard, a leering, outworn bare-back rider; Silver Moon Dugan, who could "redlight" (pitch out of a moving train) an honest boy whose money he had in charge; Slug Finnerty and Gorilla Haley, who belonged to Dugan's gang of tent pitchers; the tragic Denna Wyoming, lion trainer; the profoundly pathetic Strong Woman; the hideous-souled Blackie, a Negro roustabout; the Moss-Haired Girl; side-show barkers, circus trailers, rubes real and rubes pretended—they are all here. We see them as they appear without, but the interest is focussed on what they are within. The next time I look out the car window as my train whizzes past a circus train waiting on a side-track, I shall have a better basis for wondering about the enigmatical faces that return my glance.

Jim Tully writes of his own experiences as a hobo who threw in with Cameron's shows. The critics all say that he has strength in his pen; he has. He also has a fatal facility. His formula for baring souls is too simple, sometimes superficial. Often he fails to perceive that mere nakedness may be no more revealing of character than Victorian wrappings. He has a sense of humor that William Edge does not have and somehow he better combines sympathy and detachment; but I doubt if he is as convincing.

During war time William Edge threw in with a man named Slim to work and bum over America. Slim had reformed from living in bourgeois comfort in order to follow the philosophy of Danny de Leon, socialist, and also to evolve and practice a labor philosophy of his own. Despite a lot of talk, recorded in "The Main Stem," that philosophy is vague. The two sophisticated hobo laborers wandered from city to city, from camp to camp, sometimes working hard and sometimes malingering but nearly always drawing fine wages; occasionally stealing, occasionally lying, always feeling superior to bosses and capital. The best thing about the book is the insight it gives into the ethics and morals of munition factory workers of both sexes. All the time he was wandering Mr. Edge had a notebook in his head, and it [illegible] a respectable home, and a typewriter.

A Frightened Woman

Flowering Quince. By Dorothy Van Doren. George H. Doran Company. $2.50.

Most novels weary me. They seem a waste and useless [illegible] not warranted to distract from the world about us. Occasionally I find one peopled by characters so vitally created, and so intent upon their business, that they in turn blow into me some breath of life. On equally rare occasions I find more delicate pleasure in a novel that seems to be written with disquieting quietness about something I have myself seen, noticed the stuff of but not the design. I am interested. The novel seems written for me to read, not to be sold to an editor primarily, or to preach a simple and saccharine gospel to the readers of women's magazines which the author most certainly does not live by.

Dorothy Van Doren's second novel is more beautiful than her first. "Strange" was a tale [illegible] of interwoven and very nice adulteries that turned gossip into social patterns, but left us without a moral but with a new sensitiveness. "Flowering Quince" is the story of a passive, sentimental woman. I have been reading it on the Massachusetts coast. [illegible] Queen Anne's lace on the meadow as beautiful as ever the rosy bush in Katherine Tanner's garden. Processions of Greeks and Poles go by my house to the stocking mills. Rich Jewish commercial artists have early American estates, on the road to the dunes, and a Chicago bath-tub manufacturer has built a [illegible] enclosed the beach where ten generations of natives have [illegible] for midsummer bathing. Of such social changes "Flowering Quince" takes no notice.

But of the women I meet in [illegible] whom nothing could have happened, nor merely women to whom nothing has happened, but women who would not let anything happen to them, this story is one account. You would say the heroine is of no importance, except that there she is, a peculiarly American phenomenon, her brown braids wound about her head, busy, asking the tenderness of understanding for her still-born puritan integrity. How did so many women come to be so afraid? How did so many women come to go to college, impervious there to any of the maggots called ideas? The novel asks no such questions, but with sure and sedate narration traces faint but flowing the life and adventures of the minister's daughter who found her greatest satisfaction in a flowering bush. What became of the dark-haired school teacher? The book is full of episodes without sequels. That is part of its life-like charm. Do the bolder women achieve very much? No, not especially. The war is there, seen through Emily Ann's eyes, the bank, the banker, lavish but a curiously impoverished man, and an old bush, a gnarled, sprawling quince bush, pyrus japonicus, pink flowering. . . .

The Private Diary of Leo Tolstoy, 1853-1857. Edited by Aylmer Maude. Translated by Louise and Aylmer Maude. Doubleday, Page and Company.

Written in a crucial period of Tolstoy's life, when he was finding himself both as artist and as philosopher, this hitherto unpublished diary is of the utmost value. But what a pity that Mr. Maude was not permitted by the Russian owner of the manuscript to translate the passages describing Tolstoy's amorous life during these years as well as his intellectual and professional career. The omissions thus made necessary are painful to think upon, particularly when it is considered how important was the role of sex in the titan's lonely drama.

The Religion Called Behaviorism. By Lewis Berman. Boni and Liveright. $1.75.

Since the founder of Behaviorism is himself inclined toward polemics he can hardly object to this little book by the author of "The Glands Regulating Personality." Dr. Berman is anxious not to be taken for a mechanist and makes a plea for the recognition of consciousness as a significant subject for study. To the layman alarmed by the simple materialism of the behavioristic theories he offers a popular explanation of "Gestalt" psychology as a way out. Pessimists on the point of suicide are bidden to "configurate with the universe."

Drama

Ibsen Again

With the exception of "A Doll's House," no other play of Ibsen's is so nearly reducible to the bare bones of its thesis as "An Enemy of the People." Dr. Stockmann is, of course, Ibsen himself and the whole is a parable intended as an answer to those of his enemies who talked as though the author of "Ghosts" were himself responsible for the pestilential poisons whose existence he was endeavoring to point out to his fellow citizens; but the play has comparatively little either of the fancy which marked his earliest efforts or of the mystical symbolism which makes the later plays interesting for the very reason that their meaning is so illusive. Much of "An Enemy of the People" is argument for argument's sake, essentially polemic rather than dramatic in its intention, and hence, it would seem, destined to be valuable only so long as it was new and fresh. Does not Dr. Stockmann himself tell us that truths grow old, that a "normally constituted one," living at most but seventeen or eighteen years, has precious little nourishment left in it even at that not very advanced age; has not "An Enemy of the People" already had more time than that in which to becomes one of those "majority truths which are like last year's cured meat?"

Yet the play, as intelligently revived by Walter Hampden at the Hampden Theater, proves far more interesting than a prediction based upon a priori principles would have led one to suppose. It is, to be sure, no longer the startling paradox which once it seemed; time has reduced many of its most daring lines to the status of mere liberal platitudes and has made it seem often more explicit in its argument than it is necessary to be in this day when the point of view from which it is written is so much more familiar than it was in 1882. Yet the play has wit enough to keep it sweet. Much of it is argument but not all of it is merely that. Dr. Stockmann is not simply a mouthpiece for an opinion. He is a genuine comic character conceived with great force, and because his convictions, the result of an individual experience, bear always the slightly fantastic stamp which make them his rather than exactly those of his creator, the whole possesses that permanency of interest which is inherent in character but not in argument. I went to the performance without great expectations, I came away with a renewed sense of the pleasure to be got even (or perhaps especially) in this day, when the stage is so shrill and so bustling, by contact with a play which time may have made seem somewhat subdued in its appeal but which is nevertheless marked everywhere by that serene power which is the sure sign of a greatness even as troubled as that of Ibsen was.

Nor is, I suspect, the continued vitality of the piece due entirely to the strictly dramatic virtues just insisted upon, for in point of fact not all its truths have yet become mere platitudes and the central discovery of Dr. Stockmann is one which has not grown acceptable and hence decrepit as rapidly as most discoveries do. When the play was written, the world had not had as much experience as it now has had with the fact that the "people" are not always so virtuous or so high minded as the rosy assumptions of democratic theory had pictured them. Ibsen himself was just awaking from the delusion born of the days when, power being all in the hands of the few, it was easy to assume that the disinherited majority had all the good intentions which the enthroned minority had not; and when he made Dr. Stockmann turn confidently to the crowd and find there, not the enlightened public which a century of untested liberal theory led him to expect, but merely the mob instead, he was revealing for the first time the bitter joke which time played upon the idealists who had built so much upon an "enlightened majority" such as never existed outside their own imagination. But is the problem there raised one which time has done anything to solve? Thousands of Noras slamming doors throughout the civilized world have answered effectively the question which "A Doll's House" asked, and it can have no longer any except an academic interest, but that which "An Enemy of the People" propounds is subject to no such conclusive response and grows, indeed, more puzzling the more effective the triumph of democracy becomes. Those advanced thinkers who lived under kings were in a sense happier than we. They could at least look forward to the blessed time when "the people should rule"; for us the fait accompli has dampened our optimism. We have learned well enough the lesson of Ibsen's play; we know well enough that "enlightened public opinion" is a pretty phrase and that "the mob" is a bitter reality; but we know no more than he what to do about it. Parties, whether liberal or conservative, are still parties and he is still strongest who is most alone.

Mr. Hampden has generally preferred roles somewhat more florid than his present one, but he gives a restrained and intelligent performance, and from a generally competent cast Cecil Yapp stands out because of a wholly admirable interpretation of Aslaksen, that excessively un-excessive exponent of "discreet moderation and moderate discretion."

Somerset Maugham's melodrama "The Letter" (Morosco Theater) is a good deal of a disappointment. A certain suaveness characterizes all its author's plays, but the present one is made from a short story, written in his brittlest manner, which does not even supply sufficient material for a full length play. Catherine Cornell takes full advantage of the two opportunities afforded for an emotional outburst, but if, as is obviously the case, she aspires to a high place in the contemporary theater, then why are two seasons devoted to "The Green Hat" followed by a play as obviously unimportant as "The Letter?" In "The Shannons of Broadway" (Martin Beck Theater) James Gleason has written for himself and Lucile Webster another comedy which, like his two previous efforts, can hardly be made amenable to critical censure. He has created two real and salty characters—members of a stranded vaudeville team—which depend for their effectiveness very largely upon an exploitation of his own and his wife's personalities, and he has projected them into a play composed exclusively of conventional hoakum which is never intended to be taken very seriously. The performance is continuously funny, but it belongs rather to the genre of vaudeville than to that of even farce. "The Garden of Eden" (Selwyn Theater) is a rather laborious comedy which deals with the adventures of a cabaret singer who finds true love while masquerading as a member of the fashionable world. It could only be made effective by the presence in the title role of someone with a more vivid personality than Miriam Hopkins has yet developed, and it succeeds only in giving the impression of being a musical comedy with the music and the dancing left out. At the Little Theater an amiable comedy called "Romancing 'Round" is saved from dangerous sentimentality by the admirable acting of Helen McKellar and by the charming ingenuousness of Charles Ritchie in the role of an irresistible young naval lieutenant.

The Australian Labor Situation

By C. HARTLEY GRATTAN

IN Australia there is the apparently anomalous situation of a highly developed labor group with extensive economic and political power, in a land that is in a low state of industrial development. In the United States the labor organizations include about 27 out of every thousand of population. In Australia the proportion is approximately 106 to the thousand. Australia was settled after the philosophy of trade unionism came into vogue. It is true that the first labor supply in the land was convict to a very considerable extent, but it must be recalled that the country was not developed in an intensive fashion until after the gold rushes of the fifties. Previous to that time grazing was the principal occupation, and it required unlimited land, but a small labor supply. To be sure the graziers had their difficulties in getting labor, but the laborers could not utilize the demand to their advantage. During the gold rush period certain of the building trades were able to make definite advances on the basis of scarcity of workers. The sole labor supply was then free labor, as transportation was discontinued in the middle of the nineteenth century. The building trades substantially increased their wages and got the eight-hour day. Since then, setting aside the severe reverses of the early nineties, progress had been steady.

The strategy of Australian labor has always been based on the lack of surplus population. Intensive organization of a small population and a careful limitation of immigration is at the basis of every success it has made. Furthermore, Australian labor leaders have never been faced with the task of organizing groups other than British in racial composition. The so-called "White Australia" policy which was developed out of the race riots on the gold fields has become dignified into a national dogma of high emotional value, and has been given firm support by the Commonwealth Immigration Act. Most of the immigrants have come into the country firmly grounded in the philosophy of trade unionism. And, finally, the leaders have accomplished the unique task of organizing the workers in the primary industries—the farm laborers, shearers, shepherds, boundary riders, and station (ranch) hands generally—into a strong union.

The importance of the population situation to the success of Australian labor is frequently emphasized. It is a constant preoccupation of the leaders. Resolutions are passed regularly and deputations wait on the Prime Minister to discuss the matter. No policy of immigration can be successfully adopted by any state or by the Commonwealth without the support of the unions. Contrary to the experience of the United States in the early days the availability of land does not control the labor market. It is difficult to get men to go on the land, and yet the labor policy is to favor only those immigrants who will go on the land. There is a more or less constant body of unemployed, which is a menace to the union position, and it is not wisdom to have it augmented. With a large body of unemployed and a constant influx of new hands it would not be long before the unions would lose their advanced positions.

Such advantages as a minimum wage of £4 4 (about $20.36), an elaborate compensation scheme for illnesses and accidents, old age and invalid pensions, together with strict factory legislation and similar boons, and such valuable achievements as child endowment and national unemployment insurance in prospect are not lightly to be toyed with, and could not have been won in the industrial sphere alone. Labor in Australia is the political power, for when it is not the party in power it holds the strategic advantage. It has not been in politics from its beginnings, but made its first moves in that direction in the early nineties, as a result of a series of severe set backs due to strikes that miserably failed. Australia passed through a severe crisis at that time caused partly by excessive land speculation and partly by severe droughts, which are and always will be the curse of the country. Today labor controls five out of the six states, and in the twenty-six years of the existence of the Commonwealth, labor has been in power for twelve. It expects to capture the Commonwealth Government in 1929.

Naturally with these tremendous successes at their backs the labor leaders are anxious to consolidate and confirm their gains. They aim, in no idle sense, to make Australia a workers' paradise. Class conscious to an extraordinary degree, their aspirations are very little tinged by bourgeois considerations. They firmly reject any advances from the employers that will sap their militancy, and consequently Australian employers can learn little from American employers. The Australian worker rejects with scorn such things as bonuses and welfare work. More important, he is firmly opposed to any industrial methods that increase the production of wealth and consequently employers' profits, without an exactly corresponding share for the worker. Australian labor resents any variety of "speeding up." It turns in horror from American methods. Yet while the leaders aim at a workers' paradise, they have not given any serious attention to the utilization of leisure. Sport, the Australian religion, absorbs surplus energies. Culturally the country does not profit at all.

II

But the paradisiac aspects of the situation, actual and prospective, do not keep labor satisfied. There is always something just beyond their grasp. And the extreme sensitivity and great power of the men makes for frequent strikes. Sometimes the strikes are intensified by race troubles, as in the sugar mills of Queensland at the present moment. The influx of Italians (who being white men and able to pass the educational requirements cannot be excluded) has exasperated the British workers. It must be recalled that there is no colored labor in Australia and all tropical agriculture is carried on by white men. The Italian has shown himself better adapted for tropical work than the Britisher, and consequently has tended to oust the latter. Furthermore, the Italians are not in the control of the unions, and the unions are reluctant to expend the effort to bring them in line. But as a rule Australian strikes are of purely economic significance.

Probably the most agitated question at the moment, after immigration, is compulsory arbitration. Labor is responsible for putting the laws on the statute books, and there is no general disposition to scrap the principle. The objection, which is strenuous, is to the way in which the machinery is being operated. Labor contends that the court is being used to its detriment. Mr. T. R. Ashworth, of the Victorian Employers Federation, recently remarked: "Mr.

A NEW BIOGRAPHY
BY LEWIS BROWNE

THAT MAN HEINE

By the Author of "This Believing World"
In Collaboration with Elsa Wild

THE life of Heinrich Heine was, like his work, one long, lyrical romance, of which Lewis Browne has caught every delicate meaning. The result is a scintillating biography of a saint and sinner, philosopher and fool, cynic and sentimentalist, scoffer and believer, hater and lover, poet, sardonic wit, and amazing genius. The story is stranger than fiction—and better than most of it.

Justice Higgins has written a book in which compulsory arbitration is called 'A New Province for Law and Order.' At the moment this province has reduced Australia to a condition bordering on anarchy." Early in 1926 the Federal Government asked the Court to determine the normal working week for all labor. To do so required a test case. By mutual agreement the employers and employees selected the engineering industry as a normal industry, and the engineers then applied to the court for an award giving them the forty-four hour week. The hearings lasted four months and cost $100,000. The unions won, but the employers immediately set machinery going to "whittle down and postpone the award." Consequently, it was not until May of this year that even the engineers got the forty-four hour week, and then certain concerns were exempted from the award. The rest of the workers were not included at all. Some unions, such as those in the construction trades and timber workers, had gained it earlier and so were not concerned. The workers in the exempted engineering factories immediately protested, eventually struck, and then were threatened by judicial order, with fines and imprisonment if they did not return to work. So the matter stands at the moment. The result is that labor is demanding changes in the arbitration act that the Government will probably grant, which will facilitate the meeting of employers and employees in conciliation committees on the round table idea before going to court, and presumably after, when the award is displeasing. Those hostile to the unions contend that they are scheming to emasculate and destroy the court and so return to direct action. With one or two exceptions the labor leaders profess loyalty to the court, but contend that they have interests that they cannot allow court awards to contravene, and when awards do contravene them they have no alternative but to fight. In other words, loyalty to the union program comes before loyalty to the court. The result is that Australian workers have not yet achieved the universal forty-four hour week. The engineers' case was but a partial victory for that trade, and no gain at all for the movement. It is announced that thirty-five other unions are about to go before the court in an effort to gain the forty-four hour week.

Judge Beeby, who made the final award in the engineers' case, made provision for "piece work, bonuses, and similar devices for individual bargaining instead of collective bargaining." Consequently the unions interpret it as "an attack on working class conditions." Dissatisfaction with the court was made sufficiently acute by the trouble over the forty-four hour week, but it was made doubly acute by injecting into the controversy the matter of piece work. Australian labor is as strongly opposed to piece work as it is in favor of forty-four hours. As pointed out the unions are opposed to any device that will increase the production of wealth without giving them a share in the acruing advantages. In the matter of piece work they contend that it both speeds up the worker and lowers wages. They stand for the weekly wage. A delegation of trade union officials recently waited upon the Attorney General (in the absence of the Prime Minister) and Mr. C. A. Lloyd, a principal figure of the movement, said in part:

> The workers did not want a forty-four hour week at the expense of their health, or of the community, or of the nation. They believed they had a right to a forty-four hour week without resorting to "speeding up" methods. If it were found they were exposed to long a reduced working week at the expense of their health.

Give the People Their Own War Power

By

THOMAS HALL SHASTID, M. D., LL. B., etc.

ALMOST the whole world is filled, now-a-days, with questions and discussions on peace and war. Especially, How can the world attain, if at all, to permanent peace? Yet not one person in ten thousand understands that, in no country on the globe, have the people themselves any vote, or legal say-so of any sort or kind, on war. What would happen if, in the four or five dominant nations of the world, the war-making power were removed from the hands of just a few politicians and placed in the hands of the people generally? To answer that question Dr. Shastid has writ ten this book.

I assume that you will want a copy without a penny and without delay.

I trust [illegible] yet a WAHR book.

THOUSANDS CHEER
the street cars in Grand Rapids

The people of Grand Rapids cheered a parade of new street cars. They were proud of them.

Light, speedy cars they were, with comfortable seats and quiet motors. They ran faster, carried more passengers, and saved power every mile.

Grand Rapids, like scores of other cities today, is helping people to realize more and more —that the public must be served.

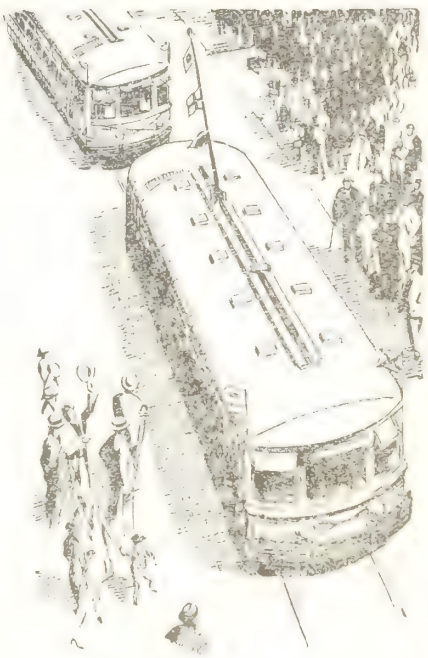
—that the demand for such a service will continue.
—that more passengers can be carried by the trolleys with less traffic congestion.
—that extensive improvements are being made.

Thousands cheered in Grand Rapids. Why? Because they appreciated the expression of service.



Since 1888, General Electric engineers have continually contributed to the industry. G-E designed motors are used on Grand Rapids cars, and on cars in city and suburban lines, and electrical elements of steam railway cars. G-E safety devices brakes, and control are used on cars of complete, modern transportation service.

THE MINISTER: Is it piece work you are now alluding to?

MR. CROFTS: Yes. The workers wanted to get over the difficulty without interfering with continuity of operations. But they were determined to resist what they considered unfair conditions. . . . Bonus system and piece work.

Yet some unions have accepted piece work when it appeared to their advantage to do so. They, however, would cheerfully abandon it. The cigar workers have accepted it. So have the clothing workers, in part. The unions will, however, accept piece work only to the extent that circumstances force them to do so, and will agitate for its abolition at all times.

III

It is idle to compare Australian industrial conditions with American. American industrial strategy with regard to labor is based on the existence of a large body of unskilled, unorganized labor. The technical methods of production are made possible by the presence of a huge home market. Neither condition exists in Australia. Nevertheless the Australian unionist has a horror of the possible Americanization of Australian industry. Writing in the Union Voice (Melbourne), Mr. Don Cameron of the Stewards Union, says:

> In a word, the Americanizing of Australia means that the workers of Australia, so far as it is possible to do so, are to be more effectively organized for the production of wealth, and more effectively rendered incapable of becoming self-conscious and masters of their own lives and the wealth that they produce by their labor.
> And then, as in America, and as the inevitable outcome, we would have here in Australia more of the ignorant and arrogant type of employers and their degenerate progeny; more crime and private murders, such as street executions and mob lynchings; more corruption and immorality both in public and private life; more religious bigotry of the anti-evolution and Ku Klux Klan brand; more sexual grossness and perversity in literature and the theaters; more drug fiends and freak social reformers; more weird Negro jazz music and the antics and dancing of primitive man; more of the extremes of the uncultured wealthy and the cringing poor, and more generally of men and things that are not only positively dangerous, but also the very antithesis of healthy and progressive social life.

Perhaps this is an extreme statement, but it certainly expresses, when reduced to lowest possible terms, the Australian attitude. And once again it is necessary to come back to the original proposition: The labor problem in Australia is linked up, like nearly every other problem, with the population problem. The interests of employer and employee are diametrically opposed on this issue. The one that controls immigration policy has the balance of power.

THE IMPERTINENCE of our naturalization courts has never been better illustrated than in the case of Madame Rosika Schwimmer, well known author and lecturer, who wants to become a citizen of the United States. Judge Carpenter, dean of federal district judges, before whom she appeared to be granted her final citizenship papers, denied her petition. Having ascertained that she was both an "unqualified atheist" and a pacifist, his Honor put to her this pretty little fiction: "If you were a nurse, caring for a wounded American soldier, and observed an armed enemy approaching, would you take up a pistol and shoot the enemy?" To this bit of nonsense, which Madame Schwimmer was kind enough to consider seriously instead of informing the judge that his question was irrelevant and immaterial, the answer was: "No." Madame Schwimmer added that she would warn the "wounded American soldier" of his danger, and that she would throw herself on the "armed enemy approaching" in an attempt to disarm him. "I would not kill a man even if he tried to kill me," she said. Judge Carpenter would doubtless be one of the last to deny that this was a Christian country; but he is not willing to suffer Christian sentiments from a professed atheist: "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you . . . resist not evil; but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also." Surely Judge Carpenter has heard those words before; it is perhaps just as well that the man who spoke them first is not seeking to become a citizen of the United States.

CARTER GLASS is on the war-path against the State Department's policy of supervising private loans to foreign governments and corporations. The practice grew up in Mr. Hughes's day of "requesting" American investing houses to submit their proposed loan contracts to the State Department, objecting to some and giving the others a form of indorsement. The objections may have been sound; but the procedure was both extra-legal and dangerous. The Nation some years ago exposed one banking house which assured investors that the State Department would hardly give its approval if it were not ready to use gunboats in the future as it has used them in the past; and since then the Department has been diligent in asserting that its approval involved no promise of protection. The implication, of course, remained; the policy smelled like the pre-war European custom of using private loans as instruments of political aggrandizement and gave indorsed loans a better chance with investors than unindorsed domestic loans. Some of the State Department's actions, also, have shown plainly that it meant to use its powers as a form of diplomatic pressure. Mr. Glass points out these dangers; he also insists with cogency that the Department of State > has no more right to prohibit the sale of American credits abroad by the National City Bank, the Chemical National Bank, or the house of Morgan, or all these combined, than it has to favor or veto the sale to the European trade of the products of General Motors, the United States Steel Corporation, Henry Ford, or any other private concerns in this country.

FOR IMPUDENCE, sheer and unadulterated, of the most unblushing kind the first prize goes without question to Theodore Roosevelt, Jr. This is the gentleman who is just now attacking Governor Smith and laying at his door the misgovernment of the city of Albany—although the Governor is the Governor of New York State and not the Mayor of Albany—and threatening that if he does not get a categorical answer in the next week he will make still further revelations and carry them right to the Governor's door. Now the man who says this is the same young gentleman who was the Assistant Secretary under Edwin Denby when the Navy Department consented to turning over the Teapot Dome and Elk Hills naval reservations to Messrs. Doheny and Sinclair, both of whom have been found guilty by the Supreme Court of having corruptly acquired these great resources. It has been alleged on Roosevelt's behalf that he did not understand the significance of Teapot Dome, though he has been charged with drafting the transfer order which President Harding signed, but, as we said at the time, a son of that President of the United States who sponsored and forwarded the conservation policy has no right to plead ignorance on such a score. Instead of resigning in protest, young Roosevelt had his brother made vice-president of one of Sinclair's companies; the brother later testified that he drew a fat salary, but did practically nothing. The same Theodore Roosevelt himself signed the order for the sending of a handful of armed marines under Captain G. K. Shuler to the Teapot Dome reserve for the purpose of expelling certain trespassers, in the interest of Mr. H. F. Sinclair. Mr. Roosevelt is one of the last men in America to talk to Governor Smith about civic virtue.

FROM SEVERAL READERS we have received protests in regard to our recent paragraph on Ruth Hanna McCormick (Mrs. Medill McCormick). These correspondents do not deny that because of her personal charm, her rare ability, and her extraordinary knowledge and understanding of politics, Mrs. McCormick is a most interesting figure in our political life, as set forth in the article we print elsewhere, but they call attention to the fact that she appears to have struck hands with the Crowe-Thompson machine than which, so writes one reader, "there is no more corrupt political gang in the country." Since Governor Small seems to have allied himself with Thompson, Mrs. McCormick is thus tied up with another one of the most deplorable figures in our governmental life. Again, Mrs. McCormick does not seem to have supported for reelection Judge Jerecki, who has been doing such admirable work in sentencing judges and clerks of election of both parties to jail for their criminal practices on election day. These are discouraging things to report about one who has in the past played an independent part in political life surprising in view of her inheritance. We shall see what we shall see, but we do not hesitate now to say that if Mrs. McCormick is really going to tie up with men like Thompson and Small for the sake of getting office she will gravely injure and not aid the political life of America and the position of women therein. We shall continue to hope that she will take a stand against the men who now control Chicago and Illinois.

PITTSBURGH, MELLON, COOLIDGE: the words flow with ease. But when one tries to say "Pittsburgh, injunction, Mellon, striking miners," the words refuse to mix. Probably President Coolidge noticed this, and so, speaking in Pittsburgh as a guest of Andrew Mellon, he simply left out the intrusive words. Instead, he delivered himself of these mellifluous thoughts:

> Andrew W. Mellon and Richard B. Mellon stand out as ... devoting themselves to the service of humanity, one by remaining as a leader in great financial and industrial enterprises and the other by turning his great talents to the administration of the treasury of the United States, where his leadership in the last six years has been greatly instrumental in restoring the universal equilibrium of the world.

IF JUDGE SCHOONMAKER'S FIAT is effectively enforced, and the Pittsburgh Terminal Coal Corporation has already proved a fund of $50,000 ... tempts of the organized miners to bargain or to maintain union wages will be prohibitively ... are "abusive language"; they must not ... ity of the mines; nor must they interfere with [i.e., talk to] ... coal-corporation employees or their families. ... which might interfere with the production, mining, transportation, or shipment of coal is restrained by the court. In addition to the foregoing restrictions, the corporation has won legal permission to regain possession of company-owned houses occupied by striking miners. Hitherto the lower courts had prevented the eviction of the strikers from company-owned houses; but the New York Times quotes Lee Hall, of the United Mine Workers, as saying:

> When the courts decided that the families could remain on the property, the company forbade trespassing on its property. This rule was applied to milk drivers, to the delivery of foodstuffs, and even doctors were refused permission to visit the striking miners unless given permission by the company. Families were prohibited from visiting one another unless the company agreed to allow such visits.
> In some instances representatives of the company tore the doors off houses, removed the roofs and windows, and did everything they could to make the places uninhabitable; all this despite the fact that the union has furnished bond to guarantee payment of rent.

Mr. Coolidge might have looked around before asserting that the conditions of unskilled laborers are "greatly improved over what they ever before received."

THE BRITISH MENACE is not only confined to Chicago, where School Superintendent McAndrew is being tried, among other charges, for having permitted "pro-British" textbooks to poison the minds of his young charges. "Modern History," a textbook compiled by Carlton Hayes and Thomas Parker Moon of Columbia University, is being attacked by the New York Veterans of Foreign Wars as containing "subtle falsehoods designed to restore America into sentimental, spiritual, and political subjection to Great Britain." The statement further says: "The inspired men of sublime zeal and genius who startled the world with their new conception of human rights [we take it the Fathers of the American Revolution are meant] are charged with having plagiarized it all from the store of British principles." Which is perhaps natural enough, considering that each of these inspired sublimities was for many years of his life a British subject, and many of them were born on England's soil itself. We confess that we are not alarmed by the prospect of a spiritual alliance with Great Britain; it seems to us the most desirable thing in the world that these two great nations, speaking the same language and with a common tradition, should be joined spiritually always, politically on occasion, and even, if necessary, sentimentally. The thought of America being "subject" to Great Britain, or vice versa, is the veriest nonsense, and we shall be certainly in a bad way if we select our textbooks by guessing at their probable political effect.

SAMUEL GOMPERS is dead; but his cautious soul still dominates the American Federation of Labor. Indeed, it becomes more cautious year after year. Its Los Angeles convention this month just marked time. Again the federation approved rigid restriction of immigration; it turned down the New York resolution calling for the "withdrawal of the war fleet and marines from China, Nicaragua, and other countries occupied by the armed forces of the United States"; it refused to associate with European labor; and it side-stepped the Boulder Dam issue. When Max Hayes of Cleveland ridiculed officials for "cooling their heels" in the anterooms of old-party bosses the delegates applauded, but they voted against independent political action. The high moguls of the federation have not yet recovered from the shock of indorsing La Follette in 1924, and until they get a new courage and a new faith in themselves—or until they are replaced—there will be scant progress toward a labor party in the United States. Even the "new wage policy" which bounced into the headlines was hardly new. The principle that gains in industrial productivity should spell increased wages as well as increased profits is sound enough; and labor certainly needs competent research men as well as competent publicity men to help it present its case to the public; but fundamentally unions will still have to depend upon mass economic power. And the federation still hesitates at the decisive problem of organizing the unorganized.

IN SPAIN STRANGE THINGS are happening. Professor Besteiro of Madrid has dared publicly to attack both the dictator, Primo de Rivera, and King Alfonso, placing direct blame upon the two for the failure of the Moroccan campaign as well as for domestic difficulties. Oddly enough, Professor Besteiro's position as chief of the Socialist Party and head of the Spanish Federation of Labor seems to keep him out of jail. Five hundred persons not so influential have recently been locked up on suspicion of plotting against the government. To allay this opposition and tension throughout Spain the National Assembly has been called and is now enjoying its first session since the establishment four years ago of the Primo de Rivera dictatorship. As a democratic institution this National Assembly is a mere gesture. It presents as fine a collection of hand-picked delegates as any dictator ever dictated to. Of the 400 members half have been selected by de Rivera personally, and the remaining 200 by the mayors of the municipalities, who were themselves appointed by de Rivera. Furthermore, the functions of the assembly are limited to advising. If the general unrest in Spain at present is symptomatic of a real movement for representative government, it is difficult to see how the feeble collection of wooden sticks in the National Assembly will satisfy or allay it.

FLOGGINGS IN ALABAMA are not to go unpunished. After two years of the most lawless activity on the part mainly of members and even officers of the Ku Klux Klan, the grand jury has returned 102 indictments against 36 men in Crenshaw and Butler counties. The Klan fought bitterly to prevent such an outcome and its political strength in that part of the State was considerable: to several courageous newspapers must go the credit for having forced action by the grand jury. The jury's report is as severe an arraignment of the Klan as any Southern State has ever offered:

> We find that in most, if not all, of these cases these outrageous acts of hooded mobs wearing the regalia of the Ku Klux Klan are the evil fruits of leadership at war with all constituted authority and done in bigoted disregard of the courts. . . . Nothing can be more cowardly . . . than for persons who call themselves men to gather together pursuing to so gather under the banner of Christ, and . . . there before the Cross of Christ to plot and plan, to conspire and concoct, connive and conjure up the yellow deeds, the diabolical schemes, the unmerciful lashings, and the cowardly torturing attacks which have . . . been committed upon defenseless men and women, white and black, in this country.

We submit that this is fine rhetoric and admirable plain speaking at the same time. The grand jury urges immediate and fearless action by petit juries when the cases are brought to trial. Attorney General McCall, who, though himself a Klansman, has vigorously conducted the investigation, promises that the cases will be heard in the regular term of the Circuit Court beginning November 7.

THE TESTIMONIAL DINNER given last Saturday to Professor Morris R. Cohen in celebration of his twenty-five years of teaching at the College of the City of New York was a significant event in the intellectual history of the city. More than a thousand persons, ranging from devoted young men only a year ago in Mr. Cohen's classes to such distinguished philosophers as John Dewey, Bertrand Russell, and Mr. Cohen's former teacher, Dean F. J. E. Woodbridge, came to pay homage to a man who has done, as Felix Frankfurter said, nothing more useful than to live a "useless" life. He has merely taught thousands of students the beautiful and impractical virtues of candor and uncompromising intelligence. He has in his critical articles done much to call philosophers back from hasty enthusiasm for uncertified gods. The tributes were astounding in the diversity of their sources and subjects. Einstein wrote a letter praising Mr. Cohen as a mathematician and Justice Holmes wrote him a letter praising him as a jurist. But it was not to pay tribute to a scientist and a critic that a thousand people came together. It was perhaps above all to express their affection for an intelligence singular in its integrity and beautiful in its sweetness. It was a great occasion and should remind the city whose college boasts such a philosopher what it has to boast of.

> Speak roughly to your little boy
> And beat him when he sneezes. . . .

BUT what can you do with a robot? The new mechanical man created by the Westinghouse Electric Company will close the door if you tell him to, but only if you speak in a voice with a pitch of 900 vibrations a second. You may shout at a human office-boy; you may throw rocks at the dog or your stenographer, and still expect a degree of responsiveness. To a robot you must speak softly, you must be polite and kind, or you may wait all day for your commands to be carried out. The Westinghouse Company announces that three mechanical men are already at work in the War Department, earning their mechanical equivalent for bread and butter. Others are being tried out, shutting doors, turning off switches, detecting short circuits, and otherwise making themselves useful twenty-four hours a day. The robot knows nothing of union hours; he works on holidays without complaint; and, if he demands a soft, low-toned command, he is docile and obedient once he has heard it. The possibilities of this new invention are not a little frightening. We may have mechanical waiters, cooks, book agents, authors, musicians, and editors. But let us never have any robot in a situation more personal than, say, that of President of the United States. There a robot might do very well; he could easily and comfortably ride the mechanical horse; he could execute orders without fuss, without complaint, without objection; and he could learn to shake hands interminably, saying "Delighted" at intervals of a second or so. Such a device should be elected not for four years but for life.

Calling Men by Their Right Names

AGAIN a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States quickens the belief that justice may still on occasion prevail in America against wrongdoers in the seats of the mighty at Washington, against the big-business thieves who steal millions and their journalistic protectors. In the Teapot Dome case the court has followed its own precedent of the Doheny-Elk Hills suit, and has declared the leasing of the Wyoming naval-oil lands by Sinclair to have been "procured by corruption" and to have been "tainted with fraud" from beginning to end. It again brands ex-Secretary Fall, who took the $100,000 bribe from Doheny, as a "faithless public officer," and repudiates his story that the $230,000 worth of Liberty bonds passed to him by Harry Sinclair constituted a legitimate transaction. It was, the court declares, a "clandestine and unexplainable acquisition" of "sinister significance." For all time these men and their associates are thus branded as crooks by the highest court in the land, from which there is no appeal. It makes no difference what the outcome of their criminal trial now taking place in Washington will be. The Supreme Court has stamped them as faithless Americans who cheated and betrayed their country in order to line their pockets.

The deep significance of this goes far beyond the recovery of the oil lands. This is the final triumph of the movement to purge the government which was set on foot by one great but bitterly calumniated American, the late Robert M. La Follette, who called attention to what was going on a year before public action began. He was ignored by the majority in the Senate and out, although The Nation and other free journals and the few Progressive Senators came to his aid. But when, under the leadership of Senators Walsh and Wheeler of Montana, the Senate inquiries were set on foot, all the forces of big business and of the commercialized daily press mustered successfully to destroy the effectiveness of that attack. One would have thought that these Senators were the arch criminals—not those whom the Supreme Court has just convicted of everything that was charged against them. Many of the leading newspapers printed with highest editorial approval the statement sent out by the Republican National Committee in March, 1924:

> If the innovation of proving honest men and public officials guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors by introducing testimony of convicts and ex-convicts, crooks, forgers, bribe-takers, murderers, train robbers, and other criminals is to be followed, then there is no end in sight of the present investigations until all the inmates of our penitentiaries have been put on the stand.

The deliberate adoption of the policy of writing down the scandals, in which pleasant pastime no newspapers were more distinguished than our highly respectable New York Times and Herald Tribune, succeeded in confusing the public mind so that the rascals were not driven out of public office at the next election and Mr. Coolidge, who retained Daugherty and Denby and never once has lifted his voice to denounce corruption in high office, was reelected.

We agree with the New York Telegram that this decision of the Supreme Court is an imperishable monument to Robert M. La Follette. Just at present it must come with heartening vigor to the group of Progressives who have boldly met together, Senator Borah sitting with them, to run an honest man for the Presidency in the Republican primaries, and to declare their allegiance again to the Progressive causes which have been betrayed and sold out by the Democracy of Woodrow Wilson as well as by the crooked and debased party that was once Abraham Lincoln's. Not only do the mills of the gods continue to grind exceeding fine; the spirit of revolt cannot be downed. It is well that the editorial writers of the New York Times are again ridiculing the handful of honest men in Washington; it is proper that these new editorial assaults should appear simultaneously with the Teapot Dome decision. If it had rested with the Times the Doheny and the Sinclair cases would never have reached the Supreme Court; they would have been smothered under its deprecations of the "muckrakers" and "scandal-mongers," the "mud-throwers" to whom, and to whom alone, we owe the fact that the good name of the United States has, in this matter at least, been vindicated.

For ourselves, we hail with joy the announcement of Senator Borah, Senator Nye, Senator Norris, and their associates that they are determined to do their uttermost to prevent the nomination of another Harding ready to put criminals in the Cabinet, or of another Coolidge ever ready servilely to lick the boots of Big Business—as he has again done in Pittsburgh where he has praised the brothers Mellon, owners of the crookedest of crooked political machines, as the type of men whom the students of Pittsburgh's colleges should regard as the finest in the land.

It is impossible to tell what results this group action will have in the country and in the next Republican convention, but it can only be heartening and inspiring to every decent-minded American that these men are willing once more to stand in the open to face the fresh press attacks which will come to them for championing anew the righteousness that brought the Cabinet crooks of Warren Harding to justice. They can exert a profound influence. They can perform the magnificent public service of being once more a protestant minority. They can give to millions of citizens the opportunity to vote in the primaries for one of the finest Americans, and one of the most devoted of patriots who ever went to Washington, Senator George W. Norris of Nebraska.

True, Daugherty and Fall are not yet in jail. We care nothing for that; we would not send anybody to jail as jails are now organized and run. The glorious fact is that a great wrong has been undone; that some of the millions stolen from the American people have been restored; and that the group of honest men, which makes Congress such a living force, is again on the warpath, reinforced by Senator James A. Reed of Missouri. Senator Reed has just refreshingly told the truth by saying that Harry Daugherty is "as vile an insect as ever crawled across the page of time," and has drawn fresh attention to the fact that the present President of the United States never lifted a hand to expose the oil-land fraud, but "remained as mum and inactive as a Boston oyster stranded on the beach in the month of August." Thank fortune, the Republic is getting back to a period of political activity and to the good old-fashioned American practice of calling men by their right names, however high the offices they hold.

Exhibitions and Expositions

WHEN the Philadelphia Sesquicentennial Exhibition shut down after six ghastly months, with losses running into the millions, there were many to say that the day of such exhibitions, or fairs, was over. The public, it was contended, knows so much of what is going on in the world through the radio, the movie, and the illustrated daily, that it is too sophisticated to be drawn readily to a celebration like that in Philadelphia. At the Chicago World's Fair the Venetian gondolas and the Javanese village fascinated millions to whom they were entire novelties. Today every child has seen Javanese and Ceylonese villages on the screen and more romances than one in which the hero escapes the doge's headsman by lying in the bottom of a gondola as it drifts lazily along the Grand Canal.

The reasoning is plausible but false. The Sesquicentennial failed because it deserved to fail. It was conceived in politics and born in graft, or near-graft, and inefficiency. It was never really finished and what there was did not fill the beholder with enthusiasm. The public knows when it has been fooled, and, unlike some of the spectators observed by Huckleberry Finn, did not pretend that it had seen a wonderful show in order that others might also be fooled. It went home and told the truth.

By contrast a three weeks' exhibition which has just closed near Baltimore has been an amazing success—the Baltimore & Ohio celebration of the first century of its existence. Originally planned for two weeks, the "Fair of the Iron Horse" had to be extended for another week and it could have been extended indefinitely. Yet it was not advertised in New York and other cities. It was not opened by a great political light and baptized with fulsome oratory. There was no jazz, and there were no "barkers." One could spend money only for eatables, souvenirs, and soft drinks. there was no entrance fee, and the railroad charged only twenty-five cents for the round trip of sixteen miles from Baltimore and return. It was an exhibition frankly devoted to one purpose—the history of railroad transportation, and yet the place was crowded—on one weekday 81,000 persons jammed the trains from Baltimore until they suggested the New York subways. In two weeks 1,200,000 persons attended the exhibit. An entrance fee would not have deterred these crowds; they were extraordinarily intelligent and they were extraordinarily interested in what they saw. They were obviously familiar with the movies. Yet they stood many rows deep about the Indian village, and though doubtless many had seen the movie entitled "The Iron Horse" and in dozens of films had become familiar with the prairie schooner, they were fascinated by the real schooners and the Wells-Fargo stage that appeared in the pageant.

The show succeeded because it was a good show, admirably put on, and the circumstance that the Baltimore & Ohio got an enormous amount of advertising out of it cannot hide that fact. It was a B. & O. show, but it was more than that. For the Pennsylvania and the New York Central were there, too, and an English railroad had sent its finest new engine, the "King George V," as an act of friendship and good-will. Daniel Willard, the president, and Edward Hungerford, who was the director for the B. & O., were wise enough to make this a remarkable historical exhibit and to realize that the exhibits themselves were the road's best advertisements. The visitor never felt that the B. & O. was being rammed down his throat at every turn. It was all as much worth while from the standpoint of every railroad in the country as from that of Mr. Willard's.

After the first three or four days there was no need to announce the show; the banners and posters could have been taken down—the crowd would still have poured out. For the pageant given twice a day told concisely the whole story of the rise of transportation in America from the days of the Indian's birch-bark canoe and "bull-boats" to the latest train de luxe. The trains all went past the reviewing-stand under their own steam—even engines acquired by the B. & O. ninety-seven years ago. The public was thrilled when, for instance, the first train ever run in Minnesota steamed past in quaint simplicity, and in old-fashioned yellow. It climbed into the latest engine-cabs with the same thirst for knowledge which made it joyously examine the first Pullman and that tragic engine, "The General," whose capture by Northern soldiers and recapture, with the ensuing execution as spies of some of the Federals, was one of the most daring and dramatic episodes of the Civil War. And not a cheap side-show anywhere; no fat women, no Siamese twins; just pieces of machinery, old or superb in their modernity. Nor was an automobile, or a radio, or an airplane to be seen. They did not exist for the Fair of the Iron Horse.

No, exhibitions are not dead. The movie may, indeed, even have stimulated a taste for the real instead of the pictured thing. The Baltimore & Ohio has proved that crowds will come to study and be instructed, provided they are given the worth-while and the genuine in a straightforward and honest manner.

What Is Happening in China

WHEN the Chinese Nationalists started North from the Yangtze River last spring, the Japanese landed troops in Shantung, advanced them inland along the railway, and announced that in order to protect Japanese lives and property they would not permit military operations in the neutral zones thus established. The Nationalists were unable to advance; behind the Japanese screen the Northerners reformed their forces. And after the Nationalists had been driven South the Japanese announced that they would withdraw their forces from Shantung. We have not yet heard that they have done so.

The tide of civil war shifted westward. Yen Shi-shan, China's prize fence-rider, the governor of Shansi Province, who through sixteen years of revolution had managed to maintain neutrality and keep his province from the ravages of civil war, at last entered the struggle. For three years he had wavered and wabbled. He had, ostensibly, made alliances with the North—but had stayed at home when invited to enter battle on the North's side. This year he flew the banner of the Nationalists and advanced against Peking. There is reason to believe that he was urged forward by promises of aid from the "Christian general," Feng Yu-hsiang, whose promises have so often proved treacherous; and the net effect of Governor Yen's attempt to take the Northern capital may be that Feng will take Yen's place as commander of the rich province of Shansi. Feng, after two years on the edge of the desert, needs a more fertile camp for his armies. At any rate, Yen's army has been driven back by the Northern forces which owe allegiance to Chang Tso-lin, who in turn remembers that Japan has more than once saved his forces from destruction.

The center and south of China remain in the hands of variously defined groups of Nationalist generals; only since the collapse of the Hankow Government the generals seem to be more important than the Nationalism. No general can hold power in that territory without yielding lip-allegiance at least to the principles of Sun Yat-sen; but most of them have been [illegible] the peasant associations and labor unions which gave that movement its broad basis in the civilian population. A so-called "Communist" army has established itself in Kiangsi province and at Swatow in northern Kwangtung, but it has yet to prove itself more genuinely devoted to the people than the other armies which prey on the civilian population. Feng and Yen, in the Northwest, also declare allegiance to Dr. Sun's principles, but theirs are again personal military dictatorships.

Meanwhile, in this moment of discouragement, Japan is quietly forcing the issue and tightening her grip upon Manchuria. When, after the Washington Conference in 1922, Japan returned Shantung Province to China, she left unsurrendered the claims upon Manchuria which she had extorted from China as part of the infamous Twenty-one Demands of 1915. The Chinese Government declared that the treaty, being extorted by force majeure, was invalid; the American Government refused to recognize at least certain parts of it; and for a time the Japanese Government, secure in essential control of Manchuria, seemed content to let the matter rest. But Japan today has a new Government, committed to a "positive policy" in China.

Japan now demands that Japanese citizens be permitted to lease lands and erect buildings anywhere in Manchuria—a right not allowed foreigners in other parts of China; that China should cease building railway lines in Manchuria which parallel and rival Japan's South Manchuria Railway; that the Chinese agree to extension of the Japanese lines in Manchuria; and that the Chinese permit Japan to open a new consulate in Linkiang—a town where Japan has no trade, but which has been a center of the Korean independence movement. Furthermore, Japan is reorganizing her bureaucracy in Manchuria, giving more power to the officials of the South Manchurian Railway—a railway which is a government in itself, with a certain territorial jurisdiction, its own police and schools, and its own coal and iron mines. And, finally, the Japanese Diplomatic Review, a semi-official publication, has been rewriting history, voicing the curious doctrine that the Chinese "have no voice at all in regard to Manchuria and Mongolia"—a plain hint of annexation to come.

In North Manchuria the Japanese have encouraged the Chinese to drive the Russians out of control of the Chinese Eastern Railway. There the Japanese lose their hallowed respect for the sanctity of treaties; and the Chinese, with their open encouragement, have seized the fleet which was a joint Chinese-Russian property, taken over administration of the railway schools, flooded the offices with incompetent Chinese employees, and forced the Russians to deposit half the receipts in Chinese banks. It is, from the point of view of Chinese Nationalism, a healthy precedent, but the Japanese do not intend to let it be followed in South Manchuria; they are eager only to get rid of rival Russian influence.

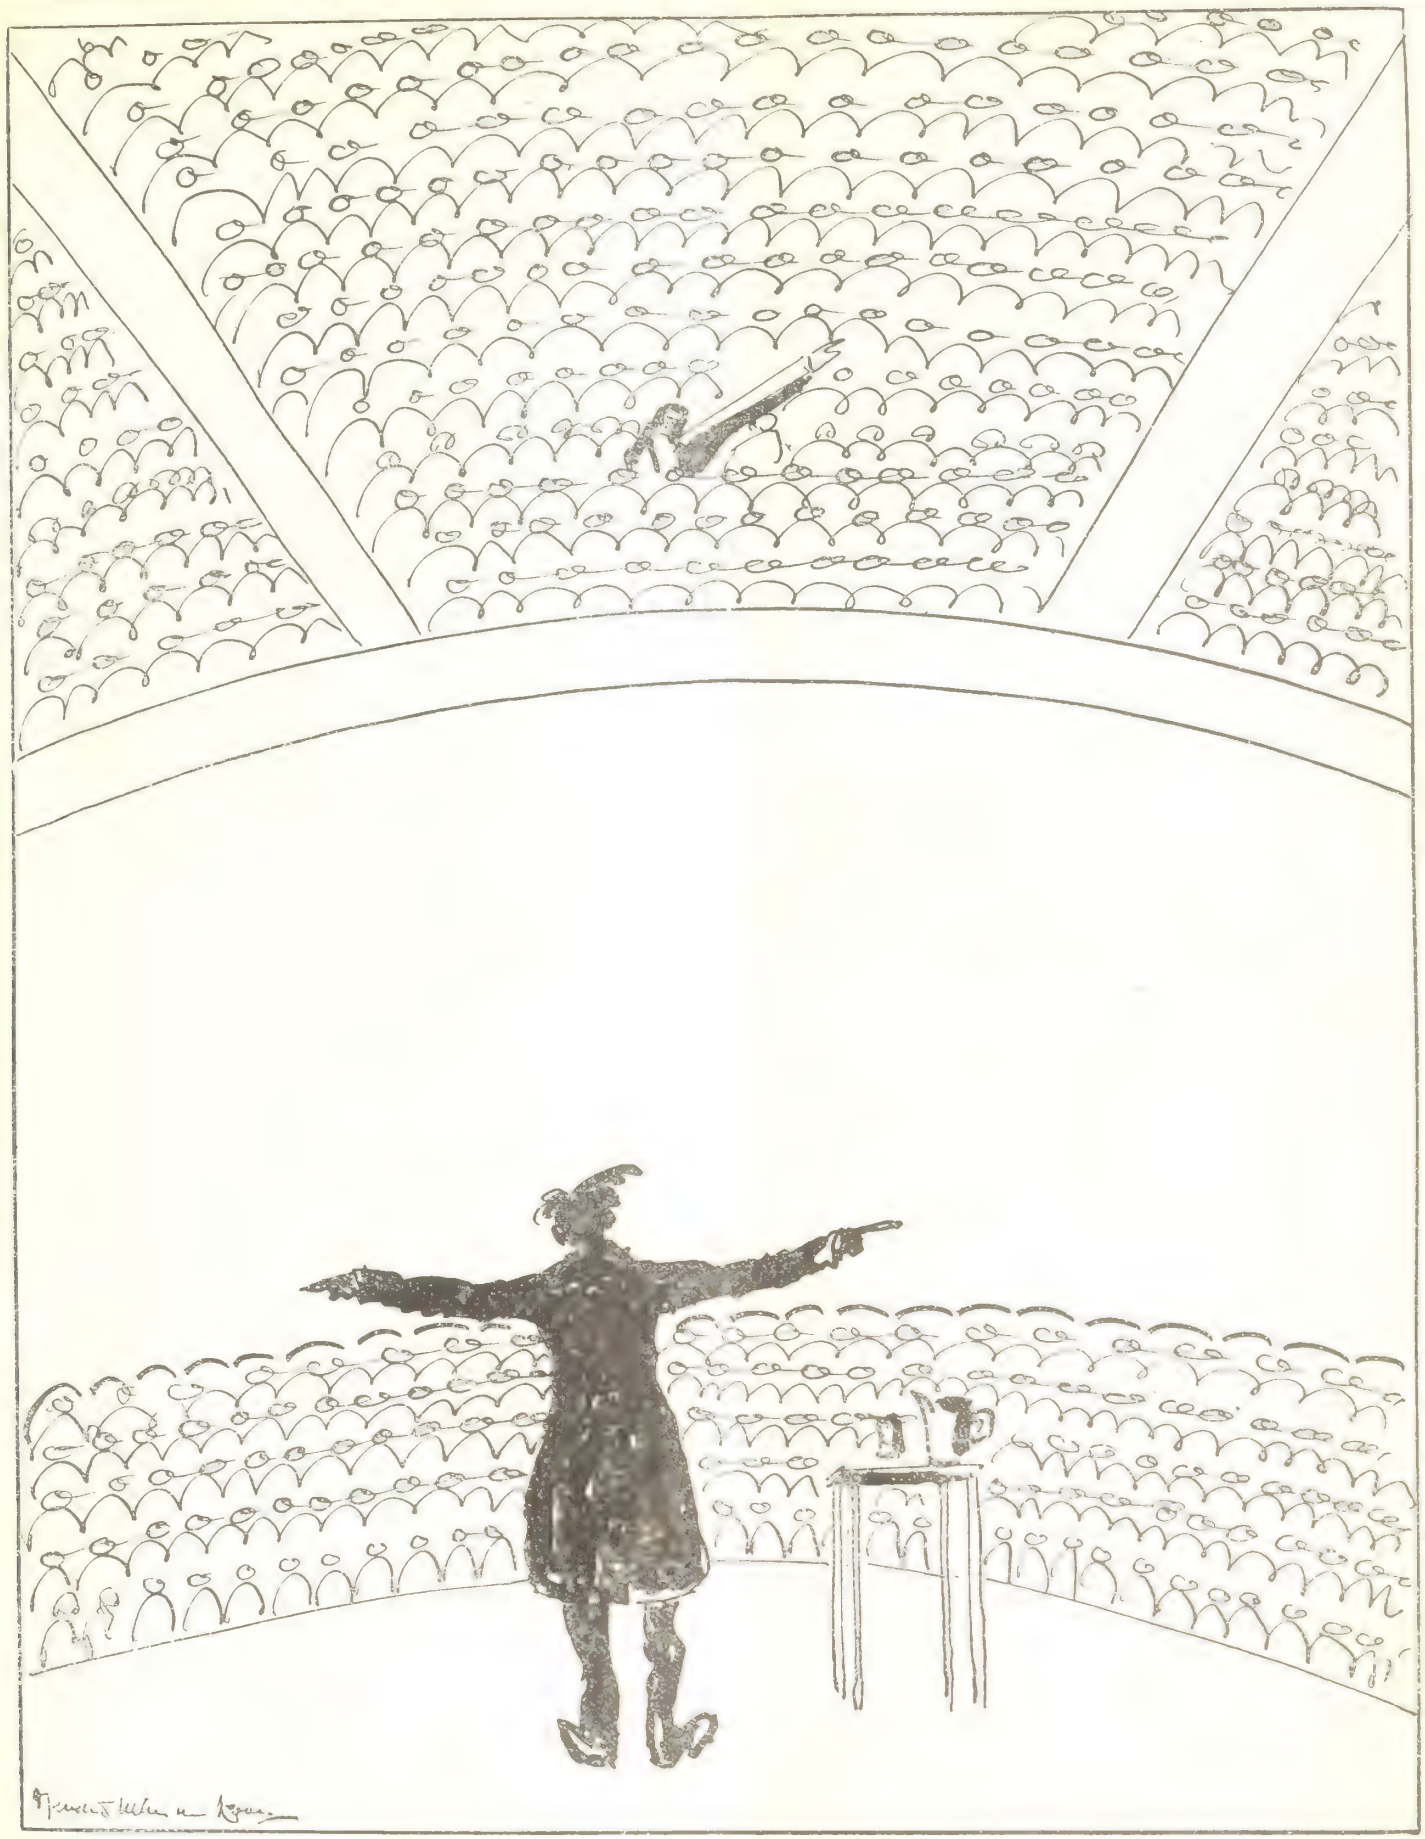
So today the question of immediate importance is not whether an army flying the Nationalist flag can take Peking, but whether the inchoate force of Nationalism will be strong enough, even in Northern territory, to stop Japan's program of gradual annexation.

Well, Then, a Short Cheer

THE other heroes of the air seem somewhat more than mortal, but not Levine. And it is heartening to have a demigod capable of supplying that clay which makes for comfort and controversy. This transatlantic flying has, in its latter days, assumed grim aspects. There is need for knocking at the door and for some porter to amble on and relieve the tension with the proper touch of rowdy comedy. Others may choose to remember Lindbergh alone, facing the fell clutch of sleet, but there is more warmth in the picture of Levine bouncing about on Croydon field. They say that when the wheels of the Columbia first touched the soil of England the plane rose up again full twenty feet as if even the red earth spurned this little man in business attire.

Most of the traditions of the air Levine has violated. It cannot be denied that he brought to flying a disturbing touch of commercial instinct. However, it should be added that it was the role of Potash which he played and not that of Morgan. Out of his schemes he seems to have profited very little and at the moment the only rewards within his grasp appear to be a speech from Mayor Walker and a complimentary dinner in Far Rockaway. Whether it was his intent or not Charles A. Levine looms up as the purest amateur who ever leaped across the broad Atlantic. Chivalry and sportsmanship are beautiful, and a little false. Levine has earned ill-will by being far more frank than any of the others. "Lindbergh had all the luck," he is supposed to have said when the Columbia grounded obscurely in a German village. This was bad taste and niggling, but surely it was also an honest expression of opinion. A tactless man goes naked into the world and must fight at each cross-road in his journey. Such has been the fate of Levine. The records show that he has bickered with everyone he met in Europe except the Pope. Legends grow up around all heroes, and it may be that one anecdote associated with the flier is not quite literally true. "No," said a man across whose field Levine and Chamberlin passed in the night, "I did not see the plane but I know they went this way because I heard them arguing."

Not for Levine will be the roses and the motion-picture offers. There is no evidence that he has been asked to give out autographs and kisses. Some wit has said that his return up through the canyons of New York City would be unmarked by the traditional ticker tape of triumph and that instead subpoenas would rain from every window. But after all, there is no getting away from the fact that he flew across the ocean. He is not Galahad precisely or anyone in shining armor, but the Atlantic is just as dangerous and deep for the ludicrous as for the sublime. It has been something of a strain to play up to the various immaculate heroes. We have been upon our knees to the others. Now we can rise, and even stoop a little, as we reach out a hand toward this little flying tradesman, and there need be no lack of cordiality in the greeting as we shake his hand and say, with true Far Rockaway courtesy, "Excuse my glove."



In the Presidential Year

"My fellow-citizens, ours is the greatest country underneath the sun. We have the most powerful navy in the world. Our army is invincible. There is no limit to our resourcefulness. There is not anything which as a nation we can not achieve. . . ."
Voice from the Gallery: "Hey Mister, get me a cook."

It Seems To Heywood Broun

THE Irish are always being insulted by somebody. They take more umbrage than is good for them. At least they sometimes fail to carry it with becoming dignity. The fine old fighting Gael of the legends has dwindled into a whimperer who cries out, "There ought to be a law," whenever he is hit. And now the proposal has been made in New York City that the toes of every Irishman shall be made a special government preserve with punitive penalties for each trespasser. Joseph McKee, president of the Board of Aldermen, wants a new ordinance empowering the Commissioner of Licenses to close any motion-picture theater if it shows a film which tends "to ridicule, disparage, or hold up to obloquy or contempt any race, creed, or nationality." Also the commissioner is to be empowered to proceed against such movies as are "calculated to arouse racial, national, or religious prejudice, or do in fact give offense to a considerable number of any race, creed, or nationality." The members of the oppressed nationality are instructed that they "shall report same to the Commissioner of Licenses who shall thereupon abrogate and cancel the license or licenses of the theater or theaters exhibiting such motion pictures."

It is true that the proposed ordinance does not specify offenses against Irish sensitivity, but Mr. McKee stated that his bill was based on a complaint from the American Irish Vigilance Committee and that the particular films which he had in mind were "The Callahans and the Murphys," "Irish Hearts," "The Shamrock and the Rose," and "The Garden of Allah."

Of the works listed, I have seen only "The Callahans and the Murphys." It seemed to me a silly and vulgar production and yet I cannot agree that the legal system of a great city should be radically altered because of this unhappy film. Concerning the other three upon the black list I can only guess. The inclusion of "The Garden of Allah" puzzles me. I had been under the impression that this was a story dealing chiefly with camels. Possibly it is insulting to the Arabs of New York who are prepared to come forward and protest in considerable numbers. It is fair for us to assume that none of the scorned scenarios offends against purity as there is already ample machinery in the State of New York to deal with such transgressions. The crime which they commit must consist of ridicule. Possibly the authors of these impertinent stories have been devilishly malignant in scoffing at the greatness of the Irish people.

And even so I think it a grave mistake to summon censors. Possibly Mr. McKee has not considered the potentialities of his little ordinance. After all, polyglot New York harbors nationals less rich than the Irish in humorous appreciation. I should like to state the sort of case which might arise under the proposed law. Recently, within a great cinema temple, I saw a motion picture which contained the caption: "What is the difference between a Scotchman and a canoe? A canoe tips."

This did not move me to enormous merriment, for I had heard the joke some several years ago. Still, I had not regarded it as insidious propaganda calculated to arouse national prejudice. Under the law my feelings in the matter would be wholly irrelevant. This would be a matter for Scotchmen to decide. Let us suppose, then, that thirty thousand Caledonians marched to the license office with bagpipes skirling to keep their anger hot. Even the city official would be without the power to reason why. Under the law the decision would lie wholly with the offended nationality, and the Commissioner of Licenses would be compelled to say, "Thirty thousand Scotchmen can't be wrong" and close the theater.

Because of one small sorry jest "The Dance of the Hours" could never more be heard in that great gilded auditorium and the passing multitude of merry-makers would be compelled to walk full half a block to find another theater in which to get a baritone version of "The End of a Perfect Day." Mr. Cecil de Mille might some day, God forbid, produce "Hamlet" upon the silver screen. What if the director were incautious enough to let the harassed Prince exclaim, "There's something rotten in the state of Denmark"? This should be enough to make Danes descend upon the City Hall in clusters crying out for cloture.

Atheists might with perfect logic protest against that great million-dollar Biblical masterpiece "The King of Kings" on the ground that this Gospel narrative tended to hold the creed of unbelief up to contempt. I'm afraid they would not get far, for it is always difficult to gather atheists together in considerable numbers for any purpose. Generally they are too busily engaged in good deeds to take up organization. The Chinese, also, might fail in procuring the suppression of "Broken Blossoms," though this tale from "Limehouse Nights" most certainly falls within the classification of themes disparaging a race. It might be remarked parenthetically that when the Negroes of New York asked for action against "The Birth of the Nation" they received but scant official attention.

Under a strict interpretation of the McKee ordinance things might come to such a pass that the scenario writer wishing to include a villain among his characters would have to make him a Moabite or Hittite or a member of some other civic minority not numerous enough to muster considerable numbers even under provocation.

As a matter of fact, no other nationals have come forward to join the Irish in their plea for censorship along racial lines. The Jews of New York have always been patient with the Perlmutters and Potashes. No Frenchman as far as I know has objected to the film tradition that every Gaul is a waiter whose articulation is limited to "Ou la la." Not all the pictures dealing with the war have been wholly sympathetic with the Germans, but as yet Mr. Viereck has failed to raise a finger. The Portuguese and the Argentines and the Greeks, all these are mute.

I think it is fair to say that of the proud peoples who dwell within the borders of New York none approaches the Irish in the demand for special fictional and dramatic favors. Sidney Howard's play "They Knew What They Wanted" was refused by dozens of managers before it found shelter within the chill arms of the Theater Guild. The commercial producers knew well enough that here was an excellent play, but they feared to put it on because an Irish priest was represented as being a little less than superbly educated. The notion of a rascally Irish prelate is unthinkable upon the stage of New York. No producer in the city would have dared to touch "Rain" if the unfortunate missionary had been called Father Kelly.

The present protest against cheap and vulgar films of Irish life and character would win more sympathy from me if the Celts had not been so ready in the past to accept and even applaud so large an amount of trash if only it were sentimental. I have yet to hear of any vigilance committee raising a single shillelagh against the noxious banalities of "Abie's Irish Rose." The sons of Erin were enraptured when Chauncey Olcott and his many imitators pictured the Irishman as a fellow with a heart of gold and a brain of some much softer metal, but when a truly great comedy came out of the very peat smoke of Ireland they would have none of it and rioted at the opening.

I was at the first performance of Synge's "Playboy of the Western World" and heard the snarl go up—"It never happened in Ireland." After that the potatoes and stink bombs began to fly and Marie O'Neill was stunned when hit by a missile thrown by some man who had familiarized himself with Irish life through long residence in Elmhurst.

To be fair, which is not altogether my intention, not all the Irish in America were gathered in the Maxine Elliott Theater, but it sounded to me as if they were present in considerable numbers. Undoubtedly there were many Gaels who recognized the fine flash of Synge's play and when the piece was done again in later years there was no riot. Still, I think it is not unjust to say that the pseudo-Irishman holds greater appeal for the Irish-American public than the more authentic fellow. The Clan-na-Gael failed to decree dancing in the streets in honor of "John Bull's Other Island."

If there is to be any sort of nationalistic censorship I think it might be an excellent idea to provide for a rotation of the function. Thus, the Jews could be empowered to decide what is offensive to the Irish, the French might act as censors for the Germans, and the Irish call a halt at themes too libelous toward England. This is much the better way. Surely no nationalistic decision should be left to a people whose representatives in New York seem to believe that Don Byrne is a greater Irish writer than George Bernard Shaw.

HEYWOOD BROUN

Sinclair and Fall on Trial

By RAYMOND CLAPPER

Washington, October 18

THE trial of Albert B. Fall, former Secretary of the Interior, and Harry F. Sinclair, millionaire oil man, for conspiracy to defraud the Government in the Teapot Dome affair has begun in Washington and newspaper dispatches for the next few days are going to read suspiciously like chapters from the novel "Revelry," Samuel Hopkins Adams and the government prosecutors having been inspired by the same set of facts.

As the two defendants scrutinize the faces of the twelve men who are about to pass judgment on them, they doubtless reflect hopefully on the fact that juries are not made up of justices of the United States Supreme Court. Just one week before they went on trial, the Supreme Court ended the Government's civil suit to set aside the Teapot Dome lease declaring that the transaction had been fraudulent, that there had been a "clandestine" and "sinister" transfer of large funds to Fall, some of them certainly and the remainder probably from Sinclair, and that Fall had been a "faithless public officer."

That was the highest court of the land speaking without a dissenting voice. On the same evidence that the court reviewed, the jury will decide the present criminal conspiracy case.

It is a long and devious trail that leads from the Fall ranch near Three Rivers, New Mexico, to the jury box at Washington. On New Year's Eve, 1921, Sinclair arrived in his private car at the ranch. There, so far as is known, the present codefendants first discussed the Teapot Dome project. Three months later, on April 7, 1922, Fall signed the Teapot Dome lease in strictest secrecy, giving Sinclair exclusive rights to all oil in the 9,000-acre naval reserve in Wyoming excepting about 6 per cent which eventually was to go into storage tanks to be built for the navy by Sinclair. The lease did not state the proposition so baldly, but that was the way it was to work out.

In defense of the deal it was said that the navy's oil was being drained by private drillers outside of the reserve. The Supreme Court has said that the principals knew this was not the case and acted in bad faith in using it as a pretext. Even had there been serious drainage the Government was protected, for, as Senator Walsh pointed out, the Government received 25 per cent to 50 per cent royalties on all oil from these adjacent wells. So that if every drop of Teapot Dome oil had been drained by outside wells, the Government still would have received more of it through royalties than through the Sinclair lease which cost the nation ninety-four barrels of oil for every six tanked.

If Sinclair merely had outdone Fall in a trade, the Government could have done little about it. But the prosecution believes there was something more in the bargain and the Supreme Court is inclined to agree. One month after the lease was signed, and while Fall still was in the Cabinet, Sinclair, so the Government charges, caused $230,500 in Liberty bonds to reach Fall's son-in-law, M. T. Everhart, of Pueblo, Colorado. In the civil trial Everhart refused to testify as to the source of these bonds, falling back on the rule against compulsory self-incrimination. The Government traced $90,000 in bonds directly to Fall. All of the bonds were traced by serial numbers and were found to have been drawn by H. S. Osler, a Canadian lawyer, president of the mysterious Continental Trading Company, a resale corporation formed under Canadian laws about the time Sinclair was considering the Teapot Dome opportunity. Osler refused to testify in the civil trial or permit his deposition to be taken, and the Government never was able to get direct evidence that he was acting for Sinclair. Other witnesses left the country during the civil trial and the two most important ones, H. M. Blackmer and James E. O'Neil, have not yet returned, despite many attempts to get them back for the present trial. As an official of the defendant Mammoth Oil Company, Sinclair did not testify in the civil suit, and the Supreme Court said: "It justly may be inferred that he was not in a position to combat or explain any fact or circumstance supported by evidence and material to the Government's case." The Continental company was dissolved at about the time of the Teapot Dome investigation, and its records were destroyed. The Supreme Court said it was plain that the company was organized for "some illegitimate purpose."

"The clandestine and unexplained acquisition of these bonds by Fall confirms the belief, generated by other circumstances in the case, that he was a faithless public officer," the Supreme Court stated. "There is nothing in the record that tends to mitigate the sinister significance attaching to that enrichment." This episode was discovered by the Government's special prosecutors, Owen J. Roberts and Atlee Pomerene. Working under the most exasperating handicaps they have built up their evidence until it forms an important element in the prosecution's case. Much of the other material, practically all of it, was developed by Senator Walsh in the Senate's investigation. This reveals the secrecy leading up to the lease of April 7, 1921, and the refusal of Fall to permit any information to be given out for several days thereafter until the Senate by resolution demanded it; the sharp rise in Sinclair Consolidated oil stock during this period; the loan of $25,000 in Liberty bonds made to Fall by Sinclair under circumstances which the Supreme Court considers suspicious; Sinclair's payment of $1,000,000 to clear up minor claims on the reserve and his promise to pay an equal sum to others who were threatening lawsuits over their uncertain rights; and, finally, Fall's dispatch of marines to the reserve to clear off the last jubilant squatters. That incident is best described by the marine captain who led the raid, George K. Shuler, later State Treasurer of New York. He was told to report for orders to Fall; his account of that picturesque interview as given to the Senate committee follows:

> I went over to the Interior Building and the Secretary was waiting there and I went in and he said: "I have got a job for you." We [illegible] a naval reservation out in Wyoming, and [illegible] country, and there is an oil company that is going in there and they are trespassing; that is, they are drilling a well," and he says, "We know that they have no rights there" and that he had called on the Secretary of the Navy to detail some marines to go out and drive them off. And he said that he had taken the matter up with the President that morning, and that the President did not want to take this action because an officer of the company that was trespassing was a close personal friend, and contributed to the campaign fund. And Mr. Fall told me he had told the President that his friend was a low-down s.o.b., and Mr. Fall said that the President told him that he supposed he was all that when he sent him his check, and Mr. Fall said that he told the President: "Mr. President, by God, he was." But he said the President finally consented, and that was why the marines were to go out.
> He said "What would you do if they served an injunction on you, signed by a federal judge?" I said "Mr. Secretary, I have never seen an injunction in my life, and wouldn't know one if I saw it, and if they served one on me I would file it." He said, "I guess you will get along all right out there."

To have reached the point where his friend in the Cabinet not only gave him an exclusive right of way in this rich government oil reserve, but insisted on sending out marines with fixed bayonets to drive off Harding campaign contributors, marked new heights of power in the spectacular and successful career of Harry Ford Sinclair.

He had not begun very auspiciously. His father was a druggist in Independence, Kansas. Harry went to the University of Kansas to study pharmacy. When his father died, he took over the store, but he was not successful and soon he was spending his days hunting. One day he happened to shoot himself in the foot. An accident policy gave him enough to start a small business selling timber to the oil drillers in the newly opened oil fields of southeastern Kansas. He bought into a drilling pool. Soon young Sinclair felt the first thrill of big luck in oil. The gamble of the business gripped him and he kept on playing. He expanded rapidly and in twenty years he rose to one of the dominating places in the industry, with more than twenty companies engaged in oil producing, refining, and marketing, in coal, water transportation, exploration, pipe lines, Mexican production, real estate, and publishing. His holdings reach into almost every corner of the world where there is oil. He offered to take over the entire oil business of Soviet Russia.

As Sinclair's fortune mounted into the millions, and doubtless into the tens of millions, he began to enjoy the expensive luxuries of millionaires and to gratify the sporting instinct which had made him love the oil business. He was one of the backers of the old Federal League which undertook to break the grip of organized professional baseball. He built up the Rancocas stables with a fast line of racing horses that included the famous Zev which a few years ago won the international race against Papyrus, the English derby winner. He became the friend of the high and mighty. Cabinet members went to the races as his personal guests. Political managers tactfully sought campaign contributions—Will Hays collected $75,000 from him when the Republicans passed the hat to pay off the Harding campaign deficit.

As a crowning distinction, the Kansas drug-store boy finally was offered the throne of Albania, the legend is, if he would apply his talents, and probably his bank roll, to the job of straightening out the poverty-stricken treasury of that kingdom. But the uncertainties of a Balkan kingdom offered no lure for a powerful emperor of oil.

Sinclair is still in his early fifties. Such hair as he has left is untouched with gray. His eyes are cold and calculating and there is a hard-set line about his mouth—and with some reason, for he got where he did by grim fighting in one of the most ruthless of industries. He has driven his way through obstacles by any means at hand. Results are all that interest him. He is impatient of politicians. He dislikes their nosing ways. In the La Follette gasoline investigation Sinclair had to be subpoenaed before he would produce some of his records although other oil men were submitting theirs voluntarily. When he appeared before the Senate Teapot Dome committee he refused to answer certain questions and as a result was convicted by a jury of contempt of the Senate and is now under sentence to spend three months in a "common jail" and pay a $500 fine. The case has been appealed and Sinclair is free under bond.

He appears in court a sleek, somewhat defiant figure, lacking much of the sentimental appeal of the kindly, obliging Doheny. That twinkling, elderly little man succeeded in creating an "old pal" atmosphere about his relations with Fall. He completely disarmed the jury and they refused to believe that he was anything except a kind old gentleman who wanted to help his old friend, Fall, out of debt and to help the navy prepare itself against the Pacific war which he was told was imminent. Instead of refusing to answer the Senate committee's questions as Sinclair did, he came forward voluntarily and admitted sending the $100,000 to Fall. He repeated his story to the jury in his conspiracy trial.

Sinclair has remained doggedly silent, refusing to exploit sentimental or patriotic motives. In the present trial his attorneys may insist upon adopting the strategy which Doheny found so successful. But it is not Sinclair's own way. He is a fighter and bows before no storm.

This is Fall's second appearance here on conspiracy charges. He did not take the stand in the Doheny trial. He never has explained his false testimony before the Senate committee. After he had received $100,000 from Doheny and from Sinclair at least $35,000 testified to by Sinclair's attorney and possibly $230,500 from the Continental Trading Company, he told the committee in writing:

> It should be needless for me to say that in the purchase of the Harris ranch, or in any other purchase or expenditure, I have never approached E. L. Doheny or anyone connected with him or any of his corporations, or H. F. Sinclair or anyone connected with him or any of his corporations, nor have I ever received from either of said parties one cent on account of any oil lease or upon any other account whatsoever.

Hindenburg Has a Birthday

By DOROTHY THOMPSON

Berlin, October 2

REICHSPRÄSIDENT, ex-Feld-Marschall Paul von Hindenburg celebrated his eightieth birthday.

He received some half million marks as a gift, which he distributed to war invalids. On his birthday itself 1,200 of the most seriously wounded—the blind, the totally incapacitated—got $50 apiece. In honor of this day some hundreds of political prisoners were set free from federal and state prisons. This number included all of those still imprisoned for participation in the Munich Soviet Revolution: all, that is to say, except the romantic Robin Hood of the movement, Max Hölz, and Lindner, convicted of attempting the assassination of Ignatz Auer, then head of the Social Democratic Government. Those who were freed were all practically at the expiration of their sentences. The amnesty included Count Arco, who assassinated Kurt Eisner, first President of the Bavarian Republic. But Arco, a director of the German Lufthansa, has been at large on parole for some time. The amnesty also included Major Buchrucker, notorious Fascist, leader of the Küstrin putsch of the Black Reichswehr. Hindenburg's birthday present reduced his sentence by six years.

As a personal gift President Hindenburg received his ancestral estate at Neudeck—a modest property—a rather superfluous number of dinner services of porcelain, a newly planted garden, and of course tons of small tokens, oceans of letters, floods of telegrams.

There were three days of continuous celebration.

As for the flag question—celebrations involve meters of bunting—a "truce" was called. The President of the republic did not recognize the banner of the republic as the official symbol of the day. He pleaded for "unity" of all parties. Only the Prussian Government demanded that the black-red-gold banner be displayed on all official buildings and on the hotels. The Prussian state had a quarrel with the hoteliers about this, but won. In the city, if the writer's observation can be trusted, there were far more black-red-white banners displayed.

With one notable exception the entire population seemed to participate in this celebration. The exception was the Reichsbanner. It is the organization for the defense of the republic. It has three million members, and is therefore greater than the Stahlhelm, the Werewolf, or any other national organization formed for a similar or conflicting purpose. It refused to march in the same line with the black-red-white banners of the old regime.

And of course the Communists sabotaged. Here and there, in the sections of Berlin where the proletariat dwell, they tried rather futily and rather heroically to interrupt the demonstration. They were up against Massenpsychologie. The police warned carriers of red flags that they could not protect them. Toward nightfall the first day there were clashes. Twenty odd Communists were wounded by Stahlhelmists; three hundred Communists were arrested. A small incident. But for the rest, all Berlin was on the streets for this unique demonstration.

On October 2, the day of the main festivities, the city was jammed as Rome must have been when the Pope first left the Vatican. Hindenburg is the least visible of presidents. Thousands came out just for a glimpse of him. The Tiergarten, the Linden, the Wilhelmstrasse, and all the streets leading to the sports stadium where the real show was to be held were black with people. Traffic despite efficient policing was at a standstill. There were innumerable organizations and vereins, in uniforms, under banners, plated with medals and other insignia. We saw Schleswig-Holsteiners flaunting their Nordicism, Stahlhelm and Jungdo, competing in brands of patriotism, Kyffhäuser—"non-political" ex-service men; half a dozen other veteran associations; "Wandervögel" and "Pathfinders," in khaki shorts, risking their lives on bicycles among the motor cars and lorries; street-car employees (the workers waiting until the celebration was over to begin their strike); members of the automobile club; students of the corps (seas of red, blue, and green caps); fifty thousand school-children in white dresses and shirts—and, we hope, in woolen underwear; and people, ordinary people. Astonishing how many such there were. Despite the abstention of the Reichsbanner and of the Communists and the half-heartedness of the Socialists, it seemed to me that every class of the population of Berlin, from porter to banker, from shopgirl to Schieber's wife, was represented in that vast crowd, eight kilometers long, who formed a cheering alley through which Hindenburg rode in state.

The official, public festivities were harmless enough. The fifty thousand school-children sat in grandstands and waved handkerchiefs, or grouped on the stadium green sang German school songs; well-trained, sweet, clear voices, displaying that harmony and unity which the President deplores the lack of in the nation. Very touching.

The October third celebration in the same place the next day was less naive. Hindenburg emerged, not as President but as Field Marshal. In place of the frock coat and silk hat of his official office he wore his uniform and medals. Instead of the Chancellor and Secretary of State he was surrounded by generals. No white-clad children sweetly sang "Ich bin ein deutsches Mädchen." There was a defile of battle flags—relics of many wars—which lasted an hour and a half. There was a pageant of historic war costumes from the tunics of the Landsknechts who subdued Rome to the tin hats of the last Great War. Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde? Not at all! Two manifestations of the German Geist, which Hindenburg is supposed to incorporate, in all its properties, in his person.

Through all the celebrations there was much singing of "Deutschland über Alles": music by Haydn, stolen from the Hapsburg anthem both by Germany and by the Christian church; words by Hoffmann von Fallersleben.

On October 12, 1847, the same newspaper which announced that a son, Paul, had been born to Lieutenant Benckendorff von Hindenburg carried the following item:

> Hoffmann von Fallersleben, who has been stopping here for two days with his friends, the von Itzsteins, has just received from the local authorities the order to leave the Grand Duchy of Baden within twenty-four hours.

This man, author of "Deutschland über Alles," was, you see, a dangerous character. The song which rang October 2 and 3 from black-red-white throats was written by a champion of the black-red-gold flag, who suffered for his opinions. In those days the students who flocked around him sang—not too loudly—

> Er hängt auf keinem Baume,
> Er hängt auf keinem Strick,
> Er hängt nur in den Traume
> Der Deutschen Republik.

The gentleman whom they so cordially hanged in their Republican dreams was His Majesty, the King of Prussia.

It was left to Major Sodenstern, leader of the Stahlhelm, addressing national associations in a little separate celebration in honor of Hindenburg's birthday, to say, "the true Hindenburg spirit cannot be realized until Germany is again an empire under a German Kaiser, and under the red-white-black flag." And Hindenburg, expressing his own birthday wish for the republic, referred to the spirit of 1870, to the spirit of 1914, but not to the spirit of 1848, into which he was born.

And the "Birthday Child" himself—as the Germans quaintly call those of any age who have a right to cake and candles? Ah, well, eighty is old—even for Hindenburg. A square-headed, square-shouldered old gentleman, the broadcloth tight on his stocky body, his top-hat in his hand. (Oh, festival of top-hats, symbols of the bureaucracy, mighty as steel helmets, what a day it was for you!) His hair was cropped in true German fashion, mowed with the clippers, his quaint moustaches wreathed his heavy, trembling jowls. His face was impassive.

"Hoch, Hindenburg!" they called—students and shopgirls and veterans and bureaucrats; "Hoch, Hindenburg!" He bowed, but did not smile. Only when he left his motor to mount to the flag-decked loge reserved for him, only then did an expression come into his eyes. Twenty steps rose before him; twenty steps, a flight of steep stairs. His brow contracted; he looked dismayed. Then he began toiling upward, quietly, steadily. It was his duty. Hindenburg has always done his duty.

We thought of Lion Feuchtwanger's birthday wish for him. (German writers were each asked to express a birthday wish.) Feuchtwanger wrote one word: "Rest."

Well, and what did it all mean?

The taps under the President's balcony, forty orchestras, nationalist organizations defiling, and the veterans proud in their long unused uniforms, the school-children and the shopgirls and the amnesties and speeches of Major Sodenstern and Count Westarp. Was it a sincere demonstration? We think, yes. Granted that the gentlemen of the old regime made the most of it. But the demonstration did not have the character of a Potemkin village. Did it mean, as Walter Hasenclever rather hysterically shouted, that all Germany is willing to go to war again tomorrow and that there is no republic? We think not.

No Hohenzollern—at least no birthday party of Wilhelm II—ever got out such a crowd as celebrated Hindenburg's fourscore years of life and service. When a commoner can embody such symbolic significance, a restoration is not imminent. But for those who have prayed in Germany for a "révolution d'esprit"—for them it was a sad day.

Germany greeted in her President the man who stabilized the republic on the basis of the Wilhelmian tradition, who proves in his person and his office that the form of the state is not the essence of the state; Germany celebrated in him the continuity of tradition. This celebration was an admission—let us admit—of the failure of the revolution. But where is revolution prized today?

The Subway

By ALLEN TATE

Dark accurate plunger down the successive knell
Of arch on arch, where ogives burst a red
Reverberance of hail upon the dead
Thunder, like an exploding crucible!
Harshly articulate musical steel shell
Of angry worship, hurled religiously
Upon your business of humility
Into the iron forestry of hell:

Till broken in the shift of quieter
Dense altitudes tangential of your steel,
I am become geometries—and glut
Expansions like a blind astronomer
Dazed while the worldless heavens bulge and reel
In the cold revery of an idiot.

Americans We Like

Ruth Hanna McCormick

By MILDRED ADAMS

The Fifth in a Series of Personality Portraits

IN the morning papers of September 29, occupying front-page space out of all apparent proportion to its importance, appeared the announcement of a woman's candidacy for public office.

"I have been asked for a statement of my political intentions"; it began almost as though apologizing for intruding on the attention of the honorable editors. And then after a short and simple account of the length of her public service, she justified the intrusion and caught the headlines with "I choose to run for the Republican nomination for Congressman-at-large from Illinois in the April primary of 1928."

That phrase "I choose to run" is no mere twist of Presidential words, but an actual statement of fact. For two years Ruth Hanna McCormick has been in the position of a small girl playing London Bridge. She has had her choice between a diamond coach drawn by eight snow-white horses harnessed in platinum, and a golden frosted birthday cake as high as the Woolworth Tower. The office of Representative, Governor, Senator—all of them have been polished on political coat sleeves and dangled in front of her sensitive nose.

"If only she would make up her mind" groaned the political gentlemen. Then they could decide what was to be done about her. But as long as she concentrated on her political fences, and went on digging post-holes and stretching wires, she kept them distinctly uneasy. More than one sigh of relief must have gone up to high heaven the morning she announced that she would definitely run for an office.

Ruth Hanna McCormick is one of the few women in the United States who wields political power in terms that professional politicians recognize. Her friends and her influence run through the whole fabric of political life, from the White House to the muddiest village on the east bank of the Mississippi River. She is the friend of presidents and of farm hands. She has presided at banquets in Washington and at schoolhouse suppers in Walnut Center, Illinois. On the top side, where "influence" is part of the very air, she was the only child and the constant companion of Mark Hanna, Senator from Ohio and maker of presidents. She married Medill McCormick, child of the harvesters, part owner of the most powerful reactionary newspaper in the Middle West, millionaire, and Senator from Illinois when he died in 1925. With such a position among the politically mighty, and with the affection and admiration they have for her, there was no reason why she should not have been given any honorary and ornamental job she pleased. But she did not please. Her interest lay not in appointments, but in votes.

She was made National Republican Committeewoman from Illinois, and in that position she set about the ungrateful task of "educating" voters. She went to villages and attended farm-center meetings. She drove over the deep-soiled length and breadth of Illinois, learning the local needs, and interpreting the national issues. She listened gravely to the district leader's plea for a new post office, and explained to his flock the position of the national Republican Party in regard to the World Court. And she organized her Women's Republican Clubs. Those are the groups whose existence makes the bosses shiver. Because of them, they say that Mrs. McCormick is the first woman who has built up her own machine.

She probably would not like the term, downright though she is in using plain words for simple facts. "I believe in education rather than in propaganda," she said in conversation a year ago. "It is bad theory and bad practice to subsidize any idea in a democracy. We present to the women the conflicting ideas that prevail within the party, and encourage them to think for themselves and to form their own opinions."

Her brand of "education" is interesting enough so that several thousand women, in ninety out of the hundred and two Illinois counties, are members of the clubs and pay dues to them. They are outside the regular Republican organization of the State, and party bosses have learned that they look to Mrs. McCormick for leadership. And it is never certain where she will lead them. No one is guaranteed "safe" who opposed Governor Small and fought Frank Smith in the primaries—though she supported him at the regular election. For that matter, Mrs. McCormick is "safe" from no one's point of view. The machine can't count on her and the progressives can't count on her. She has denounced the machine on occasion, and on occasion she has made alliances with its tools. As a rule she does her fighting within the party, and if she loses accepts defeat and obeys the party's orders.

She is a tall, slim woman, this uncertain power, her wrists almost transparent, her fingers long and flexible and shaped for fashioning things. Her mouth is wide and firm. A steady flame burns in the brown depths of her eyes. No mere prettiness mars the interest of her face. Mobile, vigorous, it has a fascination that transcends color and contours. She wears simple clothes, well tailored, and she forgets about them as soon as they are on.

She showed the shock of her husband's sudden death only in black clothes and shadowed eyes. She neither retired from the world to nurse her grief, nor made political capital out of her position as a Senator's widow. She had been interested in politics since childhood. She continued that interest. And if she worked a little harder, if her nerves were a bit more taut, and her slender bones a bit nearer the surface, only her friends knew that.

Myths gather quickly around a figure so able and so picturesque. The story of her childhood is assuming the proportions of a national legend, told by her friends to show how wise and how experienced she is, and by her enemies to prove that with such a background she must not be trusted. She was her father's playmate. A wiry, long-legged child, she drove over the countryside with the man who made McKinley President, and poked into his mines, or sat curled up in a corner till long past bedtime, intent on the twists and turns of conversations whose results were to [illegible] the whole country. As she grew up she became Boss Hanna's secretary, went faithfully to the Senate and the House to listen and report on speeches, and kept regular office hours no matter how late she had been dancing the night before. She absorbed the language, the routine, and the intangible spirit of politics. Argument and a fight for power became the breath of life. Her teacher was politically the biggest man in the United States. His pupil adored him, and was flatteringly, and sometimes annoyingly, apt.

But it takes more than the accidents of parenthood and association to make such a politician as is the lady from Illinois. She is first of all a person—of force and character and individuality. Politics to her is neither a toy nor a garment to be donned for a day, but a means of expressing herself, a channel of contact between her and the world. A very articulate person, she has a concrete, salty habit of phrasing that catches and holds attention whether she is talking on a platform, in a farmyard, or from the depth of a big chair. She still curls up in chairs, folded like a carpenter's rule, slim feet under her, and fingers clasping her knees.

Her vocabulary holds the technical words of dairying and alfalfa culture as well as the language of child-raising and the phrases of politics. "I have spent my life studying the opinions of the American people," she said one day. And a moment later she was describing scientifically the chemical and physical make-up of a globule of Holstein milk. Ideas fascinate her, but she turns them instantly into practical terms. She likes the concrete and the tangible, and she abhors the kind of vague idealism that waves blurred generalities through smoky air and calls them principles. Yet she considers herself something of a crusader. She made personal studies of stockyard conditions and worked for labor legislation when it was the most unpopular thing in Illinois. She was a vivid and active figure in the suffrage fight. She bolted with the Progressives in 1912 even though it meant breaking the "Hanna creed" of party regularity.

Perhaps the keynote of this woman is the depth of emotion with which she is endowed. She is never interested in a cause or an occupation merely on the surface. There is about her no taint of the dilettante. Things that matter to her, matter intensely, and she devotes herself to them with enormous energy.

For her three children she has a depth of affection that is almost frightening. Yet she has never construed it in terms of staying with them every minute, smothering them, and winding herself into hard knots. She arranges the routine of their lives and goes about her own affairs as long as things run smoothly. But there were weeks in the winter when she broke every engagement and refused every invitation. The children were fighting measles or mastoids and no one else could take her place with them.

Her farm is neither a rich woman's toy nor was it established as a source of political capital. It grew out of the needs of her own children. Her first baby needed special milk, which no farm in Illinois could supply. Mrs. McCormick was so horrified at the dairy conditions as they then existed that she started immediate plans for a model farm. She now has twenty-two hundred acres of rolling land on the Rock River some hundred miles northwest of Chicago. This is her home, her permanent address, and her voting residence. Here she is a professional farmer, raising cattle for the Chicago market, breeding prize Holsteins, and most important to her, shipping certified milk for invalids and babies. She is trying to work out a fool-proof method of producing clean certified milk at minimum expense. In spite of expensive experiment, she keeps the farm on a self-supporting basis.

The Holstein Fresian Association of Cattlemen made her a member of its Board of Directors in recognition of her work, and for them she goes about the country holding conferences and talking over problems, equally at home in cowbarn and conference room.

All this experience has given her a high quota of the traditional political equipment. She talks to farmers on a plane of equality and understanding. She has a practiced hand with babies that transcends any masculine head-patting. Women are her friends and her supporters.

Already the tangled filings of the Illinois political situation are moving toward their magnets. The Hearst papers have always applauded Mrs. McCormick. Now Mayor Thompson, whom she has attacked in the past in phrases that should have stung a skin less hardened, has announced his support. Not out of love for her, they say, or a sudden conversion, but because he is sworn to put Rathbone, the present incumbent, on the junk-heap.

What she will do with the office of Congressman-at-large if she gets it, one would be rash who ventured to predict. She said once in private conversation that office per se had no glamor, for she had known too many politicians to have any illusion about it. "But," she added, "there might be a political situation in Illinois where I could render definite service by running for a conspicuous office. There is no patronage for a Congressman-at-large, but he can make a lot of noise."

Knowing the lady, it is at least safe to say that the noise will be interesting.

In the Driftway

AT last the Drifter has found a cause. It came in, neatly folded, in an envelope postmarked New Orleans. It was not addressed to the Drifter, but since it is well known that he has spent the best years of his life looking for a suitable cause it was immediately passed on to him. "Shady Streets for Southern Cities" is its name and the Drifter wonders why he never thought of it himself. Nevertheless he is deeply grateful to Mr. Walter Parker of New Orleans for calling it to his attention even at this late date.

* * * * *

"I AM trying to develop a new vision in the South," says Mr. Parker. "A shady Southern city is cool and comfortable in the summer. Without shade just the reverse is true. One condition promotes business. The other retards it." "New Orleans," he goes on, > would be a far more delightful place in which to spend the long summer months were there more shade—shade over every sidewalk and shade over the principal street crossings. Before the Americans came into control, the French and Spaniards built balconies over the sidewalks. They also built homes with heat-resisting walls and cool, shaded courtyards. They understood our climate.

The Americans have torn down most of the picturesque balconies and they do not build cool shaded courtyards. Watch the people pass along the sunny side of any of our streets in July, August, and September. Their faces are drawn with the glare and heat; they hurry along in search of relief at the first shady corner. Then their features relax.

Every shady spot in New Orleans is fairly comfortable in July, August, and September. There is nearly always a breeze in the shade.

Let's advocate shade, more shade, and then still more shade for New Orleans;

Let's capitalize the obvious comfort of shade;

Let's make the creation of shade a cardinal principle of our lives here;

Let's convince the storekeepers that systematic planning for shade will increase their summer business; and let's teach the children to believe in cool, shady sidewalks in place of hot sunshine.

As an individual effort for the good of New Orleans I am going to advocate shade, more shade, and still more shade for New Orleans on every possible occasion.

* * * * *

THIS is an excellent cause in many ways. It has imagination. "One little acorn," Mr. Parker points out with true poetic insight, "given a chance, can grow into a mighty oak, and under that oak there will be cool, shady comfort in the warmest of weather." Moreover, it is a cause which even children can espouse with perfect safety. "Should not the schools," asks Mr. Parker, "teach the boys and girls that most of the comforts they will enjoy in this life were prepared for them by those who have gone before, and that in gratitude they should leave behind them comforts for those who will come after?" And it is a cause exactly suited to a Drifter, because it would not interfere with his drifting. Whether he sat fishing from some sunny rock in Glacier Park or camped on an island in Maine he could still be advocating "shade, more shade, and still more shade" for New Orleans. But its best recommendation is the one which Mr. Parker himself gives it. "I do not believe that such a campaign will interfere with any group's rights, privileges, or prejudices."

Correspondence

For President: Jane Addams

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your fine editorial, entitled Wanted: Leadership, provokes a reply. The Progressives have a leader ready to their hand, one whose devotion to lofty ideals, combined with practical efficiency, is common knowledge.

If the masters of Big Business can get together in a hotel room and decide that the country must have a ruthless imperialist as the leading Presidential candidate, may not Progressives, who do not want war abroad, or injustice at home, also get together and nominate this priceless woman, Jane Addams, as a candidate for the highest office the nation can bestow?

Would not the affairs of the country be safer in her hands than in those of any of the men you have mentioned as the likeliest candidates in the coming contest? Jane Addams, if she were President, would really and truly keep us out of war, and she could be trusted to rectify every injustice that it was in her power to set right.

If the mere fact of her sex would prevent her election, shame on us as a nation! Men have governed the country a long time, and not with unqualified success. Now let this superb woman be invited to guide the car of state.

Some Survive Without Wine

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Heywood Broun's opinions that one finds "none but practical men in the tents of the arid," and that "You cannot have dry poets, painters, and dreamers" are so commonly held by liberals and dilettante radicals that attention should be called to their hollow and baseless character. In comparison the statement, "Without wine the soul perishes," is fairly scientific. Shelley was an abstainer and Bernard Shaw is notoriously dry.

A Twentieth Amendment

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your publication would indubitably earn the gratitude of progressive men and women all over the world and at the same time help the people of this country to make a tremendous step toward civilization if it should sponsor an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to abolish capital punishment.

Such an amendment would lend a truer meaning to the almost stereotype passage in the Declaration of Independence: "Life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness."

If the federal government has a right to legislate what percentage of alcohol an individual may imbibe in a beverage, it surely has a right to dictate to the component commonwealths in the matter of taking human life, though taken by "due process of law."

In Defense of Missions

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I wish to reply to what Mr. Hubbard said in your issue of September 14 about the work of the Christian missions. I agree with his praise of industrial training and medical work, but this is not being done apart from Christian teaching either in missions or in government industrial schools. I do not believe in a mission confining its energies to evangelization work alone, and I would condemn any work "that tears down the belief of centuries and builds nothing in its place." . . .

It is not religious teaching, as such, that is "breaking down the homogeneity of the tribe" as much as it is the increasing contact of the African with Western civilization and industrialism. The moral and social chaos in African society today comes from the conflict of the group idea of the African tribal life with our conception of society as made up of individuals. The African thrust into this new society loses his regard for and belief in the old tribal taboos, inhibitions, superstitions, and belief in spirits, and has nothing to take their place. Here is the place of the mission and its Christian training, to replace the lost things with the Christian gospel in its fulness so that moral and social chaos will not be the fate of African society.

In conclusion let me give an example of cooperation between missions and government, and this is only one of the many that might be given: In Southern Rhodesia from among a native population of 800,000 there are more than 20,000 boys and girls attending mission schools, which are partially supported by grants from the government of more than £30,000 annually. There are about 275 boys in two government industrial schools supported wholly by the government. The British colonial governments believe in Christian education for the African.

Poem

By CHARD POWERS SMITH

I'm looking for a fellow Pan
Who's partly goat and mostly man,
And so I built my cottage here
To hear him piping in the weir,
To hear him humming in the bees,
And hear him whisper in the trees.
O peace immeasurable that sings
In the great soul of simple things!
One impulse from a vernal wood—
To stand here where a deer has stood
To drink at dawn! To hear the fall
Of evening dewing over all!
To watch the distant planets move!
And hear birds roosting chirp of love!
To watch the fiddling Summer slide
To Autumn, and to hear the stride
Of thundering Winter, and in rain
To feel the Spring come back again!
Something there is—a glimpse of all—
And yet—O Spring! O Summer! Fall!
O Winter! Once more everything—
O Summer! Fall! Ah Winter! Spring.
Trees, brooks, and birds, and flowers, and bees!
And bees and flowers, birds, brooks, and trees!
To wonder always, more and more!
O wonderful! Ah wonderful!
Oh! Ah! Oh! Ah! O God, how dull!
What was it I was looking for?

Fascism Before the Bar of History

The Fascist Dictatorship in Italy. By Gaetano Salvemini. Henry Holt and Company. $3.

TO those who still believe that there is an ultimate power in the moral conscience of men Professor Salvemini has seemed since the deaths of Matteotti and Amendola to be the most dangerous surviving enemy of Fascism. This book, the most effective indictment yet drawn up against Fascist methods and Fascist "facts," carries all the weight of a trained historian's expert documentation. It is primarily an appeal, passionate even in its restraint, to the conscience of the world for a verdict against the protected lawlessness of the Fascist state which is shielded behind the "movie" façade of the Mussolini myth.

Perhaps no single factor in that gradual shift of journalistic and informed opinion to a verdict against Mussolini which seems to be taking place both in England and in this country has been so great as Professor Salvemini's speeches and writing. Even the London Times has recently come into line. The anti-Fascist center in Paris has affected opinion very little in the English-speaking countries. With the exception of William Bolitho and James Murphy, few accredited correspondents had the background or the backing for a searching exposé of Fascism as it worked upon Italians—not tourists. Only Don Sturzo and Salvemini, among the political exiles, spoke authoritatively of Italy to England and America—and Don Sturzo has until lately been silent.

"The Fascist Dictatorship in Italy" does not pretend to impartiality and it loses force at times through an unwillingness to see any possible good in its Fascist enemies. Professor Salvemini is here a prosecuting attorney. His aim is to present a smashing case, documenting it with an overwhelming mass of evidence, in order to give the lie once and for all to the suppressions and evasions that have represented Fascism to world opinion. Against the myth-makers and the glozers over (like Luigi Villari) of the disreputable origins and dubious motives of the Mussolinian groups of ex-combatants of 1919-1920, Professor Salvemini opposes a picture of the reality of Italian post-war neurasthenia. Even Fascist heroes were advocating the occupation of unproductive land and factories by the workers, the confiscation of war profits, a National Constituent Assembly to be the Italian section of an International, universal suffrage of both sexes, abolition of the senate, the nobility, the crown, and compulsory military service, and a generally syndicalist program. Fascism, so far as Mussolini spoke for it in the Popolo d'Italia, was still congratulating the workers on the general railway strike in January and viewing benevolently the occupation of the metallurgical industries in the fall of 1920.

It was, according to this convincing picture, rather the failure of Bolshevism than its danger that loosed Fascism on Italy. Mussolini criticized Socialism from the left as an ineffectual revolutionary force, until social revolution was shown to be impossible; then he veered rapidly to the most reactionary attitude of the right—toward the nationalists. Universal suffrage as a safety valve plus the Christian-Democratic (Popolare) Party as a means of dividing the Italian peasantry really prevented the organization of direct action in the immediate aftermath of the war, when the disillusioned populace was in a mood to collect part, at least, of what all parties had so rashly promised during the war. Even proportional representation, by braking the socialist victory, helped save the day.

It is certain, on Mussolini's own witness, that by the summer of 1921 all threat of Communism in Italy had passed. What the anti-Fascists hardly are willing to admit, Professor Salvemini among them, is that the brake worked too well. No ministry could accomplish a coherent program so long as the Socialists on one wing were completely revolutionary and on the other were controlled by an incoherent group of 150 or more deputies who refused to cooperate with any ministry; and so long as Don Sturzo's Popolari were unwilling at all costs to back the parliamentary aims and methods of the Giollitians, the only other considerable group.

However, Professor Salvemini pretty conclusively spikes the ascription on the one hand of economic paralysis to parliamentarism and on the other of economic regeneration to Fascism. He shows that quite inevitable economic forces produced the budgetary deficits of 1920-23; that the balance of trade was less unfavorable than it has become under Fascism; that a popular loan in 1920 produced 18 milliards of lire, without bludgeons; that, in return for a fancied economic and social security, the rulers of Italy—king, army, even some Liberals—discarded patience and welcomed the treatment of a national state of nerves by the castor-oil-and-cudgel method, followed by a regimen of absolutism, terrorism, and espionage superior to anything that Metternich ever thought possible.

He makes an important charge (one made also by Bolitho and Murphy), that Fascism was encouraged by Giolitti, Bonomi, and Fera in 1920-21, and that arms were liberally provided by the army officers with official connivance in order to reduce the Popolare and the Socialist strength by a "white-guard" counter-offensive.

The other charges, which constitute the bulk of the volume, are more specific and better supported by evidence—including facsimile reproductions of Mussolini's own orders. They picture a reign of organized and protected lawlessness quite unparalleled in a modern state. The electoral terrorism before Fascism found it convenient completely to repudiate balloting as a means of invoking consent, and the formidable list of killings, assaults, terrorizations, and exiles will, most of them, be novel only to those who have not followed the Fascist story.

But no such record as is here presented has before been available.

On only one serious point is the book open to criticism. It expresses, as accurately as an indictment can, the incidents and the essence of Fascism in its early period; it exposes the protected violence that has not ceased with the deaths of Matteotti, Forni, Misuri, Amendola, Pilati, Consolo, and a host of others. It shows the authorized nature of outrages, the complete suppression of press criticism and free association, the deliberate character of a reign of terror through hostages, mob violence, and exile, that has silenced all internal efforts at criticism or constitutional opposition. But it is probably subject to the suspicion of regarding Mussolini as merely a puppet who was loosed by the militarists and reactionary timidity of war-profiteers and is still worked by them. This is to underestimate the man, for he has outgrown his origins and has gone in for a degree of state control of all economic forces that demands a playing off of labor against industrialists, as well as of industrialist against labor, and a subordination of the military caste to the Fascist Grand Council, backed by the militia of the Black-Shirts. It is also to underestimate the danger of Fascism as a phenomenon which, having seized power to the accompaniment of a sense of relief among the bourgeoisie, soon sheds all pretense of responsibility to any opinion whatever.

The result is, as Professor Salvemini terms it, "moral anarchy," but it is a much more disciplined despotism than appears in this view of the dictatorship. It is not so lacking in direction as to amount to legal anarchy.

For those to whom the punctuality of trains, the disciplining of labor, and the balancing of the budget are a sufficient offset to any methods, Professor Salvemini has in store another volume, to be published shortly, in which he promises to deal equally roundly with the myth of the "Corporative State" and its parallel of Fascist efficiency. To a public in whose eyes efficiency seems to outweigh such matters as justice, abstract or concrete, and to recompense any attack on constitutionalism, in theory or practice, this second line of defense is more necessary to breach than the first. Fascism can afford, it seems, to treat with frank cynicism any peccadillos such as political murder and the espionage of a Cheka. What it really fears is an exposé of an alarmingly adverse trade balance, a serious drop in the value of industrial shares and governmental loans, an increase in bankruptcies and bank failures, and a partial stagnation of industry. If Professor Salvemini can point to these or to Mussolini's new tendency to fix prices, he may stir American opinion where stirring counts.

Pure Novel

The Counterfeiters. By André Gide. Translated from the French by Dorothy Bussy. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

GIDE'S definition of what he terms "the pure novel" is a very simple one: a long prose narrative involving a conflict of characters and a conflict of ideas. A perfect projection of this double conflict presupposes the exclusion of all those elements "which do not belong specifically to the novel." These elements are, roughly speaking, comprised in the realist-naturalist credo which has been so often attacked that it hardly seems worth while to dwell on its articles: detail, local color, atmosphere, sociologic background, a faithful rendering of life as seen rather than as felt. In form the realist's novel tends to the horizontal biographic outline of Bennett and Dreiser; and in its conception of character it lays itself open to the charge made by Gide: that the author has not affected that degree of depersonalization which makes it possible for him to be unaware of the next move or thought of his creation.

Against all this certain modern writers have set their faces and their minds. We may note briefly the elements which have originated their revolt. First, there has been an inevitable impatience with the intellectual view of the older men. This view (and the structure and theme of the novels embodying it) was based, in one way or another, upon the consciousness of class and class struggle ("The Forsyte Saga," "Buddenbrooks," "An American Tragedy") and normally tended to express itself in some form of democratic liberalism (Wells, Zola). Now it so happens that the social and economic struggle which we see about us has stated itself so clearly in actuality that it has ceased to contain that element of speculation (otherwise known as poetry) which makes it available for art. In the same way, the panacea that was supposed to provide a resolution for that struggle has now been proved futile—the modern novelist, if he desires to be modern, is forced to deny the humanitarian faith of his predecessors. The first reason, therefore, for his artistic revolt was a conviction that the idea-world of Wells and Shaw has, for both poetic and practical purposes, been completely exhausted.

Consequently he was driven to a search for new creative material and a new creative form. At this point he met, by a happy accident, with a powerful ally. The discoveries of modern psychology permitted him to fashion a subtler narrative pattern with which to replace the traditional biographic outline; and they furnished him with a more flexible and exciting method of approaching human emotions, as well as providing him with an entirely new realm of emotion in itself.

The employment of this method finally led him to the recognition of the fact (known long ago by the Greek dramatists and the classic Frenchmen) that you do not make people real by presenting them realistically. With this perception the case against the nineteenth- and early twentieth-century novel may be said to be reasonably complete; and the effort to construct a really modern novel began, an effort which was to produce Joyce, Proust, Gide, and practically all the intelligent contemporary writers of fiction, including one or two Americans.

Unless all this is kept in mind the importance of "The Counterfeiters" may be minimized or entirely overlooked. For, if we consider it merely from the point of view of technique, it may be said to be a breviary for modern novelists. In the cases of Joyce and Proust the peculiarly intense quality of the author's personality is likely to dominate all other impressions; but this is not so with Gide where the lyrical intrusion is of a most soft-footed and undisturbing type. In "The Counterfeiters," then, we see held in solution a well-nigh perfect example of the revolt described in the preceding paragraphs. In it we observe the abandonment of the sociologic-humanitarian theme, the employment (but tactfully and quietly) of the vertical exploratory psychologic method, the denial of realism as an instrument for the projection of life. On these three counts Gide rests his famous conception of the roman pur—a conception which has its rough analogue in the pure anti-literary aesthetic of the modernist painters.

It has not been easy for Gide to arrive at his goal. In his preceding works (to which he cannily refuses to accord the title novel) he fell a victim to the siren attractions of his own theory. His zeal for purgation was so fanatic that his narratives had a frigid and intellectual air. He made one of two mistakes: either he started with an obsessing idea (that of the unmotivated crime, for example), in which case his characters tended to be functions of a series of intellectual conflicts; or (and here his Huguenot ancestry comes to the fore) he presented his characters schematically, projecting them through the operation of a series of moral conflicts. In both cases he was merely applying his own definition of the novel as a conflict of ideas and a conflict of characters (for characters are always moral characters to Gide), but he was applying it crudely. The joints showed.

This is not the case with the rich and passionate texture of "The Counterfeiters." Here the double conflict is always implied but never actually exposed, though the book is full of dialectic. It must not be supposed from what has been said that "The Counterfeiters" is a tour de force; indeed, no description could be more inapposite. On the contrary its outstanding quality (and one which cannot be here treated as its recognition is so largely a subjective matter) is its tremendous emotional impact. Before this its mere technical achievement pales; but it has seemed to the present reviewer advisable to suggest that achievement rather than to attempt a summary of the actual substance of a book which is too complicated to allow of brief analysis. All the writer can do is simply to record his feeling that, with the exceptions of "Ulysses" and "The Magic Mountain," no other modern novel has so profoundly moved him; and to record his conviction that "The Counterfeiters" is definitely among the great novels of at least our own time.

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN

The Immortal Nazarene

Jesus: A New Biography. By Shirley Jackson Case. University of Chicago Press. $3.

THE first thing to be said about this "new biography" is that it is not a biography. I think of a biography in terms of such works as Southey's "Nelson," Trevelyan's "John Bright," Sandburg's "Lincoln," or Renan's "Jesus." In each such case we have a noble edifice of narrative reared from an exhaustive study of available sources of information. But this preliminary study—the gathering, sifting, assembling, and preparing of material—is no more a part of the completed work than the stone quarry, the steel foundry, the steam-shovel, derricks, and scaffolding are a part of a completed building. What we want in a biography is a story, as what we want in building construction is a hotel, a courthouse, or a cathedral. In the case of Jesus the sources are so few, the information so scant, the story so doubtful, that the temptation is almost irresistible to weight down a biography of the Nazarene with lengthy and scholarly discussions of the Gospels, Jewish history in the time of Jesus, the early Christian Church, etc. Professor Case has yielded to this temptation. His first chapter is a thoroughgoing study of the origin, character, and inter-relation of what he calls the "ancient biographies" of Jesus. The second chapter is an illuminating discussion of the difficulties involved, and the critical methods that must be used, in getting back to "the historical Jesus." Then comes a long and exceptionally clear presentation of "Jewish life in Palestine" at the opening of the Christian era. Not until the fourth chapter, on page 160, do we come to the story of Jesus's life; and then the narrative stream, like a river in sand, flows with difficulty through the ever-present study of material. All of which means that Professor Case's "Jesus" is not a biography of Jesus but a study in New Testament criticism. It classifies with Strauss, not with Renan; with Nathaniel Schmidt's stupendous "The Prophet of Nazareth," not with Mary Austin's colorful "The Man Jesus."

In saying this we would make it plain that we are offering a definition, not an indictment. We are classifying, not condemning Professor Case's work. For, placed in its own field, seen in its own true character, this latest study of Jesus is a book of the first importance. Written by a great scholar with thorough knowledge of his subject, and in a spirit of dignity and reverence, this volume may be regarded as the last word on what we know about the Nazarene today, and how we know it. As it is the most recent, so it is the best book now available on the life and teachings of Jesus.

Professor Case tells us that he wrote "with a single purpose in mind"—namely, "to depict Jesus as he actually appeared to the men of his own time in Palestine nineteen hundred years ago." The enormous difficulties in the way of recovering such a picture are frankly and fully stated. The author makes more than ordinarily clear the ulterior purposes which went into the writing of the Gospels and other early sources—the effort made not only by "John" but by "Mark" to present Jesus in such a way as to meet the special needs of the early Christian movement in the Gentile world. What we have in the Gospels, after all, is not so much a statement of what Jesus said and did, as a revelation of what certain Christians, generations after his death, thought, or hoped, or believed he said and did. Such biography or history as there is in the New Testament is almost hopelessly overladen with missionary propaganda. That Jesus was we know, as Professor Case has himself shown us in his earlier work on "The Historicity of Jesus"; what Jesus was, however, must remain forever a matter of speculation.

Professor Case sees in Jesus a young man of vigorous personality and prophetic enthusiasm, caught up on the one hand by a mystic consciousness of God and on the other by a vision of the imminence of God's Kingdom upon earth, giving himself as a leader of his people to the proclamation of this Kingdom and the preparation of mankind for its advent. At no time did Jesus think himself to be the Davidic Messiah—Professor Case is emphatic in his conviction that this idea was foisted upon the record by his believing disciples. Neither was Jesus a miracle-worker, a divine or supernatural being in any sense of the word. The Virgin Birth, the Resurrection, the wonders, all are relegated in this book, almost without discussion, to the limbo of fantasy and legend. The Jesus of history, not the Christ of dogma, is what concerns Professor Case, and this Jesus is a man, inspired by genius, but saturated none the less in the thoughts, habits, and movements of his age.

It is a fortunate thing that a book of this authoritative character has appeared at just this time. What with the sanctimonious sentimentalisms of Papini on the one side and the superficial vulgarisms of Bruce Barton on the other, the Nazarene is in danger of being lost anew in the superstitions of the twentieth century, which are not less dangerous than those of the first. Professor Case has called us back to facts. Would that we had another Renan to make such facts once again a part of popular literature.

JOHN HAYNES HOLMES

A Bold Book

New Backgrounds for a New Age. By Edwin Avery Park. Harcourt, Brace and Company.

OVER the caldron of modernity, where the forces and materials of a changing life boil seethingly into transition, hangs a turbid fog exhaled therefrom, shot through with strange nostalgic lights—the fog wistfulness. Even Professor Park's daring and important attempt to formulate a complete philosophy of modernist art and its relation to us all is colored deeply with it. His attempts to pierce it, to ignore it, to confute it, rise themselves occasionally to that bitterness only existent in those fighting an enemy whose claws they know only too well.

Yet any attempt of this type is magnificently worth while, and Professor Park brings to this search a knowledge and a synthetic imagination rare enough in artistic criticism. He sees, as so many critics forget, that the truth of created beauty lies not only in questions of technique, or of the artists' individual vision, or of schools of thought, but also, and more, in the entire sensitiveness of created form to the life which creates it—in "those underlying and mutable factors governing its development." So it is that the chapters American Aesthetics Today, and Industrial Democracy and Art, become among the most vital and exciting examinations of industrialism in modern life that this reviewer knows; seen, strangely enough, not as problems sociological or economic, not as statistics, but from the synthetic and aloof viewpoint of artistic emotion. Speed, hope, questioning: these are the positive qualities the author finds dominant; and, for their opposites, exasperation, weariness, a hatred for reality that makes us long for a masquerade environment as a relief from the struggle of today. Confronted with the terrific complexity of civilization a man today is like "a tired person confronting an enormous pile of soiled dishes to be washed, sorted, stacked, and put away. . . ." So advertising "fosters the cult of the unreal, and deadens any effort to be honest." So today the artist, once supported by, and serving, the educated aristocrat, is now the servant of the great populace and the middle man, and beauty of the old order dies under such a regime.

Yet new beauty is being born. Here again Professor Park seeks its essence surely and rightly in modern life. "As the symbol of our age," he says, "I conceive a man standing solitary with outstretched arms, and face upraised beneath the noon sky. There are no long shadows. Everywhere objects stand revealed pitilessly in the brilliant bath of light. There are few secrets—little save the eternal mystery of life, which is the upturned face." And it is directly in the pitiless clarity of this light that the seeds of modern beauty are engendered. This modern beauty is simple, direct, non-sentimental, stark. It inclines to the geometric. It is impersonal, and a little cruel, yet it is vital and alive. This beauty is without connotation; abstraction is one of its aims. It is to the discovery of this new beauty, this beauty of efficiency, of science, of the aeroplane or the automobile, of commercial buildings, that this book is dedicated.

And as such its importance in America today can hardly be overestimated. Its chapters on American Decorators and Craftsmen, enlightening as they are, are thorough and illustrative; and its examination of modern aesthetics and modern art education, and the failure of modern art to build a home in which modernism shall serve us and not master us, all this is new and stimulating and a little bitter. And it is, moreover, written in a style vivid, epigrammatic, and itself modern, unconventional in its occasional disregard of general usage.

One question alone remains to this reviewer; and it is a question that no modernist critic has as yet answered. Professor Park hints that there is more beauty in an automobile than in twenty museums. Is then a man to feel the thrill of beauty only in reference to its creation? If "The Eve of Saint Agnes" were written today would it be less beautiful? Or if you or I should come suddenly upon the tremendous repose of the Olympia pediments, should we refuse to worship because they are not an aeroplane or a Cézanne?

A huge anthology, more trustworthy in its selections from the standard authors than in those from modern poets in England and America.

I Think I Remember. By Magdalen King-Hall. D. Appleton and Company. $2.

The burlesque memoirs of "An Ordinary English Snob and Gentleman" by the author of the successful hoax called "The Diary of a Young Lady of Fashion." The supposed subject (who tells his own story) comes of an old family whose motto is "I grabbe what I cann and hold it for the common weal," and he considers the introduction of fish-knives into good society the most remarkable change brought about by the late war. The book is amusing in spite of the fact that the author allows herself greater latitude in her burlesque than she did when she was attempting to maintain sufficient verisimilitude to make deceit successful.

Drama

Black Ecstasy

THOSE who have watched the Negro actor on Broadway must often have observed how fundamentally the character of his art differs from that of his white fellows. Put him as a subsidiary character in a play for and about a white society and he is likely to be either merely incompetent or so authentically his own natural self that he destroys for the moment all the illusion which art has built up, since the subdued traditions of our conventional drama and the intellectualized dialogue which for generations we have cultivated are so little natural to him that when he tries to adapt himself the effect is of something merely feeble and amateurish. Permit him, on the other hand, to express himself in terms more nearly his own and he is in a moment transformed. He is not accustomed to translate his deepest emotions into words and he does not speak well even the words which others have written for him if the meaning of those words depends upon a logical coherence defining a thought; but it is in supplying their deficiencies that he excels. What he cannot say he can with unmatchable eloquence shout, or sing, or dance, for he has at his command all those means of expression which we, too long accustomed to be dumb with all but our tongues, have allowed ourselves to forget. A banal colloquialism issues from his mouth with an intonation which makes it say all that the mere words were impotent to say; his shoulders, more eloquent than a Latin's, can have fathomless despair written upon them; and in his legs is an ecstasy.

Ecstasy seems, indeed, to be his natural state. While our own actors pant after an emotion and must depend for their outburst upon elaborately learned tricks he, on the contrary, is good only when some utter abandonment is to be portrayed. He may move awkwardly, almost uncomprehendingly, through level scenes which the most mediocre of general utility men could carry off with competence, but he leaps with an effortless ease into a crisis and surrenders himself to joy, to terror, or to grief as to a native element. And above all he catches the con-

THE story of Theodosia Bell, courageously facing the decay of the gentility in which she had been reared. Its theme is universal, and its roots are deep in nature. Those who plunge themselves into its rich life, its love and pain and hope, will experience a unique adventure of the mind and heart. EDWARD GARNETT, after reading a part of the proofs, wrote: "I was deeply impressed. It has all her quality. That wonderful scene in which Lou handles the knife before the fascinated eyes of Theodosia is a masterpiece, and the scene of setting the frantic dogs on the lover is of amazing force." My Heart and My Flesh is unquestionably an American masterpiece. $2.50 tagion of a group. His voice swells with the swelling of other voices; his body catches the rhythm of a crowd; and he reveals an instinctive sense for participation in an emotion larger than his comprehension. One searches for a word to describe his abandonment and one discovers that the word is Dionysian—that his gift is a gift for drama in a form more primitive as well as, perhaps, more purely dramatic than that of our conventional stage which is no more than a platform where the decorous conversations of decorous life are recited. He is drunk, as the followers of Dionysus were drunk, with emotions that words cannot convey, and he dances or shouts his ecstasy.

Fortunately the dramatization of the novel "Porgy" which the Theater Guild has caused to be acted at its own theater by a large company composed almost entirely of Negroes is one which affords a great many opportunities for just such casting. Most of the action takes place either in the courtyard of a swarming Charleston tenement known as Catfish Row or in the room of one of its denizens where the community gathers to hold a wake over a murdered man; and the effects are created by a succession of mass scenes in the course of which the performers, abandoning themselves with almost equal completeness to the excitement of a crap game and the frenzy of a religious excitement, succeed in conveying to the spectator a sense of life in a community which, for all its ignorance and squalor, lives passionately and as a unit. The whole is, indeed, a highly interesting and, in part, very successful attempt to translate a novel into purely theatrical terms, and if the method were carried only a little further it would result in a type of play in which ordinary dialogue had been completely replaced by the pageant, the pantomime, and the chant of the ritualistic drama. When it fails of its effect it does so because it has not quite sufficiently mastered its own method to enable it to dispense wholly with more conventional devices; because it seems to remember from time to time that it has a story to tell and because it pauses, much as a musical comedy often pauses, to tell it with unfortunate results. When it does so we descend quickly from ecstasy to melodrama and exchange the moving authenticity of genuine passions for the meager emotions of a rather artificial tale. "Porgy," like the actors who play it, is most successful when it attempts what appears to be the most difficult tasks. It soars with ease, but when it walks it stumbles.

Ever since the days of "The Bat" and its kind New York has been accustomed to have its dramatic horrors spoofed by the author, but in "Dracula" (Fulton Theater) it is again asked to take them straight. The play, made from Bram Stoker's well-known tale of the vampire and his victim, is not done with any remarkable subtlety, but it has its shivers. "Hidden" (Longacre Theater), Freudian tale of the havoc wrought by a girl who did not know that she was in love with her sister's husband, has a good deal of a case-book's interest, but in spite of the good acting of Beth Merrill it never seems quite to reach the effects it is aiming at.

Several of the new musical comedies are better than the average. "Just Fancy" (Casino Theater) is made from a rather naively romantic play by A. E. Thomas dealing with the days when Prince Edward fluttered American hearts, and though it is decorously innocuous it is prettily staged and it has Raymond Hitchcock to help make it amusing. At the Cosmopolitan the imperturbable Balieff is again presenting the Chauve Souris company in a new program. But best of all is "The Five O'clock Girl" (Forty-fourth Street Theater). It is both tuneful and witty, and has in Al Shaw, Sam Lee, and Pert Kelton three most unusual comedians. In Louis Bromfield's "House of Women" (Maxine Elliott Theater) Nance O'Neil, Helen Freeman, and Elsie Ferguson contribute extraordinary acting to a rather unimpressive story. "High Gear" (Wallack's Theater) tells with crudity and feeble humor the difficulties a young married couple encounter in entertaining an uncle from the West.

Labor's League of Nations Explodes

By HEBER BLANKENHORN

Paris, Sept. 1

AFTER a week of dramatic sessions—whose significance was hidden rather than advertised in the press—labor's league of nations has dissolved in disagreement.

The delegates of thirteen million people, from twenty-five different political divisions of the world (including Canada but excluding the United States), fell between two stools: a red one, Russia, and a supposedly gold one, America. How their old organization will pick itself up, and which direction it will turn—east or west—may be as important, ultimately, as are those conferences of Baldwins, Poincarés, Mellons, etc., whose grand gatherings at Geneva, or quiet chats elsewhere, are reported as world events.

Labor's league is much the older, antedating that of Geneva by two decades. It is the International Federation of Trade Unions, the "I. F. T. U., or "Amsterdam," from its headquarters. Once it was modest enough for a beer-hall to contain its "world congresses"—usually in Germany where its headquarters formerly were. This August its triennial assembly was held in the Grand Palais, the big exhibition hall off the Champs Elysées in Paris. Its banquet was at Versailles.

A few ex-cabinet ministers were among the 175 delegates, from Labor Governments which had ruled Britain, Denmark, Sweden, Germany, or shared power in countries like Belgium. But the I. F. T. U. delegates met primarily as trade unionists, rather resentful of "interference" from even their own political parties. For politics they have another league, the Labor and Socialist International, scorned as the "Two and a Half" by its lesser rival, the "Third" in Moscow. The I. F. T. U. delegates referred to their home organizations, the unions, as the ones which create, finance, and manage the more showy political parties. More "direct" action than operates through legislatures was the concern of the I. F. T. U.

For example here sat Austrian trade-union leaders whose members recently broke their discipline to burn up the Law Courts "which were hatching Fascism." Yonder sat the German chiefs of railroaders, public-service unions, and the like, who a few years back, when Kapp's army seized Berlin and the government was in flight from town to town, ordered the general strike which strangled the monarchists—whom soldiery could not have beaten. Here at the British tables sat the very men whose orders some years ago stopped dead a threatened war with Russia and who last year conducted unsuccessfully a general strike which was a nine-days' wonder. The failure of that strike, and the resultant weakness of the four and half millions of British trade unionists, was the real cause back of the turn of events in the congress.

A black brother for the first time was present, Clements Kadalie, organizer of his race in the Union of South Africa. The congress recognized his claim for support against oppressors, chiefly the white skilled trade unions! Kadalie sails this autumn for the United States. Three other dark faces were guests from the All-India Trade Union Congress. For the first time Argentina had a full-fledged delegation. From Mexico as an invited guest had come Samuel O. Yudico, railroader, and right-hand man of Morones. An invitation to send a guest-delegate had been declined by President Green of the American Federation of Labor. Russia was not invited. In this line-up of new members, guests, and absentees was contained the germ of the fight which tore the congress to pieces.

For the great question before them was—which way to march, to complete their federation as a "world" league? East, to Russia? West, to the United States? Or south to Latin America, Australia, China? Though 13,000,000 are in the I. F. T. U., outside are the 3,000,000 of the A. F. of L.; the 9,500,000 of Russia; the 1,500,000 of the Mexican federation (CROM); and many smaller powerful federations like the Australian, and weak but portentous movements like the various Chinese. When the I. F. T. U. was reconstituted after the war the American Federation was a member but withdrew partly because of intense personal antipathies between the late Mr. Gompers and M. Thomas, the present director of the (Geneva) International Labor Organization; largely, however, because the science of world cooperation of labor is no more developed than is that of governments. The League of Nations stands deadlocked at about the same place as the I. F. T. U., a little behind perhaps, since Germany has been in the I. F. T. U. since 1919.

"To get men to think together is the hardest thing in the world." In the realm of labor, cooperation is a science where highbrow writers have scored mostly failures; it is a workingman's job. Workingmen and "statesmen," working together, in 1919 achieved the establishment of the International Labor Organization. It in turn has achieved at least one thing more solid than has the League—its own huge office "palace" on the shores of Lake Geneva. The Labor Section in that office, and in its world conferences, has been clearly dominated by the I. F. T. U.

There are in existence twenty-seven trade federations—miners, metal-workers, transport-workers, wood-workers, builders, post and telegraph, and so forth. These are affiliated with the I. F. T. U., and have three representatives on its board. American trade unions are joining these trade federations in increasing numbers. The carpenters have joined the wood-workers, the machinists the metal-workers, and various railway brotherhoods have approached the transport-workers. One of these twenty-seven has admitted the Russians—the food-workers. The trade federations thus repeat the history of pulling and hauling—east vs. west—of the I. F. T. U.

Of course the belief that going east means toward revolution, and west away from it, lay behind the whole debate. But in the immediate foreground was chiefly a question of stand-patters against progressives. Some in the I. F. T. U. were anxious to keep out anything big, lest it upset their balance of power. The I. F. T. U. balance of power is important to others besides labor leaders in Europe. Foreign offices and cabinets keep a sharp eye on it. Amsterdam policies confront governments at Geneva conferences. Amsterdam demands monopolize the agenda of Geneva annual labor parliamentary proceedings, surely the most deliberate and involved of any legislative body in the world. Statesmen liked to see I. F. T. U. executives, Oudegeest, Jouhaux, Mertens, Poulton, arriving on schedule in Geneva, and these leaders visibly enjoyed their equality with governments there, even when voicing labor dissatisfaction with Genevan results. The balance of power, "so serviceable to European stabilization," had survived years of criticism from Moscow without much worry, but in recent months it had been seriously threatened by the restiveness and enterprise of a member group, the British trade unions.

To try to "defeat the British" had become almost a habit of certain national groups in I. F. T. U. meetings, a habit readily met with efforts to "defeat the French" or "hold the Germans." Thus the congress assembled in a great glassed hall where redness was confined to a circle of vivid banners and to the red posies in the geranium pots on delegations' tables, while internationalism and universal brotherhood as expounded in the opening address of President Purcell instantly turned those desideratums into myths for the rest of the session.

Three of those on the platform became the center of the melee. One was Jan Oudegeest (Holland), "the old man," senior secretary of the I. F. T. U., the ruddy-faced, stocky, former railroader who had become the walking embodiment of "Amsterdam" in the halls of Geneva. Another was young John Brown, the English-language secretary, a lean, distinguished face marked by an odd twist of the lip. The third, A. A. Purcell, M. P., had succeeded J. H. Thomas as head of the I. F. T. U. when Thomas had become a member of His Majesty's Labor Government. Continental colleagues deemed Purcell a notable, and trying, contrast to Thomas. Purcellian energy, arrogance, and individualism had offended them almost as much as had his habits of visiting Russia, the United States, and Mexico.

These countries were the heart of Purcell's "keynote" speech, together with China, India, and South America, and such countries as Australia and Mexico which have refused to join the I. F. T. U. until Russia has been admitted to membership. Purcell's speech had nothing standpat in it; very "left," as Europeans term it. Just the sort of pronouncement the British unions "had no right to make," considering their year of defeat and demoralization.

During the lumbering process of translation, while the speech was re-thundered in French and in German, with side groups listening to it in Scandinavian, Polish, Czech, and other tongues, there was visible disturbance among Oudegeest's neighbors: Jouhaux, the portly head of French non-Communist unions; Mertens (Belgium), the tall docker from Antwerp, now floor leader of the Labor section at Geneva conferences; and the elderly, silent Leipart (Germany), whose face looks like a scientist's forever stooped over a microscope. Jouhaux took advantage of his "welcome to Paris" speech to disavow Purcell's keynote, in behalf of all the executives except Purcell and Brown. In the name of brotherliness, Purcell was no brother of theirs.

At that the British delegation—and some of them had looked uncomfortable over Purcell's tone—rose as one. In a hubbub they refused to countenance any attacks on Purcell. They were well-schooled in the Marxian rule that "an injury to one (Britisher) is an injury to all." The British rising stampeded France and Belgium into furious counterattack to save the stand-pat fort. Mertens and Jouhaux represented the whole British policy, culminating in Secretary Brown, as "intrigue" and sabotage of the "true I. F. T. U. policies." Last year's international labor delegation to Mexico, invited by the unions and Government there, was termed the handiwork of Brown, with the approval of Moscow. Whereupon Brown wrecked the meet[illegible]

For years at Amsterdam he had been hamstrung and isolated in every effort to broaden the policies; sick of it, he was ready to quit. On the topic of intrigues he produced facts. He read a cablegram to himself when in Mexico received at the hour Mexico was ready to join the I. F. T. U.; it was from Oudegeest in Amsterdam and it asked "Why can't the Mexicans pay up first?" which made Morones and Mexico dismiss the I. F. T. U. with contempt. Then Brown read the letter dealing with Russia during the negotiations two years ago, begun by order of the 1924 I. F. T. U. congress. It was a confidential letter from Oudegeest to Jouhaux (circulated by error to Brown) giving the perfect picture of stand-patters coagulating against "outsiders." Mertens, Jouhaux, and Oudegeest were to prepare the reply to the Russians before "the Englishman Hicks" arrived. This sentence was in the letter: "Tomsky seems to desire to collaborate on a sincere basis; it is therefore time to attack him." Thus in one stroke a year's literature from Moscow seemed justified. That the congress could not forgive.

Oudegeest and Jouhaux denied it. After a day's grilling by the British in committee, Oudegeest admitted it. As the congress reassembled, he rose and resigned. The only veteran who had been at every international congress since the beginning of the century thus left the stage with unexpected drama.

Germany, the largest federation in the congress, resented Oudegeest's fall and set about getting Purcell's scalp. This meant either crowding out the British (and so wrecking the I. F. T. U.) or dictating to Britain the name of the British representative. For Purcell was the official nominee of British labor. The Germans therefore did the unprecedented thing, and nominated, beside their own German representative, George Hicks, present chairman of all British unions, as candidate against Purcell.

The British were aghast. Solemnly they warned that the fate of the I. F. T. U. was at stake by such maneuvering. When Germany proved resolute, the British delegation in a body marched out. A minute after they were notified that Hicks had been elected in their absence, with the virtual offer of being made president of the I. F. T. U. Apparently Britain had walked off, and been bounced back. They left Paris to put the whole question of staying in the I. F. T. U. before their own people.

At that hour so little was left of the I. F. T. U. that the congress did not dare attempt to elect officers or debate reports or do anything except decide to remove the headquarters—to Frankfort in Germany or possibly to Brussells—selling their building in Amsterdam. A commission of six national representatives was left in charge to pick up the pieces, to consider reorganization, or to congeal into the old stand-pat, if smaller, I. F. T. U. For the present all will await the decision of Britain.

Yet labor's league, with older and deeper roots than the Geneva league of governments, cannot avoid its destiny. The League of Nations evades without too great pain the objects of its charter, which would have to be met by fetching in Russia and America and proceeding to disarmament. Labor's league's habit of coming to grips with its basic object was, after all, what split it at Paris. Nobody knowing its history expects it to stay split and impotent. And if the British should happen to vote for leading a new organization now, there would be sudden concern among various governments which for the moment are smiling with satisfaction.

"PEACE COMMISSIONER" STIMSON reported to President Coolidge on May 14 that the insurrection in Nicaragua was definitely ended. Since then the United States Marines, aided by the American-financed constabulary, have been mopping up the revolutionaries (called, in State Department parlance, "bandits"). In early July the Navy and State departments announced that all Nicaraguans had been disarmed except some fifty bandits headed by Sandino. Mr. Maurice A. Hallgren, of the International News Service staff in Washington, has done a public service in compiling a list of the engagements and casualties since Mr. Stimson declared the civil war ended. It is as follows:

MAY 15-16—At La Paz Centro, 14 Nicaraguans killed; number of wounded unknown. Two marines killed, including Captain Richard B. Jackson.

JULY 16—Ocotal, 300 to 500 Nicaraguans killed; more than 100 known to be wounded. One marine killed.

JULY 26—San Fernando, six Nicaraguans killed; 15 to 20 wounded. One marine wounded.

JULY 27—San Fernando (during pursuit by United States planes of fugitives from battle of July 26), 20 Nicaraguans killed or wounded.

AUGUST 16—Along northern border, two Nicaraguans killed.

SEPTEMBER 3—Telpaneca, five Nicaraguans killed or wounded.

SEPTEMBER 8 (reported September 15)—Sanata, five Nicaraguans killed.

SEPTEMBER 19—Telpaneca, 20 Nicaraguans killed; 50 wounded. Two marines killed.

SEPTEMBER 21—Telpaneca, unreported number of Nicaraguans killed and wounded. No mention of marine casualities.

OCTOBER 9 (reported to Managua October 18)—67 Nicaraguans killed or wounded. Four members of native guard killed. No marine casualties.

FIVE OR SIX HUNDRED NICARAGUANS, then, have been killed—or let us use the honest word, murdered—by United States troops fighting, without a shadow of constitutional justification, on foreign soil, since Mr. Coolidge's "peace commissioner" and publicity man said fighting was at an end. Throughout the Nicaraguan affair the State and Navy departments have deliberately and persistently lied to the American people. Can any one pretend that the manhunters of the Marine Corps are still "merely protecting American lives and property"? Is there no way of stopping this butchery?

CHICAGO'S HERESY-HUNTING school commissioners seem to be unpopular; the press ridicules them from coast to coast. David Saville Muzzey, author of one of the sinning textbooks, is suing his abusers for libel; and the embattled historians have arisen in defense of Truth. We would have more sympathy for them if they had had more sympathy with Truth in the past. There was a time, ten years ago, when they sat at their desks, very mum about Truth, busily revising their textbooks to fit the needs of war-time propaganda. It was in those days that King George III took on a mildness of character unknown to previous generations, and that all the hardships of the Revolution were unloaded on the heads of the mercenary Hessians. Britain did indeed acquire a surprising halo in more than one war-time textbook. Doubtless much of that revision consisted in a wise erasure of haloes where haloes did not belong; the fathers of our country were, after all, human beings like the British. But the motivating force was less a pure passion for truth than a desire to adapt the textbooks to the mood of 1917, when blood was thicker than water and all Germans were Huns. Mayor Thompson and his cohorts, absurd as they are making themselves, are only acting as the historians themselves did a decade ago.

MAINE HAS RETAINED the primary election system by what appears to have been a two-to-one vote. This result is the more remarkable because only two newspapers, one in Bath, the other the Portland Evening News, were for the primary. The rest of the Maine press was unanimously in favor of returning to the old convention system. It is true that the vote was light, but the voice of the majority is none the less unmistakable, and it is the occasion for real rejoicing, while incidentally showing, as has happened so many times before, that not even a practically united press in a State or a city can persuade an electorate to do what it does not want to do. There are many signs that a nation-wide effort is being made to do away with the primary. Had the Maine election gone the other way and the primary been abolished there, the result would have been widely trumpeted by our reactionaries and our Fascists as proof that the people themselves were beginning to turn away from the democratic experiment. Beyond question it would have heartened the efforts in other States to do away with an institution which, whatever its faults, remains a bulwark against the encroachments of corrupt political machines.

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE assures the country that it is prosperous. "Crops are better," he says—he omits to note that prices are lower. "Exports are on the increase," he remarks, quoting the September figures—he might have added that trade always picks up in the fall, but that September 1920's exports were $22,000,000 below those of 1926. Railway net receipts, he admits, have fallen, but the decrease is not great—though the railways say it was a drop of 11 per cent from the 1926 figures. Tonnage figures, he announces, are encouraging—in fact freight-car loadings dropped 4½ per cent. It is difficult to understand why business continues its adulation of so ignorant a President, and of the Mr. Mellon whose Treasury estimates tend to be a billion dollars wrong each year. Perhaps the cynical commentator of the New York Times financial staff has the clue: "Generally," this astute gentleman remarks, Wall Street comment was "that the President had done his best to prevent undue discouragement over such reaction as is known to have occurred." In other words, the President did his best to keep the country happy by telling it bedtime stories. Wall Street is not fooled, but it likes other people to be.

EDISON HEDGES is an obscure lawyer from Atlantic City, New Jersey, and Nathan L. Miller is a former Governor of the State of New York, and attorney for some of New York City's wealthiest corporations. That is one difference between them; there are others. Hedges is attorney for Willis Beach, wanted by the police in connection with the Lilliendahl murder case. On October 17 his client disappeared.

> Whenever the courts want my client I will produce him [said Hedges]. I told Beach to leave town because of the inhuman treatment [by] detectives and the refusal of the Prosecutor to allow me to be present when they questioned him. . . . When only the police demanded him to appear he was acting within his constitutional rights in leaving his home. If Beach is indicted for murder he will appear at once to answer that charge.

The next day Hedges, the attorney, was indicted on two counts charged with spiriting away a material witness. "This Hedges phase of the investigation," said the Assistant Prosecutor, "will disclose whether a lawyer can obstruct justice and stifle an inquiry of this sort. It will show whether one lawyer is bigger than the whole State of New Jersey."

NATHAN MILLER had different luck. He is attorney for Harry M. Blackmer, former chairman of the board of the Midwest Refining Co., and the missing key man in the Government's case against Harry F. Sinclair and Albert B. Fall. Blackmer left the country in a hurry about the time of the Walsh investigation, and has not been home since. He was discovered, and subpoenaed in Europe; and Atlee Pomerene, counsel for the Government in the oil cases, made a special trip abroad to persuade him to return; but Blackmer has not come back. When Blackmer's name was called as a witness in the Sinclair-Fall case, Nathan L. Miller stepped forward to explain his absence. According to the New York World Mr. Miller explained that "he had advised Blackmer to disobey the subpoena on the ground that service in a foreign land is unconstitutional and therefore void." The other newspapers report him in substantially the same terms. Obviously Mr. Miller is a lawyer who considers himself greater than the government of the United States. Perhaps he is. Without waiting for a mere court to rule on it he has declared a United States law unconstitutional, and has advised his client to disobey it. Yet he has not been indicted for obstructing the course of justice, and we predict that he will not be. Attorneys for oil magnates are not treated like Atlantic City lawyers.

TO HAVE HAD ELEVEN CHILDREN and to be sentenced to prison for life at thirty-two must surely be a record in hectic careers. A Detroit woman, convicted six times of larceny, is now liable for life sentence under Michigan's new Habitual Criminals Act. Mrs. Brennan explains that she was married at fifteen, that eleven children have been born to her, and that only when she is about to have a baby is she seized with the tendency to kleptomania which makes her steal. Obviously Mrs. Brennan is a subject for a psychiatrist, not a court; yet this Michigan Baumes law is so blind that it makes no provision for cases like hers. Any more than for the case of Fred Palm, another young victim of Michigan's new passion for punishment, who was sentenced to life because he had in his possession a pint of gin. This was the last of a series of convictions for minor crimes, but to say that Palm is a dangerous criminal and a menace to society at large and that the State should therefore support him for the balance of his life because he owned a pint of gin is to indict also a fairly large group of citizens at present comfortably out of jail.

WARDEN LAWES of Sing Sing prison has seen 109 men electrocuted since he became warden in 1920; but he thinks capital punishment worse than futile. He points out in the Survey Midmonthly that "juries and judges erred in 11 per cent of the original commitments for first-degree murder," and suspects that more errors are never discovered. If so, the state kills constantly with no excuse whatever. Murderers, Mr. Lawes adds, are rarely chronic criminals. Ninety per cent of those committed for first-degree murder have no previous criminal record; "nor is there a single instance in which a prisoner pardoned or specially committed for murder, first-degree, returned to Sing Sing prison because of a second homicide." His studies of the racial origin of murderers in various decades puncture another popular myth.

> The Irish led for a long period following their immigration and the Germans were a close second following their immigration period. The Italians then took first place and now the Negro, who is migrating from the South, is rapidly forging toward the lead. In other words, the typical murderer of any given period comes from that race which is making a place for itself in a new environment.

WE ARE TIRED of "weeks." On that one point we sympathize with Calvin Coolidge, who refused to indorse National Education Week. We too have refused to give publicity to weeks—to National Reindeer Week, Popcorn Week, Crabapple Week, and we forget what else! But when it comes to Visiting Nurse Service Week in New York we relent. We can merely advise the Henry Street nurses that they know more about nursing than about publicity, and that the day of the week is past. The day of the visiting nurse is here; and it is here in part because Lillian Wald's Henry Street Settlement has put it on the map. For this nursing service is one of New York's really great institutions. What Miss Wald began on the East Side has spread over the city—it now has eighteen centers in three boroughs; and its two hundred graduate nurses average a total of 1,600 visits every day—Negro, Irishman, Armenian, Jew, Italian, Yankee—the nurses go to all who need them, and are paid as the patient can afford. A baby born in New York City today has a better chance of living and thriving than most babies born on American farms—and for that the "Henry Street nurses" deserve a large share of the credit. It is natural that nurses from forty-seven countries have come to New York to study and admire the Henry Street system—and typical that most able-bodied New Yorkers are unaware of its existence.

TOLSTOI, TROTZKY, and now the United States customs service, have tried to define art. When Edward Steichen brought in an ovoid piece of metal shaped by the sculptor Brancusi and labeled The Bird, the literal-minded customs authorities said it was not art and assessed it 40 per cent duty as a "manufacture of metal." Mr. Steichen protested, and now the United States Customs Court is earnestly at work. "Would you recognize it as a bird if you saw it in a forest, and would you take a shot at it?" the judge asked one artist on the witness-stand. "It is a matter of indifference to me what it represents," came the intelligent answer. "If the artist calls it a bird so would I." The artist remarked that the profile might suggest the breast of a bird. "Or the keel of a boat, or the crescent of a new moon?" asked the judge, still seeking wisdom. "Or a fish or a tiger?" added the learned Assistant District Attorney. We confess that some modern art has left us as unmoved and frivolous. But the whole discussion seemed somehow to be lifted to clean wind-swept mountain-peaks when Jacob Epstein, a very great modern artist, answered the question, "Why is this a work of art?" with the simple but final words: "It pleases my sense of beauty. I find it a beautiful object." When the judge persisted "So a brass rail, highly polished and harmoniously curved, could also be a work of art?" Epstein answered "It could become so." "Then a mechanic could have done this thing?" the customs lawyer interrupted. "No," said Epstein impressively. "A mechanic could not make a work of art. He could have polished this, but he could not have conceived it."

THE AGORA OF ATHENS is on its way to the sunlight at last. Buried for centuries, some of it under thirty feet of silt and rubbish, the market-place familiar to Greeks as early as Herodotus and as late as Plutarch is now to become as accessible as the Forum is in Rome. Professor Capps of Princeton, laboring over a plan to raise $2,500,000 among the American universities for excavations in this most famous of unseen places, has just heard the good news that an anonymous donor has promised the whole of the required sum, to be paid in checks as soon as satisfactory arrangements can be made with the Greek Government and with the citizens of Athens who live on the site—whose house walls, we hear, are veritable museums of imbedded tablets, capitals, and bas-reliefs. We hope the work can proceed quickly, for temples lie under this common dirt, and there may very well be statues, archaic or classical, which it would be worth one's time to sail to Greece to see. It is pleasant to think that the Acropolis may one day look down and recognize its old friend the Agora, as the Capitoline and the Palatine have long been able to do with their old friend the Forum. Pausanias, who described it all, should be on hand to hear us say that he had done his Baedeker well.

TO THE BALTIMORE SUN go our deepest sympathies in the sudden death of its editor, John Haslup Adams —and to the entire profession of journalism. Writing in the Sun, Henry L. Mencken says that Mr. Adams was the only journalist he ever knew "who never made a visible compromise with his convictions." We have known others, but that does not keep us from believing that there is no finer tribute for the epitaph of a journalist. It is as much the right of the unselfish and devoted journalist to have this said at his grave as it is that of the soldier to have his unsullied sword upon his bier. Mr. Adams was of that category of editors who have believed that newspapers exist primarily to right injustice, not merely to make money as vulgarly as a chain of tobacco stores or a cut-rate bargain emporium. Hence his loss affects the whole profession—there are so few men with his type of conscience and his ideals left in it, and so few newspapers which value such a man and give him free rein. Like the lamented Frank I. Cobb, of the New York World, Mr. Adams died much too young—he was but fifty-six. Like Mr. Cobb, he was a great liberal, but one who felt that changed conditions made impossible the laissez faire doctrines of the great liberals who are the forefathers of the present day. He never lost faith and courage, despite years of almost unbearable physical suffering. To John W. Owens, who now succeeds him as editor of the Baltimore Sun, Mr. Adams has left the highest of writing standards and the noblest of editorial traditions.

THE DEATH OF CHARLES H. LEVERMORE ended a career of fine scholarship and steady effort in behalf of peace. For many years before he won the Bok peace prize in 1924, Dr. Levermore had been actively connected with various organizations working for international decency and the rule of reason. The $50,000 prize, relieving him of the necessity and restrictions of money-earning, made it possible for him to travel and investigate international relations at their sources. He has been in Europe the greater part of the time since 1924, continuing his close study of the machinery and activities of the League of Nations. With a certain fitness, death came to him while he was delivering a public lecture on peace. Men of the temper and learning of Dr. Levermore are rare, too rare, and it is a consolation to know that one of them lived long enough to taste honor and the fruits of honor, and to put to such satisfying use the money that a prize essay brought him.

Politicians and Issues

WITH Nicholas Murray Butler we so rarely find ourselves in agreement that it is a pleasure to record the fact that he is rapidly becoming the enfant terrible of the Republican Party. Whether it is that he has abandoned as hopeless his own political ambitions and feels that he is now free to talk as he thinks, or whether the change is due to some other reason, he has, beginning with his prophecy that Calvin Coolidge would not run for reelection, rendered a genuine service in demanding that the candidates stop concealing their views and come forward and let the public know exactly where they stand. His latest offense consists in the speech, The Lost Art of Thinking, which he delivered before the Institute of Arts and Sciences in New York. In the course of that address he pointed out the familiar fact that > the office-holding and office-seeking class dislikes thinking and pretty uniformly discredits both it and the thinker. To hold reasoned convictions, and to give public expression to them, is to incur criticism, possibly enmities, and to the office-holding and office-seeking class that is well-nigh fatal.

He added that as a result the office-holders and office-seekers "block the road of the people toward those higher and finer things which it is in their hearts to accomplish."

This is, of course, what we have been saying in The Nation, lo, these sixty-odd years. The offense is, moreover, as old as the politician, but it is true that since the war the art of thinking has been lost by wide American circles. There has been practically no political thinking at all, and the sinners are not merely politicians, but also clergymen, the legal fraternity, almost the entire press of the country, teachers, and everyone else who ought to reason and ought to apply critical yardsticks to what is happening, not only within our borders, but beyond. If that had not been the case Calvin Coolidge could not have lasted in the White House six months without becoming an object of public ridicule. It is not only that he never gives us an original or really worth-while thought, but that when he does say something to commend itself to liberal opinion the world over he promptly offsets it by moving in the opposite direction. Thus he failed in his Disarmament Conference at Geneva and now announces that he wants the army and navy to receive much larger appropriations—forgetting that he informed the American Legion at its Omaha meeting in 1925 that armaments have never prevented a country from being attacked or assured its success in a war.

The almost inevitable cowardice of the politicians is the more extraordinary because if they had the slightest courage, or intelligence in the reading of American history, they would know that the American people rally with enthusiasm to men whom they believe free and fearless, with the right to call their souls their own. It is true that they are often deceived by appearances, and that men to whom they gave support have subsequently turned out to have feet of clay. But until that was discovered the people supported them with joy, happy in the thought that at last they had discovered real men and not puppets. Hughes when he was Governor, Wilson and Roosevelt when they made war upon big business, Cleveland for some years, Foulke when he seemed bent on purifying the State of Indiana, Governor Hunt in Arizona where he is today doing admirable work, and many another have found the public backing them. But the politician continues to think that the only way to get ahead is to keep mum on all the pressing issues, hoping that if he offends no one the lightning will strike him as it struck Harding and Coolidge.

Mr. Butler's ire is rightly aroused because the leading Presidential candidates on both sides are, as our gifted Senator Reed of Missouri would say, "as mum as oysters stranded on the Massachusetts coast." Not one of them dares mutter; they are all engaged in hiding in bomb-proofs lest somebody ask them how they stand on prohibition, or on the tariff, or on disarmament, or the foreign debt, or some other worth-while issue. Mr. Butler lists nearly a dozen problems besides prohibition—the problems of the land and of the agriculturalists, of international cooperation to establish peace, of freeing the government from control of business and privilege, of doing away with lame-duck sessions of Congress among them. In short, he demands that the nation face the problems of its day. Everybody knows that the liberation of the government from big-business control, so loudly called for by both Wilson and Roosevelt in 1912, is much further from achievement than it was a decade and a half ago. Indeed, Mr. Butler might well have pointed out that no nation can stand still in the face of the ever-moving juggernaut of capital. With trusts and super-trusts and international trusts being formed every day—the latter chiefly aimed at the United States—to content ourselves with contemplation of the colossal number of automobiles, radio sets, phonographs, and moving-picture houses is to invite a day of most dangerous reckoning. Behind "prosperity" stand these terrible specters of corporation greed and avarice and the heaped-up billions of capital that, when in the hands of individuals, challenge the very existence of the political state.

It is also a gratifying event that, on the same day on which Mr. Butler spoke, Senator Borah publicly accepted an invitation to discuss in New York the status of prohibition in connection with the Constitution. He wants a showdown as to whether the Eighteenth Amendment of the Constitution is to be allowed to become a dead letter or not. That is courage and wisdom. Whether one is for or against prohibition the time has come to face it in all earnestness. We would put to every candidate the question: Are you Wet or Dry? If politically dry, do you drink intoxicating liquors? Whichever you are, what do you propose to do about the situation? Are you for or against the Constitution? Are you a conscientious objector to the obeying of the Volstead law? And then we should go on, and make them answer categorically without platitudes or glittering generalities how they stand on the tariff, and disarmament, and world peace; whether they believe that big business should continue to rule this country as it does now or not. It is high time, with corruption widespread in this country and official lawlessness flagrant from one end to the other, that pussyfooting should stop. If Mr. Butler and Senator Borah, and the Progressive Republican group, will put pistols to the heads of candidates, beginning with that delightful man of mystery, Herbert Hoover, and find out what they really think, they will do a valiant service to the entire country and its political life.

National Flood Control

THERE are at last signs that the problem of flood control in the Mississippi Valley will be presented in the next Congress as one of national importance, a problem that can be solved adequately and permanently only by the federal government. Most heartening in this respect are the recent statements of certain members of the Administration. If their words were never heeded before, one hopes they will be in this instance. No public pronouncement, for example, is more pertinent to the whole problem than the declaration of Secretary of War Davis that the Mississippi River must be kept "in its banks and out of politics." If the Secretary's position had been accepted several years ago there is strong likelihood that "the greatest peace-time disaster that the United States has ever known" (as Herbert Hoover puts it) would never have occurred.

The importance of full federal control of the Mississippi flood problem has not been recognized by Congress. Petty pork-barrel legislation and independent State jealousies have been given precedence. States have been allowed to treat the matter as of more or less local concern, and the result has been the policy of always passing the water on to the next State downstream, and letting the people below look out for themselves. And the fruits of this shabby decentralized policy, as we were permitted to read in the papers three months ago, are destruction, desolation, and starvation for the people in the lower Mississippi Valley. In addition to these hardships is the irreparable destruction of farm land by the washing away of its choice topsoil. One cubic mile—equivalent to three inches from the top of 13,000,000 acres—finds its way to the gulf each year. With the possibility of similar catastrophes recurring each spring, it does not take genius to see that the Mississippi flood problem is most decidedly national in importance and that the administration of flood control for the entire region should be under one centralized federal bureau.

It should be equally plain that once Congress loses sight of the national aspect of the problem, the result can only be confusion, with a wonderful opportunity for the pork-barrel specialists to do their worst. Already greedy eyes have been watching the nation-wide sentiment for flood control, and plans are brewing to unite other schemes with the flood-control legislation. Hydro-electric power in the Boulder Canyon region, reclamation of arid lands, and flood relief are hailed as "one and the same problem." And it is just this sort of hokum which, following the devastating floods of 1912, resulted in the Newlands Act of 1917, a measure of some initial worth which became so palpably an omnibus log-rolling affair that it prejudiced flood relief throughout the country. Plainly, the record of the United States in the Mississippi Valley is not exemplary. But that is all the more reason why the next session of Congress should treat the matter with intelligence and deliberation, and that engineering skill should be allowed to work unhampered by political strings.

If the engineers are to accomplish a real solution they must be given a free hand. It is a problem that challenges their skill and knowledge to the utmost. The Mississippi River seems today more portentous than ever before; and man, despite the enormous progress of science, despite all his successes in harnessing the forces of nature for his own betterment, seems just a little weaker in comparison. One thing is certain; there is no single, simple solution. So far, there have been three broad theories of flood control. These are (1) "levees only," supported principally by the army engineers and the Mississippi River Commission; (2) levees plus spillways—a plan particularly favored by New Orleans, since it was the operation of the spillway theory in the blasting of the Poydras levee that saved New Orleans from inundation; and (3) levees plus spillways plus source control.

Through source control in reservoirs there is the possibility of both the generation of hydro-electric power and the creation of great inland waterways. The statement of President Coolidge in his address to the Red Cross that "in the solution of the problem we shall advance our system of inland waterways," and the belief of Secretary Hoover that the Mississippi River affords an opportunity for a revolution in inland transportation in America, give added weight to this third scheme of flood control. The practicability of hydro-electric power-generation through reservoirs, however, is questioned, because the bulk of the flood water does not originate in the higher lands where reservoirs are most feasible; and because the reservoirs, if they are to be effective in storing flood waters, would necessarily be empty part of the year—and empty reservoirs seem to be of no use. As to the "levees-only" policy, it was so patently responsible for the recent disaster that it will hardly again be accepted as the sole method of control. The flood records have demonstrated its inadequacy.

There are some objections to every method of flood control suggested. The problem obviously needs the most expert engineering attention of the nation, and Congress's first task is to collect and sift that expert information. Until the engineers and scientists, with the necessary data in hand, have reached a measure of agreement upon the proper solution, it should surely be the fervent hope of everyone that Secretary Davis's admonition to keep the river out of politics will be observed.

The End of "Abie's Irish Rose"

"THE success of 'Abie's Irish Rose,'" Anne Nichols has explained with the customary frankness of the creative artist, "is the result of its great message—the spirit of tolerance."

It must be admitted that the comedy did win the tolerance of Broadway, for it was performed 2,327 times at the Republic Theater. Back in May of 1922 the play was first shown to a New York audience; or, to express its longevity in more comprehensible terms, one actress who began as a flower girl in the cast at the age of ten ended the run in the character of a bridesmaid. Another member of the troupe found time to be married twice and once divorced as "Abie" ambled on.

It would be heartening to believe that the playwright's profit of $5,000,000 came wholly out of America's great love and passion for tolerance. During the life of this comedy celebrating denominational democracy the Ku Klux Klan rose and fell. Governor Smith wrote his famous letter explaining how one might be both Catholic and patriot. Henry Ford discovered a Jewish conspiracy and recanted. And here and there in minor ways race prejudice was manifest. Great as is the triumph of "Abie's Irish Rose," it can hardly be maintained that universal brotherhood has come bounding in upon its heels. Millions saw the happy romance of Abie and Rosemary and though very many laughed not every heart was softened. There is a great gulf fixed between dramatic literature and life, and some who remained to applaud no doubt went down to business the next day and advertised for "Christians only."

Possibly Miss Nichols is mistaken. It may have been the jokes and not the message. Few plays have ever succeeded in gathering within a single evening so many of the old, familiar wheezes. Some have said that America is too new and lacks tradition. Yet there is love and reverence for the jokes of our ancestors. Buildings hallowed by age and gentle memories may go down because they stand across the march of progress, but not the warm and humorous belief that Irishmen bridle and grow apoplectic at even the most casual mention of an orange. Nor will America surrender its belief that twins are by nature a fact hilariously funny.

The critics said that "Abie's Irish Rose" was cheap and sentimental folly. Ten million paying patrons flocked to see the play. Ten million Americans can't be wrong? Perhaps not; but there was a Harding landslide. It is a healthy sign, to be sure, that there should be a public opinion unterrified by any dogma issued through a little group of wilful men. If the ten million enjoyed "Abie's Irish Rose" they were quite right and justified in trampling down the censures of a handful of newspaper critics.

Still, it is difficult to accept the contention that the vast revenues of the play prove beyond doubt that all professional reviewers are dolts and pedants. There remains posterity to be considered. It is by no means certain that "Abie's Irish Rose" will linger through centuries of revival. Nor can the final test be left wholly to the ages. If ten million persons can be wrong over a stretch of five years, ten thousand might err for many decades. There must be somewhere a court of last resort, though it is difficult to locate it this side of Paradise. When Judgment Day roars round, there ought in all reason to be critical comment upon plays as well as people. Celestial criticism would be without bias and quite independent of the box office. How will "Abie's Irish Rose" fare in this last review? There is at least a chance that it will go to the pit accompanied by hissing. The children of light, we have reason to believe, are interested for the most part in the potential magnificence of man. Miss Nichols made him ludicrous and banal.

Even after fame and fortune came to Miss Nichols she remained bitter against those journalists who said her little play was not so good. And is there tolerance in this? The critics have a right to sneer at the ten million. A minority need not be liberal-minded when the odds against it grow overwhelming. One does not carry gifts of gold to Midas. Rather the responsibility of tolerance rests upon the great cheering horde which likes the Nichols drama. There should be compassion for the few who tried to hold the pass against an army.

Take, for instance, the glamorous example of Robert Benchley. For fifty-two weeks in each of the five years he reiterated his opinion that the play was catastrophic. Those who know the man feel certain that he will never weaken. Indeed he is among the happy ones who need not fumble for a fitting message when his final hour approaches. Surely those who stoop for his last words have every reason to expect a thin, devoted whisper: "'Abie's Irish Rose' is rotten."

"The Good Gray Poet"

OUR favorite Irishman for the moment is William Douglas O'Connor, whose pamphlet in defense of Walt Whitman, "The Good Gray Poet," has just been reprinted in Canada. Henry S. Saunders, Toronto enthusiast for Whitman and other important causes, has with his own hands set up and bound 125 copies of the little book first issued by O'Connor in 1866, and it will take two dollars to get one of these copies. We wish the book were to be more accessible. In a proper society it would be distributed to everybody free—though in such a society there would never have been need for the thing to be written.

The need was this. On June 30, 1866, Whitman was summarily dismissed from his post in the Department of the Interior at Washington, and in response to inquiries into the reasons for such action the Secretary of the Department, James Harlan, gave out that Whitman had been discovered to be the author of "Leaves of Grass," a book "full of indecent passages," proving that their maker must be "a very bad man" and a "free lover." Protests from Whitman's friends led Harlan to admit that it would be difficult to prove the badness of the book, and even that he had now revised his judgment of the man. But Harlan thought it better not to invite the poet back, and the poet would ask no favors. O'Connor, who was one of Whitman's warmest and most intelligent friends, waited nine weeks for something to happen. Nothing did, and he poured his pamphlet forth.

It has been called "the most brilliant monograph in American literature." It is at any rate all red-hot, from the first indignant word to the last. It is a stream of fire directed at the head not only of Harlan but of any censor who was ever to come after him. And it is as complete an arsenal of ammunition against censorship in general as anyone, even in these fundamentalist days, would want to borrow from. All the arguments we moderns use are here. O'Connor declared first that Whitman and his book were not bad—his rhetoric on the theme of Whitman's goodness being, as Professor Holloway has recently pointed out, a little excessive but tending toward a substantially accurate statement. He declared next that even if they were bad it was not the business of a Secretary of the Interior to do anything about it. And he asked at last whether all such questions should not be left to the simple reader rather than to that large class of persons whom he had once heard Whitman call "the immutable granitic pudding-heads of the world." Which is all there is to say, we think, upon the subject of the censor.

"If," wrote O'Connor, "rising to the utmost cruelty of conception, I can dare add to the calamities of genius a misery so degrading and extreme as to imagine the great authors of the world condemned to clerkships under Mr. Harlan, I can at least mitigate that dream of wretchedness and insult by adding the fancy of their fate under the action of his principles." Then he showed how Moses, Homer, Lucretius, Dante, Shakespeare, Goethe, and a dozen others would have suffered and been suppressed. It is an argument which liberal lawyers today are using in the courts without too much success.

DR. JUNG in Zurich has an assistant named Miss Wolfe. When American men come with shattered nerves they are sent to her for preliminary consultation and confession. The doctor believes that America is a land sodden with the worship of women. The wife, the mother, and even the niece stand upon a pedestal in the United States according to the notion of foreign observers. It is the function of Miss Wolfe to remove this cursed misconception of feminine perfection and ease the crick out of the neck of the idolators. Neurotics go away entirely cured and mumbling something about the fundamental similarity between the Colonel and Judy O'Grady.

I do not know the precise nature of Miss Wolfe's technique, but it is no great trick to prove that women are not so much. I mean not a whit more or less than men. To work on a paper with a woman, to attend a coeducational school, or even to fall in love should carry conviction of the basic equality of the sexes. Where on earth does this notion come from that American men think of women as in some peculiar way divine? And I wouldn't have asked that question if I didn't know the answer.

There is, or used to be, the toast "To the Ladies." Mother's Day persists and the Southern gentleman sometimes finds his way into print. But whoever took any of that nonsense seriously? This time I don't know the answer. A foreigner may be excused if he is fooled by our national hyperbole, but there should be less patience with a native who compounds the fallacy.

Distinctly in my mind is Louis Bromfield, who writes novels and won a Pulitzer Prize. Before embarking on a lecture tour the young man said that the American woman lorded it over her fellows because she had been led to believe that she was pure and holy. This is a second distillation out of the roots of folly. I will admit that I have known women in politics and elsewhere to seize upon traditional sex eulogies and try to pass them off as honest coin, but even these deceivers grin and give up the instant the base metal is clinked against the counter. If a man is foolish enough to treat a woman as a saint she may allow the impression to ride, but that is no proof that she herself believes it. And, as a matter of fact, she is almost certain to tell him to leave off kneeling and to provide adequate and logical persuasion. Saints do not seem to have much fun.

Of course I belittle masculine intelligence in suggesting that only fools go in for talk about the purity of American womanhood. Rascals have had recourse to just such oratory. Bosses with well-oiled machines were against the extension of the franchise. Probably they did not believe that all the new voters would be reformers, but they were disposed to let well enough alone. To the credit of women it may be said that they have been muddle-headed, corrupt, and incompetent at the polls in precisely the same manner as men. Recent disclosures of census-taking at Albany are in many ways deplorable, but at least they indicate the rapid approach of the day when it will be necessary for no man to take off his hat in any elevator. Even at the present time I think a well-informed American has the right to boast that there is less chivalry and more comradeship between men and women in our land than in any other nation of the world.

Sometimes the point is admitted with regret. The belief prevails that the gross Anglo-Saxon understands nothing of the art of love and that rich American girls are forever marrying foreigners. This is one of the subjects upon which statistics are meager, and I contend that the international alliance is rare rather than otherwise, in proof of which I cite the fact that it is always first-page stuff.

Mr. Bromfield includes in his lecture the observation that marriage is a failure in America because the American male works so hard that he has no time to pay women charming attentions. Many American marriages fail. So do French and English marriages. Surely the divorce rate is no fair test of marital success or failure. The causes for secession are many, and few I believe are purely local. The hag-ridden, hard-working American man is largely a legendary figure. He, too, is the creation of the casual European tripper. We have no leisure class, I am told, but here in New York, the traditional hive of industry, you can find thirty thousand people at a double-header in the Yankee Stadium on almost any sunny afternoon.

Possibly the American business man keeps slightly longer hours than are known in Latin countries, but he takes longer and more frequent vacations. Anyhow, not very much goes on in an office. It is perfectly simple to get hold of a couple of bond-salesmen for bridge on any afternoon except Saturday and Sunday, when they play golf. The supposed high pressure of a newspaper office is largely fictional. There may be one or two executives about the premises who like to yell, but that is of no consequence. Even the grinding gravity of weekly intellectual publications I find greatly exaggerated. Before I ever attended a conference at The Nation I was terrified because Dorothy Parker had said: "You won't be able to hear a word on account of the clanking of the Phi Beta Kappa keys." She was mistaken.

But to return to women and their alleged dominating saintliness, another charge remains to be answered. It is said that our literature and our drama grow increasingly feminine. The theory of the theater is that man pays for the seats but woman selects the show. What is the result? Thirty years ago the best-known American playwright was Clyde Fitch. Today Eugene O'Neill rules the roost. This does not seem to me a diminution of virility. My earliest memory of an American best-seller is "Richard Carvel." And now "Elmer Gantry" sweeps the country. If the prevalent literary taste has become over-sentimentalized through feminine influence, just what is the reason for the success of Ernest Hemingway, Theodore Dreiser, Sherwood Anderson, and Sinclair Lewis? Naturally I do not accept the theory that men are realistically minded and women romantical. If I had any faith in generalizations I would be prepared to argue just the other way about. I think it is likely that women read more books than men, but since the standards of our native literature are constantly rising I see no reason for complaint.

If I may quote again from Louis Bromfield I should like to mention the fact that he believes it odd that in a country so young and vigorous as America "the subject of love should be taboo." Where has Mr. Bromfield been keeping himself? If he means that there is very little frank discussion of sex in current novels or upon the stage I will agree with him. The theater grows less shamefaced, but the road to freedom still stretches many miles ahead of us. Naturally the shout of the censors is without significance. There has been no American generation which did not insist that its own particular theater had reached the lowest depths of degradation. Back in the eighties Anthony Comstock expressed precisely the same concern about nudity in musical comedies which agitates Mr. Banton, the New York district attorney, today.

However, we do not learn wholly from the lips of players or from the printed word. I feel that there has been an extraordinary advance in conversational limitations. It has not been my privilege to hear "Shall we join the ladies?" for fifteen years. Preachers are correct in complaining that anecdotes once known only to barrooms now pass about a dinner table. If the question is asked whether it is admirable that custom should permit the telling of ribald stories in the presence of honorable women I shall answer "Yes" without hesitation. My love of ribaldry is not intense. Most of the stories are not much good, but they serve as symbols. When a fairly strong tale goes by unrebuked a barrier goes with it. Once smoke and smut were reserved wholly for men. Accordingly, these vices might justly be called anti-social. The woman who smokes and says "Have you heard this one?" is bringing about a better and a cleaner America. A story with a double edge acts as an ice-breaker. It is not possible to hold serious conversation until all the taboos which chill the spirit have been splintered. Men and women talk much more honestly to each other than ever before in America because the need for being finicky is abating.

Here's to the ladies! Sweet rest to them in the churchyards where they lie. They didn't ask to be pure and protected and fragile. I don't believe they even wanted to be ladies.

HEYWOOD BROUN

"Norris for President"

By LEWIS S. GANNETT

Washington, October 25

THE Progressive Senators in Washington have announced a new coalition, led by Senator Borah, to support Norris for President.

"George Norris is the only honest man in political life in America," says a cynical Washington correspondent. The hard-boiled gentry of the press actually believe the Nebraska Senator when he says he does not want the Republican nomination for President and allows his name to be used against his will. Certainly there is no other man in Washington whom they do not suspect of Presidential ambitions.

Norris knows that he will not be President, or Republican nominee for President, and he would not want to be if he could. He lacks the sanguine enthusiasm of his lifelong friend, the late Senator La Follette, and though his political life has been one long fight he has not La Follette's zest for battle. Norris has been fighting Muscle Shoals and the power trust, sometimes almost single-handed, for a decade, and he is still fighting, but he is too clear-headed to be an ardent hoper. He would rather encourage independent voting than build up a loyal party following—as he showed when he entered the barony of Pennsylvania and spoke there, as a Republican United States Senator, against Republican corruption and in behalf of the Democratic candidate for the Senatorship. Nebraska voters, be it said in their honor, respect that kind of independence. The Republican organization in that State includes some of the same breed of patronage-hounds as infest the G. O. P. in other States, but when George Norris's turn for reelection came up they stopped baying, and Senator Norris —despite the fact that nine-tenths of the Nebraska press was against him and that he did not stop work to make a speech—was overwhelmingly reelected. And next year Nebraska's delegation will be for Norris for President. Even Governor Adam MacMullin, who recently informed Mr. Lowden of Illinois that the corn-fields of Iowa were thirsting for Lowden, is at work changing his mind. Wisconsin, the Dakotas, Idaho, will probably be for him too; and half a dozen other States are possibilities. Such a bloc should at least have a voice and influence in the convention.

The Northwest is unhappy. It isn't dreaming dreams of a Progressive Messiah, but it is acutely aware that the price of wheat, ignoring Mr. Coolidge's proclamations of prosperity, has just made another low record. The Northwest wants farm relief, wants it badly, really needs it. That, of course, is the economic impulse behind the gathering of the Progressive Senators and the launching of the Norris "boom."

From a legislative point of view the most interesting thing about this Progressive revival is that Senator Borah is leading it. He called the conference which sent forth the call to battle, and the publicity statements have been issued from his office. Now Senator Borah has always been an independent, but he has usually played a solitary hand. He did not support Mr. Roosevelt in 1912, or Mr. La Follette in 1924. He has not crossed party lines as Mr. Norris did in Pennsylvania, and he has made most of his brilliant fights in the Senate as a lone lion. If he wants company now, wants to cooperate and organize, that is a healthy sign. The Progressive bloc will have the balance of power in the next Senate, and unless the Democrats all desert to Mr. Mellon they should be able to make Congress lively. Since the death of the elder La Follette they have, however, lacked dramatic and effective leadership.

The cynical see other thoughts in the lines on Mr. Borah's forehead. He supports the candidacy of Senator Norris, who has no chance. He assures his visitors that Mr. Coolidge does not wish to run for office because the President sees business bumps ahead and does not choose to take the blame for them. He is against Mr. Lowden because of the Missouri scandals which he himself exposed in 1920; against Mr. Hughes as the private attorney, in office and out, of the Standard Oil Company; against Mr. Dawes because of the Lorimer bank scandal; and, while he professes respect for Mr. Hoover, he fears that the war-time fixation of the price of wheat would make it impossible for Hoover to win the West. Which, to be sure, seems to leave William E. Borah as the residuary legatee of the Norris bloc and perhaps as the logical nominee of a deadlocked National Convention. It is possible that this thought may have occurred to the Senator from Idaho, and may have something to do with his zeal for Norris.

Mr. Borah has just announced liquor as the paramount issue of the next campaign—or rather the question of obedience to the Constitution that underlies the liquor question. But the politician fears to touch the liquor issue on a national scale. Norris, himself a Dry, has had the honesty to blurt out that he would rather support for President an honest Wet like "Al" Smith than a dishonest "Dry" like Mr. Mellon, or a "Dry" who doesn't dare peep on the subject, like Mr. Hoover or Mr. Coolidge. (If "Al" continues his recent reverential silence on the liquor question Norris may find still more to say.) But few have the Nebraskan's freedom of speech. One Progressive Dry Senator from an arid Western State said: "If Al should run against Cal, I'd pray for Al, but in public I'd be so damned silent you wouldn't know I existed." Furthermore, the Progressives are not united on the issue. Borah, Norris, Brookhart, the North Dakota Senators, and Shipstead of Minnesota are all Dry; but Wisconsin is Wet—and what is a Progressive movement without a La Follette? Liquor, it is safe to say, will not be too heavy a plank in the Western Progressive platform.

They all want farm relief. No issue is so popular in the corn and wheat States. But while Mr. Borah opposed the McNary-Haugen bill, Mr. Norris has his own plan for a government marketing corporation, and almost all the other Progressives supported the Haugen bill only for lack of a better standard. Yet here is the crux of the Western movement—the one cause that fires the prairies. It is possible that the Senators, conferring, can reach common ground; they are all willing to shift position a little. They consciously represent a Western protest against the domination of Congress and of legislation by the industrial East. The tariff, they argue, has been a subsidy to Eastern manufacturers, and the Mellon crowd continues to expect its raw materials to come in duty-free while its finished products are protected. No one in the Western group has the courage and vision and optimism—a bit of blind optimism would be necessary—to lash out at the whole system of special protection. Instead of demanding a free field for all, these Progressives tend to climb on the tariff wagon and to demand their part in privilege. This latest Progressive revolt threatens to simmer down to North Dakota's demand for a duty on flax-seed and Idaho's for protection against Egyptian and Turkish onions! It reminds one painfully of Hiram Johnson's historic plea for the patriotic California lemon.

Yet in this Western group is the hope of American politics—such as it is! Against the domination of American life by the Mellon-Gary type of mind they stand almost alone—and they have made a gallant fight. They have slowed the pace at which private corporations can grab the people's heritage of water-power, and on that issue they are united. They have a quick, instinctive resentment of America's imperialism in Mexico and Nicaragua, and of naval concentrations in China. It was the Western group which forced the investigation of the oil scandals, and the Supreme Court's decision is their victory. They do stand out, without oratory or blah, against corruption in political life. George Norris is that dodo of politics, a genuinely independent man. When a group of Senators rallies about him and announces its belief that he can carry a dozen State primaries, it is time for us of the East to wake up.

The Hampton Strike

By W. E. BURGHARDT DU BOIS

THE wave of revolt against local conditions that has already aroused Negro students at Fisk, Howard, Lincoln, Shaw, Johnson Smith, and other institutions has reached Hampton Institute, where it was long overdue.

Hampton is beautifully situated, adequately endowed, and has a fine tradition of human service. Its principal is a white man; most of its teachers are white, but there are several Negroes on the faculty. For many years the Hampton students have been a selected group, coming, in large part, from the best homes of black Virginia. They have been self-respecting, healthy, eager young folk, obedient and patient by nature and more so by Hampton training.

The "Hampton idea" of education has been long and tirelessly exploited. It was based on a program of industrial training for Negroes, the discouraging of college work, and the exploitation of certain methods of "learning by doing." This program has broken down under its own weight. The South came to want Hampton graduates as teachers because they were thought to "know their place," to be docile and uncontaminated by college "ideals." At the same time the South was coming to recognize certain required standards of education for teachers, both white and colored, and in some cases even asked a college degree.

Hampton was thus compelled to meet more modern educational standards. A survey by a Harvard professor showed that her educational system was not effective and—worst of all—that Hampton graduates were becoming teachers, physicians, and lawyers, instead of cooks, carpenters, and farmers. Consequently Hampton was forced to raise her standards and to establish college courses. She now offers the degree of Bachelor of Science in agriculture and teaching and has nearly 400 college students. But this very yielding to the new educational standards brought internal difficulties. Hampton was no longer dealing with docile and half-grown elementary students, regimented to strict military discipline; she had to deal with older college men who were thinking for themselves.

The growing dissatisfaction among these students led repeatedly to petitions which were laid before various departments and the president and administrative officers. Most of the petitions were denied. A student council was formed, but it is dominated by the faculty. In 1923 the students struck for a characteristic cause. According to the "Hampton idea" a student is especially honored if he is made servant to a teacher. One such student chauffeur failed in his duties and was denied the right to participate in the concert. The whole student chorus struck and a public concert had to be "postponed."

And the students have struck again. Today they state their grievances thus:

They want the educational system so revised at Hampton that "we shall no longer be subjected to instruction from teachers whose education is below that of the average student." "All teachers in the trade school should have at least high-school training." They ask that the whole educational system be improved, especially "in the academy, the trade school, and the school of agriculture." They declare that the institution should live up to the courses prescribed in the catalogue, especially in the trade school, and in the matter of electives, which they claim are "electives" today only in name.

Secondly, the students object to the present regime of discipline at Hampton: men are required to dress in uniform and to be members of the military cadet body. They ask that they be at least allowed to lay aside their uniforms "from Saturday noon until Sunday morning inspection," and they want the cadet officers chosen hereafter by competitive examination instead of by official favor.

They complain about the food. Despite increased payment for board this year the food is just as bad: they still have beans and molasses four times a week. They complain about the laundry: clothes are lost and torn without compensation to the students.

Hampton is a coeducational school. The boys and girls want to associate with one another and the authorities at Hampton seem to regard this as suspicious if not wrong. It was this spirit that precipitated the present strike. The students demand increased social privileges: they want the right to dance with the girls, which is now allowed only to seniors and then only once a year; they want ten days vacation instead of six at Christmas.

About two years ago college students and senior high-school students were granted the privilege of taking girls to certain evening exercises at the school—among these, the Saturday night cinema. The plan has seemed to work well. At any rate, the students declare, during the two years no complaint has been made to the student body, either through the Student Council or otherwise, of the conduct of students on these occasions. It is probably true that there was some love-making, but if there is any institution in the United States, white or black, where this does not occur we have yet to hear of it.

Nevertheless, on Saturday night, October 8, during the movie show, most of the lights were left burning, the authorities merely informing the students that this was necessary "to insure the greater decorum of the escorting parties." The students were angry. They felt that proper order had been maintained and they regarded the incident as a "direct insult to the student body and especially to the womanhood of the Negro race." They showed their resentment on Sunday by refraining from singing during church services, in spite of the presence of Sir Gordon Guggisberg and the pleas of the principal, and by refusing to submit to military inspection. They organized the men and appointed a Student Protest Committee to lay their grievances before the faculty. The students maintained perfect order, but the faculty secured Southern white men to patrol the campus at night. Then began one of those silly games of stalemate which colleges are so fond of staging:

Students (Monday morning): "Hear our complaints!"

Faculty (Monday noon): "First go back to classes!"

Students (Monday afternoon): "We'll go, but hear our complaints and promise no punishment for this protest."

Faculty (Monday night): "We will hear the complaints but we promise no immunity to the men; we will not, however, blame the women or new students."

Thereupon the principal on Wednesday proceeded first to commend the order and discipline maintained by the students and then went on to suspend the ringleaders; and on Thursday the whole school, men and women, new and old, struck again. The Administrative Board then closed Hampton Institute "until further notice."

Three hundred students left. Letters were sent to parents stating: "We shall require all those wishing to return to apply in writing to the vice-principal for readmission. This application must be accompanied by a pledge of loyalty and obedience." (Italics ours.)

Slowly the students are drifting back. Their parents for the most part have joined with Dr. Gregg and the Hampton faculty to force them into submission. The strike has thus failed, and the compelling forces at Hampton are free to proceed with the Hampton "idea." The faculty is riding high in the saddle. An onlooker writes me:

> Very much depends on public opinion in this affair. The authorities are crediting this strike as the work of disobedient boys and girls who were led on to do what they did. On the other hand, each student I have talked with has impressed me with the serious attitude he has taken in the matter—with each one of them it became a holy cause. The strike to them was not a prank, in fact it was partly forced on them; but when they found themselves too deeply involved to back out, they went straight ahead with great religious fervor. Previous petitions have always been ignored; their student council has six faculty members; and they felt drastic action was necessary if they were to be heard this time. Many are arguing that the students went about their strike in the wrong manner; but be that as it may, they carried it through in an orderly and manly fashion that brought commendation. . . .
> Through my own observations and experiences, and what I have learned from others in a position to know what they are talking about, I have become keenly aware of the state of hypocrisy, racial prejudice, and backwardness into which Hampton has fallen.

As a result five students were dismissed, twenty-nine suspended, and thirty made "temporarily ineligible."

Advice to a Mendicant

By LYNN RIGGS

Learn this: your mind, in straying after Tiger lily, tufted sedge
In their lush paths, can never build
Under itself a rocky ledge.

Turn to the stony seed unhusked,
Turn to the oak so brightly vined:
These are the slow and adamantine
Givers of granite to the mind.

Fights and Flights in the Newspapers

By SILAS BENT

RUTH ELDER'S oversea hop is acclaimed by the daily press as a triumph, although she fell more than six hundred miles short of her destination, and seems from the headlines to have accomplished nothing much beyond saving her lipstick. Flying over water is a commonplace, and Miss Elder was not the first woman to undertake it; but her adventure is described as "sheer daring," and herself as "the prettiest, bravest of girls."

In view of the stories as cabled to the American newspapers, my allusion to the lipstick may seem ill-natured. Let us see. The Associated Press vouched for this daredevil feat:

> Before their descent to the sea . . . her courage was tested in a breath-taking manner. The fliers had been driving their plane, even then slowed down by a defective oil line, through a sleet storm. The tail of the plane, on which a heavy coating of sleet had formed, became too heavy for the machine to be kept on an even keel.
> Something had to be done to right this. There was some gasoline stored in the tail of the plane—a reserve supply to be used in an emergency. Haldeman and Miss Elder consulted each other regarding what should be done. They decided the reserve supply of gasoline would have to be jettisoned. They then took their turns at the stick while one or the other crawled along the icy fuselage of the plane and threw overboard some of the reserve supply.
> Miss Elder took her turn at crawling along the fuselage without a tremor, it was related, and, this chore accomplished, returned to do her shift at the stick.

How ungallant to call it a chore! You get the picture: a dauntless heroine buffeting icy midatlantic blasts as she crawls over a sleety, sloping surface, with watery wastes yawning beneath her. How thin and sterile the ten-twenty-thirty melodrama in comparison with such a situation! Who shall say Miss Elder doesn't deserve the pulpwood encomiums heaped upon her? Well, let "Bill" Brock and "Ed" Schlee, who actually flew across the Atlantic, in a plane precisely like Miss Elder's—let them say it.

"Once you are in the cabin of that plane," they explained to the New York Evening Post, "you can't get out on the fuselage as long as you are in flight. It simply can't be done. Silly to talk about it." They added that there was no aperture in the plane making it possible to get out of the cabin to the top of the wing and thence to the tail. It seems a pity that mere physical fact should interfere with a story so romantic that the Associated Press and its member newspapers swallowed it hook, line, and sinker. Romance and peril was what was wanted, to build circulation. For the sake of circulation, a heroine is still being made of a young woman.

The flight is another in the chain stimulated by the successful journey of Colonel Charles A. Lindbergh, which was arranged as a publicity stunt to put St. Louis, Missouri, on the map, and succeeded beyond the wildest dreams of its promoters. The chain has included an aerial derby to Honolulu, to advertise a "pineapple king," which cost seven lives. The majority of these events, encouraged by the press because they help sell papers, have left tragedy in their wake.

The newspapers of this country have just come through their first peace-time summer without a slump in circulation. In a page "spread" the New York World declares that in the six months ended September 30 "one event of international importance followed fast upon the heels of another. . . . When news of transcendent importance is afield it is to the World that New Yorkers turn in ever-increasing numbers for the most authoritative, quickest, and most reliable account of world events." Editor and Publisher, however, offers no pious palaver about "news of transcendent importance." It frankly entitles a leading article: Fights and Flights Banished the Slump from Summer Circulations. The New York dailies, its figures show, have gained an aggregate of 400,000 daily sales, and similar benefits were reaped the country over. The Dempsey-Sharkey fight sent the Seattle Times circulation up 113,729, which was three thousand more than the gain on Lindbergh's flight; while the Dempsey-Tunney fight gave a gain of 15,000 more than Lindbergh. The circulation manager wired the trade journal: "I believe this type of news has genuine circulation-building power; the best, in fact, we have yet experienced." From many other quarters the cry was echoed. "Sports seemingly fetch more and hold more than crime news," said the Philadelphia Enquirer. Of all the papers quoted, only one attributed its advance to crusading. "Our gain," said the St. Louis Star, "may best be attributed to the steadfast policy of this newspaper in defending the interests of the public in several outstanding issues during the last year, rather than to any sensational news."

Flights got due credit, but not one word was whispered about prize fights when the New York Times polled the publishers and printed their views under the headline What Increased Newspaper Sales. Ralph Pulitzer of the World said that paper's gain was accentuated by a reduction in price, a fact ignored in the page advertisement. The others spoke of "an abnormal amount of news," "unusual and stirring events," greater proportionate literacy since the stoppage of immigration, and "a widening interest in news happenings." But not one word about the squared circles, a strange instance of ingratitude. It was too bad that no statement was obtained from the Evening Post, which outdistanced them all in the proportion of its gain. In the year ending the first of October it doubled its circulation. "More sports play than last year," said Editor and Publisher, "is the crux of the Evening Post's story."

Occasional peaks of sales from sensational events alone do not mean substantially higher levels of circulation; the theory is that they make new readers, and make old readers buy more editions, and that some of the gain is maintained between times. The New York Journal, which has a highly responsive audience, affords an instance of how certain circulation-building stories have fattened its figures during the late spring and the summer months; the circulation of the paper is 680,000, and the peaks are given in round numbers.

> May 10—Snyder-Gray murder verdict and disappearance of the Nungesser-Coli plane, 106,000 gain.

May 21—Lindbergh's arrival in Paris, 170,000 gain.
June 6—Chamberlain and Levine land in Germany, 95,000 gain.
July 22—Day after Dempsey beat Sharkey, when discussion of foul added interest, 85,000 gain.
August 23—Sacco-Vanzetti execution, 50,000 gain.

The only event of "transcendent importance" in this list was the Sacco-Vanzetti execution, and it was at the bottom of the list as a circulation stimulant. All the others were prearranged and press-agented exhibition stunts, to which the newspapers lent their columns in order to pad their sales. The advertiser demands mass circulation; and the newspapers are generous with free advertising of commercial sport and aviation enterprises, however dubious their nature, when there is the prospect of a circulation gain.

The period under discussion included other big stories. There was the Mississippi flood and the Geneva conference on naval limitation, during which the world saw with astonishment that Great Britain and the United States were eyeing each other with a view to "the next war." In the spring there was an arrangement between the Federal Reserve Board and the central banks of France and England to maintain a low interest rate here, which would improve the international position of the franc and pound, and would enable the Treasury to refund our Second Liberties at advantageous terms. The low interest rate and cheap money brought an orgy of Wall Street speculation, but the story about the Federal Reserve Board did not get onto the first pages until a minor development fitted it into the journalistic pattern of sensationalism. When the board commanded the Federal Reserve Bank in Chicago to maintain its low rate, despite an announced increase, there was the threat of court proceedings and a Congressional fight. Here was conflict, and the story made Page One.

But none of these stories was "played" by the press, for none of them had the thrilling emotional quality thought necessary for circulation building. The Gray-Snyder murder trial shouldered the Mississippi flood, which imperiled a million and a half of the population and made 700,000 homeless, over to the inside pages. The press is preoccupied with thrills; and a tabloid picture paper outbids its big brothers by paying $100,000 for Ruth Elder's "own" story, that its readers may have an illusion of intimacy. The newspaper's function, on which its privileged status and Constitutional guaranty are based, has been abdicated.

Austria Wavers Toward Reaction

By G. E. R. GEDYE

Vienna, October 5

"AUSTRIA," once remarked one of those witty self-critics whom Vienna has produced in far greater numbers than she has vigorous reformers, "is destined to be always one idea too late." The present ever-growing movement of the Heimwehr, or home-defense forces, also called Selbstschutz and Selbstwehr, is proof that the epigram is still true.

The movement grew indirectly out of the riots and shooting of July 15. The majority of those engaged in promoting it would declare that it grew directly out of those deplorable events, but that is not so. I have recently spent a month traveling all over Austria, and have had some opportunity of judging how serious things are, how great a gulf yawns between the Clerical provinces and the Socialist capital. What struck me everywhere was the honest conviction among the peasantry and small tradespeople of the provincial towns and cities that July 15 was an attempt by the Social Democratic Party to carry out a coup-de-main, to imprison or execute the Chancellor, Dr. Seipel, nationalize all property, and govern through the dictatorship of the proletariat. These things sound so ridiculous to all persons, whether enemies or friends, who study the principles of Social Democracy as well as those of other political creeds, that I may be suspected of exaggerating. I am not. The view of July 15 which I have set forth here was expressed to me, not once, but a dozen times during my tour, and in every case sincerely. It is not to be wondered at that timid peasants and small-business men, under this impression, are forming fours, prodding at sacks of straw supposed to represent human bodies, and shooting holes in paper targets all over the countryside in preparation for a hand-to-hand fight which shall end the Red Terror of Vienna forever.

The task of the nationalist agitators was not a hard one. Vienna, standing for a bureaucracy concerned only with securing the personal aims of the Hapsburg family, is disliked in the provinces as it was in the lands of the "Nationalities" which have now left Austria. Always there has been a gulf between Vienna and the countryside greater than that existing between most capitals and their provinces. The social contrast between the gay, super-sophisticated capital and the backward, grave, devout Catholic German provinces or the often semi-Europeanized "nationalities" helped to deepen it. After the revolution Vienna became doubly a bugbear. There ruled the Socialists, the enemies of the church, the men who wanted to steal the peasant's half acre, to confiscate his produce, and give it to lazy dogs of workmen and mechanics whose ambition it was to riot in luxury in Vienna. There, too, in so far as the Socialists did not rule the roost, the "Jewish bankers" who speculated and increased the cost of living did.

Then came stabilization. The speculative banks collapsed, the power of the big banks diminished while they were busy trying to cut their losses in safety, and the provincial banks attained an undreamed-of importance. Dr. Ramek, a country solicitor from Salzburg, formed a government behind which stood the Clerical banks of the provinces. The Socialists had to stabilize their municipal finances in Vienna as Dr. Seipel and then Dr. Ramek had the national finances with the help of the League loan. As it became clear that the former would never possess the majority in Austria (or lose it in Vienna), so their attitude (which had often been aggressive) was modified. A certain amount of cooperation had begun between them and the Ramek Cabinet when a series of financial scandals, which in no way affected the Chancellor but did concern a a number of his lieutenants, brought a fresh change. Dr. Seipel, a statesman of great ability but without much belief in compromise, again took the reins. The big Vienna banks, now recovered, resumed the financial control. The Socialists, after some slight gains at the elections this summer, began a violent campaign against the Chancellor. For the provinces, Vienna, which because of Dr. Seipel, the big banks, and the increasingly more aggressive Socialists had disappointed provincial hopes, became more detestable than ever. It was not easy in these circumstances to persuade the disgruntled provinces that the Social Democrats had, by a miracle, failed to set up a proletarian dictatorship on July 15.

I write as one who is neither Socialist nor Clerical, but merely a well-wisher to Austrians of both parties. It is beyond question that much of the fault lies at the door of the Socialists, some of whom have incurred natural suspicion by the violence of their language. By playing at soldiers ever since the revolution with their Republikanische Schutzbund, they have made it difficult for themselves to complain of the undoubted illegality under the Treaty of St. Germain of these Fascist-like organizations of Heimwehr which are springing up and drilling all over the countryside. They committed the grave error of calling for a complete amnesty for all those arrested in connection with the July disorders. A great many of the charges brought against those arrested have been revealed as trivial, but although no really grave case of rioting has yet been tried, some of the offenders were certainly not of the type for whom the Socialist Party should have taken up the cudgels. But they were infuriated by the fact that the Government did nothing for the many obviously innocent victims of the shooting, though large sums were paid out to the police, and that so far the Socialists have been unable to obtain satisfaction for their charges of unnecessary police brutality. Slowly the Socialists realized the strength of the feeling against them—it is tremendous and sincere, though based on an absurd misreading of the events of July 15—throughout the country and became more conciliatory.

It became clear to the reactionaries long before it did to the Socialists what a weapon July 15 had delivered into their hands. The provinces knew and cared nothing about the shocking miscarriage of justice which had provoked the workers to noisy protest, knew nothing of the efforts of the Socialist leaders to calm the mobs at the risk of their lives, knew nothing of the attempts of the Socialist Republikanische Schutzbund to help the firemen to end incendiarism and to restore order without violence. The failure of these efforts entitles the Right to query the extent of the leaders' influence over the masses and to laugh at the utility of the Schutzbund. It should in honor prohibit the extreme Right press from continually holding up these leaders as "Moscow Bolshevists." The provinces, realizing only that Vienna had "been at it again," were only too ready to listen to appeals to join in the parades of these new formations.

There was a chance directly after July 15—which is unlikely ever to recur—of burying with the eighty-five dead those bitter animosities and indecencies of political controversy which created the atmosphere in which July 15 was possible and which imperil the existence of the Austrian state. Councilor Julius Meinl, Austria's great multiple shopowner, whose businesses may be found from the shores of the Adriatic to the steppes of Poland, a non-party man but anything but a Socialist, sent a large donation to the President of the Republic to be used to open a Reconciliation Fund for the innocent victims of the disorders, without distinction of party. The officials, obviously on the instructions of the Cabinet, returned the check with a sarcastic intimation that Herr Meinl had better keep his ideas of reconciliation for a more convenient and appropriate season.

This was typical of the attitude of the Austrian Government. Having gained a tactical advantage, it refused to think of doing anything but pursuing the party advantage to the last against the Socialists. Certainly at that moment the latter showed no desire for reconciliation, but it was far more difficult for them to do so than for the Government. The latter declined, thereby losing an opportunity as rare as that which was flung away by the Allies under very similar circumstances at Versailles. The latter could have instituted a new order in Europe, the former in their own little country. Both preferred the sweets of victory, and in Austria today, as in Europe, there is no thought of peace. None of the regular organs of public opinion will hear of reconciliation now. They cry for a new heart and for "material concessions" by the Socialists, forgetting that what Austria really needs is not a cessation of political controversy but something far more practicable and urgent —recognition on each side that the other is not an unspeakable scoundrel to be abused and insulted day after day because he happens to differ in matters of politics. Alone one illustrated newspaper—the Stunde—grasps this point and struggles in vain for a hearing.

The Socialists were "an idea too late" with their present feelers toward conciliation. But the Right are more than an idea too late with their Heimwehr organizations. Openly the papers speak of a Heerschau—a military review. Dr. Pflügl, a former under-secretary in a government department, writes openly in the Wiener Journal that the spirit of these organizations, which sweeps over Austria like a fresh north wind, is determined "to bring order to Austria." It comes, he says, from Bavaria; the Heimwehr are modeled on the notorious Orgesch; Austria is determined to follow the example of Bavaria in 1920, when the revolutionary government of Kurt Eisner was smashed, by the bullets of the reactionaries.

How many ideas too late is this? There has been no Communist putsch in Vienna and will not be while the Social Democrats lead the masses. Europe has had enough of that. Austria is surrounded by jealous neighbors who would welcome the opportunity to "restore order" and to take a little territory at the same time. Hungary makes no secret of her determination to get back the Austrian Burgenland as well as the rest of the territory liberated from her misrule. Dr. Bauer, one of the Socialist leaders, hit the right nail on the head in his important speech this week when he declared that it was essential for Socialist Vienna to realize that she could not get on without the Clerical provinces and vice versa. He was "an idea too late," again; his party should have seen and preached that long ago.

But the Right does not see it yet, and dreams of crushing Socialist Vienna by force. Any attempt to do so would imperil the peace of the world.

In the Driftway

BROCCOLI has become fashionable. Like the flu and the crossword-puzzle craze the broccoli epidemic has swept New York. A downtown eating-place would no more be without it than without clams. And the Drifter's young friends tell him that broccoli is another example of the cultural conquests of the Italians. The triumph of spumoni and ravioli is followed by the victory of broccoli, and another immigrant race has come into its own.

* * * * *

IT is a pretty story, but it is only another example of the ignorance of youth. This theory that the habit of eating green vegetables landed at Ellis Island with the swarms from Southern Europe is just another of those melancholy myths which a robustious younger generation attempts to foist upon its elders. It may be that the nineteenth century reached its peak in a carnival of red meat and greasy potatoes, but it began with a nice appreciation of salads and kales, and an understanding of the succulence of fresh corn and green peas rivaled in our own day only by the marketers of Paris. Old Timothy Dwight, who was president of Yale a century or so ago, planted Indian corn in the presidential back yard in ten successive plantings so that he might eat it in the full milk every day from July to November; and he did not need an Italian gardener to teach him. The Drifter does not know the nationality of President Angell's gardener, but he will wager that the 1927 president of Yale does not eat as well as his predecessor.

* * * * *

WHILE President Dwight was planting ten successions of corn, and three kinds of strawberries, in his New Haven garden, Virginians were also at work. President Jefferson, throughout his eight years in the Presidency, noted the dates on which green vegetables appeared in and disappeared from the markets of the capital city, and to the thirty-three vegetables of President Dwight's New Haven list he added only sorrel, "sprouts," corn salad, lima beans—and "brocioli." President Jefferson may have grown brocioli on his own Virginia estate; at any rate his library included a book written before 1784 by his friend John Randolph, Jr., which described its culture. Randolph's "Treatise on Gardening"—a rare book which Marjorie Fleming Warner has recently unearthed and made available to the curious modern—explains that

> The proper time for sowing the seed of broccoli is in the latter end of May, and transplant them into beds when they have eight leaves, and plant them out about the latter end of July, in a place well sheltered, not under the drip of trees, in a soil rather light than otherwise. . . . The Roman broccoli is the proper sort to cultivate, otherwise called the Italian broccoli. When you have cut the flowers or heads, cut to about five or six inches of the stem, and before they are boiled, strip off the skin, and after having washed them boil them in a clean cloth, and serve them up with butter, as cauliflowers are. Th stems will eat like asparagus, and the heads like cauliflowers.

* * * * *

BROCCOLI did indeed come from Italy, but long before immigration laws were dreamed of. In those days the seaboard States were in many ways less provincial than in this supercivilized, aeroplaning year of 1927. Timothy Dwight called tomatoes "love apples"—a name which the colonists had transplanted from the French "pomme d'amour." The French in turn got their word from the Italians, misunderstanding the name, "pomo dei Mori," which the Italians gave to a fruit brought from South America by the Spanish Moors. "Cultural complexes" existed long before the sociologists began thinking up long words to describe them! THE DRIFTER

Gallinipper Wisdom

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

Sir: All of this hue and cry about the red peril threatening to destroy the foundation of democratic institutions reminds me of the fables of two gallinippers who, upon a time, lit upon the dome of the Capitol. The more venturesome and reckless of the twain gave vent to his vainglorious purpose in these boastful words: "I've a great mind to stomp my foot and shake this pesky old structure to the ground."

The other with greater restraint and caution advised: "If I were you I wouldn't do it."

The Lugano Spirit

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I'm in the middle of translating an article about Sacco and Vanzetti, from the Journal de Genève, into German for a journalist here. Oddly, in Lugano there is a statue to George Washington. And they have just had a procession and put wreaths on Washington's statue, inscribed in four languages: "In remembrance of Sacco and Vanzetti, murdered." And they parked two fellows in red shirts to guard them.

Fake Pictures from China

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I just finished reading the article on The Camera Learns to Lie by Samuel Tenenbaum in your June 8 issue and was interested in it for the reason that the faking of pictures for American and British consumption is not confined to the United States. These camera artists have also been out here, one in particular who probably has done a considerable amount of harm in misrepresenting the China situation to American and British movie patrons as well as newspaper readers.

Some two years ago, following the anti-English outburst resulting from the May 30 atrocities in Shanghai, the Canton authorities were forced to expel an American camera man from Canton owing to his attempts to "frame" pictures showing outrages upon foreigners by Cantonese strikers and pickets. This man, an American, represented one of the "news reel" organizations connected with a powerful newspaper syndicate. Immediately following his expulsion from Canton this resourceful gentleman came to Shanghai and, renting one of the local Chinese movie studios, he staged a whole set of pictures, both "movie" and "stills," showing the activities of the Cantonese strikers and pickets. The pictures depicted the forceful seizure and confiscation of foreign goods.

About two months after this I saw the whole show in a double-page spread in one of the London illustrated papers and being somewhat familiar with Canton, noticed something strange about the pictures. Inquiry in Chinese circles here exposed the whole fraud, even to the amount of money which had been paid to the proprietor of the local movie studio.

This, unfortunately, is not an isolated incident. Recently I noticed in several American newspapers a picture showing a Chinese woman bound hands and feet and being carried through the streets of a Chinese city by two Chinese coolies. The woman was suspended from a bamboo pole. Since this picture looked fishy, I inquired among local newspapermen and found that the picture had been staged and the Chinese woman paid the munificent sum of $1 for her part of it. Under the picture was a title stating that this was the way the Cantonese treat those who continue to accept employment from the British.

Still another case. In Shanghai there is a wealthy local resident who makes a practice of providing every beggar in Shanghai with a ticket for a free meal on New Year's Day. As a result of this professional beggars from the infant stage up collect on one of the side streets to receive their tickets. Naturally they provided an excellent subject for the camera men, but imagine my surprise when I saw these pictures in the American and English press labeled as "Poor Chinese farmers and villagers driven from their houses by the Cantonese invasion of the Yangtze Valley."

It is true that the camera doesn't lie, but it's wonderful what a lying camera man can do with a picture. Many of the pictures which were taken in Shanghai during the recent crisis when the Cantonese forces occupied this district were deliberately posed for the purpose of glorifying the activities of the foreign forces and showing the necessity of the barbed-wire barricades in the protection of the foreigners against the Chinese mobs.

Mr. Hughes and Michael Karolyi

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: May it not be possible that Mr. Hughes will go down in history books as the humorless Secretary of State who, disregarding the founders' faith in freedom of speech and the significance of these United States as a political haven, gagged the first president of Hungary, Michael Karolyi, when on a visit to these shores? I wish also that Mr. Villard had made use of the degrading effect on Mr. Hughes of party loyalty. Republicanism became a faith so potent that even the oil frauds against the nation were passed in silence. If Mr. Hughes sat through the oil-investigation days and knew nothing of his confreres' doings he is hardly acute enough to fill the job of stopping another steal. If on the other hand he knew of the frauds and Republican reprisals and remained silent, then let us apply the old legal maxim: "He who is silent when in conscience he should speak, may not speak when in conscience he should be silent."

Our Rights in New York

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: You mentioned some weeks ago a city ordinance against distributing circulars. The only time this ordinance (Section 15, Article 2, Chap. 22, Code of Ordinances of the City of New York) has been passed upon by an appellate court, Special Sessions determined that it prohibits only the distribution of commercial or advertising matter (People vs. Johnson, 117 Misc. 133). For this reason, on August 22, Magistrate Simpson discharged one Fred Stoll, an I. W. W., charged with distributing leaflets announcing a Sacco-Vanzetti protest meeting.

It is apparent that if, as reported in The Nation, Magistrate Ewald gave a Red sixty days for distributing similar circulars, his ruling was not warranted. An appeal by the defendant might have been successful, but I believe that he is actually serving his sentence. The conviction by Magistrate Simpson was based upon the testimony of the arresting officer that the defendant's machine, plastered with Sacco-Vanzetti posters, had been parked for half an hour in violation of his order and had collected an enormous crowd. The five-dollar fine imposed was paid.

What the law permits and what the police officers and magistrates tolerate are frequently as far apart as the poles. The law as construed by the courts would permit a Sacco-Vanzetti sympathizer to speak in New York City without a license (except if he is trying to speak in a park)—unless what he says conflicts with the provisions of the New York Criminal Anarchy Law, a matter over which the magistrate has no jurisdiction. Similarly such a sympathizer has the right to distribute circulars unless they violate that law, and, presumably, he has the right to carry posters on his machine unless that machine is actually violating the traffic rules.

Mayflowering

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I inclose my yearly subscription for The Nation. I cannot tell you how your articles on the Sacco-Vanzetti murder moved me nor how I thank you for your gallant defense. I am of Mayflower ancestry, and for generations my family have lived in Boston, where we have a family tomb on the Common, where those shameful arrests were made. I am the widow of an Episcopalian clergyman, and have been in bed for twelve years in this hospital, a victim of heart disease. On that last night my doctor gave me veronal that I might sleep the eleven hours away! I am seventy-three years old and I never believed I would live to see Massachusetts sink so low.

I get my nurses to read The Nation; I have it left in the sun parlor, and I send it to the men's Surgical Ward, in the hope of getting a little "fresh air" in this place!

Henry Harland's Letters

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am interested in obtaining either the originals or copies of as many as possible of the letters of the late Henry Harland, editor of the Yellow Book and author of "The Cardinal's Snuff Box." I should like to use these letters in the completion of a definitive biography of Mr. Harland on which I am now at work. The cooperation of any readers of The Nation who may have known Mr. Harland or who may possess his letters will be gratefully received. Communications may be addressed to me at the College of the City of New York.

A Correction

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am troubled to see that Mrs. Ratcliffe, in her otherwise excellent account of our visit to the homes of Sacco and Vanzetti, refers to me several times as a delegate from the defense committee.

My trip to Italy, while made in accordance with the earnest wish of the two men, was a purely personal and unofficial one. I have never had any connection with the defense committee, and I do not like to seem to be claiming an honor that is not mine or to be sailing under false colors. My association with the case, as far as actual work is concerned, has been comparatively slight, and it is only my interest and my faith in the two men's innocence that have remained deep and unbroken ever since I attended the trial six years and more ago.

Bookworm

By CLIFTON CUTHBERT

When Tuesday's platitudes
Ponderously do nothing
It is time for the mind to go dancing
Down straight rungs of small pica.

Life is a drunken goddess
Jabbering irrelevant encyclicals
Over an incongruous realm.

Bring books to temper the idiocies of reality:
Superb classics, bound in blue morocco,
To supersede the long commonplace;
Exquisite volumes of satire
To analyze the idiosyncratic parade;
Weighty black tomes
To squash the puny substances
Of Momentous Events.

Men are slaves to fact.
The truth shall set them free,
And the truth is only in books.

Pile them on every side of me,
And leave me undisturbed
Until the last paradoxical realism
Is revised
And duly recorded.

The Education of India. By Arthur Mayhew, C. I. E. London: Faber and Gwyer. 10/6.

THE yearly account of Indian affairs prepared by the Director of Public Information for the Government of India are most valuable résumés. Although meant to justify the Government, they nevertheless achieve general reliability in the presentation of facts, while expressions of opinion are kept well in hand. The year 1925-26 was more important in India than the readers of American newspapers might have thought. It witnessed the climax of power and then disruption of the powerful Swaraj Party, which by its obstructionist tactics [illegible] seriously embarrassing the Government in the working of the unpopular "reforms" and in Bengal and the Central Provinces had produced political chaos. It saw the settling of the Sikh situation and the final suspension of the long-established excise tax on Indian woven cotton goods that was originally meant to equalize the market for Lancashire products. It marked the close of the first period of Indian legislative history under the new constitution with the first government-appointed president vacating office, as had been prearranged, to be succeeded by an Indian elected by the Legislative Assembly. In politics it was a year that in the last analysis was a disappointment to the old style non-cooperating Nationalists. Too weak to withstand internal dissension, the ill-feeling aroused by renewed Hindu-Moslem outbreaks, and the ever-growing desire to work the reforms rather than fight them, the Swarajists seem to be abandoning the policy of non-cooperation for that of "responsive cooperation." It was, if anybody's, the Government's year.

Some of the most interesting parts of this book deal with non-political matters, such as the growth of the cooperative societies among the peasants, which are bringing relief from the demoralizing grip of money lenders; the development of industry; the abolition of slavery in a remote section of Burma; the progress of both lower and higher education; the conservation and development of natural resources; the scientific breeding of cattle; the spread of medical relief. Economically and socially it was a year of progress, as in fact almost every year has been recently for India. Although things move slowly, too slowly to suit Miss Katherine Mayo, author of "Mother India" (1927), nevertheless they do move, as a survey of any decennium will show.

The sixteen-page bibliography relating to India, published in February, 1927, is an admirable collection of titles under ten general heads with many sub-heads—General Description, Administration and Politics (including important titles both for and against the present system), Economics, Finance, Frontiers and Foreign Relations, History and Biography, Literature, Religion, Reminiscences, and Travel. It is weakest on literature and contains a number of minor errors, but is an excellent and useful guide. The separate four-page folder on Indian art is equally commendable.

The problems of education in India are far cruder than they are here. The system has long been criticized as top-heavy, with too many colleges and universities in proportion to the lower schools, and it is necessary to spread instruction among the masses. In the high schools and colleges the medium of instruction is English, a foreign language, which makes the process of learning as difficult for Indians as it would be for us if we had to use Chinese. A third problem has been the subjects of study, which have been prevailingly Western with a countenancing of Oriental culture but no encouragement to study it and hence its general neglect. Added to these are social and religious problems arising from caste, the joint family system, the Hindu-Moslem antipathy, the economic difficulty of finding acceptable positions for graduates, the question of educating females who are precluded from attending school by the practices of child marriage and seclusion, and finally the great mistrust by Indians of any learning that is not motivated by some religion, whether it be Indian, Mohammedan, or Christian.

Mr. Mayhew begins with the intrusion of Western learning and the long and bitter controversy preceding its adoption in 1835 in government-supported institutions as against Oriental learning. The policy is symbolized to the public by the utterances of Macaulay, whose ignorance of Indian culture was exceeded only by the vigor of the phrases in which he reviled it, but it must not be thought that his was the compelling voice. Advanced Indian opinion, as Mr. Mayhew points out, wanted the foreign learning, which it mistakenly thought would automatically rid the country of social and economic ills, while the East India Company wanted it to train cheap servants for its employ. In addition, the missionaries saw in it a lever to turn the "heathen" overnight into Christians. Thus educational curricula, embodying English literature and Western history and philosophy, were imposed that never touched the heart of the country, and the system was not looked upon as an instrument of cultural function but merely as a means of getting entry into government service. The one other ideal it inspired was that of political independence.

Nowadays Indian education is shifting its center of gravity. Natural science and technological training are coming to the front, a decided advantage. Not serving culturally, it is at least becoming utilitarian, and the country needs just this sort of help.

Mr. Mayhew's survey of Indian education after many years of distinguished labor in the Indian Educational Serivce leads him to the five following conclusions:

> (a) Our education has done far less for Indian culture than for the material and political progress of India. . . .
> (b) Emotional reaction against foreign culture affords no soil for indigenous growth. The sympathetic application of critical and scientific methods to Indian life and thought, and the adoption of a "Western" attitude of mind, must precede the fusion of East and West that India's wisest minds desire.
> (c) Indian personality and life as a whole will not intimately be affected by any education which is not animated by religion. . . .
> (d) Higher education in India depends for warmth and color, vitality and response to communal aspirations, on the measure of its freedom from the control and direction of any form of government, whether Indian or alien. The function of government in this sphere is to suppress what is harmful to the commonweal and to support, with the utmost elasticity, whatever is useful and effective. But for the better education of the masses, as a fundamental condition of national progress, a vigorous initiative must be taken, and a financial policy prescribed by the Government.
> (e) At no previous stage has Indian education needed more sorely Western sympathy, support, and guidance. English educational work in India will be more deeply appreciated and more fruitful when it is not associated officially with an alien government.

This is the considered opinion of an experienced educator and is entitled to our profound reflection. For details readers must turn to the book itself.

An Impoverished Art

History of Anthony Waring. By May Sinclair. The Macmillan Company. $1.75.

MISS SINCLAIR is one of the relatively few contemporary novelists who have continued to practice the art (as distinguished from the trade) of fiction long after the more elementary motives for doing so have passed away. It is obvious that she ceased, sometime since, to have what is called in common parlance "anything to say." It is obvious, that is, that she is no longer moved either by that impulse to social protest which once tinged even her work or by any less definite need to communicate an individual attitude toward life, and hence obvious, too, that if she continues to write novels she does so merely because she is still intrigued by the practice of what we may call, without thereby implying any praise or blame, a "pure art." Each of her recent books has been, more conspicuously than it has been anything else, an exercise, and though that does not mean that any has been carelessly or mechanically written—indeed, the reverse is true—it does mean that we can read them only because we are interested in her method and can judge them only by its success. She has deliberately chosen people and events as little extraordinary as possible and deliberately imposed upon herself the task of conferring upon them whatever distinction they may seem to possess entirely by her manner of writing their story.

The "History of Anthony Waring" carries her particular experiment still further, and its direction is exactly the opposite to that taken by other experimental novelists. While their works have become longer, more complicated, and less direct, hers have grown shorter, simpler, and more completely straightforward. Here one hundred and thirty-one pages, printed in large type and with lavish margins in every possible direction, serve to tell the story of a life from the nursery to the deathbed. There are paragraphs four words long and whole chapters shorter than a single paragraph of this review. Everything not absolutely necessary has been eliminated and the whole is told in words each one of which would be comprehensible to a child just finished with its primer. Simplification could be carried no further, but here at least simplification defeats its purpose, and even as an experiment the result is negative since it proves either that what Miss Sinclair is attempting to do cannot be done or else it proves nothing at all.

So far as I know no critic of his own or another's craft has ever succeeded, even when analyzing a specific novel, in pointing out just which of its details are in themselves responsible for the effect produced. One may go over a great work for the purpose of abridging it and one may fancy that this or that might be dispensed with but one can never be sure at just what point one has begun to diminish the effect of the whole. One can never be sure just when the mere number of words used to recount an incident serves by itself to place an emphasis upon it or just how many details of a sort insignificant in themselves are necessary to give a solidity or a color which their aggregate contributes. Somehow the essential emerges as a result of the relationships subsisting between unessentials and somehow the indispensable is dependent upon things individually dispensable. The art of the novelist depends, of course, upon an intuitive perception of how he may bring this about but Miss Sinclair seems to have edited or abridged her own words with fatal results. She seems to have gone over them, asking if this or that might not be omitted, and to have taken so many things away that nothing is left.

One may be amazed that the "History of Anthony Waring" is not flatter than it is; one may grant that it is better than either "Far End" or "The Allinghams," but one must conclude nevertheless that the author has not been able either to say or to imply anything very significant in words so few and so simple. Even the mood which the book provokes is not the mood which it seems probable that Miss Sinclair intended. She is not exactly a bitter person; one knows that the impression which she wishes to give of life is not an impression of futility; and yet when the whole earthly existence of a hero is recorded in a book which a child could read and understand in an hour the effect is almost inevitably that. If all that is significant in a life can be recorded in a few simple sentences, if a few level pages can record, dispose of a youth, a few more of love and marriage, and a few more of death, then life is hardly worth the years which it takes to live itself out and the biography of a man is no more worth writing than the biography of a may-fly.

I do not say that a novel no longer than this one might not possibly be made to seem adequate and more; but I do believe that it would have to retain at least some one of the various things which Miss Sinclair has left out even if it were only a language less simple than hers. Either condensation would have to be achieved by packing in instead of cutting out or the fewness of the incidents chosen would have to be compensated for by some extraordinary vividness which the mere competence of Miss Sinclair does not achieve. She is, to put it bluntly, never intense enough to justify her brevity and her novel is no more than a mere synopsis.

Labor and the Law

The Law of Organized Labor and Industrial Conflicts. By Edwin Stacey Oakes. Rochester, N. Y.: The Lawyers Co-operative Publishing Company. $15.

IT is approximately seventeen years since anyone has attempted to make a study of all of the decisions bearing on the law of industrial disputes. There is much to report. Far-reaching changes in the law during that period, in many ways disadvantageous to labor, more than amply justify the issuance at this time of another work.

The law in regard to boycotting, sympathetic strikes, picketing, the organization of non-union fields, the validity of growing power in the hands of the national union, has dealt poorly with labor. Even labor's "constitutional right to strike" becomes an ignis fatuus in the hands of Mr. Justice Brandeis's gratuitous dictum in the case of Dorchy vs. Kansas (1926) to the effect that "Neither the common law, nor the Fourteenth Amendment, confers the absolute right to strike." No matter that labor never had the constitutional right to strike. The illusion was a fond one. Finally the recent decision of the United States Supreme Court in the case of Bedford Cut Stone Company vs. Journeyman Stone Cutters' Association, overruling the federal Circuit Court of Appeals, marks the complete dissipation of Gompers's day-dream concerning the Clayton Act. The courts, rulers in a higher sphere, in no way accountable to the expressions of Congress, have seen fit to direct the law in other (ancient) channels.

Mr. Oakes's exhaustive work presents labor with an opportunity to take stock and discuss ways and means. It contains all of the significant cases in the field he attempts to cover. It is a big job of collection, digestion, and classification, admirably done by one thoroughly trained in the search and use of legal materials. Its excellent arrangement and indexing will earn the gratitude of the practicing attorney who is constantly in danger of being pressed into an opinion on short notice. Cases bulking formidably in the various State, federal, English, and Canadian law reports are here hewed and whittled to a cause or phrase.

The value of the book is considerably enhanced by the inclusion of helpful allied matter, e.g., criminal syndicalism, and other subjects of especial concern to the employer, such as the existence of a strike as an excuse on the part of the employer for failure to perform a contract obligation, the liability of an employer for injury suffered by scabbing workers, and insurance against strikes. Intelligently also the subject of boycotting is treated as one aspect of the larger question of the refusal of one person to have business relations with another. Trade unions, however, also need orientation in cognate matters. If those factors that condition the struggle of organized labor are proper subjects for such a work, why not include treatment of the law of arrest, of searches and seizures, and possibly an inquiry into the authority of police captains, sheriffs, or justices of the peace? All too often are the issues of a strike decided as a practical matter by abuse in low official places. The bland hostility of a police captain or sheriff, or, frequently, of a justice of the peace, is sometimes as effectually disastrous as the directness and dubious legality of a preliminary injunction.

In a sense it is regrettable that this book follows as closely as it does the abstract, legalistic terminology of the courts. Courts deal largely in traditional legalisms, hardened by outward logical symmetry. Only the exceptional court will compound its reasoning with realism derived from a consideration of constantly changing economic and sociological factors. Perhaps the largest part of labor's activity is condemned as unwarranted "interference with the right of an individual to conduct his business." The courts translate this into the concept of property, involving thereby every traditional and supposed constitutional guaranty designed for its protection. What of labor's interests? They fall under no legal concept accorded the sacredness of property. Labor wants a voice in the dictation of the conditions and remunerations of industry. However, the language of the law does not yet exist to comprehend these interests of labor or even to explain them. Labor therefore approaches the law at a great handicap. Labor sustains the burden of proof before the law. Labor must justify its "interference" with the individual "right" to conduct one's business. Legal analysis proceeds in terms of the "rights" of the employer with which labor "interferes." It never occurs to the courts that the employer's "right" may invade and restrict that area claimed by labor on the basis of social or collective interests. The result of this one-sided terminology thus not only leads to confusion of thought on the part of the courts but also to a disregard of those interests which labor has come to press for their attention as a consequence of an industrial age.

Perhaps more consideration of dissenting opinions, particularly those of Messrs. Holmes and Brandeis, cannot fairly be asked of the author. Their interest for labor is great, though possibly somewhat out of proportion to their authority as precedent. For labor, however, the path of the law lies along just such a realistic approach as that of Holmes and Brandeis to the possibility of new "rights" and new "legal concepts."

Our Puritan Artist

Hawthorne: A Study in Solitude. By Herbert Gorman. Murray Hill Biographies. George H. Doran Company. $2.

HOW heavy a tangle of hero-worship has grown up about the greater figures of the New England Renaissance only one who has tried to push his way through and see the authentic reality can realize. Our Victorian biographers and critics who took charge of New England reputations made a thorough job of it. They entered whole-heartedly into a pleasant conspiracy to set up shrines for the American people to worship at. No touch of realism sullies their idyllic pages; no concern for standards or values is suffered to minimize their heroes. Certain names are sacred and one approaches Craigie House or the Old Manse as one approaches the shrine of Thomas à Becket. One may read volumes, for example, without discovering that Sophia Hawthorne—to whom every Victorian pilgrim offered a nosegay of praise—was a sentimentalist who wrote so gushy a letter to Aldrich in praise of a poem he afterwards deleted from his works that he must have blushed for her, and whose literary judgment could have had no good influence on her husband's work. But the realists are having their innings at last, and it is an immense relief to read a study of Hawthorne written by one who has no client to defend and who thinks as an American rather than as a Bostonian. Such a study may not say the last word—which, of course, is never said—but at any rate it is an attempt to evaluate the work of the artist as a product of his strange mentality, and of the Puritan world that shaped that mentality.

I am not at all sure that Mr. Gorman's interpretation is wrong. The more I try to puzzle out the problem of Hawthorne's refined technique and scanty accomplishment—the thin atmosphere in which his stories move and the poverty of thought that marked his intellectual life—the more I am driven back upon the hypothesis of inhibitions that prevented his normal unfolding; and those inhibitions certainly resulted from the unhappy solitude into which he was early thrown, and the Puritan heritage that held his mind in its cold grasp. Here then is Mr. Gorman's thesis—a thesis that he defends with much persuasiveness and charm. It is a much more elusive task than he set himself in his study of Longfellow, calling for subtler analysis and shrewder insight. It is a study in the psychology of what, perhaps, may be called the skeptical aftermath of Puritanism—of the workings of a mind emptied of Calvinistic dogma but still aware of the reality of sin and sensitive to its possibilities as material for the artist to deal with. The world that Hawthorne created for his art was unreal—more unreal probably than Mr. Gorman has realized; with no likeness to the every-day realities of Samuel Sewall's world, or to the passionate intellectuality of Jonathan Edwards's broodings on the inscrutable Stable Will of God. It existed only in the twilight of his imagination and was subdued by the shadows of twilight; yet once he had taken up his abode there, refusing all contacts with other worlds, his literary expression was rigidly fixed.

Mr. Gorman's study is done with skill and insight. If he reveals a somewhat inadequate knowledge of the Puritan backgrounds of New England, and dismisses rather too hastily the stirring movements in ferment all about Hawthorne, such shortcomings are more than compensated for by the intelligence with which he has penetrated to the heart of his problem and has stripped from Hawthorne the tangle of maudlin eulogy that has so long covered his reputation. I accept his interpretation as just and am thankful for the clean and beautiful way in which he has done his job—only I wish he had split somewhat fewer infinitives and had not permitted Hawthorne to be "fed up" on anything. Magic

The House of Lost Identity. By Donald Corley. Robert M. McBride Company. $2.50.

THE short story is perhaps the most obdurate of prose forms for the artist seeking self-expression, since, like the sonnet, it is already so straitly conditioned by tradition that it has a characterless character of its own. When, now and then, a writer succeeds in putting his mark on it, stories of his type come henceforth to be regarded as his own. And so it is not to be held against Mr. Corley that his House of Lost Identity is a Hawthorne story, and that his Glass Eye of Throgmorton is a Kipling story, and that his Book of the Debts and the Price of Reflection are American Magazine stories, and that "Figs" and "The Manacles of Youth" and "The Song of the Hombelaine" and various others remind us of Cabell, who writes a cordial preface to the book.

"Hereinafter," he says, "you encounter magic. . . ." But "no magic can affect anybody—precisely as Mr. Corley tells us, in 'The Glass Eye of Throgmorton,' unless 'the sorcerer has first got hold of something personal, extremely personal, belonging to the intended victim.' Now I take it there is nothing more 'extremely personal' than one's heart. And magic—the special sort of magic that here solicits us—does, certainly, retain an inveterate hold upon the hearts of all who have ridden, howsoever briefly, and no matter how long ago, in the manner of Pierre Salabat, upon the horse with golden wings which flies high, and so very high, above the earth familiar to us." Which means, dear reader, that if you don't perceive the beauty of these stories, there's no one to blame but yourself.

This beauty, like Mr. Cabell's own, is associated with a consciously studied literary style—though, unlike Mr. Cabell, Mr. Corley uses half a dozen different consciously studied styles. Sometimes he is very simple and colorful, almost paternal in his tenderness, as in "The Legend of the Little Horses." Sometimes he is sophisticated and cosmopolitan, as in "The Glass Eye of Throgmorton." Sometimes he is fragrant and mysterious, as in "Figs." Always he knows his muttons as a story teller, just as well as Fanny Hurst knows hers and Edna Ferber hers and Cabell his; so that it is no wonder, after all, that his delicate confections have found their way into the popular magazines. "San-Yada, the Governor of the Province of Chouan, was drinking tea in the audience room of his palace, with his feet upon a cushion of rabbit furs. His shoemaid, Ssu, had just taken off his oiled silk boots and brought to him slippers of green silk embroidered with green wading birds."

He gives us long catalogues of glamorous names. "The castle of Warekin, as white as the sea-gulls that haunted its towers of an afternoon, flaunted blue marriage banners from every window and every gonfalon. The Island of Idressy, of which the castle was the kingskeep, awaited the coming of Hedragors, that evening; Hedragors, Isle lord of neighboring Kelmsney. . . ." And always in this conscious literary way, and according to distinguished precedent, and through a glass that seeks in some way to put an enchantment upon reality, he pursues those things that to him symbolize beauty.

Books in Brief

Strange Woman. By Elmer Davis. Robert M. McBride Company. $2.

When Lucy Merriam's husband has an affair with Dagmar Dahl, the opera singer, Lucy wakes up to the fact that there is very little left for a woman of forty to do. In this crisis she manages her [illegible] her own with almost supernatural tact. Eventually she and her husband are united on the old basis, and Dagmar returns to the more hectic world of art. The book, done largely in racy conversations, is a little unreal in many of its situations and by no means solves the problem of women of forty. But it is an amusing exposition of what fools old men can be.

The Flower Show. By Denis Mackail. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

This leisurely tale of a day's events on an English country estate, seen through the eyes of a child and interpreted whimsically but superficially by the author, will make pleasant enough reading for gentle old ladies and all others who enjoy the details of the manner in which "the heir to the property" takes his tiffin.

Zelda Marsh. By Charles G. Norris. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

Mr. Norris, following in the wake of the popular interest in stage folk, offers the turgid tale of Zelda who proves her basic virtue, despite several transgressions of the Seventh Commandment, by returning to her first lover and seducer in his hour of need. "John," she cries, "I'm leaving my heart behind me, but I'm gaining my soul."

The End of a World. By Claude Anet. Translated from the French by Jeffery E. Jeffery. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

This would make a delightful sugar-coated pill for geology or archaeology classes to read along with their required texts. It is a novel dealing with a certain phase of prehistoric civilization and gives the art, the hunting and fishing industries, and the social customs of our more brute-like ancestors. Part of the book is very beautiful, and some of it is very amusing (the origin of some of our moral and marital notions, for instance), but a portion of it is very dull. It is really too instructive to be altogether amusing.

God Got One Vote. By Frederick Hazlitt Brennan. Simon and Schuster. $2.50.

Here is a sprightly book on the ways and means of politicians. Up to a certain point it is honest and iconoclastic, and then it [illegible] sentimentality brought on, no doubt, by the effort to provide the hero's daughter with a husband. The material is interesting but photographic and reportorial, and needs blurring and softening before it can enter the realm of art. The book is most to be remembered for its portrait of Patrick Van [illegible] politician.

From Gallegher to The Deserter. The Short Stories of Richard Harding Davis. Selected by Roger Burlingame. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

This copious collection will be welcomed by those who have found it difficult to lay their hands upon the most characteristic [illegible] and permanent of Davis's work.

Profane Earth. By Holger Cahill. The Macaulay Company. $2.

A first novel crammed with a deal of naturalistic observation which might conceivably have resulted in a reasonably satisfying work if Theodore Dreiser had never existed. The usual sensitive farm boy goes to the usual big city, becomes the usual reporter, has the usual love tragedy, and at the end, dry-eyed and stubborn, repeats to himself that Life is Like That. Strong stuff for weak minds.

The Kingdom of Books. By William Dana Orcutt. Little, Brown and Company. $5.

Mr. Orcutt pursues his way still farther among the delights of the older and better typography.

Declaration of Love. By Geoffrey Dennis. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

Those who were fortunate enough to marvel at Mr. Dennis's earlier novels, "Harvest in Poland" and "Mary Lee," will not be surprised and assuredly not disappointed in this analysis, at once savage and mystic, of the states of mind preceding the efflorescence of love in the hearts of two very modern young people. A book of astonishing sincerity and originality. It will not be widely read.

The Negro in the Reconstruction of Virginia. By A. A. Taylor. The Association for the Study of Negro Life and History. $2.

The reconstruction period aroused such bitter resentment that its chief literary products have been the polemic novels of Tom Dixon and Judge Tourgee. The present dispassionate study shows that no extreme view can be taken. The author understands the difficulty the white South experienced in seeing the bottom rail on top, but he shows that the Negro under tremendous difficulties of self-adjustment made a better showing than he has been credited with.

Civil Liberty. Edited by Edith M. Phelps. H. W. Wilson Company. Ninety cents.

Thomas Jefferson, Mark Twain, Jeremy Bentham, Bernard Shaw, Alexander Hamilton, Archibald Stevenson, Louis Brandeis, Benito Mussolini, and Nikolai Lenin on civil liberty, with schematized arguments pro and con, and bibliographies—ready made for the college debater.

Art

Modern Art in Palestine

"IN Palestine . . . everybody buys a picture. Clerks, students, workmen—everyone, with however little money to spare, buys a painting as he would buy a book." This from Elias Newman, whose paintings we shall presently see at the Galerie Intime in New York. And his gratifying statement refers particularly to the work of the young Modern Group in Palestine, that group of which he is the first member to be shown in America. His is the first of a series of exhibits planned to introduce the modern Palestinians.

Almost without parallel in the history of painting is the consciously nationalistic aim of this group; aesthetics, for the moment, assume second place, and here for the first time we have a gathering of young, social-minded artists determinedly striving to interpret a nation, the spirit of a people—if you will, a social idea. Newman, youthful, enthusiastic, alert, appears in America with little desire to exploit himself but with a determination to prepare the way for his coworkers, and with a religious fervor embracing the Palestinian ideal. Listening to him is an amazing revelation to one accustomed to hearing contemporary artists releasing in wholesale quantities such remarks as "So-and-so is a nice fellow—but of course he's a rotten painter. . . ." And this in view of the fact that the Palestinian moderns have attempted to establish no "school" of painting. Each approaches his subject in his own erratic fashion. But it is supposed that as long as the common aim is not lost sight of, much is mutually forgiven. It is to be hoped that this generosity of spirit does not wane with the youthfulness of the group.

The ten workers representing this new movement worked quietly for several years until they felt the time was ripe for a public showing. There are some outstanding names among them: Lubin and Melnikoff of Chicago, Rubin of Rumania, Paldi of Russia, Newman, born in Poland, Siona Tager, the only woman in the group and the only member born in Palestine. It is, of course, a question whether a national art can ever be produced until at least one generation has grown up in a country; whether Lubin and Melnikoff can avoid painting their Chicago influences in Palestine; whether Paldi does not still paint Russia; whether Newman's previous training in New York at the National Academy and the Educational Alliance is not part of the voice giving a tale of Palestine. The group is positive in its answer to this question; they point to their youth, their Zionistic enthusiasm, their individual immersion in the struggle of the country. But it remains for their paintings to prove or disprove these assertions. And Newman's collection of oils and water-colors may, or may not, give a positive answer. His paintings show a tremendous struggle, an early consciousness of adaptation which has given way, in his later things, to a fresher naivete. Certainly they are an interesting problem, just as Palestine is. His water-colors, for all their wider appeal to most critics, seem to me much farther from the goal than certain of his oils. He has a large canvas of Jerusalem, "The Blue Synagogue," which gives me the impression of a near approach to coherence and simplicity. The hot, pure color of Jerusalem vibrates throughout, and it has an elusive richness and a depth that may well be part of Palestine's own experience. There are also scenes of Jaffa partaking of this feeling. And, all in all, one may safely say that it is serious painting. It has not had the label "Palestinian" attached to it merely as a theoretical distinction. The exhibition will have its interest not only for artists but for all those who harbor the belief that painting must not be afraid to align itself with social forces.

SOMEWHERE between the past and the present, in a region where things are neither new nor old, lies the limbo of the outmoded. It is a sort of attic in the house of culture, a place where costumes no longer chic but not yet old enough to be quaint are stored away along with the furniture which may be antique tomorrow but is merely unfashionable today; and it is a dim and dusty region. There is the slang of yesterday, there are the unread novels which history may or may not take up, and there, too, are the plays which, having had their hour upon the stage, are not likely to have another. Musty with the odor of undignified decay, it is not a heartening place to rummage in, and he who goes there in search of some remembered thing is likely to find a tarnish upon its brilliance, a mold upon its sentiment, and a crack in the ring of an eloquence which once sounded so clear and so strong. Much Pinero and Jones, much Brieux and Björnson is there along with unnumbered Germans who aspired to or achieved a performance at the Freie Bühne but upon whom the dust now lies as thick as it does upon our own Clyde Fitch or William Vaughn Moody. Many an enthusiast, fired by memories of his youth and determined to resurrect what he fancies to have been a glory of the past, has mounted there full of hope but has usually descended with nothing but a dry sneeze for his pains and a conviction that though the contemporaneous and the ancient both have their charms there is nothing so dull as a mode which has just been outlived.

Yet even here the rule has its exceptions and it is from the lumber-room that Miss Eva LeGallienne has extracted Hermann Heijermans's still moving play "The Good Hope," which she is using to introduce her new season at the Fourteenth Street Theater. The play was first produced in 1900; it is said to have been seen here briefly once before with Ellen Terry in the leading role; and it belongs to one of the deadest of dead periods. Heijermans was a Dutch follower of Hauptmann who wrote at the time when the drama was just discovering the proletariat, when it was busy pointing a heavily accusatory finger at the sorrows of the humble, and when every social wrong was considered to constitute per se the materials of a drama; and yet he managed in this case to transcend the limitations of the mode. The play is said to have been written (God save the mark!) as a protest against the loose methods of Dutch companies in insuring unseaworthy vessels; I presume and hope that these methods have been since reformed; but whether they have or not the piece would be no more interesting on account of its purpose than "Hamlet" would be if our concern depended chiefly upon an active indignation against those things which were politically rotten in the state of Denmark toward the end of the ninth century. Fortunately, however, Heijermans built better than the theorist of naturalism thought necessary. His impulse toward social protest served only to supply him with an attitude and to sharpen his observation so that he might make the old story of the rotten ship and the wives at home real once more by giving it a local habitation and a name among particular people, in a particular place, at a particular time. He had the gift for indignation but he had much more conspicuously the gift for character drawing and for situation; so that he has painted the life of a fishing village with something of that realism, at once uncompromising and yet loving, which once served as the mark of his countrymen's graphic art; and he managed at the same time to rise to moments of almost painful tension like that in which the timid son is sent away to the ship by the mother who soon will mourn his death. One fancies that the play was written rather directly under the influence of Hauptmann's "The Weavers," but it becomes, in spite of itself, much more than an imitation. There is a robustly cheerful good humor in the genre scenes which is most un-Hauptmannesque, and there is besides an individual vitality in the characters which makes them refuse to be merely either representatives of a class or straw men to serve as the subject of an argument. The play has life in it and it will not take its place quietly upon the shelf with the other documents for the study of an out-moded school.

Whether by deliberate intention or not Miss LeGallienne's Civic Repertory Theater has made an individual place for itself among the various "Art Theaters" of New York. While the Guild (its show specialties aside) devotes itself chiefly to contemporary plays and while both the Provincetown and the Playwright groups concern themselves chiefly with the more radical sort of experiment, Miss LeGallienne has been conspicuously concerned with the recent past and she has shown remarkably good judgment in selecting those relatively few plays of yesterday which it would be a pity for us to lose. "The Good Hope" is well directed and soundly played by her stock company. It will, I fancy, attain something of the steady unsensational popularity which rewarded "The Cradle Song" last year.

Madge Kennedy has usually specialized in unscrupulous little minxes who are too charming ever to receive the spankings they so richly deserve, but in Alice Duer Miller's sprightly comedy "The Springboard" (Mansfield Theater) the tables are turned upon her and she appears as the long-suffering wife of a man who cannot resist the solicitations of his own natural talent for philandering. The piece is sparklingly written, it has an edge, and it is, all in all, one of the brightest little pieces of the season. "Interference" (Empire Theater) is a polite English melodrama dealing with blackmail and murder as really nice people meet them.

How many are 421,000 stockholders?

An Advertisement of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company

ON OCTOBER 15th, American Telephone and Telegraph Company checks representing the 152d dividend were mailed to its 421,000 stockholders. That is the largest number of stockholders of any company in the world. The American Telephone and Telegraph Company is owned by a great investment democracy. Its dividend checks are cashed at banks in every state in the Union, by people representing all trades, stations and professions.

No institution is more nationally or publicly owned than the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, which in turn owns more than 91% of the common stock of the operating companies of the Bell national System. The average holding is 26 shares, and no one person owns as much as 1% of the total stock.

The Bell System was developed in the interest of telephone users and is owned by the public that it serves.

"Drain Inspector's Report"

UNDER the title given above, Mahatma Gandhi has published in Young India (Ahmedabad) for September 15 a review of Katherine Mayo's book "Mother India," from which we print an extended extract.

Several correspondents have sent me cuttings containing reviews of, or protests against, Miss Mayo's "Mother India." A few have in addition asked me to give my own opinion on it. An enraged correspondent from London asks me to give him answers to several questions that he has framed upon the authoress's references to me. Miss Mayo has herself favored me with a copy of her book.

I would certainly not have made time, especially when I have only limited energy and caution has been enjoined upon me by medical friends against overwork, to read the book during my tour. But these letters made it obligatory on me to read the book at once.

The book is cleverly and powerfully written. The carefully chosen quotations give it the appearance of a truthful book. But the impression it leaves on my mind is, that it is the report of a drain inspector sent out with the one purpose of opening and examining the drains of the country to be reported upon, or to give a graphic description of the stench exuded by the opened drains. If Miss Mayo had confessed that she had gone to India merely to open out and examine the drains of India, there would perhaps be little to complain about her compilation. But she says in effect with a certain amount of triumph, "The drains are India." True, in the concluding chapter there is a caution. But her caution is cleverly made to enforce her sweeping condemnation. I feel that no one who has any knowledge of India can possibly accept her terrible accusations against the thought and the life of the people of this unhappy country.

The book is without doubt untruthful, be the facts stated ever so truthful. If I open out and describe with punctilious care all the stench exuded from the drains of London and say, "Behold London," my facts will be incapable of challenge, but my judgment will be rightly condemned as a travesty of truth. Miss Mayo's book is nothing better, nothing else.

The authoress says she was dissatisfied with the literature she read about India, and so she came to India "to see what a volunteer unsubsidized, uncommitted, and unattached could observe of common things in daily human life."

After having read the book with great attention, I regret to say that I find it difficult to accept this claim. Unsubsidized she may be. Uncommitted and unattached she certainly fails to show herself in any page. We in India are accustomed to interested publications patronized—"patronized" is accepted as an elegant synonym for "subsidized"—by the Government. We have become used to understanding from pre-British days that the art (perfected by the British) of government includes the harnessing of the secret services of men learned and reported to be honest and honorable for shadowing suspects and for writing up the virtues of the Government of the day as if the certificate had come from disinterested quarters. I hope that Miss Mayo will not take offense if she comes under the shadow of such suspicion. It may be some consolation to her to know that even some of the best English friends of India have been so suspected.

But ruling out of consideration the suspicion, it remains to be seen why she has written this untruthful book. It is doubly untruthful. It is untruthful in that she condemns a whole nation, or in her words, "the peoples of India" (she will not have us as one nation) practically without any reservation as to their sanitation, morals, religion, etc. It is also untruthful because she claims for the British Government merits which cannot be sustained and which many an honest British officer would blush to see the Government credited with.

If she is not subsidized Miss Mayo is an avowed Indophobe and Anglophile, refusing to see anything good about Indians and anything bad about the British and their rule. She does not give one an elevated idea of Western standard of judgment. Though she represents a class of sensational writers in the West, it is a class that, I flatter myself with the belief, is on the wane. There is a growing body of Americans who hate anything sensational, smart, or crooked. But the pity of it is that there are still thousands in the West who delight in "shilling shockers." Nor are all the authoress's quotations or isolated facts truthfully stated. I propose to pick up those I have personal knowledge of. The book bristles with quotations torn from their contexts and with extracts which have been authoritatively challenged.

The authoress has violated all sense of propriety by associating the Poet's [Rabindranath Tagore's] name with child-marriage. The Poet has indeed referred to early marriage as not an undesirable institution. But there is a world of difference between child-marriage and early marriage. If she had taken the trouble of making the acquaintance of the free and freedom-loving girls and women of Shantiniketan, she would have known the poet's meaning of early marriage.

She has done me the honor of quoting me frequently in support of her argument. Any person who collects extracts from a reformer's diary, tears them from their context, and proceeds to condemn, on the strength of these, the people in whose midst the reformer has worked would get no hearing from sane and unbiased readers or hearers. But in her hurry to see everything Indian in a bad light, she has not only taken liberty with my writings, but she has not thought it necessary even to verify through me certain things ascribed by her or others to me. In fact she has combined in her own person what we understand in India as the judicial and executive officer. She is both the prosecutor and the judge. She has described the visit to me, and informed her readers that there are always with me two "secretaries" who write down every word I say. I know that this is not a wilful perversion of facts. Nevertheless the statement is not true. I beg to inform her that I have no one near me who has been appointed or is expected to write down every word that I say. I have by me a coworker called Mahadev Desai who is striving to out-Boswell Boswell and does, whenever he is near me, take down whatever he considers to be wisdom dropping from my lips. I can't repel his advances, even if I would, for the relationship between us is, like the Hindu marriage, indissoluble. But the real crime committed against me is described by her at pages 387-388. She ascribes to the Poet "a fervent declaration that Ayurvedic science surpasses anything that the West can offer" (she has this time no quotation to back her statement). Then she quotes my opinion that hospitals are institutions for propagating sin, and then distorts out of all recognition a sacred incident, honorable to the British surgeons and, I hope, to myself. I must ask the reader to excuse me for giving the full quotation from the book:

> As he happened to be in the prison at the time, a British surgeon of the Indian Medical Service came straightaway to see him. "Mr. Gandhi," said the surgeon, as the incident was then reported, "I am sorry to tell you that you have appendicitis. If you were my patient, I should operate at once. But you will probably prefer to call in your Ayurvedic physician."
> Mr. Gandhi proved otherwise minded.
> "I should prefer not to operate," pursued the surgeon, "because in case the outcome should be unfortunate, all your friends will lay it as a charge of malicious intent against us whose duty is to care for you."
> "If you will only consent to operate," pleaded Mr. Gandhi.

Julian Green

JULIAN GREEN, a young American, living in Paris, writing in French a novel of life in Virginia, has stirred the literary world. The French critics have acclaimed him the best novelist of his generation in France. This first novel, "Mont-Cinère," has just been translated and is now published in English under the title:

AVARICE HOUSE

ERNEST BOYD compares this strange story of an old Virginia house to "Wuthering Heights," while the French critics compare Green's work to that of Balzac.

BERNARD FAY in The Saturday Review of Literature says: "Julian Green is going to be one of the greatest living French writers. His novels in less than a year have made of him the foremost French novelist of the younger generation."

"I will call in my friends, now, and explain to them that you do so at my request."

So Mr. Gandhi wilfully went to an "institution for propagating sin," was operated upon by one of the "worst of all," an officer of the Indian Medical Service, and was attentively nursed through convalescence by an English Sister whom he is understood to have thought after all rather a "useful sort of person."

This is a travesty of truth. I shall confine myself to correcting only what is libelous and not the other inaccuracies. There was no question here of calling in any Ayurvedic physician. Colonel Maddock, who performed the operation, had the right, if he had so chosen, to perform the operation without a reference to me, and even in spite of me. But he and Surgeon General Hooton showed a delicate consideration to me, and asked me whether I would wait for my own doctors who were known to them and who were also trained in the Western medical and surgical science. I would not be behindhand in returning their courtesy and consideration, and I immediately told them that they could perform the operation without waiting for my doctors, to whom they had telegraphed, and that I would gladly give them a note for their protection in the event of the operation miscarrying. I endeavored to show that I had no distrust either in their ability or their good faith. It was to me a happy opportunity of demonstrating my personal good-will.

So far as my opinion about hospitals and the like is concerned it stands, in spite of my having subjected myself and my wards to treatment more than once by physicians and surgeons, Indian and European, trained in the Western school of medicine. Similarly I use motor cars and railways, while holding to my condemnation of them as strongly as ever. I hold the body itself to be an evil and an impediment in my progress. But I see no inconsistency in my making use of it while it lasts, and trying in the best manner I know to use it for its own destruction. This is a sample of distortion of which I have a personal knowledge. . . .

That a book like Miss Mayo's can command a large circulation furnishes a sad commentary on Western literature and culture.

I am writing this article also in the hope, be it ever so distant, that Miss Mayo herself may relent and repent of having done, I hope unconsciously, atrocious injustice to an ancient people and equally atrocious injustice to the Americans by having exploited her undoubted ability to prejudice without warrant their minds against India.

The irony of it all is that she has inscribed this book "To the Peoples of India." She has certainly not written it as a reformer and out of love. If I am mistaken in my estimate let her come back to India. Let her subject herself to cross-examination, and if her statements escape unhurt through the fire of cross-examination, let her live in our midst and reform our lives. So much for Miss Mayo and her readers. . . .

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

THE NATION is on file in most public and college libraries and is indexed in the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature.

CERTIFICATES OF PURITY, in Chicago's anti-British-textbooks war, have been issued to three historians. The fortunate ones are Albert Bushnell Hart, C. H. Van Tyne, and Willis Mason West. Mr. "Sport" Herrman, Mayor Thompson's public-library investigator, has pronounced histories of the War of Independence written by these three men to be fit for the American child. Mr. Herrman explained that he had not exactly read the books but that he had "looked through them" and they were "all right." Others besides the three authors in question must draw a sigh of relief. Not only have Mayor Thompson and his band decided not to burn the nasty books they think corrupting and pro-British; but they have actually found books already in print which will do. This is very cheering; we had begun to fear that no such books would be found and that Mr. Herrman would have to write them, or perhaps Mayor Thompson himself. Meanwhile, all is not well in the Thompson camp. Time was when prospects looked bright for a "Thompson for President" boom. Now rude citizens in all parts of the country are laughing at Chicago's mayor for his dust storm over the British menace, and as every little schoolboy knows, the minute you begin to laugh at a Presidential candidate, that candidate's chances are a flop. You may insult him, you may make unpleasant insinuations about his private life or his public character, you may call him a bully, a hypocrite, a crook, a time-server. But no matter what you call him, you must not smile.

SECRETARY WILBUR has run true to navy form in detaching Rear Admiral Magruder from the command of the navy yard at Philadelphia after declaring that no punitive action would be taken against him. We have carefully read such extracts from the correspondence as have been published and are impressed with the way in which the Admiral, who had written in the Saturday Evening Post that the United States was paying $300,000,000 for a $200,000,000 navy, stuck to his guns in the face of Secretary Wilbur's belligerent letters. The Secretary was palpably insincere in asserting that the detachment of the Admiral was not a disciplinary action but simply an administrative one. What has happened to the Admiral is precisely the historic fate meted out to anybody in either the army and navy who revolts against the system. If an officer dares to criticize publicly he is likely to be court-martialed or thrown out—witness the fate of Colonel Mitchell. If a dissenting officer protests through the regular official channels his reports are promptly pigeonholed and never heard from again. Competent civilians, if given a free hand, could, we are sure, save hundreds of millions in both services. But once in the service the progressive officer might as well submit to powerlessness unless, like Admiral Sims in his historic crusade against the bad target practice of the navy, he has newspapers and politicians to help him. In this case President Coolidge has even declined to give to Admiral Magruder a hearing. We trust that Senator MacKellar will stick to his present intention to demand an inquiry by Congress. There are dozens of officers who will back up the Admiral if they can be heard under circumstances that will assure them freedom from black-listing by the governing clique of the navy.

A TEMPORARY, BUT ONLY TEMPORARY, SOLUTION of the disagreement with France in the matter of tariffs was reached on October 26. By decree American products will be restored to the favorable rates they enjoyed in France prior to September 6, which makes it possible for the American exporters who have millions of dollars' worth of products tied up in bonded warehouses in French ports to release them for sale in France. The long and tedious task of negotiating a permanent commercial treaty will now be undertaken, with the French in a much more favorable position than before because they have shown their readiness and their ability to strike hard in order to get what they believe to be just terms. While the effort is being made in Washington to portray this as a decided success for the American Government it is nothing of the kind. The State Department has had to promise that the American Government will lift our restrictions upon French agricultural, sanitary, and pharmaceutical products which have virtually excluded them from the American market—whether this can be done by Presidential decree, or requires consent of Congress, remains to be seen. More important than that, the Government of the United States has been forced to abandon in France the abominable spy system to which we have repeatedly referred in these columns, in accordance with which French exporters have been asked to open their books and reveal their inmost trade secrets to American customs agents, under the penalty of being excluded from American markets. Switzerland, the Argentine, and Sweden have already struck against this impudent demand. Congress would do well to end it.

AT LAST THERE ARE SIGNS that the police are going to be held accountable when they themselves turn criminals. In New York City, one Thomas Raffaele has obtained a verdict of $1,000 against a city detective. This policeman, with an associate, was searching for hold-up men. Meeting Raffaele they arrested him, dragged him to the drug-store which had been robbed, and beat him up with blackjacks. He was then locked up overnight, but was released as entirely innocent when taken into court the next day. This sort of official crime occurs every day, and it is, of course, connived at by the highest police authorities. If the legal profession will not exert itself to stop these practices which bring the law into contempt, then the thing to do is to bring suit against both the policemen and the head of the police for false arrest and assault whenever one of these crimes occurs. Only then will the guardians of the law begin to realize that theirs is the first duty to obey the law. It is also encouraging, in this connection, to note that public opinion has forced the release, in custody of counsel, of a youth who, after being beaten by police, was sentenced to serve three months in the workhouse—merely because he was caught sleeping in subway trains in order to save money! He had deposits in two banks and was sending some of his earnings to his mother in Massachusetts. In Passaic, New Jersey, the chief of police who two years ago so brutally maltreated the striking textile workers, has just been arrested because of his peculiar habit of possessing stolen automobiles. How can such men make the law respected?

> The Red Cross [said Mr. Nelson, chairman of the Brooklyn chapter of the American Red Cross] does not have to ask permission of any commandant to enter the Brooklyn Navy Yard. The American Red Cross is in the Brooklyn Navy Yard by the authority of the President of the United States, who is also President of the American Red Cross, which is as much under the command of the President as the army and navy.

THESE HARSH WORDS were directed at Rear Admiral Charles P. Plunkett, for refusing to allow Red Cross officials to solicit subscriptions from the small-salaried civil employees of the Brooklyn Navy Yard. Fortunately Mr. Coolidge, who is President of the United States, the Red Cross, the Boy Scouts, and several other organizations, was not as dictatorial as Mr. Nelson, and Secretary Wilbur announced, the day after Mr. Nelson's fiery pronunciamento, that he had no intention of interfering with the Admiral's orders. Nobody would deny the excellent and indispensable work that the Red Cross does in peace as well as war. But other persons besides Admiral Plunkett have questioned the advisability of money-getting "drives"—a disease caught during the war from which we have by no means recovered. Twelve-dollar-a-week clerks in some of New York's largest offices are frowned upon if, by begging off from Red Cross membership, they keep their division from being "one hundred per cent enrolled." Gifts made under duress surely cannot be welcome; and it hardly seems in keeping with the Red Cross spirit to wring unwilling and hard-won dollars from those who can ill afford to spare them.

NEW HAVEN NEWSPAPERS are usually delighted to report any transgression on the part of a Yale man. Let a student run counter to the strong arm of the law, be it because he was surprised in the wrong apartment, because his automobile misbehaved on a public highway, or because of any other aberration discountenanced by the statutes of the Nutmeg State, and the journals of New Haven will obligingly blaze forth with all the details. This reputation of the newspapers led three students, members of the Yale Liberal Club, to take part in the picketing in the local necktie strike and allow themselves to be arrested. For six weeks the strike had been running and with the exception of the Times-Union no New Haven paper had mentioned it. The papers even refused union advertising which would have presented the case of the workers to the people of the city. The strike was primarily against two concerns, Berkman and Adler, and Stern and Merritt, who had moved from New York to New Haven in order to avoid union conditions. The students believed that if they had themselves arrested, strike news would surely find its way to the front pages. They succeeded in their first ambition, but not a word appeared in any paper. The business manager of one New Haven newspaper explained: "You know, we don't pay any attention to labor troubles here unless we have to."

THERE ARE ENOUGH BUBBLES in the pot of European politics to make a hard-boiled American isolationist smile. Poland and Lithuania are growling at each other across the Vilna frontier; Rumania and Hungary cannot agree about Transylvania; Jugoslavia has talked war because Bulgarian irredentists assassinated a Serbian general in Macedonia—but has had the common sense to simmer down; Italy has sent a squadron to Tangier as a kaiser-like hint that she wants a share in the international administration of that city; and Spain and Rumania have escaped revolutions by hair's-breadths. Another whole crop of rumors centers about the conversation which Austen Chamberlain, British Foreign Minister, is supposed to have had last month with Primo de Rivera. Primo seems to have given an interview to a London newspaper—only to deny it three days after publication—suggesting that he and Sir Austen were planning large plans. Spain was to cede her African colonies to France but to gain a free hand in Tangier; France might give Italy compensation in Syria or elsewhere; and England would thus cement her anti-Bolshevik alliance of the Western Powers. The project is nebulous in the dispatches; but Sir Austen's record gives no guaranty that it is not true. The spirit of Locarno seems to be hibernating.

A CURIOUS STORY comes from Bolivia of how four men, convicted of assassinating a former president of the republic, were instructed to draw lots so that one might die for the offense and the others be set free. Would the advocates of the death penalty in this country—who insist on it chiefly as an example—think their purposes as well served if only one out of every four condemned men were executed? And if one in every four is enough, could we not presently satisfy our blood lust by sacrificing only one in ten and finally one in every hundred? Probably the suggestion will seem visionary, but there does appear to be one practical and reasonable opportunity for the drawing of lots in this ghoulish business. Even among the strongest advocates of capital punishment there is a general loathing for a public executioner. Yet what right have we to ask another to perform an act which we ourselves would be unwilling to undertake? Why therefore should not executioners, like juries, be chosen by lot from a panel of citizens?—those not believing in the death penalty to be excused. Or, better still, perhaps, let every jury that condemns a fellow-human to die draw lots to decide who shall press the button of the scaffold or the electric chair.

"GENTLEMEN OF THE JURY," said Maître Torres, counsel for the Jew Schwartzbard, on trial in Paris for murdering the Ukrainian Hetman Petlura, "there is only one question before you. Can Schwartzbard be considered guilty?" Unanimously, after thirty-five minutes' deliberation, the jury answered, "No." The plaintiffs were ordered to pay the costs of the trial (though Mme Petlura and her brother-in-law received damages of one franc each), the crowd shrieked "Vive la France" as the verdict was announced, and the confessed murderer fell on the neck of his defender. The explanation of the trial and its outcome lies deep in the make-up of the French mind and French processes of justice. Schwartzbard was in fact never on trial for the murder of Petlura. There was at no time any doubt about his guilt. It was Petlura, the dead man, who was tried. Did Petlura commit atrocities against the Jews of the Ukraine during the dark days of the civil war in Russia when thousands of innocent Jews were slaughtered by their Christian neighbors and the troops of the White armies? Did Petlura know of these atrocities or, knowing, could he have prevented or stopped them? Did Schwartzbard seek to avenge the massacred Jews on his own volition or did he do it as a tool of Russian Communists? Such were the questions which turned a murder trial into a pandemonium of political accusations, insults, and fist fights. And the jury, in deciding as it did, justified Schwartzbard in an act of violence which has, ironically, succeeded for the first time in focusing public attention on an organized regime of violence certainly as brutal and wanton as any the world has ever witnessed.

MAXIMILIAN HARDEN is dead. Born Isador Witkowski, he became a Christian at the age of 16, supported himself for years as an actor, and never entirely recovered from his histrionic training. As the confidant and partisan of Bismarck, he hated the young Kaiser who dropped the old pilot, and in pre-war Germany Wilhelm had no bitterer critic. When exposures in his magazine, the Zukunft, led to his trial for perjury, he used the trial to reveal more of the cheap scandals which abounded among the sycophants of the imperial court. He had courage, and shrewdness, but he lacked the thrust that carries through. During the war he was hailed as a hero in Allied countries because his voice was loud against the Kaiser, but his criticism was rather of strategy than of aims. If he had thought the Pan-German dream possible he would have been for it. His common sense, however, brought him the hate of the short-sighted Nationalists, and in 1922 a group of "patriotic" thugs blackjacked him, leaving him with injuries from which he never entirely recovered.

Where Genghis Died

NEITHER Tutankhamen nor King George ever reigned over as vast an empire as bowed the knee to Genghis Khan. The papers say he "ranks with Alexander, Caesar, and Napoleon among the world's conquerors," but it is only the provincial astigmatism of the white race which leads us to class those petty men with the giant whose armies swept across the deserts of Central Asia to the rich valleys of India, Persia, and Asia Minor, crossed into Russia, harried the Adriatic, and at the other end of the earth laid low the mighty empires of old China.

Now, according to the Sunday Express of London, Piotr Kozlov has found the secret tomb of Genghis, deep in the labyrinthine heart of a Mongolian mountain, in a great stone hall forty feet square, hewed out of the solid rock. Seven silent lamas guard it, and every seven hours one of them strikes seven times upon the great jade bell which overhangs the sarcophagus of the Khan. The silver coffin rests, the story says, upon the gem-studded crowns of seventy-eight conquered princes; and among the relics of the shrine are a thirteenth-century Bible presented by Marco Polo and a chronicle of the Mongols signed with Genghis Khan's own hand.

We hope the story is true. If Kozlov comes out of the desert to confirm it, it is true, for he is among the greatest of living explorers. But the picture does not jibe with what we have known of Genghis Khan and the city of the Black Sands, Karakorum, where Kozlov, led by a lineal descendant of the great Mongol, is supposed to have found the tomb.

It may be that for seven centuries the desert lamas have kept such a royal secret; but it has been the Mongol tradition that Genghis was buried a thousand miles or more north of the black city, under a great tree in the forests of his boyhood. One tribe was exempted from military service to guard the forest, until the trees grew so tall and thick that the emperor's tree was lost and all trace of his grave vanished. He lived in a tent all his life; the luxuries of his grandson Kubla's court were unknown to him, even when he amassed treasure beyond Midas's dreams; and he would hardly have liked the gaudy glory of such a tomb. It would not be in keeping with the character of the man who, dying in far-off China, left minute instructions for the completion of his campaign there, at the same time directing that his own remains be taken to Mongolia post-haste, and every man met on the way killed, so that news of his death might not spread and give new courage to his enemies.

Moreover, Kozlov was in Karakorum in 1909, and if there are vast rocky mountains among the desert sands that now climb over its deserted walls he did not mention them in his account of his earlier explorations. It is true that in that arid air decay is slow; but how did Marco Polo's Bible find its way to Genghis's tomb? He was not born when the old warrior died; and it was forty-eight years later when Marco reached the court of Genghis's grandson. He might make an offering, even so, to the tomb of a dead hero; but then the location of the grave must have been known; and how are we then to account for the story, centuries old in Chinese annals, of Genghis's burial in the northern forest?

Something New in the World

TEN years ago something new was born into the world —something fresh and live, infectious and creative. The world into which it was born did not like it. At first it did not even take it seriously. It seemed to be just the temporary rioting of a few wild soapboxers, annoying because it interrupted the business of winning the war. Today the world is engaged in rectifying the mistakes of a war won too thoroughly, while Soviet Russia, still hated and feared by the West, is enthusiastically celebrating its tenth birthday.

Russia's March Revolution ousted the Czar and substituted a regime which, seeking to undo the worst abuses of autocracy, clung to the old forms of legality, promised the peasants new land legislation, and sought to reorganize Russia to continue fighting the war. The West accepted even that mild regime doubtfully, conditioning its approval upon the new Russia's success in killing Germans. Kerensky's Government pleased neither its Allies nor its own people, and in November Soviet Russia was born to the twin battle-cries of Land and Peace. The Bolsheviks made no effort to keep the peasants from driving out the feudal landowners and appropriating the soil of Russia to themselves, but rather encouraged them to take at once what legislation might have brought them after many years. It shouted peace from the house-tops; it urged the conscripts to go home and till their new-won fields; and it sought with pathetic earnestness to persuade the world to make peace upon the basis of "no annexations and no indemnities." The Powers, desiring both annexations and indemnities, were ready to let millions of human beings bleed to death rather than admit a peace without victory.

When Trotzky, without an army behind him, stood on his soapbox at Brest-Litovsk and orated over General von Hoffmann's head, calling upon the German masses to join Russia in revolution, the Kaiser's ministers saw only a chance to win a battle, and made the ephemeral peace of Brest-Litovsk. The Allies were no wiser. The first point upon which Germany, England, and France joined hands was common opposition to Lenin's Government.

The Allies begged the Germans to keep their troops in the Baltic provinces until they could themselves organize anti-Bolshevik crusades. British, French, Japanese, and American troops were landed upon Russian soil long after the Armistice; every anti-Bolshevik freebooter found the Allies ready to finance and equip him; and while the people's armies of young Russia crushed one after another of these terrific counter-attacks the war-worn country was racked and torn and brought to the depths of distress. Surely no government in history ever attempted to build upon more ruinous foundations. Yet this group of men whose lives had been passed in prison and exile, who had had no training in government and administration, who sought to apply in their country principles untested and uncharted, did succeed in building a stable government out of that chaos—and a stable government founded primarily on an honest desire for the happiness of the people.

The West is disillusioned today, weary after the emotional debauch of a war which almost drove democracy out of our world. But Soviet Russia has become a land of hope, a country where millions of men and women feel a new intensity in the dull business of living. It must be judged, in part at least, in the light of what it followed. It rose on the ruins of a country soaked in the bloody tyrannies of Czarism and sunk in the hopelessness of medieval feudalism. Roger Baldwin elsewhere in this issue gives, we believe, a fair picture of the new freedoms of Russia. The old bourgeoisie is still harried and persecuted as labor was until a decade ago. But women have a freedom exceeding even that of America and Scandinavia; children have a primary consideration unknown elsewhere; and the whole machinery of the state is directed toward raising the standards of living of the millions. No government in history has set out so deliberately, and so successfully, to annihilate illiteracy, to build up mass health, to set its people economically free. There is no divergence of testimony regarding the devotion of the Communist commissars. They sacrifice themselves to their ideal as ruthlessly as they do others. They live on a salary of 250 rubles a month and if they are caught in peculation they suffer more rigidly than mere laymen. The usual perquisites of rulership are not theirs. Comparing this regime with the callous class contrasts of Czarism, or even with the aimless profiteering of the present-day West, one feels the breath of a new life.

Russia is far from her goal of socialism, or communism. As Louis Fischer suggests elsewhere, the effort to build the economic life of a nation upon the principle of planned common welfare is an experiment still. The valid criticism of Russia's method would be that it does not work; and only today, after the harsh years of counter-revolution, blockade, and famine, is that question receiving a fair test. The second decade—if England does not first produce another war—will tell.

In its first decade Soviet Russia has had most influence upon the world in the field of foreign relations. It hoped in its early days that the fire of its own revolution would spread—and the cruel ashes of that hope still scar Europe. Yet it was a natural hope; the Western governments were sponsoring rebellions in Russia, and the Bolsheviks only followed the Western lead when, through the Third International, they sought to organize revolt behind those hostile governments' backs. It is not only the fear of the Third International, however, which has set the West against Russia. The Soviets early began publishing the archives of the Czar's diplomacy, and the crass light they shed upon the hypocrisy of Allied pretensions was bitterly resented. They sapped the war myths, and made a joke of the slogans which sent millions to futile death. M. Chicherin, Russia's able Foreign Minister, has again and again punctured the armor of his opponents and revealed behind their puffed-out fronts the inspiration of oil, of steel, of military power.

But Soviet Russia's cruelest sin against the imperialist West has been committed in Asia. First, by giving a new freedom to most of its subject nationalities, and second, by treaties with the independent nations of the East, it set an example to the white empires of Asia which they have no inclination to follow. It abjured the special privileges to which America and the other Powers still cling in China; it canceled Czarist concessions in Persia; it helped the Emir of Afghanistan—and those who denounce these steps as essentially selfish forget that the same opportunities to express enlightened self-interest have been open to the Western empires, and conspicuously neglected by them.

It is for her virtues that Russia is most hated; and we love her for her enemies. We do not dedicate this issue to her tenth birthday because we subscribe to the communist principles of her rulers, or because we condone the brutalities of the Red dictatorship. We have a horror of all religious fanatics, of all men who feel so sure of themselves that murder and lying become acceptable means, however beautiful the goal or god to which they make their sacrifices. But all things are relative; and we live in a world which has just poured out the blood of ten million boys, and our Western countries were ready to let more thousands go to death if they could crush the workers' republic of Russia. It is because Russia's success would threaten the prestige of the private-profit world upon which the Mellons and Dohenys feed that our American Government, which was on friendly terms with the Czar and today hobnobs with Mussolini, refuses to recognize the Soviets. It is because Soviet Russia has openly and ably encouraged the struggle for freedom of the subject peoples of Asia that Britain fears her most.

In the stale world of diplomacy Soviet Russia has been a living yeast; and the example of its workers' republic has been a creative ferment in Western politics. The scars of the Czarist centuries still lie deep, and the regime which brought so much hope and freedom still fails of its broadest destiny; but in this muddy age its ten years shine.

Our Waning Prosperity

WITH each day it is more difficult to reconcile President Coolidge's optimistic statement of October 18 and his rosy prophecy of a greater prosperity than ever with the facts of our economic situation. It is true that public-utility companies are prospering and that General Motors reported earnings for nine months of 1927 of $193,758,302, thereby becoming the greatest money-maker among American corporations. But on the same day the earnings of the United States Steel Corporation for the same period were announced to be but $74,050,623 as contrasted with $85,433,404 during the similar months of 1926. Meanwhile, the railroads continue to report decreasing earnings in the East, West, and South, the Atchison, the Baltimore & Ohio, Southern Pacific, Seaboard, Wheeling and Lake Erie, Central Railroad of New Jersey, and Chicago and Eastern Illinois, among others, recording decreases in both gross earnings and net operating income. The losses are chiefly in miscellaneous freight, general merchandise, coal, ore, and forest products. Fifty railroads report a joint loss of $9,250,762 in net income for the month of September.

In the steel and iron industry, the Bethlehem Steel Corporation earned only sixty-one cents a share on its common stock, as contrasted with one dollar and fifty-seven cents during the third quarter of 1926. Its President, Eugene Grace, after laying the blame for this entire situation at the door of President Coolidge, merely because that gentleman did not choose to run for the Presidency again, declared that every possible saving had been made, but that with the prices of steel lower by $4 a ton than they were at the beginning of the year there is nothing left to do to make a better showing except to cut wages. That, he said, no one likes to think about, and, he added: "If we have to save invested capital by reducing wages it will signify that we are really in a serious business cycle. Business is being carried on largely by deferred credits, or instalment buying. If we have to reduce the purchasing power of the workingman it will have serious consequences." Precisely. It is to just two facts that so much of our recent prosperity has been due: Purchasing on credit and our export trade. If the deferred-payment structure begins to crumble we shall be in for bad times, and so we shall if our export trade does not show a volume equal or superior to that of last year. Already, as Mr. Grace has doubtless noticed, there is beginning to be serious unemployment. Baltimore reports a considerable slackening of trade and employment, and Cleveland, to take another example, with an army of 70,000 unemployed is witnessing public meetings demanding that those out of work shall be supported by the municipality.

But the most striking symptoms of trade slackening are in the pig-iron field. Thus, the price of foundry pig iron delivered in Philadelphia has decreased from $23.26 in December, 1926, to $20.26 at this writing. That in turn has had its effect upon the furnaces. On September 30 only 174 furnaces were in blast as compared with 189 in August; the daily average rate of pig-iron production was the lowest for any month since September, 1925. The decrease in the number of active blast furnaces is directly due to the fact that of the four most important lines of business using steel only one, building construction, is holding its own in comparison with 1926. The automobile industry, the railroad business, and the oil fields are all of them far behind in their orders for steel products—the automobile industry, in large part, because of the suspension of production by Henry Ford which apparently more than offsets the great gains in sales of the General Motors Corporation. The steel industry firmly believes that November and December will see increased orders from railroad and automobile companies, but it expected increased orders during September which it did not get. The stock market has reflected the growing uncertainty by the recent downward pressure against very determined efforts to keep up the prices.

All of which makes many people believe that President Coolidge had seen the storm signals before he decided to let some other fellow carry the burdens of government during the next four years. That may or may not be the case, but that there are grave industrial symptoms at this moment cannot be denied. No one can look forward with any satisfaction to a period of depression in this country at any time. But just now there are two reasons why a serious depression would have exceptionally bad results. For one thing, the American people have enjoyed greater luxuries and comforts of living than ever before, and it will be correspondingly difficult for them to give up those luxuries and comforts and return to a lower scale of living. Again, despite warnings and excellent recommendations by unofficial bodies, neither the Union nor any single State has done anything to prepare to deal with unemployment on a large scale. That Cleveland has today no recognized machinery to deal with the feeding of its unemployed is nothing exceptional; so far as we are aware it is true of every city. While certain trades like the cotton and woolen industry have lived through bad times without much public aid, that will not be possible if the depression should affect many lines. Social engineering has been neglected in favor of radios and phonographs and automobiles.

Begging for Women's Colleges

TO the eye of the outsider our great Eastern women's colleges appear to be stable, prosperous institutions, delightfully equipped with handsome buildings, large trees, playing fields, and a certain pleasant air of intellectual activity. To the insider—the trustee, the president, the dean, and the lesser administrative deities—the woman's college is a plant for the mass-production of education, which can be kept running at all only through the greatest economy of operation, achieved in part by the usual expedient of inadequate wages and long hours for its employees, the faculty, and in part by inadequate physical equipment. None of these colleges has an endowment sufficient to meet its legitimate needs either for buildings and their upkeep or for teachers and their salaries.

What is to be done about it? This question is forcibly put by the heads of the seven largest Eastern institutions for women in an article appearing in the November Atlantic Monthly. They describe, with more particularity than would seem necessary, the fine academic record of the colleges they represent and the achievements of the alumnae; they point to the friendly attitude of the public, the overwhelming demand for such education as they offer. And they ask, why cannot the women's colleges get support from the community, on the same scale as the men's?

The women's colleges are steadily drained of their best men teachers by the men's colleges and the State universities, both of which offer higher salaries and more leisure for research and writing. The women teachers stay in the women's colleges, on insufficient pay, only because they are not wanted—whatever their qualifications—by those other institutions; it is this fact, no doubt, that is responsible for the high grade of teaching that actually persists in the women's colleges. If the twin problems of poor salaries and inadequate plant were to be met within the college it would mean largely increased tuition fees—and a corresponding increase in the proportion of wealthy students.

In our present civilization the manufacture of education cannot, it seems, be made self-supporting. It must be paid for by the public either through state aid or through private endowment. The private colleges depend solely on gifts from interested wealthy citizens to make up their deficits. At present those gifts go in disproportionate amounts to the men's colleges. Quite naturally, since the large fortunes in America are generally controlled by men, who give most freely to their own colleges.

Can our millionaires develop the imagination and interest necessary to induce them to take the women's institutions under their golden wing? We hope the arresting appeal in the Atlantic will help them to, but we fear that it will take more than a single prod. We suspect that one reason for the poverty of the women's colleges was ignored in the article by their presidents: Do those same presidents spend as much time as their colleagues in the men's colleges in going about, hat in hand, begging money from the men who have it to give? We recall the pathetic effort of the head of one of our Eastern men's colleges to compute the number of miles he had traveled up and down in the elevators of great office buildings in order to solicit funds from rich men. He could, he believed, have reached Mars if his vertical voyages had been put end on end.

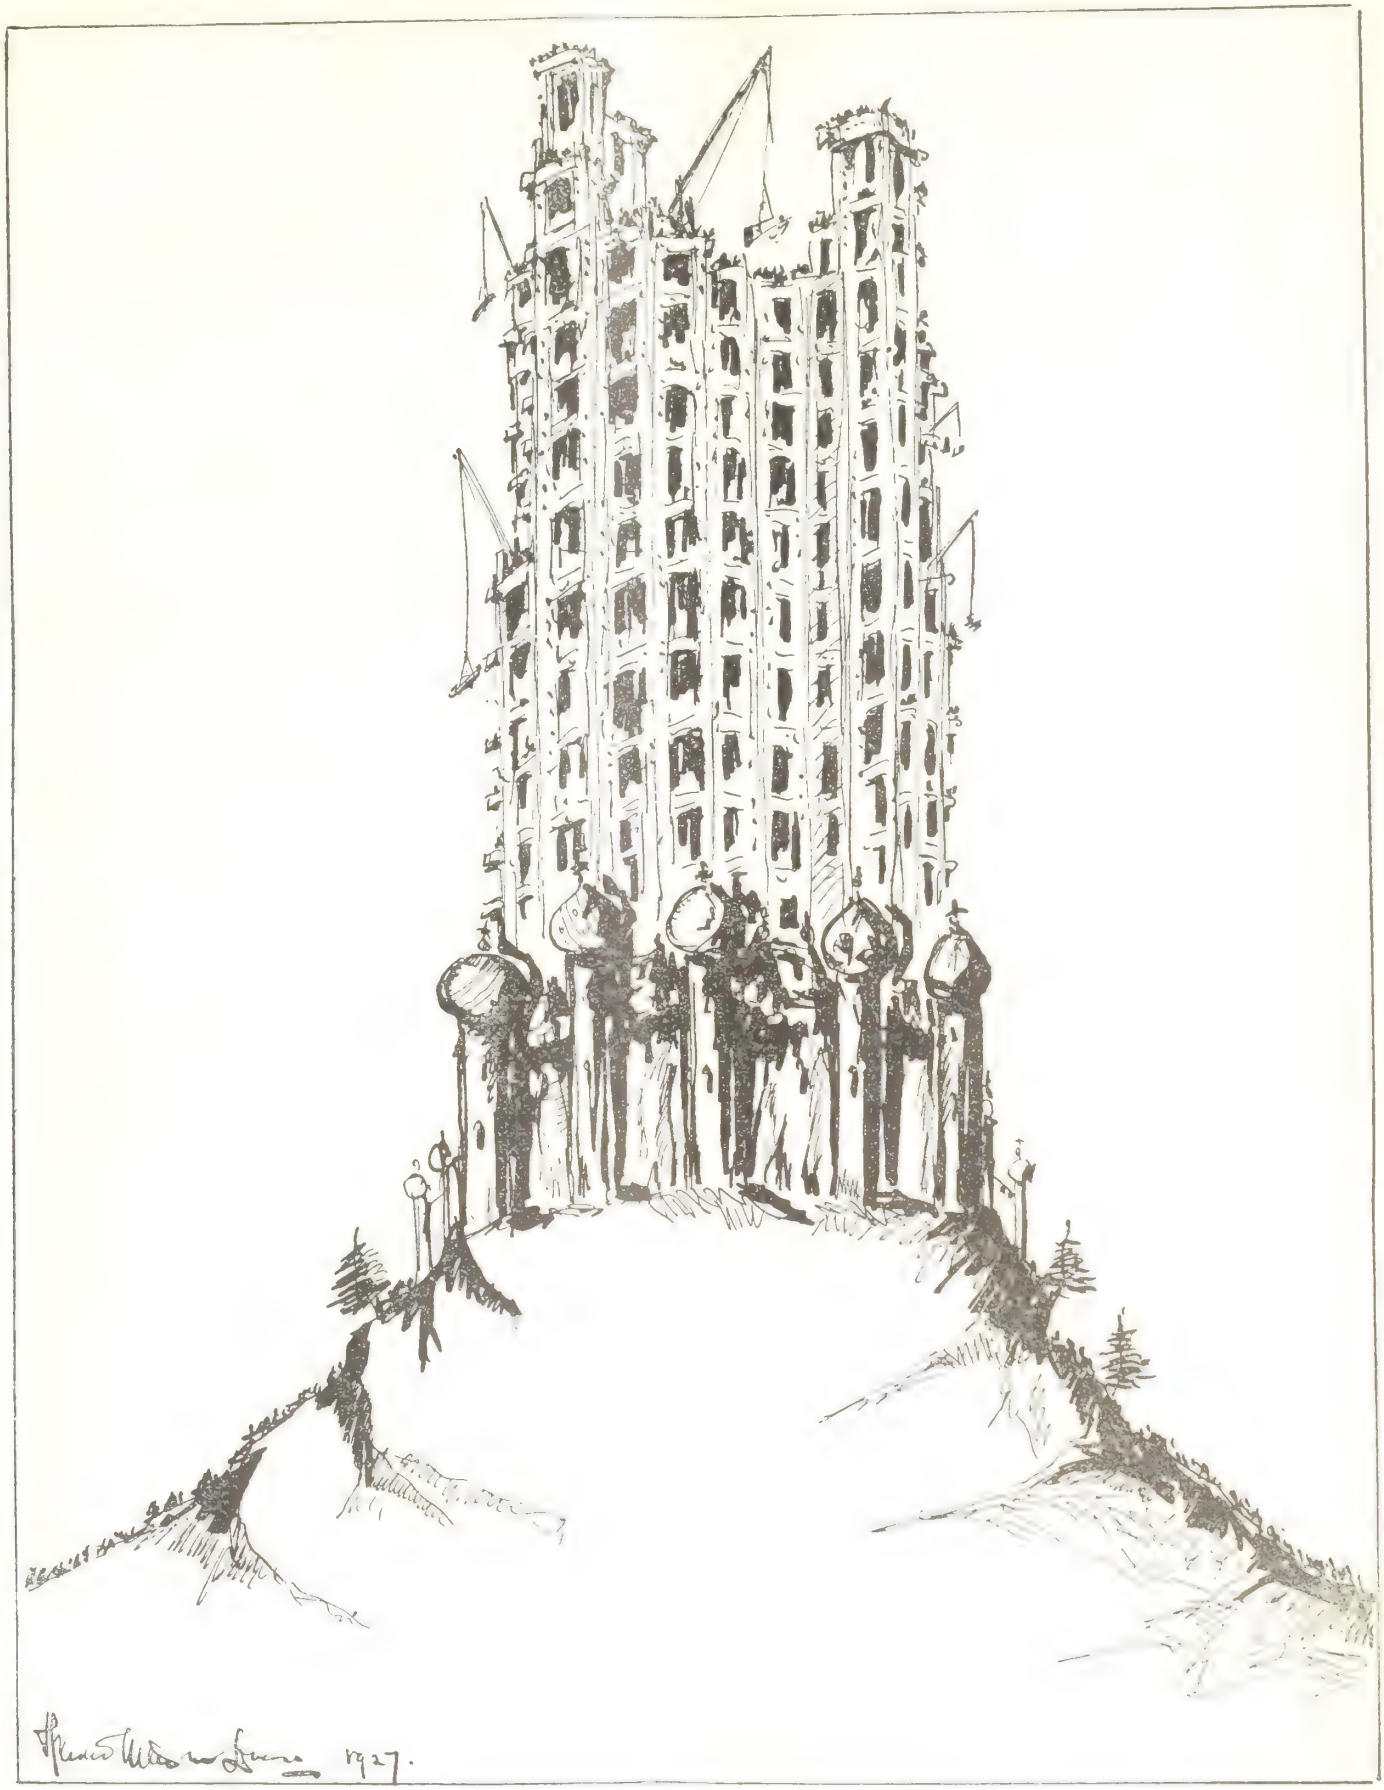
This is a wretched way to get money for the production and distribution of education. But it is the way in which it is done in the present commercial-industrial civilization. Such articles as the one we have quoted, together perhaps with more brazen and unremitting money-begging, must be trusted to carry the women's colleges along until a better day. The time will come when sex divisions in education will be wiped out, when there will be no separate men's and women's institutions scrambling and bidding against each other for money and teachers, and when the state will assume the responsibility for the higher as well as the lower education of its children.

The Inoffensive Art

OF all the radicals in the various arts the modern painter would seem to be the least offensive. He makes no demands upon the time of his fellow-citizens, as do the poets, nor drills upon their ears, like modernist musicians. It is the work of a moment to ignore a picture, but this the conservatives cannot do. An academician will press and prattle round a picture which annoys him much after the manner of a sufferer from toothache. For him the new art aches and lingers.

John Kane, aged sixty, sent a picture to Carnegie Institute, and the judges hung it. Mr. Kane works by day at the trade of house-painting and in the evening adventures into more creative effort. It was in late hours that he did his "Scene from Scottish Highlands." Here is a legitimately romantic story. Many will feel that it is just as exciting to have a first picture accepted in a show as to drop in the Atlantic Ocean, but the newspapers have been less friendly to John Kane than to the fliers. The New York World refuses to "thrill over the product of sheer ineptitude." It "asks to be excused from taking it seriously." The newspaper admits that its criticism is based only on a photographic reproduction. There is a grudging reference to the potential "charm of color," but though a competent committee judged the Scotch scene worthy, the editorial critic refuses his sanction. He bridles at the conception of "Art, that shy and fickle jade, going off on a joy-ride on a kiddie-kar."

By now there is a considerable public willing to admit that no one right way exists to tell a story or to compose an opera. The old bitterness about free verse has ended. Painting remains the last barricade of the Bourbons who stand in solid, shining ranks all armed with mirrors which they hold up to nature. Only God and the literalists can make a tree. It is hard to understand just who has been injured by John Kane's journey to the Highlands. He has not swaggered, nor has his picture. The World may hold, if it chooses, to another Scotland. Mr. Kane has merely taken a tiny corner from that land for his own. Perhaps it is not a good picture, but there is something gallant in this glorified busman's holiday. The man who paints a house and then, at the age of sixty, a picture deserves to be taken not only seriously but in kindly fashion. If it is hard to think of Art off on a joy-ride then most of the prevalent thinking about Art must be muddle-headed. Where would Art be except careering and careening? "Montessori Art," the World calls it, but as a matter of fact there is no other sort worth cherishing. By all means let John Kane continue to go as he pleases with a full brush and a merry one.



Building a New Russia

We may not always like these modern styles of architecture, but nobody can deny that they are interesting and impressive.

It Seems To Heywood Broun

A CITIZEN of Fort Madison, Iowa, has been chosen by the American Magazine as the average man and he has not sued for libel. Perhaps it is too much to expect an average man to resent the accusation and to say "When you call me that, smile." Indeed the whole tone of the article suggests that Roy L. Gray is honored by the selection and that he should be. Still I wonder whether the editor of the American Magazine would be pleased to have his publication referred to as an average magazine.

In order to determine whether the Life Force should bestir itself to produce more Mr. Grays it might be well to run briefly through the creed and practices of this average citizen. He owns and runs a retail clothing store and lives in a brick house with his wife and two children. He is not interested in foreign affairs. "I reason that we've sent folks to Washington to attend to these matters for us." Mr. Gray does not always agree with the men who conduct the government but feels that they always "do their best." Concerning prohibition he believes that there is much to be said on both sides. In national politics Roy Gray is regular on the theory that he has no way of knowing the candidates, and "the best I can do is to stick to the party which most appeals to me and trust it to pick the best man available." To him the evolution trial in Tennessee was merely funny and "a lot of noise over nothing." He sticks to the religion he was taught as a boy. "I don't question it." Books are not in the life of Mr. Gray but he subscribes to several magazines. "I turn first of all to the advertisements."

He sees no plays, but occasionally goes to a picture if he has been told that it is clean. "I have no use at all for this sex stuff." His news interests are inventions, great disasters, and unusual crimes. For a time radio constituted a field in which Mr. Gray employed his own initiative and exercised the right of choice. He used to "fish around" but this dissipation of aerial adventuring has been abandoned. "Now I tune in on the stations that I know have good programs and stick to them." Mr. Gray is a member of the Chamber of Commerce, the Elks, the Odd Fellows, and the Rotary Club. According to William S. Dutton, who tracked down the average man in his lair and wrote about him, "He is a little of all of us—and much of some of us. A dependable man! A steady, sane, conservative man!"

But I want to know just who and what can depend safely and sanely upon Mr. Gray. Is he a bulwark or a menace? He may be a little brother to the editor of the American Magazine, but he's no little brother to me. I do not think it is sane to stick to a political party through thick and thin and to assume that everybody in office does his best and may be depended upon without question. Roy L. Gray is forty-three and should be able to remember that there was a war. That was a war which came out of the American disposition to have no interest in foreign affairs and to let "the folks in Washington attend to these matters." It was a long way from Tipperary to Fort Madison but the war did come to Iowa. God in His mercy help the nation if we must depend upon men who learned no lesson from that conflict. Mr. Gray does not seem to go in heavily for opinions. He accepts his government, his radio, and his religion as they are handed to him without question. Maybe this is sanity, but I should call it not quite bright.

In these days of syndicated editorials and magazines for millions there has been a considerable tendency to slap the average man, any average man, on the back and to tell him that he is the backbone of the country and more than that, of the human race. And, of course, he isn't. Undeniably he has his moments of grandeur upon the barricades, but not until somebody, who isn't average, hands him a slogan, a flag, or a white cockade. The trouble with the average man is that he does not retain. Having fought nobly to right some grievous wrong, he forgets and in ten years the thing has to be done all over again. The notion that America was preserved and founded by the might of the average man is wholly erroneous. All the trails were blazed by exceptional people. Practically every national crisis has found its genius. Of late there has been a disposition to write about Lincoln as if he were "just folks." We have comforted ourselves with the notion that he was merely one of many tall stalks in the prairie. Nobody has blasphemed to the extent of suggesting that Lincoln was the average American, but some have had the audacity to call him a typical American. Well, rails have been lying about for more than half a century for other men to split and there has not been one man to stand back to back with Abraham. He was by every biological standard a sport, and it seems likely that people may go on until the end of time being born in log cabins without a Gettysburg address coming from one of them.

If life is an experimental process and Somebody with enthusiasm and curiosity putters over the test tubes then the advent of the average man must be to Him the greatest of calamities. Even the outcropping of degeneracy is more useful for the future of the race. A slump in the scale contributes its cosmic knowledge because it shows just which factors will not work and must be eliminated from the next equation. Since this is not the best of all possible worlds there is no symphonic glory in merely holding your own. Anything average may be set down as belonging to that dull part of the orchestration which is indicated as "vamp till ready."

Average poetry or gallantry or even average eggs are not exciting. But man, when carefully inspected, does not fit into any crate. It seems likely that injustice was done to Roy L. Gray, the average man from Fort Madison, Iowa. There must have been reticences into which the interviewer did not penetrate. Depend upon it, this sane, solid man has somewhere in reserve an identifying birthmark, a secret and peculiar virtue. And if not, let us still give Mr. Gray the benefit of the doubt and in all charity assume that there is in him, hidden, some vice the American Magazine neglected to discover.

SOVIET RUSSIA—1917-1927

On the Road to Socialism

By LOUIS FISCHER

Moscow, October 3

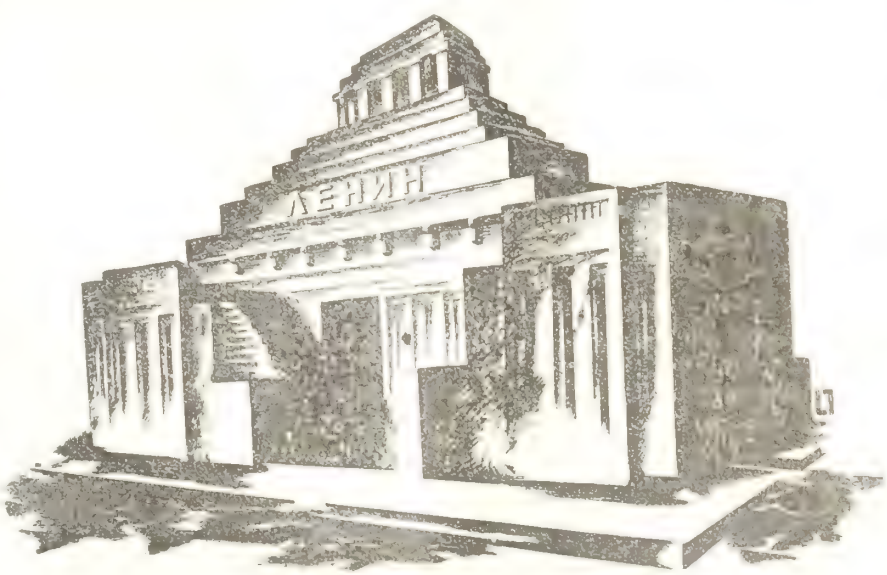
IT was interesting this summer to watch the tourists come and go. Students, professors, writers, and labor leaders tried, with varying success, to fathom the intricacies of Soviet affairs and left at least a bit more "pink" than they had been when they arrived. There were few exceptions. Hard-boiled business men, too, carried away favorable impressions. Some even grew enthusiastic about present performances and future possibilities. The essential reason is Russia's obvious economic progress.

A decade of Soviet rule may be roughly divided into two quintennials: 1917 to 1922—conquest of power, civil war, economic destruction, and preparation for economic reconstruction; 1923 to 1927—economic rehabilitation and the beginning of improvement over the pre-war past. I have been able to watch events during the latter period and I know with what exhilaration and vigor the creative forces let loose by the Bolsheviks can infect one. If the outsider feels this, how much more the man in daily, intimate contact with the remolding of the life of a nation. To grasp this truth is to understand the sources of the enthusiasm, optimism, and confidence with which the Communists have faced innumerable heart-breaking tasks—and won. But there are greater possibilities ahead, for the Russians have been sharpening their tools and removing incumbrances from the field of action. This tenth anniversary is the dawn of a new phase promising attainments hitherto unknown to Russia. The Bolsheviks and the millions who with them hold the rifle and the trowel pause for a brief moment to rejoice and to laugh at the prophets of evil who still sip drinks in Paris cafes.

The material prosperity of this country is undeniable. Here are some indices jotted down at random: better-dressed people in Moscow, Leningrad, and the provinces; more taxis and more citizens riding in them; more restaurants, ice-cream parlors, and cafes, and more patrons in them; more buses with more passengers who can afford to pay the extra kopecks for the extra speed and comfort; new homes built cooperatively by workers and state officials; new office-buildings, better-paved streets and walks, cleaner, brighter-looking children, more pay-station telephones, more spending of money at railway stations during train-stops, more travelers to trade-union and government summer sanatoria; the appearance of bicycles owned by students, young workers, and petty government employees.

Some would add more unemployment, more beggars. Quite correct. There are more unemployed, but more employed, too. The number of trade-union workers is growing and also the number of individuals gainfully employed. Unemployment in Russia is no sign of shrinking productive possibilities but rather the result of peasant migration to the cities and the discarding of excess personnel through "rationalization." The Bolsheviks are meeting these phenomena by rural colonization and technical training for the unskilled. Beggars: they are a public nuisance. They concentrate in central streets, especially those frequented by foreigners, and in stations. Some one has suggested that more people ask alms because there are more people who can give them. I do not know. But at worst there are a few thousand beggars in Russia; they weigh as nothing against indices of prosperity which apply to millions of inhabitants.

What of the bezprizorni, the tens of thousands of homeless, Bedouin waifs scattered over the face of the Soviet Union? Stanley Baldwin referred to them in a recent speech. . . . I went to the dog show yesterday (an exhibit, incidentally, not of lap-hounds, but of sheep and police and proletarian, working dogs). At the merry-go-round nearby, bezprizorni were pushing copper kopecks across the counter for entrance tickets. They have money. I noticed, too, that their rags were less shabby. But the waifs are a terrible cancer on the body of Russia, a wound left by ten years of world war, civil war, foreign intervention, and famine. The Government and voluntary organizations are spending huge sums for the creation of colonies and farms for the bezprizorni. They are sent to villages to work, and to schools, but much of the difficulty remains.



Lenin's Mausoleum at Moscow

What the eye tells one of the general material well-being, the statistician confirms. The wealth and income of the country are increasing, witness the comparative ease with which successive internal loans are absorbed by the mass of the people, and the steady rise in savings accounts. The buying capacity of the peasant expands because he grows more, gets more for his surplus, and, this year, pays less for manufactured goods. Workers' real wages average 100 per cent pre-war plus about 32 per cent additional in insurance, vacations, social and cultural benefits, and funds for improvement of living conditions. Moreover, salaries of state employees have risen—for a six-hour day. According to official figures, the income of the entire population, peasants included, went up 28.5 per cent in 1925-1926 and showed a 10.3 per cent increase in 1926-1927; for wage earners only the corresponding figures are 49.1 and 18.1.

But after all, 1913 represents no ideal. The Bolsheviks plan to leave the antebellum norm far behind them. Russia was and is a poor country. Its annual income could be trebled without straining the natural possibilities of the country. Wages are relatively low, teachers are underpaid, and the general standard of living must be lifted high above it's present level. The Bolshevik goal is a socialist Russia as rich as but quite different from America. They insist that their methods and form of organization will enable them to do quickly what for capitalist Europe is impossible.

The volume of industrial products now exceeds the pre-war figure. Taking 100 as representing 1913, coal output was 105 in 1926-1927, oil output 109.7, textiles 109.6, pig iron 70.5, metal production 76.3, freight loadings 99.1, the number of horses 82, cows, 112.7, oxen 118.5, horned cattle 106.3, and acreage planted 97.1.

Much remains to be done. Retail prices throughout the Union were cut from 8 to 10 per cent during the first ten months of 1926-1927, but they are still too high. Despite considerable reduction of staffs and the elimination of preposterous red tape, bureaucratism flourishes and presents a moral as well as an economic problem with which the authorities are grappling with insufficient success. Above all, the cost of industrial production is excessive. This is the most difficult nut the Bolsheviks have to crack. Instead of carrying out the government program of decreasing costs by 5 per cent, costs increased 1.2 per cent in the first half of the current fiscal year. In the second semester a change for the better intervened which will bring down the costs for the entire year by 2 per cent. This, however, is very little.

Have not the successes of the last five years, some may inquire, been achieved despite the Bolsheviks, or at least, without their assistance? No. That tiny portion of industrial activity not in the hands of the government is closely regulated by it through direct control and taxation. The state's price policy in the collection of farm surpluses not only determines roughly the area sown but also the character of the crops and, occasionally, even their quality. Distribution is either a state or cooperative function, or a private business harassed and restricted by the Government. The economic system here is highly organized and centralized and the Communists have their whole hand in every pie.

But is this socialism, or communism? Is it not true that in the tenth year of the revolution Moscow is further away from socialism than ever before, and that the retreat is still progressing? Are not the attainments of the last five years explained by the adoption of capitalist methods?

For two years the majority of the Communist Party and the Trotzky Opposition have been debating these questions. The former say Russia has socialism; the latter, state capitalism. Land, natural resources, forests, railroads, all banks, and between 85 and 95 per cent of all industry are in the hands of the state. Foreign trade is a government monopoly. A small fraction of industry, petty artisans, part of domestic merchandising, and, most important, agriculture, remain. Cooperatives and the state do more trading than private merchants. In the cities, the Socialist elements far outdistance the private-capitalistic. In the villages, the exact opposite prevails. The mujik, though he does not own his holding, is still a small-scale capitalist.

The relationship between the socialistic and the capitalistic factors in economic life, however, is not static. In 1924-1925, 29.5 per cent of the entire production of the country came from socialized enterprises; in the coming year it will be 39.8 per cent. The 25,000,000 peasant households in the Soviet Union still account for the bulk of the nation's products, but they are losing ground. Moreover, the private merchant is slowly being ejected from the scene by state and cooperative stores. It is significant, too, that the socialized trading institutions have succeeded in gaining more than majority control of grain collection, the largest single economic activity in the country. Private industry is likewise collapsing. In 1925-1926 it employed 41,682 workers (against several million in government plants); in the first quarter of the current year 31,033, and in the second quarter 25,715.

The explanation of the more rapid growth of the socialized elements in the national economy as compared to the capitalistic lies in the heavy investments of fresh capital which the former have been able to make. The Government, in the last three years, has spent upward of five billion rubles for the development of socialized producing and distributing agencies. The peasants and the urban private-business community of course had far less money at their disposal. The rate of growth in agriculture and in other capitalistic forms has therefore lagged behind that of socialized activities. In the coming year, 3,350,000,000 rubles will be added to the funds of the socialized sector of the country's economy—for industry, transport, electrification, cooperatives, housing, and city building.

These figures promise gigantic achievements in the industrialization and modernization of Soviet Russia. The city will soon become all but perfectly socialized. In the country there will be socialized finance, transport, and, in large part, trade. Capitalistic agriculture, and the problem of the peasants, remain.

The Bolsheviks, accordingly, are definitely not returning to private capitalism. They are drawing further away from it. Their system is not communism, but it is not the capitalism of the Western world.

The most socialistic feature of the economic system in the Soviet Union, and the one least known abroad, is state planning. The ideal of socialism is an ordered, correlated economy free from wasteful competition and duplication. The State Planning Commission serves this purpose and much of the loss suffered by the country by reason of lack of capital, lack of experience, mistaken experiments, etc., has been balanced by the gain through planning. Capitalist production is anarchistic; bolshevism is a mortal enemy of anarchy. The State Planning Commission or Gosplan is a romance in itself. There is no more important institution in Moscow.

Whatever this system is called—socialism or state capitalism—it has certainly passed the stage of an experiment. Changes there probably will be, but the Bolsheviks feel that their method will lead Russia quickest up the lane of economic progress.

Soviet Achievements in Public Education

By N. KRUPSKAYA

WE are beginning on the eve of our tenth anniversary to forget the "good old times" when the landowners and capitalists were the masters and the Czar's government did all in its power to keep the people in ignorance. We are beginning to forget what our schools used to be before the revolution. The country was largely illiterate. The public school was under the strict surveillance of the priest, the tight-fisted rich peasant, and the policeman. The teacher was always under suspicion. Prayers and religious instruction filled most of the school-time. Icons were the principal equipment. All the textbooks were permeated with a spirit of bigotry. Histories were written in servile loyalty to the authorities. Discussion of the realities of life was taboo. Nature-study was viewed with suspicion.

Half the population of the Russian Empire consisted of non-Russian nationalities who often had no knowledge of Russian at all. The Czar's government assumed the task of "Russifying" these nationalities. Many of the Oriental nationalities were without a script of their own. There was no literature or periodicals printed in the languages of the national minorities. No school was conducted in any language except Russian.

Minister of Education Delyanov plainly stated that the "middle" or secondary school was not for the "cook's children," but only the lower school. The middle school was turning out mainly law-abiding functionaries. The prevalent type of middle school was the classical gymnasium which prepared its students for the university. The principal subjects in the gymnasium were Latin and Greek and the history of the czars. Conditions were somewhat better in the so-called Realschule, but also there abstract academic instruction prevailed. The landed nobility and the rich educated their children in the institutes for young girls of quality or in private gymnasia, in military academies, law schools, or lyceums. The Ministry of Education took little interest in adult education, and was concerned mainly with surveillance over schools for adults—in forbidding Sunday schools, closing schools because they overstepped the limit and taught fractions whereas the adult workers were allowed to go only as far as the four basic operations in arithmetic. The government persecuted the instructors of Sunday schools, disrupted literacy committees, kept out of the public libraries even the works of Nekrasov, Tolstoi, Gorki, Korolenko, and closed libraries without explanation.

After the October Revolution the intelligentsia, including a large portion of the teachers throughout the country, at first did not realize the full meaning of the change. The more aristocratic among the teachers at first boycotted the Soviet Government. When the Commissar of Public Education, A. Lunacharsky, came with his assistant to the Ministry of Education, he found the institution deserted except for the technical staff. The boycott did not last long. It quickly dissipated under the pressure of the liberated masses, but the schools and the extra-scholastic education had to be rebuilt.

The first decrees of the Council of People's Commissaries separated the school from the church, removed the clergy from the school administrations, and placed the religious, parochial, and missionary schools under the authority of the People's Commissariat of Education. The office of religious instructor was abolished for all denominations and the teaching of religion or the performance of religious rites in the schools was forbidden. To this change there was no resistance on the part of the population.

The above-mentioned decrees could not be carried out with the old textbooks, permeated with the spirit of religion and the church. Even the better textbooks in the elementary schools were irreconcilably at odds with the spirit of the new decrees, and when the new system of simplified spelling was introduced, the old textbooks were still less acceptable. It required an enormous amount of work to prepare and publish new textbooks. Coeducation was decreed in May, 1918. The reform included all grades and types of schools and met with no resistance anywhere.

In October, 1918, decrees were adopted encouraging the non-Russian nationalities to organize schools conducted in their own languages. This decree gave tremendous impetus to the cultural development of the various national minorities. Thus, for instance, under the Czar's government there were in Tartaria (former province of Kazan) only thirty-nine schools open to Tartar children and instruction was conducted only in Russian. In the Crimea there were only eleven such schools for Tartars. Under the Soviet rule Tartaria now has 1,500 schools and the Crimea 350, with instruction in the native language. The Karelians, a people living on the Finnish border, once sent a delegation to the governor of Olonetsk requesting permission to open a school with instruction in the native language; the governor considered this petition nothing short of mutiny and ordered the delegation arrested. Now the Karelian Republic has 450 schools in the native language, seventy-one reading huts, and 227 reading circles.

In 1918 the system of unified work schools was introduced. These schools are divided into two grades embracing the ages from 8 to 17. So far they are too few to meet the needs of the entire population. Therefore in the second-grade schools preference is given to children of workers and to non-propertied and small-propertied peasants. It is but natural that the Soviet Government should take care of the laboring population first. The same principle governs the admission to the higher educational institutions. Children of workers, farm-hands, and poor peasants get the preference.

One of the first circulars (December, 1917) of the Commissariat of Public Education recognized the principle that pre-school education must be considered as an integral part of the school system. This work is closely connected with the work of promoting public health and expresses itself, among other things, in safeguards for mothers and infants, in the establishment of nurseries and consulting stations where mothers are taught how to care for their babies. In Czarist Russia half of the children died before the age of five. Even in such cities as Moscow and St. Petersburg infant mortality in 1913 was as high as 26 per cent. Now infant mortality in Leningrad is 13.8 per cent and in Moscow 13.3 per cent.

With the rise in the general culture of the population

there has been a corresponding growth in child-care. The number of nurseries is steadily increasing. Before the revolution these were rare. In 1923 we had only 475 nurseries, but in 1926 the number increased to 4,101. Prior to the October Revolution the rural population had no idea of what a nursery meant, and in 1918 the peasants of the middle Volga regions were still bringing their petitions to the propaganda steamer Red Star imploring the authorities not to put their infants into the nurseries. Now this ignorance is no longer in evidence. In the rural communities there are at present about 10,000 nurseries for mother and child, and in many instances the peasants have volunteered to participate in communal plowings as a means of raising a nursery fund. In the textile regions all of the factories have nurseries. But even there the facilities are inadequate to take care of all infants. The work in this direction must be extended a great deal.

In addition to the above-mentioned types of pre-school institutions there has been a marked increase in the number of so-called "platforms," outdoor places equipped for the care of pre-school children during the summer months. The number of these platforms has been increasing rapidly. In 1924 there were only 300 of them, in 1925, 1,500, and in 1926, 3,000. These summer stations have been established not only in the Russian regions but also among the non-Russian nationalities. In a number of provinces the child-platforms have been turned into permanent kindergartens.

Simultaneously with the development of pre-school education there has been opened another new avenue of enlightenment—the extra-scholastic education for adults. A special department was organized under the Commissariat of Education to direct this work. Later it was renamed the Department of Political Education. The local subdivisions of this department are working hard toward the eradication of illiteracy. Upward of five million adults have gone through the "liquidation points," as these schools for abolishing illiteracy are called. In the towns and villages there are many schools for semi-literate and literate adults as well as courses for peasants, workers' universities, and party schools.

The book is more and more recognized as a carrier of education to distant places. The reading huts and traveling libraries are carrying on an extensive cultural work. Club activities are promoted. The work is conducted with the active participation of the population itself. It is here that one particularly realizes the growth of the new mass culture. The ever-growing number and variety of periodicals, the introduction of radio and the traveling cinemas have enormously widened the range of political education.

The Red Army is an important center for disseminating culture. Those who enter the Red Army receive, besides purely military instruction, a good general education. There are 1,509 libraries in the Red Army, 719 clubs, 47,000 reading circles. Political instruction is offered daily. After he leaves the Red Army, the soldier becomes a carrier of culture, bringing to his village enthusiasm for knowledge, the habit of reading newspapers, eagerness to raise the cultural level of the village.

In the first year of its existence the Soviet Government indicated the main course of the work on behalf of popular education. The next step was to mobilize the teachers. At first, as has been said, only a few teachers followed the lead of the Government, but gradually the teachers of the lower strata, from among the masses, drew closer to the Soviets. These teachers began to realize that the Soviet Government was affording them an opportunity to do creative work in raising the new generation destined to complete the task of the October Revolution. In the years that followed there has been steady improvement in the type of the new teacher for the new school. The teacher now is a mature person, a Red Soviet educator, standing close to the masses of the population.

The October Revolution separated the school from the church and removed the clergy from the school administration. This has been an easy task compared to the one of inculcating a sound materialist conception of life. The problem has been solved thus:

The core of the curriculum is the productive activity of mankind and its various forms of organization, viewed in a historical cross-section. Nature study, occupying a prominent place in the Soviet school, illumines the material basis for the growth of one form of productive activity or another, and shows how the economic mode of living at a given time and place determines the forms and relationships of social life, thereby revealing the connection between politics and economics. In the curricula all this is, of course, treated in the simplest possible form. The relations between nature, productive activity, and social order are explained on the basis of concrete facts and observations.

The curricula include matters that are vital to the population of any given section and are of immediate and natural interest to the child. Still another peculiarity of the curricula is their linking of the given subject with practical work in the school and the home. The school-children help in carrying out the programs of pre-school education, in organizing the children within and without the school, in teaching and serving the illiterate adults, circulating newspapers, sanitation work, popularizing new methods of farming and tending cattle. They cultivate the school gardens and farms, they form flower-cooperatives, school-cooperatives, etc.

Our schools are essentially vocational and adapted to the needs and interests of the working masses. But our material conditions are poor. We still have schools working in three shifts; the lack of buildings and equipment hinders in the establishment of workshops.

The relationship between the school and its teacher is interesting. Corporal punishment is forbidden. Coarse treatment of the children calls forth protest on the part of the children and the population. Discipline in the school aims to develop in the child an inner sense of discipline, based on a realization of its importance. To this end complete self-government has been instituted in the schools.

Our schools are in living contact with the population they serve. School exhibitions for parents are common and regular occurrences. There are also report-meetings where the children tell their parents of the work done at school. The local Soviets and their subdivisions, the delegates to the women's sections, the branches of the Comsomol (Communist League of Youth)—all are interested in the school. In the factories and at the village meetings school matters are frequently discussed. Interest in the problems of school and education is ever increasing among the population. With rapid strides we are coming abreast of other peoples, at the same time creating something new, a new culture which in its culmination will be broad and profound and permeated with the spirit of Marxism and Leninism.

All Over the Soviet Land

By ALBERT RHYS WILLIAMS

FOUR years ago I went out to live among the people of the steppes and forests and villages of Russia.

My first guide was Yarkov, the singing peasant of Bronitz, who fifteen years ago was cursed as Antichrist by his fellow-villagers for proposing the rotation of crops. Then with Dmitriev I went out to the villages of Vladimir, swinging the scythe with the mowers in the river meadows, cracking the long whips with the cowherds behind the cattle, circling the fields with the women carrying the ikons to save the crops from insects.

With the People's Judge Khonin, I journeyed out to the Old Believers' villages in Saratov, dealing with horse-thieves, moonshiners, and village hooligans. All day long in the hall, holding regular court. Then in the izba of our peasant host, holding samovar court till midnight, the judge giving counsel and advice to all comers, reconciling hastily marrying and hastily repenting youths, hot-tempered sons with despotic fathers.

Burenkov was my guide into the village made famous by Gogol. Some forty delightful evenings I passed in the khutors near Dikanka and in the village itself: evenings luminous with Ukrainian moonlight and vibrant with the balalaika and the peasant choruses; out under the great oak where Mazepa declared his love to Maria; or roaming through the ruins of the old Kochuby estate with peasants telling how they burned the palace and why; and finally an "Octobering" evening in the Soviet hall where I stood up in an Ukrainian costume as the Red godfather for two Dikanka babies dedicated to the revolution. And their names were Engels and Profinterna (Trade Union International). Then into the village made famous by Tolstoi, where the old peasants discussed Leo Nikolaevich as a plowman, friend, and philosopher.

With Yesenin, the poet, I drove out some forty versts from Kirmy to see the chief peasant of the Soviet Union, that mujik of Tver, known to all the world. We found him flat on his back under a threshing machine, mending a broken wheel. Neither Russian poet nor American journalist could drag him away from his job until he had finished it. After that Kalinin was amiable enough. For work he took us mushroom gathering in the forest. For dinner he gave us each a wooden spoon to dip together from the common bowl. For a bed, a place in his fragrant hay-mow. For recreation he drove us over to holiday in a neighbor village. It was a question who was the happiest, Yesenin chanting his poems aloud to the peasants, or the peasants listening and applauding, or Kalinin passing his criticism on poets and literature in general.

The Tartar Gubaidulin was my guide into the villages around Kazan where the Azanche still cries to Allah from the minarets of the mosques and the sons of the Azanche sing Communist couplets through the streets.

Poor Peasant House

It is pleasant to have guides and fellow-travelers. But for direct unimpeded contact one must go it alone. So I traveled third-class on little steamers down the winding Moscow, the Okla, and the northern Dvina, and in big steamers on the Volga and Dnieper. Everywhere I found the peasants ready to talk freely, even though I was a foreigner. When a man carries a tea-kettle, smokes makhorka, and takes his fleas and cockroaches philosophically, they count him straightway as one of their own and press him to join them in their travels or come with them to their villages.

Thus on the Pinega, five hundred versts from Archangel, I fell in with the woodsmen poling their boats up-river into the heart of the northern forest. Three weeks I spent with them in the land of bears, wild swans, and monstrous mosquitoes. The peasants of Popovka insisted that I should celebrate with them the ancient pagan holiday of Maslenitza. A parade of three hundred horses decked with ribbons, the straw effigies of the old Slavic gods hung up at the end of the street, and a smashing wall-on-wall fight between the two ends of the village with victory for the lower end—an auspicious omen for a good harvest.

Then in Alekseevka the triumph session of the Soviet which declared the old three-field "grandfather" system of agriculture dead and decreed the nine-field system for the future.

Thus following the lead of chance acquaintance, I sojourned in, perhaps, a hundred villages of central and northern Russia, and when my eyes wearied of the plains I turned south to the Caucasus, "the stone girdle of the globe." On foot over the Georgian Military Road, bathing in the Narzan pool from the bubbling spring on the crest, following the shepherds with their flocks up into the mountain meadows; then into Kaketia, the valley of wine, where the over-hospitable natives sought to drown me in red and purple floods.

A coasting steamer carried me along the Black Sea to the Crimea, and from Yalta I followed the bandit-infested highway that zigzags up past Ai-Petri. Happily, Abdullah, my chance companion, had the best of bandit connections, and so we came safely to Bakchesarai and Sebastopol. From there again into the Ukraine; a year and a half in the Chuvash, Mordvian, and Russian settlements along the Volga; and six months in a village near Moscow.

In these five years I have seen great changes in the life of the masses.

First, a general rise in their material welfare.

I came in the wake of the famine, when the land was still in the throes of poverty and epidemics. Now I have seen the harvest return to the Volga Basin. Into Kvalinsk, the worst of the hunger-scourged volosts, I have seen wheat come pouring down in long files of creaking wagons and in camel caravans from across the steppe. In big streams it pours into granaries and barges and into the mills, grinding away day and night. It pours life into the veins of the state, loosing the tides of trade and commerce. It pours laughter and song into the peasant masses crowding into the bazaar. It sets the forges glowing and the anvils ringing and brings tractors and machines into the villages. Except for a few nailed-up izbas, whose owners never returned from their long pilgrimage after bread, and the glistening white trunks of the willows peeled of their bark for food, no sign remains of the holocaust that reigned here a few years ago.

Not everywhere is the change in the well-being of the peasant so marked, but all over the Soviet land it is steadily improving. Not only did the peasant receive tens of millions of dessiatines from the revolution, but these were the best lands, the fertile fields and meadows of the landlords, giving him the foundation for the creation of a fairer standard of life. The peasant is still poor. But along with black bread and cabbage soup he is now eating the butter and eggs he formerly sold in the market. He still lives in a log-hut, but the new ones he builds are bigger and have more window space. "We want to live in the light," he says.

No longer are there complaints about the "cursed wantlessness" of the mujik. Content no longer with the mere necessities of life, he is demanding its comforts and amenities—demanding them insistently in keeping with his new evaluation of himself.

In every peasant can be seen the growth in consciousness of himself as a citizen and a man. Didn't he realize his dreams of centuries in wresting the soil from the landlord? Didn't he defend it from invading armies on seventeen fronts? Hasn't he forced radical changes in Soviet policies? No longer a pawn or puppet in the hands of an inscrutable force to which he must helplessly submit, he feels himself master of his destiny, the maker of history.

Last winter with a commissar I made a sleigh journey across the steppe of Saratov. Our road—a narrow track cutting through the deep snow-fields. Our old yemshik in as fine fettle as the blooded horse he was driving, and a bit arrogant. This was like the days of old when he drove the landlord and the peasant sledges hastened to give him the right of way. Now a sledge was coming head on and our yemshik, cracking his whip and rising grandly on his box, cried out:

"Ho there, mujik! Off the road! Don't you see I'm driving a commissar?"

"Commissar, eh?" jeered the mujik. "He's not a czar, is he? If we made the Czar get off the road, we can make a commissar!"

Threats and curses from our yemshik, but to no avail. Then he changed his tone to one of entreaty and persuasion.

"But, tovarish, don't you see it's a town horse I'm driving? A two-year-old and afraid of the deep snow?"

"Now, little dove," said the mujik, smiling amiably, "you talk sensibly. After all the revolution did let some light into your thick head." And turning his sledge into the deep snow he gave us the road.

More marked than the peasant's growth in material well-being and self-esteem is his growth in political understanding. A far hark back to the days of those agitators who complained that when the peasants heard of the Constituent Assembly they thought it a new sort of vodka, and the secret Australian ballot some sort of a kangaroo. In the last decade the peasant has received an intensive education in politics and government. Scores of peasant papers have been established and hundreds of ring posts to carry them into remotest districts. Thousands of nardoms (folk-homes) have been erected; and when funds were lacking, two or three sheds, stores, and kulak's houses have been combined for the purpose. Anything for a place of assemblage to give vent to feelings long repressed and now welling up in speech that starts at sundown and lasts till rooster-crow. Millions of meetings, lectures, disputes, debates.

Amazing, this increase in political literacy. Penetrate into the most backward section of Russia—the deaf villages of the North, the mountains of the Caucasus, the far off steppes of the Urals—and with difficulty you will find a group of men who cannot discuss with a degree of intelligence the French debt demands, the encircling tactics of Chamberlain, or the careers of the Chinese generals. There may be peasants who have not heard of Sacco and Vanzetti, but I have not met them.

Criticism of the social order is not limited to the "democratic" system under which various other nations live, or to the monarchist system under which the peasants formerly lived. It is directed quite as mercilessly at the system under which they live today.

Yesterday, around a campfire on the river bank, I took pot-luck with a threshers' artel going home at the end of the season. While we drank our raspberry tea, the "elder," a tall blond lad of twenty-two, discoursed on the principles of the Soviet. Easily, philosophically, he explained that the Soviet is a temporary expedient, that, like other systems, it plays a coercive role, then it passes away to the stateless society in which "we shall be one big family, the workers giving tools and cloth, and we mujiks supplying the workers with bread. And there will be no money. Not hard for us mujiks to get along without money; we never had much, anyhow." He was repeating the theory learned in the winter school of peasant youth in his village sixty versts back from Ryazan.

Needless to say, most discussions of the Soviet system are not carried on in such an abstract, theoretical manner. They concern themselves with practical issues: the tax-levy; the grain loan; the excessive vodka-drinking of the volost secretary; where the judge got his funds for building a new house; the bourgeois traits manifesting themselves in their former fellow-villager, Ivan Petrovich, since his elevation to a post in Moscow.

The peasant accepts the Soviet as an institution in which "he is teaching himself how to rule himself." He well knows its defects and disabilities and comments on them in a language of great strength and variety. This right to curse is for the peasant one of the supreme conquests of the revolution. It rises out of the conviction that this is a government of his own, a government in which he has a part and a say and which he can alter. But let no outsider presume to join the peasant who is criticizing or assailing the Soviet. To his great sorrow he will find that this privilege the peasant jealously reserves for himself.

Liberty Under the Soviets

By ROGER N. BALDWIN

Paris, October 15

I SPENT a little more than two months this summer traveling from the top to the bottom of Russia—from Georgia to Leningrad, through the Crimea and the Ukraine. My inquiries were made with a special eye to Russia's methods of political control and to the kinds and degrees of liberty existing there. Allowance must be made for the fact that I happened to arrive at a time of greater repression and terrorism than has existed since 1921, due to the fear of counter-revolutionary plots following the murder of the Soviet Ambassador at Warsaw and the rupture with Great Britain, with the consequent threat of war. Thousands had been arrested all over Russia. The prisons were crowded. The Government was nervous. The Kremlin in Moscow was closed to all visitors; the Moscow political prisons were closed to all except their inmates; and the high chiefs of the G. P. U. (political police) were inaccessible to all inquirers.

Despite this extraordinary situation I was able to visit a dozen prisons, to discuss freely with officials the issues and the facts, and to talk with many opponents of the Soviet regime, both among the old bourgeoisie and the Anarchists, Socialists, and Tolstoians. Away from Moscow the tension was markedly less. In the villages, which after all constitute most of Russia, there was hardly the slightest reflection of it.

Access to officials and to institutions, save for the exceptions I have noted in Moscow, is easier for a foreigner in Russia than anywhere else in Europe. Contrary to common report, this is true even on the delicate subjects of political prisoners, exiles, and the secret service. Prosecutors, wardens, G.P.U. officials, all talked freely. Some things they frankly refused to tell—the numbers of political prisoners and exiles, the method of executions, and the size of the police and secret service.

My personal bias in approaching repression under the Soviet regime is divided between warm support of the revolution and a Western prejudice in favor of the utmost freedom of opinion consistent with its maintenance—as a basis essential to its further growth. Though there is no such freedom of political opinion in Russia today, it does not follow that Russia is without significant liberties. They do not fit our traditional Western concepts of individual liberty, based historically upon the emergence of private capitalist enterprise; they are group and class liberties within the political structure of the Soviet state. In addition there is a striking freedom of nationalities in their cultural life, of religious organizations (provided they do not mix in politics), and of women in all social relations.

Against these developing class and group freedoms in the Soviet state stands the fact of universal suppression of political opposition—whether from bourgeois counter-revolutionary sources, from the remnants of the old Socialist parties, from the Anarchists, or even from within the Communist Party. The G.P.U. exists to suppress it, doing probably the most effective political police job in the world. But more important than its function is the rigid control exercised over every means of communication throughout the Soviet Union, not only to stifle political opposition but to keep the way clear for the dictatorship's program. The press and all publications, the mails, cinema, radio, and all associations are either Communist-directed or Communist-censored. This censorship remains essentially unchanged on the basis established in 1922. It is more thorough, more frank, more effective than any control in Europe. But it displays an unexpected elasticity and intelligence, though it suffers from the stupidities inherent in all dictatorships.

Leon Trotzky
Leader of the Opposition

There is terrorism in Russia, but it is directed chiefly against a comparatively small class, the old bourgeoisie. They live in constant fear of arrest on the slightest suspicion of political activity. They are discriminated against in every possible way. When, in discussing with a Communist official what seemed to me unnecessary cruelty to an impotent class, I referred to their sense of being terrorized, he said: "Thank God they are!"

The great masses of the Russian people have no such sense. I doubt if one peasant out of ten ever heard of the G.P.U. There is no repression by force in the villages, either against the kulaks (richer peasants) or the priests. There is no forcible repression of any section of the working class, though Anarchists and Socialists among them are sometimes exiled for activity. The G.P.U. is careful not to arouse antagonism among workers or peasants by arresting bona fide producers. Intellectuals or office workers are regarded as another breed. Great surprise was voiced in Russia during the arrests last June because a number of factory workers and peasants had been arrested in the general round-up.

The cries of horror which accompany political executions of bourgeois opponents are all of bourgeois origin. I asked the president of a peasant Soviet—a non-Communist—what he thought of the summary execution of twenty members of the old regime last June. His reply would be echoed by any of the active peasant minority supporting the Soviet regime: "If it is necessary to execute a thousand of them to save the revolution, I would be for it." No peasants or workers have been executed for political reasons since the civil war ended in 1921. Nor have any Socialists or Anarchists, with the sole exception of a few Georgian Socialist-Nationalists.

Real fear of speaking out is limited to the classes definitely opposed to the present regime—the old bourgeois, the old intellectuals, the reactionary priests, the rich peasants who have less land now than before, the traders, and the national-independence advocates in Georgia and the Ukraine. These classes are far less numerous in Russia than the suppressed classes under other dictatorships, and fear is therefore far less general than it is elsewhere in Europe under systems similarly controlled. Nor does the rigid control of means of communication mean the universal imposition of propaganda. Russian habits of discussion and protest, vigorous even under the Czar, together with the stimulus of the new life growing up under the constant encouragement of the Communist Party, go far to offset the evils of regimentation. Indeed, I met everywhere among workers and peasants a spirit of freedom, a released creative force that stands out in contrast to the furtive fear that marks every other dictatorship. There are exceptions, of course, even among workers and peasants, especially where socialism or anarchism had a hold or social religion such as Tolstoi's, a following.

Criticism of the regime is amazingly free, but it is confined to the causes of economic discontent—unemployment, high prices, shortage of goods, and bureaucratism. It does not and cannot attack the dictatorship as such. The Communist regime keeps its ear to the ground, and is constantly endeavoring to meet this discontent. I happened to be present at a meeting of a village Soviet when the tax bills for the year were presented by a messenger from the county seat. They were denounced as iniquitous, and the Government was attacked as a robber of peasants.

There is no sharp dividing line between those who thus may speak their minds and those who are arrested and exiled for their expressed opinions or their activities. Counter-revolution and economic espionage are elastic offenses, and the system of administrative exile allows no real defense to anyone charged with subversive activity. By far the largest number of those exiled or imprisoned are members of the old bourgeoisie, many of them guilty of nothing but being what they are. A sharp distinction is made between them as "counter-revolutionaries" and "political prisoners"—Socialists or Anarchists. The bourgeois counter-revolutionaries convicted in the courts are treated like common criminals, and a few can be found in any Russian prison. But most of the bourgeois and all of the Socialist and Anarchist political prisoners are now dealt with administratively, not by public trial in the courts: they are sent either to one of six special prison colonies, where they get a better regime than in ordinary prisons; or they may be sent into exile in Siberia or Turkestan, or to exile in its lightest form, a prohibition of living in any one of the six largest cities.

This whole system of exile is surrounded with mystery in Russia. It is never mentioned in the press. The Government will not publish the number of persons arrested or exiled. Facts as to the disposition of any particular person are given, but that is all. It is therefore impossible even to estimate fairly how many persons are now in exile. All that it is possible to say is that it runs into thousands and that as between the bourgeois and revolutionary exiles the proportion is about 5 to 1. The number of persons actually sentenced by the courts for political offenses is of course known, but no figures have been compiled. They include some hundreds of the bourgeoisie, a few score of Socialists; no Anarchists.

The pressure on Socialists and Anarchists has lightened somewhat, as the chance for their anti-Soviet activity has decreased. The Anarchists are allowed to maintain a bookstore in Moscow, and occasionally to publish books properly censored. One young Anarchist, arrested in Moscow on the night of the Voikoff murder, told me that he was kept three weeks in prison, apparently for the sole object of persuading him that anarchism and communism had the same ultimate objective and that he ought to support the Soviet regime. When he failed to see the point he was released.

Conditions of the exiles are about the same as under the Czar, for the unique Russian system remains the same. They are sent to very distant places in small villages where work is hard to find, and they get only an allowance of a little more than $3 a month to live on in a land where $3 goes about as far as it does in the United States. They may, of course, receive money or goods from friends and relatives, and their families may accompany them. Although the period of exile is limited by law to three years, that period is commonly renewed without the formality of doing more than change the place of exile.

Conditions in the prisons have undoubtedly improved. Physically they are still very bad, but humanly their administration is an advance on anything I have seen elsewhere. Wardens are practically all former political prisoners who know how prisons should be run. The new penology, taken over by the Soviets from the best ideas of the West, has a real hold, even in the most remote places.

It is not, however, the conditions of prison life which are significant from a political viewpoint, but who is in prison. And that depends largely on the Government's attitude in the international situation. More prisoners are taken in, and of more varied types, whenever the anti-Soviet pressure abroad becomes acute or whenever some internal counter-revolutionary plot arouses fear. At such times, as for instance in June, hundreds on the lists of the G.P.U. are picked up in a hurry, to be examined, and, for the most part, later freed. Of perhaps four or five thousand arrested all over Russia last June, it was estimated that only seven or eight hundred were actually exiled.

The attitude concerning the G. P. U. is everywhere one of reticence—even where it is not feared. It exercises a power all but supreme, checked only by the highest political authority. Even the government chiefs are inclined to defer to its judgment of what constitutes public safety. Its operations are masked in secrecy; it encourages dread by making its arrests late at night; and rumor is the chief reporter of its decisions. Wild stories are constantly afloat about executions, though it is certain that none has taken place without public announcement. There is more reason to believe that some of those announced have not occurred, especially where the G. P. U. has been able to secure a useful agent by sparing a life.

Several hundred religious conscientious objectors are serving sentences for refusal to take military training. The administration of the law has become much narrower since the death of Lenin, who had drafted it on liberal lines. Comparatively few sects are exempted from active service, and none from some form of service. The Tolstoians are the chief sufferers. An interesting commentary on the situation which confronts them developed at a meeting of their society in Moscow at which I spoke. Three of the young men present came up to me afterward, explaining that they were conscientious objectors serving terms in prison, from which they had been released to attend the meeting on their promise to come back in a day or two.

These leaves of absence from prison are one of the characteristic features of the new penology in Russia. But at the same time the secretary and two women assistants were in prison for writing letters to members concerning the military-service law, and next day they were exiled to Siberia. One of the prisoners out on leave went to the station to see them off.

There is talk in Russia about an amnesty on the tenth anniversary of the revolution, but it is hardly possible in the still nervous state of affairs in Russia that any essential change will take place in the control of opposition. The struggle within the Communist Party has doubtless increased the rigors of internal repression. Members of the Opposition have themselves been the objects of G. P. U. surveillance, and in a few cases of arrest. A few expelled Opposition members have suffered exile.

Nor is there any discernible tendency in Russia toward other tempering changes in the universal control of communication. The censorship of books and periodicals has lifted slightly, and out in the republics away from Moscow it is even easy-going. The radio and cinema are on about the same level of control as elsewhere. Incoming foreign news, while controlled by the state telegraph agency, is subject to no more than a casual censorship; and the foreign correspondents in Moscow call the censorship on their dispatches "one of the lightest possible." The censor calls it a control for "accuracy and fairness only." The way it works in matters of opinion was well illustrated by two American journalists this summer. One, who wrote an article on the Red Terror, was asked if he minded putting that phrase in quotation marks; the other, who wrote on the "war danger," was asked if he minded taking off the quotation marks.

Despite this wholesale political control in Russia, the basis of the dictatorship is wider than any in Europe. A comparison of Russia with Italy is ridiculous. The Italian regime is a one-man-and-the-police dictatorship, with the overwhelming mass of Italians against it. The Russian regime is a dictatorship of a whole party and the police, with only a minority against it. It suffers from an inherited system of high-handed political control, and it displays traits of cruelty obviously unnecessary to its security. But it is directed by an amazingly devoted, if somewhat fanatical group, doing the most heroic piece of social engineering ever undertaken, and that in a country of primitive economy and culture. The working out of its great experiment depends in large part upon democracy in the Communist Party machine and upon the party's responsiveness to criticism, to discontent, and to the creative forces of the Russian people in peasants' and workers' associations. Its rigid controls are regarded as temporary war measures, but of course they run the danger of becoming intrenched as a system of government. How far that danger is real depends largely on how free the rest of the world will leave Russia to work out a revolution which is perhaps—happily or unhappily—too universal in its significance to be let alone by its enemies.

Mass Movies

By SERGE MIKHAILOVICH EISENSTEIN

I AM a civil engineer and mathematician by training. I approach the making of a motion picture in much the same way as I would the equipment of a poultry farm or the installation of a water system. My point of view is thoroughly utilitarian, rational, materialistic.

When the little "collective" which I direct hits on a subject we do not draft plans in an office. Nor do I go and sit under an oak tree waiting for poetic inspiration. Our slogan is "Down with intuitive creation." Instead we wallow in life. Having chosen the village as the theme of our latest production, "Generalnaya Linya" (General Peasant Policy), we dip into the archives of the Commissariat of Agriculture. Thousands of peasant complaints are perused. We attend village soviet meetings and listen to village gossips. The picture—it will be finished on January 1—shows the power of the soil over man and aims to teach the town-dweller understanding and affection for the peasant. We took the actors from night-lodging houses; we picked them up on the road. The "heroine" must plow and milk a cow.

Our films do not center around an individual or a triangle. We want to develop the public, not the actor. This is a reflection of the spirit of collectivism which is abroad in the land. Nor do we attempt to excite vicarious participation in the lives of the persons of the drama; that is an appeal to sentiment. The cinema can make a far bigger contribution and a far stronger impression by projecting matter and bodies rather than feelings. We photograph an echo and the rat-a-tat-tat of a machine-gun. The impression is physiological. Our psychological approach is on the one hand that of the great Russian scholar, Pavlov, with his principle of reflexology, and on the other, that of the Austrian Freud—the principle of psychoanalysis.

Take the scene in "Potemkin" where the Cossacks slowly, deliberately walk down the Odessa steps firing into the masses. By consciously combining the elements of legs, steps, blood, people, we produce an impression—of what kind? The spectator does not imagine himself at the Odessa wharf in 1905. But as the soldiers' boots press forward he physically recoils. He tries to get out of the range of the bullets. As the baby carriage of the crazed mother goes over the side of the mole he holds on to his cinema chair. He does not want to fall into the water.

Our mounting method is a further aid in achieving such effects. Some countries in which the picture industry is highly developed do not use mounting at all. A sled rushes down a snowy toboggan and you merely see it sliding and skidding to the bottom. We photograph the bumps, and the movie goer feels them, and hears them, too, from the orchestra pit just as he did the throbbing of the engines when the armored cruiser "Potemkin" moved into battle. For this reason, probably, the movement of things and of machines in our pictures is not a part quickly to be passed over but one of absorbing interest. Mounting—the interlacing of close-ups, of side-views, top-views, bottom-views—is the most important part of our work. A picture is either made or unmade by it. Such methods cannot be adapted to the theater. I started in the theater, with the Proletcult, but left it for motion pictures. The theater, I believe, is a dying institution. It is the handiwork of the petty artisan. The movie reflects heavy, highly organized industry.

The scenic effect is calculated; so also is the ideological effect. We never start a picture without knowing why. "Potemkin" was an episode of revolutionary heroism calculated to electrify the masses. "Generalnaya Linya" seeks to encourage the bond between the city and the village—the outstanding political task of Bolshevism. "October," which will be shown all over the Union on November 7, depicts the ten days in the autumn of 1917 that shook the world. It shows history being made by the man in the street, by the worker from the foundry, by the lousy soldier from the trench. It identifies the common citizen of today with that history.

Conditions make our work easy. Night after night from four to five thousand Leningrad workers volunteered to participate in the storming of the Winter Palace which forms part of "October." The government supplied the arms and uniforms, as well as the army. In addition to workers and soldiers, we needed a mob. But word was whispered about and the militia had to be summoned to keep away the tens of thousands.

In "Potemkin" the Black Sea fleet was put at our disposal. On November 7, 1917, the flagship Aurora of the Baltic squadron joined the Communists and proceeded up the Neva to bombard the Winter Palace. The state lent us the Aurora for the reenactment of this scene in "October." We likewise had the use of tanks and artillery.

As we stick to life for our subjects so we stick to life for our scenery. We never build streets, or cities, or villages. The natural ones are truer. The detail of permission is easily arranged. No private owner or entrepreneur can object to the photographing of his premises or demand payment for the privilege. These things cheapen production.

"Potemkin" was a poster. "Generalnaya Linya" and "October" are subtler. They are nearer life. We are learning. We feel that our method is the only correct one and that its potentialities are unlimited.

Our method and America's highly developed movie technique ought to be a powerful combination. For this reason we are interested in an invitation to work in the United States during the next year. If our activities here permit, and if we are granted freedom of action in the United States, we may soon be there.

The Patient

By MICHAEL ZOSHCHENKO

Translated by Max Eastman

PELAGEIA rode thirty versts to the village hospital. She started at dawn and arrived at the one-story white house about noon.

"The surgeon?" she asked interestedly of a mujik sitting on the porch.

"The surgeon?" The mujik asked with equal interest. "Sick, eh? Belly, very likely."

"Yes, I'm sick," answered Pelageia.

"I'm sick, too, dear," said the mujik. "Ate too much meal. I'm number seven on the list."

Pelageia tied her horse to the lattice and went into the hospital. The doctor's assistant, Ivan Kuzmich, was receiving patients. He was little and old and dreadfully famous. Everybody around there knew him and praised him and called him "surgeon," without any reason.

Pelageia entered his room, bowed low, and sat down on the edge of a chair.

"You sick?" asked Ivan Kuzmich.

"I am sick," said Pelageia. "That is to say, I'm sick through and through. Every little bone aches and trembles. My heart is rotting alive."

"What could that come from?" the assistant asked indifferently. "Since when?"

"Since autumn, Ivan Kuzmich. Ever since autumn. In the autumn I got sick. You know just when my husband, Dimitri Naumich, arrived from the city, I got sick. I'll be standing, for instance, beside the table, rolling cookies in the flour. Dimitri Naumich used to love those same cookies. 'Where is he now?' I thinks to myself, 'In the city he is a Soviet deputy.'"

"Now please, little woman," said the assistant. "Jabber a little, but not too much. What's your trouble?"

"That's just what I'm telling you," said Pelageia. "I'll be standing alongside the table rolling cookies. Suddenly my aunt Agafia runs in like a ram and waves her hand. 'Come!' she cries, 'Pelageiiushka, come quick! You'd never believe it. Your man has come, and is walking up the street with a bag and a stick!' My heart stops beating. My legs give out. I stand there like a fool and knead cookies. . . . Then I drop the cookies and run out in the yard. And in the yard the sun is playing. The air is soft. On the left, right by the stable, a yellow calf is standing, shooing flies with his little tail. I look at that calf. Tears come to my eyes. 'There,' I think, 'Dimitri Naumich will be delighted with that same yellow calf!'

"If you please," the doctor's assistant said, frowning, "talk business."

"I am talking it, little father. Don't be angry. I am talking business. I ran outside the gate. I looked this way, you know—to the left. There the Klopovski's goat is browsing; a rooster is scratching with his feet. I look to the right. In the very middle I see Dimitri Naumich coming. I look at him. My heart flutters. A hiccough rises in my throat. 'Oh, honest holy mother of God! Oh!' I think, 'I'm a little sick!'

"And he comes along with a serious short step. His beard waves in the wind—and a city suit on him—and leather shoes!

"When I saw those shoes, something kind of broke loose inside of me. 'Oh!' I thought. 'What am I good for, such an ignoramus, if he is maybe a big citizen and a Soviet deputy?'

"I stand like a fool by the lattice and can't make my feet go. I run my fingers over the lattice and stand stock still. And he, Dimitri Naumich, the Soviet deputy, comes up to me with short steps and salutes me.

"'How do you do?' says he, 'Pelageia Maximovna! How many long years since we met!'

"I should have taken that bag from Dimitri Naumich, but like a fool I just looked at his shoes and never moved.

"'Oh!' I think, 'my mujik has forgotten me—wears leather shoes—talks with city folks—maybe with Communist girls!'

"But Dimitri Naumich speaks in a deep bass voice. 'Ah,' says he, 'Pelageia, Pelageia! Such you are! Ignorant,' says he, 'my ignorant Pelageia Maximovna. What can we talk about now? I,' says he, 'am an educated man, a Soviet deputy. I,' says he, 'know perhaps the four rules of arithmetic right through. I understand,' says he, 'fractions. And you,' says he, 'look at what you are! Maybe you couldn't even,' says he, 'perhaps write your name on a piece of paper. Another man might very easily throw you over for ignorance and lack of education.'

"And I stand by the lattice and murmur these words: 'Of course, Dimitri Naumich, throw me over. It means nothing to you.'

"And he takes me by the hand and says, 'I was only joking, Pelageia Maximovna. Stop thinking. I was only fooling,' says he. 'What do you imagine?'

"My heart rolled over again, and the hiccough rose in my throat. Says I: 'Dimitri Naumich, don't worry, I can learn fractions, too, you know, and the four rules, or even to write my name on a paper. I won't disgrace you,' I says."

The doctor's assistant rose from his chair.

"Come! For Heaven's sake!" he said. "That's enough! enough! No more jabber. What's your trouble?"

"Trouble? Why nothing now, Ivan Kuzmich. It goes better now. I can't complain of my health. But he says to me, 'I was fooling,' he says. That means he meant some kind of a joke."

"Yes, yes, he was joking," said the assistant. "Of course. Shall I give you some powders?"

"Oh, I don't think it's necessary. Thank you, Ivan Kuzmich, for the advice. I must be going."

Pelageia, setting a little bag of grain on the table as a fee, got up and went toward the door. Then she came back. "As to those fractions, Ivan Kuzmich, where should I go now to find out about those same fractions? Should I go to a teacher?"

"Yes, go to a teacher," the doctor's assistant said. "Of course! That has nothing to do with medicine."

Modern Women in Soviet Russia

By ALEXANDRA RAKOVSKY

THE great French idealist, Charles Fourrier, declared that one could judge the degree of civilization of a country by the social and political position of its women. The ten years since Russia's October revolution have witnessed an enormous change in woman's status. In Czarist days she had no civil or political life. In present-day Russia she is ahead of her fellows in Europe or, indeed, anywhere in the world.

The development of large-scale industry in Russia had its start before 1870, and from the beginning women took part side by side with men in the economic life of the country. According to the census of 1897 Russia had five and a half million male industrial workers, and one and a half million women; and the Bureau of Labor reports for 1913 indicate that 30.7 per cent of the factory workers were then women. During the war the proportion of women workers grew. By 1917 they formed 40.2 per cent of the industrial working class of Russia, and this proportion has been growing ever since; in 1918, in thirty-one out of the thirty-eight provinces of old Russia, it was already 42.8 per cent.

The trade unions have also developed since the October revolution. In Czarist Russia they were illegal and secret; only in 1917 did the Russian proletariat win a legal right to organize. By 1925, out of a total of 6,604,684 trade-union members, 1,682,991 were women—25.5 per cent. In the textile industry 53.9 per cent of the organized workers were women; 57.5 per cent of the clothing workers, and 38 per cent of the organized clerks were women. In the same year in Germany only 21.8 per cent of the trade-union members were women; in France 10.3 per cent; and in Great Britain 15.1 per cent.

Women play a large part also in the organizations of poor and middle-class peasants and they supply about one-seventh of the members of the unions of agricultural workers. In Russia the cooperatives are highly developed and in them women, as organizers, producers, and consumers, have an important share. A quarter of the cooperative officials are women; a woman often begins in a small cooperative and rises to be a member of the committee or commission of control of the whole cooperative society.

But it is particularly in the structure of the law that woman has obtained her full equality. In the first place she has an absolutely equal right to vote and to hold office. About 15 per cent of the members of the local soviets are women—as many in the country as in the city. Women participate as delegates in the Soviet congresses and they serve as commissars, particularly in the departments of education and of public assistance. They are even admitted to the General Staff School—we have women officers who have graduated from this military academy—and to the diplomatic service. Alexandra Kollontai has served as minister to Norway and to Mexico.

Lenin said: "In a workers' and peasants' republic every citizen should be educated, and so educated that he may direct and defend the interests of the state." The political education of women begins in the local Soviet, where women not only participate in the discussions but also in the village or city administration. As every woman elected to the Soviet periodically reports upon her service, they become accustomed to political life. Their service is equally important in the people's tribunals where women often serve as judges and in settling labor conflicts. Thanks to this varied activity, Russian women exercise a powerful influence in questions concerning childhood and maternity and supervise the application of the laws protecting women —in which respect Soviet Russia has the most advanced legislation of any country.

But it is in family legislation that women have acquired their most important rights. They are no longer subordinate members of their own families. The new marriage and family law of January, 1927, asserts the necessity of registering marriages "in the interest of the government and of society and with the purpose of better defending the personal and material interests of the two parties and of the child." Civil marriage is obligatory; religious marriage is a private matter for the individual to decide. The minimum age for marriage is eighteen. Man and woman are equally free to retain their own names or to assume the name of the other party. The property of either before marriage continues to be his or her property afterward, and the two parties have equal rights in the administration of the family estate. Any attempt to diminish the rights or property of the other is illegal. Divorce takes place by a simple declaration made in common by both parties or even by one of them alone. Then arises the question of the children. When the father is known and recognized by the court it obliges him to bear his share of the cost of educating and maintaining the child. It is the government's duty to defend the interests of a mother or of children who are abused by the husband or the father. Children of an unregistered union have equal rights before the law with those whose parents have recorded their marriages. All children are legitimate; there are no more "bastards" in Russia.

The struggle for social and political equality in Soviet Russia has been facilitated by the extensive organization of committees to end illiteracy, of lecture series, and of popular libraries. In the last few years more than half a million women have learned to read and write, and along with this has gone a process of political education. Close to the factories and workshops everywhere in Russia one finds various sorts of political schools. There are also continuation schools, some with long terms, some with short, to train the women for more skilled labor. The doors of the university, too, are wide open to women of the various nationalities within the Soviet Union. A third of the college and university students in 1926 were women, and more than half of these women students were workers. Among the recent university graduates are women lawyers, doctors, engineers.

The women's section in the local committees of the Communist Party facilitate all this cultural activity and insist upon strict application of the laws for the protection of women and children. These sections also seek to organize the working women outside the party—not only in Moscow but in the most distant corners of the republic, particularly in the East where before the revolution women were literally the slaves of their husbands. The October revolution caused a radical change in sex relations in European Russia, but the declaration of sex equality in the Soviet republics of Central Asia has revolutionized social life from top to bottom. Hence the particular importance of the women's sections in the Asiatic parts of the Union.

The Colorado River Controversy

By MARY AUSTIN

THE second Colorado River Conference, which began at Denver, August 22, and is still going on between recesses to permit the assembled governors of seven States to attend to their respective duties, is not only the most interesting of our territorial adventures, it is in some respects the most American conference which has taken place among us since the Continental Congress. Here, while the congress of peace-seeking nations fails at Geneva and Europe is still staggering under the burden of its own struggle across a little river like the Rhine, a territory equal to the whole of the republic of France, within which our original Colonies could be so disposed that it would take a good car two weeks to locate all of them, is being discussed by a small group of men whose names are Hunt, Adams, Emerson, Young, Wallace, Winsor, Mathews, Wilson, Dern, Dillon, McClusky, and others of that ilk. And if you imagine that Dillon, McClusky, Mecham, and Balzar are not de novo American names, you have only to turn back the pages of American history to discover that there never was an important territorial conference in the United States which did not include name[illegible] similar derivation. In keeping with this tradition the first Colorado River Conference, which was held at Santa Fé in 1922, included the Pennsylvania Dutch Quaker name of Hoover, representing the federal government. At this second conference, however, the States are on their own, settling a controversy which had arisen between two of them.

Wyoming, Utah, Colorado, Nevada, New Mexico, Arizona, and California are all involved in the project for converting the rampageous Rio Colorado into irrigation ditches and hydroelectric power. But from the beginning the situation of California was somewhat apart from the other intramontane States. The others are all relatively undeveloped, anxious to restrain development rather than to hurry it. California, on the other hand, is involved in an inflated economic complex which by its own momentum has outrun its own resources. Unless new resources can be found, Southern California—it is only the section southwest of the San Bernardino Mountains which is affected—must suffer a serious check to her characteristic expansion. And California's claim on the Colorado is not quite in the same case as the other States. Hers is the smallest fragment of the basin, and she contributes no flow to the waters of the river, her natural right resting on 300 miles of State line along the Colorado. Her chief claim is to the waters already taken out of the river for irrigation in Imperial Valley, and to uncompleted filings for domestic water for coastal cities. And at the original conference California was, of all the seven States, most alive to the possibilities tied up with the river project. At that conference a compact was drawn up which secured to the four upper basin States, Wyoming, Colorado, Utah, and New Mexico, 50 per cent of the flow of the river, in perpetuity, leaving the other 50 per cent to be divided among Nevada, California, and Arizona. Nevada, in view of the small amount of land suitable for irrigation, was easily contented with 2 per cent of the lower half of the river, Arizona and California being left to agree on the partition of the remainder; until such agreement had been arrived at, Arizona refused to ratify the compact. A little later California withdrew from it altogether. And then Utah. And in August of 1927 a second conference was called to uncover the roots of the situation.

It is always a little difficult to deal with Southern California as one deals with other localities. In Southern California boosting has become a religious duty; and the divine right of that section to all it can get, by any method whatever, is unquestioned. Naturally California wanted more than half of the water left by the compact to be shared between her and Arizona, and was hurt because Arizona so evidently didn't mean to surrender it. A great many people in the Southwest felt California's way about it; such is the glamor over all the American view of the immediate and the outsize enterprise. Even Mr. Hoover called Arizona rebellious, though what she rebelled against was the forced limitations of the development. Arizona has practically all her lands in the basin subject to irrigation, and contributes the major portion of the southern basin flow. Moreover, she has lands that would produce in due time exactly the citrus fruits and sub-tropical crops that are grown in California. Arizona therefore continued to insist that a fifty-fifty allocation was not only fair but generous. Also there was the question of power control. Suppose Arizona should continue to insist on the natural logic of natural resources. It was much to California's interest to build a dam at Boulder Lake as soon as possible. This would take care of all Southern California's necessities, and do very little for Arizona. It would benefit the five other States not at all. But the dam would be on Arizona's soil and subject more or less to her State control. California withdrew from the Santa Fé Compact and initiated the Swing-Johnson Bill.

Detailed discussion of the Swing-Johnson Bill is reserved for all citizens of the United States who have an interest in the question of the federal control of State resources, for all people who have an interest in power, both present and prospective, and for those who see in any move toward the socialization of natural resources either an advantage or a menace. Also the six intramontane States whose chief natural asset is the Colorado River are intimately concerned. The power to be developed by the proposed Boulder Creek Dam is estimated as about equal to the sum of all the existing power development in the United States. A few of Arizona's reasons for objecting to the Swing-Johnson Bill are that irrigation demands are sacrificed to power prospects; that the bill utilizes the natural resources of Arizona and Nevada to develop California; that the bill initiates the taking of natural resources from one State to another without compensation. There are twenty-three other reasons set forth in the statement of Arizona which can be had by applying to her Governor; quite enough to stiffen the resolution of the whole State and quicken the apprehensions of five others. It was to clear up the general situation, baldly and too briefly outlined here, that the Denver Conference was called.

One of the omitted items relates to the use of water by landowners in Mexico below the State lines. The general usage of waters for irrigations in our Southwest follows the old Spanish law of prior use. Landowners in Mexico are now entitled to all the water they are using or can put to beneficial use before the United States takes action by advising them that the remaining flow of the Colorado is about to be impounded for use within the United States. This can hardly take place until an agreement is reached by all the States affected. Thus the flow available for future irrigation north of the international boundary is steadily being diminished by the amount that is increasingly used below the boundary. This makes for urgency in point of time in settling the allocation of interstate waters. But as it is reported that California capital is invested in these Mexican irrigation schemes, the urgency is greater on the six other States than on California. There are also claims of water users in California for flood and silt protection, but as these are freely conceded by the other States they do not materially affect the problem. And over the whole situation hangs the Swing-Johnson Bill, which California is steadily pressing and all the other States are preparing to resist.

Perhaps this is the time to mention a factor that is definitely operative, and singularly unaccounted for: a widespread disposition on the part of the press to minimize and definitely to misrepresent the situation. Even while the present conference was in session many newspapers throughout the country carried reports of its proceedings which were explicitly contradicted by the facts. Such misrepresentative reports reaching citizens of the seven States unable to come into more direct relation to the facts will undoubtedly affect the reaction of those States to their own problems. The general implications of the reports in question were, first of all, that the Swing-Johnson Bill is more certain to pass than anyone is at present warranted in assuming; and, secondly, that the responsibility for the failure of agreement rests primarily on Arizona. One never quite knows whether the American press means anything by its freely expressed biases, or whether it is simply not sufficiently interested to form an intelligent opinion. If that is the case, it is much the worse for the American people, for what really transpired at the conference was the swing of the whole subject away from a two-State contest to a national policy.

There was no question that the five States already contented with their allocation of waters had met to hear out the matter of the other two with sympathy and without rancor. The details of the discussion would hardly interest a public unacquainted with "acre-feet" and "miners' inches." At the end of the discussion a committee of the governors of the four upper basin States was appointed to effect such compromise as was thought advisable. To the compromise thus proposed Arizona finally consented. And in the end California still stood out for a larger share, the exact amount of which would mean nothing to the uninitiated. For possible beneficiaries of either the Arizona or the California contention, there are the printed statements of each side. But for the country at large there are far more serious considerations than the matter of a few hundred thousand acre-feet of water for irrigation. As a matter of executive convenience at the conference, an effort was made to keep these larger factors in the background of the earlier meetings. But when the conference reconvenes on November 7, the real problem of the Colorado must be faced.

To understand it in its national implications, it must be realized that the Colorado basin is the United States' last large-sized opportunity for peaceable territorial expansion. For a territory the size of the republic of France all Europe would gladly permit itself to be torn to tatters. It is a goodly land, immensely varied in climate, topography, mineral wealth, and crop possibilities. It has in an unusual degree the new and imperfectly estimated possibility of hydroelectric power. It has the beginnings of a strongly marked regional culture. It beckons from every hill and valley with the last opportunity for the rise of a superior English-speaking culture within the territory of the United States. Should the Swing-Johnson Bill pass and California have her way, or even the dominant position in the distribution of benefits, many of these opportunities would pass away forever from the people of the United States. Probably, outside of Arizona, this is only half realized even by the people whose immediate future is at stake.

Let me not be misunderstood as imputing any special iniquity to Southern California in making every effort to secure the advantage of her own territory. It is the tradition of American expansions that we should tussle over our natural advantages and the devil take the hindermost. While our resources seemed practically unlimited it was useless to try for a more considered and far-looking method of dealing with them. But this adventure of the Southwest can never happen again. What will happen if she has her way is that Southern California will continue for a time her phenomenal material expansion. She will produce more of the same thing in the same limited district of the identical limited type of what goes by the name of "prosperity." And large areas of Arizona capable of producing not only the same thing that Southern California produces, but other things and more of them, will remain forever undeveloped. There is practically no agricultural development in the Southwest without water; and owing to factors of climate and soil formation water will go further in Arizona than in the parts of California where it is proposed to use the waters of the Colorado. It can also be done more cheaply in Arizona than by lifting the water out of its natural basin over the divide onto the California coastal plain.

This is the first, but only one item. There are unhappy possibilities among the six remaining States, of other struggles for the remainder of the river's possibilities, of opposing inter-State interests, instead of the unified development of an intramontane culture such as is suggested by the natural configuration of the land. And there is the beginning of the usurpation of State control by the federal government, and the exposing of natural resources unreservedly to political intrigue rather than the checks of private enterprise which have so far regulated such matters in the United States. The beginning is inauspicious for those who favor federal control of natural resources, for no way of arguing the Swing-Johnson Bill can make it seem other than the rape of the natural resources of one State against that State's consent, for the advantage of another State. There is no manner of doubt that, unanimously as California seems to be fighting for the Swing-Johnson Bill, Arizona will fight against it, and on constitutional grounds. So that even the convinced advocate of the federalization of such control must see that the forcing of Arizona's hand would heavily prejudice the whole project of federalization.

That the people of the United States must eventually face this possibility, this closing of the doors of individual enterprise, this sharp regional struggle for portable advantages, we have all known. The real question is, Are we ready to face it now and on this layout? It must not be forgotten that there is an international factor involved, and that the Colorado River is not the only source of water for irrigation divided between the United States and Mexico. There is also the Rio Grande, with the two growing States of Texas and New Mexico having somewhat differing interests. This international situation has not yet got beyond the reach of reasonably diplomatic control. But it does afford, in the possibility of a protracted struggle among the Southwestern States, an easy loophole of advantage for Mexico.

These are the most salient aspects of the situation being dealt with in the conference of governors and their advisers at Denver. There is probably no one at that conference who does not fully realize the national reach of the problem and its almost fatalistic relation to the American future. The one thing most needed to aid them in coming to decisions which will have the good of the country in full regard, is that the country itself should awake to a proper share of its own interest.

In the Driftway

THE Principessa Mafalda! The name staring at the Drifter from the first pages of the newspapers brings back memories of a good many years ago when he first saw this steamship in the docks of Buenos Aires. She was then the undisputed queen of the European-South American fleet. Today she is a mass of mangled wreckage off the coast of Brazil.

* * * * *

WHEN the Drifter first saw the Principessa Mafalda she was a comparatively new addition to the fleet of the Lloyd Italiano, and had no rival among the craft entering the River Plate. There is no vessel entering New York harbor today which enjoys such a supremacy, and perhaps there never has been. Half a dozen or more liners which steam regularly in and out of the North River dispute with one another for first place. The Mauretania still holds the blue ribbon for speed, but in size she is scarcely more than a minnow beside the great Majestic or Leviathan, while in luxury of appointments the new Ile de France is now the talk of Park Avenue. No one entering New York harbor can say condescendingly: "I'm the queen of the waterfront. Stand by and watch my wake."

* * * * *

THE Principessa Mafalda could. She was the first eighteen-knot vessel to enter the South American service and for years hadn't even a near competitor. The nearest to this speed was offered by the Hamburg South American Line, which had one or two ships that could log sixteen knots. The spoiled transatlantic traveler may be disposed to pooh-pooh such speeds as inconsequential beside the progress to which he is accustomed. But if he has traveled anywhere else except between Europe and the United States he knows that sixteen sea miles an hour is fast, that twelve or fourteen is more common, and that eighteen is an exceptional speed which only a large, steady passenger traffic—capable of paying high fares—can make possible. The Mafalda used to whisk her passengers over the 6,500 miles from Buenos Aires to Barcelona in fourteen days, with a stop or so en route. In another day an express train landed them in Paris, the goal of all smart Argentinos. And the Mafalda was not only fast; she was luxurious too. Her name was a household word, at least on the lips of all the elite who turned out for the afternoon parade through the fashionable shopping district of the Calle Florida or sipped the most wonderful coffee in the world in the sidewalk cafes of the spacious Avenida de Mayo.

* * * * *

THE docks of B. A. (as the English call Buenos Aires) are in some ways the most interesting in the world. Certainly they are the most concentrated. They are not spread out over miles and miles as in New York and London. The view of the ships is not shut off by great sheds and warehouses. At the time of the Drifter's visit, at least, the docks were rectangular basins with ships moored against all sides, the warehouses far enough back so as to leave a generous passage-way all round. At some places ships were ranged three or four deep along the dock sides. The Drifter has never seen any other port where one can get such an eyeful of shipping in so small a compass.

* * * * *

IT was in one of those docks that the Drifter first—and last—saw the Principessa Mafalda. He was impressed at once by the extent of what sailors would call her top hamper. That is, there was a great deal of structure above her main deck; it rose so high as to make her appear top-heavy. She would have been except for plenty of ballast along the keel. She had been built simultaneously with a sister ship. The sister never reached South America. She was not sufficiently ballasted at the time of her launching in Italy, turned turtle when she slid off the ways, and was abandoned as a total loss.

* * * * *

THE Drifter had always surmised that if the Principessa Mafalda was lost at sea it would be due to foundering in a storm. Fortunately severe storms are not frequent on the route between the Mediterranean and the River Plate and the ship came to another end. Not such a bad one either except for the tragic loss of life in connection with the accident. The vessel had seen a score of years of service. She had lately been supplanted in speed and apparently was no longer fashionable. It is better to be torn asunder quickly and buried in the salt Atlantic than to live to be sent to the scrap-heap. The ocean is warm and tranquil in the equatorial belt off the city of Bahia, yet fanned day and night by strong and steady trade winds. It should be snug lying there for the Principessa Mafalda.

Only Dogs

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Are you exclusively anthropophilist, or have you an inch or two for the rights and wrongs of our poor relations? There's something closely (to my thinking) related in the inhumanity of man to beast and that of man to man.

A pregnant female terrier, at Western Reserve Medical School, had the adrenals removed, and in the end, "within an hour," say the experimenters, "she had three yelling spells. . . . At 1:30 p. m. unchanged, yelling fits from time to time . . . tetanic spasms; at 6 p. m. coma and convulsions at intervals. At 6:45 p. m. she was found dead. . . . One pup had been expelled . . . another was bulging from the vagina. . . ."

This was "Dog 1137."

The 74 control dogs all died within 15 days. The 30 pregnant ones lived much longer. A bull terrier held out for six weeks.

The article is in the American Journal of Physiology for January, 1927. It is called "The Influence of Pregnancy Upon the Survival Period in Adrenalectonized Dogs."

Concentrated Control

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Intensive solicitation by banks for trust business is steadily increasing the amount of the property of the middle class held in trust by these banks—either by devise or living trust. If the process keeps on will not all the wealth of America soon be in control of the few?

Another View of Brandeis

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have no desire to prolong the Brandeis discussion. But Norman Hapgood in his apology for his hero's action in the Sacco-Vanzetti case neglects to take notice of the fact that this was but one of a number of similar failures—the Don Stephens case, wherein he joined in upholding the Conscription Act, in spite of the Thirteenth Amendment; the Debs case, wherein he concurred in upholding the Espionage Act in spite of the First Amendment; and the Whitney case, wherein he concurred in another violation of constitutionally guaranteed rights. Mr. Hapgood speaks of "the obligation of a judge not to usurp power." This alleged obligation in the Sacco case can be construed as nothing else than an obligation to allow a murder to be committed. And these other cases dealt with clear violations of the Constitution which required no usurpation of power to check. It was a violation of duty to let them stand unchallenged.

Justice in Hell

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: When Bob Ingersoll was asked to intercede with Governor Oglesby in behalf of the Chicago anarchists he replied: "It's no use—Oglesby wants to be governor again. Besides, every politician is a prostitute." When Bob reached [illegible] found the place so full of politicians that an apology was demanded. Bob claimed certain rights which are constitutional in hell; the right to a trial by a jury imported from heaven. The jury was composed of Socrates, Jesus, Bruno, Joan of Arc, Raleigh, John Brown, Sacco, Vanzetti, and four other martyrs. This jury brought in a unanimous verdict that Bob had uttered the foulest aspersion on the prostitutes that could be expressed in parliamentary language and owed an apology to them.

Farmers and Pullman Porters

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Everything is comparative. Farm laborers average well under forty dollars a month for ten-hour days of semi-skilled hard manual labor. Farm owners average only about seventy-five. To such, Pullman porters, receiving a "pitiful $72.50" minimum wage exclusive of an average $56 per month in tips, must appear a "privileged class."

Books and Plays

To the Impatient Revolutionist

By JOHN WALDHORN GASSNER

In the stillness of dark maple
Came the voice to me singing
Of the noise that shall be:
Of the dissolution,
Of the tempestuous end.

I who sit comfortably in my rocking-chair
In the small white porch of my sleep
Will find no weapon sharp enough to slay.
Nothing will suffice me—grown awake—
Nothing stand the trip-hammer of my hate so well
As one large lever cast of human hands—
Till down the adamant deeps
After mad rushing
Splinters our smudged ball. . . .

Laugh and smirk not, you fragmentary clouds
Of a moment's arisking,
If in a silence far from you
I who grow the thunder
Sag high and gather blackness.

Ivy Lee on Russia

USSR (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), A World Enigma. By Ivy L. Lee. Privately Printed.

THIS is my second day on a southbound train from Moscow. One can travel five days, ten days in the same direction in the Soviet Union. Soon I will be on the mysterious Ukrainian steppe. Two riders race across the black-soil field on the right. I see a tractor; but also a mud hut; thatched roofs; peasants spitting sunflower seeds at stations; passengers running for free boiled water as we frequently stop.

Yesterday, I spent the day in the coupe with a Moscow University professor. A tax collector got on and off and talked. A student discussed America and told the professor what the youth thought in Russia. At Kurusk a worker joined us. He had repaired locomotives on the Chinese Eastern Railway. Now he was coming from the neighborhood communal farm where he repaired their tractors. He talked like a red-hot Communist though he did not adhere to the party. From him I learned how the common laborer in the ranks looks at the Stalin-Trotzky controversy.

And when there are such interesting fellow-passengers I read Ivy Lee on the USSR. Brave man to write on Russia after a ten days' visit to the country. Foolish man to believe that Rykov, Radek, Tomsky, Litvinov, etc., can tell him what is the revolution, what are the policies of the government, what are the ways of the people, what are the attitudes of the masses.

The book is politically fair more or less—but so poor in material and in diction! It is not even a good piece of journalism. There are a few glaring errors and many mistakes. It is not true, for instance, that correspondents in Moscow must submit their mail articles to a censor and, failing that, are liable to expulsion. Unlike Gaul, the Communist Party is divided into three sections. Ivy Lee's explanation of the Opposition is as incorrect as it is naive. His chapter on Lenin and Leninism is laughable. It is well enough to write these things, but I do hope Mr. Lee himself does not imagine he understands Trotzky's position on foreign capital, or Stalin's views on the permanent revolution, or Lenin's fundamental philosophy. Also, it is a grave misconception to say that "All business in Russia which is not done either directly or indirectly by the government is done through 'concessionnaires.'" What about private traders and private manufacturers? This is the danger of turning out books on the basis of a week-end to week-end stay in the capital only of a tremendous nation. People have so little sense of responsibility toward the printed word.

Pages 113 to 156 constitute the only part of the book an intelligent man can read with a little profit, and only the last chapter is reminiscent of the old Ivy Lee. The author's conclusions are three: (1) "The present Soviet regime is there to stay." (2) Backward Russia is making progress toward a new life. (3) The tendency is away from communism and socialism to capitalism.

What must Russia do, according to Ivy Lee? His answer is, "Establish a reputation of good faith" by recognizing and paying Czarist and Kerensky debts probably; scrap the Third International; "establish real freedom of thought, action, and belief."

The chief problem, then, is to drive "a wedge between the Communist International and the Russian people"—who "as a people are all right."

In conclusion, "The dilemma which faces civilization is this: How to draw Russia toward the West, to cure the disease of Bolshevism, and to avert the menace of revolutionary Asia." The Standard Oil's publicity man, we all know, would solve the dilemma by buying Soviet petroleum and entering into trade relations and perhaps political relations with the Soviet state.

I do not see, however, why an apologist of business interests need be so roundabout in getting at the real point. You do not want to trade with Russia in order to save Europe—if Europe is worth saving—from the menace of Asiatic Bolshevism, but simply because trade may prove very profitable. The rest is simply barrage. The existence of the Communist International will no more prevent the Vacuum Oil or the Socony from dealing with Moscow than it did Harriman, or Lena Goldfields. What you must have is a tempting contract.

Russian Nightmare

A Prince of Outlaws. By Count Alexis K. Tolstoy. Translated by Clarence A. Manning. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

RUSSIA'S tempestuous life during the latter half of the sixteenth century had a tremendous fascination for Count Alexis Tolstoi, and his major creative work was the interpretation of this period to a generation which, under the veneer of nineteenth-century civilization, had the same characteristics and suffered the same evils. First in the order of writing, as well as in historical sequence, was the novel "Prince Serébryany," now made available to English readers as "A Prince of Outlaws"; then followed the vastly superior trilogy of plays, "The Death of Ivan the Terrible," "Czar Feodor Ivanovich," introduced to America by the Moscow Art Theater, and "Czar Boris."

It has been the custom of literary historians and other cataloguers to classify this novel as an historical romance; and to write an historical romance was probably the author's original intention. But it was an intention never achieved because Count Tolstoi was too intensely stirred by his material to accept the detachment and the limitations of fiction. Quite aside from the crudities and uncertainties inevitable in the work of a novice there is an authorial intrusion here which betrays that he had determined to sacrifice the effects of his medium for the effectiveness of his message.

Writing his belated preface in 1863, Tolstoi naively announced:

> In his description of the terrors of that age the author has constantly been kinder than history. From respect for the artistic and moral sensibilities of his readers he has cast a shadow upon all of them and has kept them as far as possible in the background. Nevertheless he confesses that as he read the historical sources for this period, the books have more than once fallen from his hands and he has thrown down his pen in anger, not from the thought that Ivan IV could exist but from the thought that a society could exist which could look at him without dissatisfaction. This heavy feeling constantly disturbed the objectivity necessary to an historical work and was one of the reasons why this novel begun more than ten years ago has just been completed.

And when he did not throw his pen down Tolstoi used it to moralize upon the iniquity of his villains.

The faint resemblance of "Prince Serébryany" to such genuine historical romances as the products of Scott, Dumas, and Hugo lies in a love affair that is as extraneous to the plot as the romantic name which the translation substitutes for the original title. But to say that there is more history than romance in this work is in no way a reflection on its vital interest. Ivan the Terrible's sadist companions and savage victims, his incongruous indulgence and asceticism were the elements of a national nightmare. And their maniacal extremes and vast significance have a magnetic attraction of immense force even when, to Americans, the entire story will seem precisely like a frightful fantasy of improbable horrors despite the obvious verity of Tolstoi's details and the matter-of-fact stolidity of the translator's English.

JOHAN SMERTENKO

Propaganda Value

Right Off the Map. By C. E. Montague. Doubleday, Page and Company. $2.50.

MR. MONTAGUE'S literary productions and particularly his most recent one are of peculiar interest in that they reveal with a nice clarity the impact of the late lamentable war upon a highly intelligent but slightly naive mind. Some time ago, and obviously as a result of personal experience, Mr. Montague learned what a careful reading of any sound economics textbook would have revealed to him: that modern wars are inevitably produced by selfish economic interests. He also learned that the war spirit is always induced by a combination of machiavellian propaganda and self-deceiving sentimentalism and that the gallant military tradition is either soft-headed idiocy or pap manufactured to satisfy the romanticism of the masses. There are a number of unpleasant souls who are so smart that they know all this intuitively, from their cradles; for them, to use Mr. Montague's phrase, there is no "disenchantment" because there has never been any "enchantment." But it is true enough that these hard-heads are a vain and useless crowd; they have long ago, with a supine and possibly inexcusable irony, abandoned the struggle to make these staring facts about war clear to the good citizens of their country.

From these disagreeably bored sophisticates "Right Off the Map" will exact an hour or two of amused attention (for Mr. Montague writes extremely well)—and an eventual yawn. But for those who are both intelligent and innocent (the spiritual state, it would seem, of so many "decent" university Englishmen today) this satire on war and its makers may very well have a profoundly enlightening effect. Their eyes will be opened by its characters, perhaps, all the more because those characters are presented with such crude and downright energy. Mr. Montague is too laudably earnest in his crusading to worry about subtilizing his puppets: there is Bute, for example, whose economic ambitions furnish the mainspring for the struggle between Ria and Porto, two technically hypothetical modern states; Bishop Case whose rich and rotund oratory assures his bellicose congregations that Christ came not to bring peace but a sword; Dr. Browell, the romantically militaristic university president who devoutly believes that war is a glorious instrument for elevating mankind far above the petty cares of the everyday materialistic life; Burnage, a liberal newspaper editor whose independence is undermined by his (unconvincing) love for his bored, cruelly aesthetic wife; and Major Willan, gallant and modest soldier of fortune, sure at the beginning that he has found a really just war, wondering, as he approaches his tragic end, whether there is any such thing.

Good counters all of these; a little hard to believe in, for they are so terribly stupid that if we did not have our own commonalty right at hand we should find it difficult to imagine any state intrusting its governing to them—but good materials, for all that, simple yet available for all the purposes of effective, if not highly artistic, satire. But Mr. Montague, following the instinct of a competent romancer, had to go to work and spoil his satire—or not so much spoil it, perhaps, as puff it up so that it assumed a vague and distended appearance. Hoping possibly that by sugar-coating the bitter pill he might reach a larger audience he surrounded the hard satiric core of his book with a moving little romance for feminine consumption and a glorious piece of military adventuring for the satisfaction of highly male desires. These two pieces of sentimental intrusion take the edge off the satire; for when we finish the book we are less likely to remember that the Ria-Portan War began with the selfish desires of a certain Mr. Bute, professional capitalist, than that it ended with the sad death of Major Willan, professional hero. When the sugar-coating is too thick the pill may lose its purgative quality. This Major Willan is really so noble and brave and self-sacrificing that one forgets that he is also a fool living on a rotten romantic tradition. It will not do to fall in love with him, as the author occasionally does himself, for wars are made not only by captains of industry but by romantic idiots, highly sexed neurotic women, and other over-agreeble creatures.

Despite which, "Right Off the Map" is a laudable piece of rough and ready satire on modern war, written with sparkle and energy and bluff honesty. It has a high propaganda value and should be circulated widely. Considered as a novel (in this case a matter of minor importance) it is a little too naive in outlook and miscellaneous in structure to take very lofty rank.

Rozanov

Solitaria, Together with Matter from The Apocalypse of Our Time. By V. V. Rozanov. Translated from the Russian by S. S. Koteliansky. Boni and Liveright. $4.

"WHISPERS," "sighs," "half thoughts, half feelings," "fragments of sound coming straight from the soul, without elaboration, without purpose, without premeditation, without anything external," jotted down by the author, anywhere, at any time—in a railway carriage, while bathing, while examining coins, in bed at night, on the sole of a slipper—and gathered into a volume of delicate beauty—this is "Solitaria." With the appearance of this book the American reader is for the first time brought soul to soul with Rozanov, one of the most enigmatic and disputed personalities in Russian literature.

Inordinate praise and bitter condemnation have been this writer's lot ever since he first appeared in Russian letters in the early nineties of the last century. While writers like Strakhov, Merezhkovsky, Gippius, Khovin, and Filosofov have acclaimed him as a "great man," a "seer," a "genius," a "most complex psychological phenomenon" to whom ordinary human criteria were not in the least applicable, there have been others (Biely, Trotzky, Struve, and the whole of revolutionary Russia) who saw in him nothing but a "wriggling, slippery, sticky worm," a "vile creature," a "swindler," and a "fool."

Indifferent to what the world thought of him, Rozanov in his estimate of himself whimsically agreed with both sides in the controversy:

> I may be a "fool" (there are rumors), perhaps even a "scoundrel" (there is passup to that effect) but the width of thought, the incommensurability of "horizons revealed" —no one has had that before me in the way I possess it. And all of it came from my own mind, without [illegible] in [illegible] even. Wonderful! I am simply a wonderful man.

But even Rozanov's friends had to admit that, on the whole and judged by ordinary human standards, his conduct was that of a rascal and a knave. A man without principles, a sycophant, a lickspittle, an amphibian, he did not hesitate to pose as an avowed reactionary or a revolutionist, Judophile or anti-Semite, hater of Christ or devout Christian, as circumstances seemed to demand. He even managed, under assumed names, to defend simultaneously, and apparently with equal heat and sincerity, two incompatible opinions in two diametrically opposed journals. To many he appeared lewd and coarse. Gippius, one of his admirers, remarks that Rozanov's frequent references to various natural functions often carried with them a haunting exhibitionist suggestiveness. To ascetic revolutionists and austere Christians his dithyrambs on sex, his persistent exaltation of that instinct and its functions to the heights of a mystical religion and ritual, appeared especially repellent. However, the thing that aroused the ire of most people was Rozanov's brazen nonchalance. He boasted:

> I am not so much a simpleton as to think of eternity. A million years passed before my soul was let out into the world to enjoy it; and how can I suddenly say to her: "Don't [illegible] yourself in a moral fashion." No, I say to her: "Enjoy yourself, darling, have a good time, my lovely one, enjoy yourself, my precious, enjoy yourself in any way you please. And toward evening you will go to God." For my life is my day, and it is my day, and not Socrates's or Spinoza's. . . . It is surprising how I succeed in accomplishing what I do. falschood. It has never worried me. And for this odd reason: "What business is it of yours what precisely I think? Why am I obliged to tell you my real thoughts?" My profound subjectivity (the pathos of subjectivity) [illegible] as though behind a curtain, untearable, irremovable. "Nobody dares touch that curtain."

We shudder: "What cynicism!" "Cynicism through suffering—did it ever occur to you?" whispers Rozanov almost soundlessly. And nothing is quite so touching, so stirring, so seductive as Rozanov's intimate whispers, not even those of Dostoevski. In these pages, passionate outpour of his soul, he catches vague, fleeting intimations of another, perhaps the "real," the "immortal" Rozanov, of him who "God was looking at the sky," and in whom God "there always was a mustache," of him who was "suffering of dirt, underlinen, and sodom," and who through "sin [illegible] and through sin [illegible] resolved to overcome sin with." of the poor [illegible] who never knew exactly he was "something orthodox" and who "dared to [illegible] so much as for [illegible]" and who, trembling, "rushed out" and "fled [illegible]."

Devil or angel? Both. Two polarities, two abysses, two utterly irreconcilable principles. A fantastic [illegible] in a fantastic milieu.

"Fallen leaves," said Rozanov of his [illegible] fallen leaves. . . . Leaves fallen off a strange, misshapen tree that stood brooding over the boundary [illegible] decadence, its bare branches piercing the sky, hopelessly [illegible] for the last rain, mystic kisses of a dying sun. Its leaves caught up by the roaring, howling winds of the Russian steppes and carried over mountains and across oceans to the four far corners of the earth.

H. M. Tomlinson

The Foreshore of England, or Under the Red Ensign. By H. M. Tomlinson. Harper and Brothers. $3.

Gallions Reach. By H. M. Tomlinson. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

"THE Foreshore of England" is a powerful picture of Great Britain as the author sees that kingdom from the point of vantage he has taken down along the waterfront. The book is an economic study, yet it is stated in human terms, for Mr. Tomlinson sees something far more important in an economic survey than pounds sterling and bills of lading. The author knows the foreshore of his country. He is intimately familiar with the harbors and quays, and he knows, equally well, the neglected slums that invariably cling to the waterfront of every port. It is with a foreground of ships and quays and waterfront slums that he discusses Britain's economic problems, and occasionally, through a rift in the fog of difficulties that hangs over the merchant marine and the trade of the Mistress of the Seas, Mr. Tomlinson is able to see a remarkably clear picture of the difficulties that face his country.

For those interested in Great Britain's problems "The Foreshore of England" is a clear and sane discussion worthy of the closest scrutiny. Such a book would be a credit to any author, and in that respect it goes hand in hand with Mr. Tomlinson's earlier work. The surprise is all the greater, then, when this able author presents the world with such a book as "Gallions Reach"—his first novel.

In it is told the story of James Colet of London, who, having disagreed with his employer, strikes the man only to see him fall dead immediately—of heart disease, apparently. Colet spends the night aimlessly wandering about the city, and early the following morning finds himself at Gallions Reach—a waterfront section along the Thames. He boards a ship in order to do a favor for her captain who is ashore, and the ship sails with him aboard when the captain sends word that he has decided to join the vessel at Plymouth. Colet frankly admits to the First Officer what he has done, and is invited by that person, as if such an invitation after such an admission were purely a matter of course, to stay on the vessel during her voyage to the East. When the captain comes aboard the story is retold and the reaction is the same. This accomplished, Colet, for most of the rest of the book, seems to dismiss from his mind the fact that he has been responsible for his employer's death. The ship sinks in a storm and Colet, rescued, goes on a prospecting trip into the Malayan jungles. Then he tries to help a learned and absent-minded ethnologist cross the peninsula. Finally he makes his way through to Penang and there announces his purpose of returning to London in order to lay his employer's "miserable ghost," which seems to have troubled him very little indeed throughout the course of the story.

A first novel is likely to have its weaknesses, and this one is no exception to the rule. Three or four revealing incidents suggest that there is really a character hiding behind Colet's name, but no reader of the book can possibly feel that he has any idea of what Colet might do under any given set of circumstances. Nor is the story any more complete. As to the descriptions—only here and there is there a paragraph, a sentence, a phrase which suggests that it really is Mr. Tomlinson writing.

That the author knows the sea is apparent—sometimes. Yet his description of the storm in which the Altair sinks is anything but convincing, quite aside from the fact that it is filled with nautical inaccuracies and impossibilities. A loose rope end is described as "resting straight on the wind as rigid as an iron bar." The captain, who at one moment is described as an exceptionally able sailor, permits himself to go down with his ship in the most landlubberly and unnecessary fashion.

Extraordinary things are done at the height of the storm with a lifeboat, in which, quite contrary to nautical practice, both the First and the Third officers accompany their men and make a preposterous but apparently successful attempt to repair something in the vicinity of the rudder. Nor is his jungle greatly more convincing than his sea.

Novels, of course, may be designed to serve any of a number of purposes, but it is difficult to see what end is furthered by this one. It is merely another first novel, and not at all a good one. HAWTHORNE DANIEL

Three Poets

Branches of Adam. By John Gould Fletcher. London: Faber and Gwyer, Ltd. 6s.

The Pyramid. By Sherard Vines. London: Richard Cobden-Sanderson. 5s.

Copper Sun. By Countee Cullen. Harper and Brothers. $2.

SO disparate are the approaches of Messrs. Fletcher, Vines, and Cullen to the poetic substance of their thought (which in the first two, at least, is a decided philosophic adumbration) that they may well be put forward as representative of certain urges permeating contemporary poetry. Mr. Fletcher, in "Branches of Adam," is intent on a larger and more impersonal gesture than that of most of the young men. In a loose, cadenced verse he retells from a new angle the most powerful of myths—that of man's creation, his fall, and the introduction of evil into the world. Of course, he draws an implication from it: that good depends on evil and evil on good and that civilization could not exist if it were altogether good. The ghost of Bernard Mandeville hovers outside the door here. Mr. Fletcher, it is to be suspected, is spiritually disturbed about God. His poem, as a whole, fails because the philosophical concept is not sufficiently fused with the poetic flare to make it worth while. There is more vigor and distinguished intelligence manifested in "Branches of Adam" than poetic inspiration. This intense desire to convince oneself of Godhead (what Mr. Fletcher calls "the ultimate unchangeable value which exists in each one of us") is certainly a part of the travail of the modern poet.

The anfractuosities of Mr. Sherard Vines are also concerned with a philosophical reaction to life, to modern life. "The Pyramid," with its fastidious modernities, its employment of scientific terms, its faint aura of Mr. T. S. Eliot, is a book that both fails and succeeds. It fails because it is too self-conscious; it succeeds because it reveals a distinct personality. Mr. Vines is walking in The Waste Land and a certain desolation hovers over him, but he faces his times a trifle preciously. He suggests a sophisticate in a silk hat. Yet there is indubitable color, a restrained current of steadily moving passion, an ingenious agility in imageries, and an implied irony that stamp his work with individuality. He, too, is representative of an urge in modern poetry, that urge which smiles both bitterly and ironically at its own disillusionment and cages its vaster aches in the preciosities of an intensely conscious style. So far as surface mannerisms go there are moments when Mr. Vines suggests the Sitwells (My Lady Edith, most of all) but this may be forgiven him.

Mr. Cullen, in "Copper Sun," continues to be good but not so good that there is not crying need for improvement. He is less broadly concerned with philosophical approaches to his times, but this is understandable in a young Negro poet of immediate personal reactions. There is indeed in the work a love of color, an inborn lyric impulse. Although his thought is neither profound nor set forth with any striking individuality, there is an evident sincerity about him that is "taking." Best of all, he can forget that he is of the colored race and be just "poet" most of the time. It seems to me that the future of the Negro in literature, his equality with white writers, depends somewhat on the power of forgetting that one must be a Negro first of all, and a writer in the second place. Few white poets (Mr. Kipling, perhaps) constantly harp on the evident fact that they are white. Why should the Negro insist that he is black? The spirit of his work will reveal his race without his reiterating it constantly. Which, after all, opens up a field for argument from which I back away gracefully. HERBERT GORMAN

The Works of Ben Jonson. Edited by C. H. Herford and Percy Simpson. Oxford University Press. Volume III. $7.

The third volume of this magnificent edition initiates the long series of plays, masques, and miscellaneous writings which will, when completed, occupy five volumes of the entire edition, three more instalments being planned, to contain a commentary. In thus adopting the arrangement of which Skeat's "Chaucer" is the most familiar example (i. e., of separating the commentary from the text) the editors offer little matter for discussion in a review; for the plays themselves are too well known to require comment of an appreciative sort and before estimating the contribution of the editors in its entirety we must wait for the three concluding volumes. At the time of the appearance of volumes I and II ("Ben Jonson: The Man and His Work") we devoted ample space to commendation of this undertaking. It is familiarly known that Jonson's plays are textually the most nearly accurate of any body of Elizabethan dramas. Unlike almost all his contemporaries Jonson expended great pains upon the publication of his plays, regarding them not merely as ephemeral entertainments but as a permanent part of literature. The editors are thus spared much of the toil of "establishing" the text; but there are innumerable "variant readings," due to the dramatist's own care in correction and revision; and the recording of these with the minute accuracy required by modern scholarship has been an immense labor—a labor not without profit, however, even to the non-academic reader, since it shows the dramatist in his very workshop, altering this phrase, polishing this metaphor, revising this scene, all in the interest of a nearer approach to his ideal of perfection. And even Jonson's text is not perfect. He was not (or at any rate very rarely) at the mercy of piratical publishers, as was Shakespeare; but the imperfect state of the printing trade in his day left a legacy of many misprints which Gifford was the first to attempt to eliminate. The present editors, while owing much to Gifford, have produced a better text, probably as nearly "definitive" as is possible.

Southern Albania or Northern Epirus in European International Affairs, 1912-1923. By Edith Pierpont Stickney. Stanford University Press. $2.50.

Miss Stickney's book deals only with a fragment of the Albanian question. It is an account of the diplomatic litigation between Albanian nationalism and Greek irredentism over the southern boundaries of Albania and the fate of a population of less than 200,000. It gives a clear, exhaustive, and scrupulously fair account of the various phases of the dispute from 1913 to 1922; but does not quite succeed in presenting it in its relation to the general European situation from which it derived a significance disproportionate to its intrinsic merits. For, after all, it was very largely Sir Edward Grey's eagerness to placate Italy and Austria-Hungary in the interests of general peace that inspired the pro-Albanian verdict of the Conference of Ambassadors in 1913; and the virtual confirmation of that verdict by the Council of Ambassadors and the League of Nations in 1921-1922 was due at least as much to the desire of the dominant European Powers to remove another danger spot in the Balkans as to the strict merits of the Albanian case. A generous supply of accurate maps and an exhaustive bibliography help to make the book very useful to the student of international relations.

Labor and Politics in England. 1850-1867. By Frances Elmar Gillespie. Duke University Press. $4.

Dr. Gillespie here presents an intensive study of the social and economic activities leading up to the enfranchisement of the English working classes. Taking her start from the collapse of Chartism, she shows, by a skilful weaving of evidence from innumerable published and unpublished sources, the operation of the two new potent ideas which Chartism left in the working-class movement. The first was the recognition of the need of political power to help in the economic struggle. The second was the new motive which a sense of justice and of the moral dignity of labor contributed to the movement, which two generations later was to take a socialistic shape and color. The difficult and delicate work of welding together the activities of the middle-class liberals and the trade unionists for political purposes involves Dr. Gillespie in a very intricate research. Her book is not for the popular reader, but the serious student of the democratic movement will find it full of use and interest.

India's Past. A Survey of Her Literatures, Religions, Languages, and Antiquities. By A. A. Macdonnell. Oxford University Press. $3.75.

The emeritus professor of Sanskrit at Oxford, known for fifty years as a distinguished laborer in his field, gives us here a rapid survey of India's intellectual life from the earliest times down to the arrival of Vasco da Gama on the Malabar coast in 1498. He touches upon religion, art, and language, but allots most of his space to literature, especially that in Sanskrit, of which he wrote a brief history many years ago. As a guide to the study of native Hindu culture, as distinguished from the imported Mohammedan, the book is useful although in no sense complete, while those who wish to read further on any special phase of Indian civilization will find satisfactory references in the brief bibliographical notes appended to the separate chapters. The book is not intended to advance knowledge, but rather to summarize it, and in this respect accomplishes its purpose.

A Pageant of India. By Adolf Waley. Houghton Mifflin Company. $6.

It is hard to tell for just whom this book is meant. It adds nothing to scholarship, is not a history according to the modern conception of that science, nor is it fiction. Perhaps the group of people who could use it to greatest advantage would be tourists who want to know about the events and persons connected with points of interest in India, but here the publishers have let the author down by not giving him an adequate index. The book is almost exclusively a narrative of political events, based on a few good authorities, but neglecting others that should have been consulted, not amplified by social and economic description nor adorned, except rarely, with reference to literary and artistic achievement and religious development, uneven in its treatment of the characters it presents (as only 10 pages to Asoka against 88 to Akbar), yet often redeemed by a gift for story-telling. The possession of this last quality possibly explains Mr. Waley's predilection for the romantic tales he has culled from translations of the old Rajput bards and the medieval Mohammedan primitives.

Modern Russian Composers. By Leonid Sabaneyeff. Translated from the Russian by Judah A. Joffe. International Publishers. $2.75.

This book begins with Taneieff, Scriabin, and Rachmaninoff, and ends with the composers of the revolution. It is written with apparent sensitiveness, discernment, and perspective, and is therefore enjoyable and profitable; nevertheless it must be read with the discrimination born of acquaintance with the various composers' music. For sometimes the author develops an idea beyond the corresponding development of the musical facts it supposedly accounts for; and sometimes, therefore, he errs in judgment.

Drama

Petruchio in Modern Dress

TWO seasons ago Mr. Basil Sydney played Hamlet in a business suit, and now that he and Mary Ellis are at the head of their own company at the Garrick Theater he is undertaking to interpret the role of Petruchio with a gray derby upon his head. The resulting production of "The Taming of the Shrew" ("in modern dress") is the most thoroughly delightful one that I, at least, have ever seen, but I am still somewhat at a loss to understand just why contemporary costuming should be as conspicuously favorable to an interesting interpretation of Shakespeare as experience with two productions has proved it to be.

There are, to be sure, good abstract reasons to justify the method. Shakespeare, as everybody knows, wrote his plays to be played in the "modern dress" of his day and his Cleopatra was acted in the farthingale and stays of Queen Elizabeth's court. Knowing little and caring less about antiquarianism, he gave to historical personages the habits and ideas as well as the dress of his age and he thought of them as contemporaries in every respect except the accident of time. If the exigencies of the plot demanded that some unfamiliar custom be accepted as a premise then he accepted it without question, but the ignorance of an audience in which deficiency of knowledge was scarcely less conspicuous than liveliness of perception made it unnecessary for him to worry about any mere anachronisms. When we dress his characters up (as the eighteenth century began to do) in historically authentic costumes then we emphasize the fact that neither the language nor the ideas of these characters are historically authentic when, as a matter of fact, historical authenticity is the last thing about which we ought to be thinking. In fancy one can always see the Elizabethan hose protruding from the bottom of Cæsar's toga, and logic might seem to direct that the costume of any Shakespearean character should be that of Shakespeare's own time, since, if the mood and language of his plays correspond to any style of dress, it is rather to that which includes the ruff and the farthingale than to any known to either ancient or modern times.

These reasons, I say, are good enough as such reasons go, but I confess that I am convinced of their cogency only after the fact, and that both in "Hamlet" and in "The Taming of the Shrew" the "modern-dress" productions were far more interesting than I should have anticipated. Even now I am inclined to suspect that the mere matter of costuming is in itself of little account, that we quickly cease to notice the dress at all, and that, in the case of "Hamlet" at least, the magic of the play is so great that even if it were played by actors in no costume at all except that which nature gave them we should forget their nakedness by the time the ghost had made each of our particular hairs to stand on end "like quills upon the fretful porpentine." The real importance of the modern dress seems to lie chiefly in the sense of freedom which it gives to actors and audience alike, in the fact that it effectually banishes that oppressive sense of responsibility which so often makes even the presentation of a Shakespearean comedy a solemn affair. Some contagious pomposity residing in a doublet seems to infect the player who dons it, and in the presence of a robe the spectator seems always in danger of mistaking his seat for a pew. But this frigid awe is put off with the clothes which inspire it, and a Hamlet or Petruchio in trousers seems to feel an ease in the company of his contemporary, Shakespeare, not unlike that which Shakespeare himself felt with characters equally remote from him in time. Certain plays—the Greek for example—require ceremony; they were not treated familiarly even by the people for whom they were written and they must be thought of as solemn rituals; but the Elizabethan drama was a lively, rather informal, affair and the closer it can be brought to us, the less pompous it can be made to seem, the nearer we approach its spirit.

Mr. Sydney and Miss Ellis (conspicuously aided by Reginald Bach, whose transformation of Tranio into a hearty cockney is one of the delights of the evening) move easily and gaily through the rapidly moving farce, and the air of modernity which they give it results less from the introduction of such objects as a camera and an electric heater than from the fact that they have realized that the play is neither more nor less realistic now than it was when it was written and that they have accordingly played it in the mood of contemporary extravaganza. Mr. Sydney is merely an energetic and go-ahead young man and Miss Ellis merely a cantankerous young girl who is reduced in the end not to that state of simpering vacuity which is generally taken to be the permanent state of any really nice girl in a Shakespearean play, but merely to the condition of accepting, with some humor, the fact that it is wiser to get along with her husband. There is a touch of mockery in all her submission and there are many humorous subtleties in her entire interpretation. In particular she was greeted by a burst of well-deserved laughter at the moment when, having been violently kissed for the first time, she made her exit with an expression in which indignation seemed to be struggling with a certain surprise that she was not angrier than she found herself to be. It was one of the most intriguing bits of acting seen here this year. Mention should also be made of Madam Ouspenskaya who touches the minor role of Curtis with her usual vividness.

"The Wasp's Nest" (Wallach's Theater) is a conventional mystery melodrama which is more than usually irresponsible. Novelty dancing, vaudeville singing, and fair acting are happily combined to make "Weather Clear, Track Fast" (Hudson Theater) good, amusing entertainment.

The Soviet Invasion of America

By TANSY McNAB

WHILE in a diplomatic sense Washington and Moscow do not speak as they pass by, New York and Moscow are conversing more and more intimately on economic matters and are exchanging visits with growing frequency. Scores of American bankers and business men and engineers have visited the USSR in the past two years. Scores of Soviet industrial executives and technicians and scientists have made trips to the United States. On both sides one subject is strictly taboo—politics and diplomatic relations. Most of the Soviet visitors, except the scientists, do not go to Washington at all. They pass up the show city on the Potomac in favor of tours to the steel mills of Pennsylvania, the oil fields of California and Texas, the hydro-electric plants at Niagara, the automobile factories at Detroit, particularly the mechanized hive of Henry Ford.

The number of these pilgrims from the Soviet Union during the past two years has been well over 250. They come singly and in delegations and stay from a few weeks to six months or more. The largest contingent consisted of fifty peasant boys who came over last year to study automotive principles at the Ford school in Detroit. Another large delegation consisted of twenty-one agricultural scientists, headed by the eminent Dr. K. D. Glinka, who came to attend the sessions of the First International Congress of Soil Science held in Washington last June, and subsequently made a tour of the country for research and study. They formed the largest foreign delegation at the congress, and their exhibit of soil samples and charts was the most comprehensive. Other scientific visitors have been Dr. V. V. Obolensky-Ossinsky, editor of the magazine World Policy and World Economy and an editor of the new Soviet Encyclopedia; Dr. John G. Alexandroff, professor of hydro-electrics at the University of Moscow and father of the Dnieper River project; Professor V. V. Talonoff, director of the Soviet Institute of Applied Botany, and Dr. Boris E. Linberg, dean of the Medical Faculty and director of the Surgical Clinic at Smolensk University.

Vladimir Mayakovsky, the Soviet poet, came over a year ago. Stanislavsky has led his players of the Russian Art Theater for a tour of the United States under the tutelage of Morris Gest, and the Second Studio of the Art Theater has also come with a repertory of opera including a new Carmen and a lively interpretation of Lysistrata. The actors of the famous old Jewish Habima Theater have also enjoyed an American tour. Director Nemirovich-Dantchenko of the Moscow Art Theater has put in some time at Hollywood and Director Glagolin of the Revolutionary Theater visited the United States this fall.

Virtually every important phase of American production or of industrial organization has been studied at first-hand by these eager-minded guests. Among recent visitors, executives and technicians of the Donugal Coal Trust have inspected mining methods in Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and Illinois, and plants manufacturing coal-mining machinery; several delegations from the Soviet oil trusts have made an intensive survey of our oil fields and oil machinery; experts from the Metal Institute at Leningrad have investigated our metal industries preparatory to drawing plans for the expenditure of $300,000,000 for new plants and mills in the Soviet Union; Soviet hydro-electric engineers have toured the country to visit all the more important power plants; the glass and porcelain industry, the rubber industry, the canning industry, the timber industry, and others have come in for minute observation by Soviet inquisitors. A delegation from the Ukrainian cooperatives, which run 10,060 stores, recently made a study of the methods of American department stores, chain stores, restaurants, bakeries, and large warehouses. Soviet agronomists and statisticians have toured the country studying farm methods from coast to coast. Once a year executives of the Soviet Textile Syndicate come over to inspect their American cotton-purchasing agency, which purchased American cotton to the value of $45,000,000 in the past year.

In fact all the Soviet visitors have met a cordial welcome from American industrialists, whether they came to leave substantial orders with the Amtorg Trading Corporation, which buys equipment here for the big Soviet trusts, or whether their visits were merely platonic—i. e., for study. The scientists have also been well received. They have included such distinguished names as Professor Glinka, Dr. Adolf Joffe, physicist; Dr. D. I. Mushketov, director of the Soviet Geological Committee.

One Soviet visitor, a young man representing the Northern Timber Trust, had a veritable American Odyssey. Entering the country on the Pacific Coast, he worked as a lumberjack in Western camps and then got jobs in various sawmills. Thereafter he took a course in forestry at a West Coast university. With this apprenticeship he presented his introductions and made a study of the timber industry in all parts of the country, finally winding up with a survey of the operation of pulp mills, wood-working factories, and plants producing machinery for the industry.

Reciprocally, American engineers are now assisting in developing the ambitious superpower plans in the Soviet Union; they are supervising the construction of model coal mines in the Donetz Basin, designing new metal plants and glass factories for Soviet industry, helping to revive the platinum works on the slopes of the Urals. In fact Moscow and New York have developed a broader network of relations than before the war.

SINCLAIR'S MILLIONS may keep him out of jail, but his name stinks. The time may even come when it will be impossible to find in Washington a jury of men and women so illiterate that they have never heard of his crimes. The whole long process has been a revelation of the ease with which money can warp the law to its own ends. It was four years after the elder La Follette exposed the Teapot Dome scandal in the United States Senate that the Supreme Court denounced the crooked leases in the civil suit for their recovery, and the criminal suit against the conspirators has only just come to trial. And under what circumstances! Sinclair's right-hand men skulk in Europe, and the Government cannot bring them back. The jurymen who judge him must be such weak-minded morons that they have never heard of the Supreme Court's denunciation or formed an opinion of this scoundrel's guilt. The trial is held up for days by legal quibblings over the question whether Sinclair's previous testimony before a Senate committee will be admitted in evidence: and the court's decision is that it may not—the jury cannot hear his former admissions. He and his associates refuse to answer questions on the ground that to do so might incriminate them—yet the jury may not hold that against them! And finally, it is discovered that the unscrupulous scalawag has hired a corps of Burns detectives to shadow jurymen, inquire into the mortgages on their houses and into their debts and friendships—for no conceivable purpose except to browbeat or bribe them. Yet this man is one of the leaders of American business, allied even in the Teapot Dome deal with the Standard Oil, and the employer of Cabinet officers and President's sons.

OIL MEN GO FREE while awaiting trial, but Donato Carillo and Calogero Grecco, anti-Fascist Italians, have spent five months in the Bronx County jail, New York City, hoping daily for legal action on their case. They are accused of killing two Fascists in the Memorial Day parade last June; but a group of Italian and American liberals believe that they are in jail only because their Fascist opponents want them out of the way and have succeeded in persuading the New York police to do Mussolini's dirty work for him. Giacomo B. Caldora, president of the Duce Fascist Alliance, has told the story of this plot. Caldora was formerly high in Fascist circles; but, he says, he split with his associates when they sought to avenge their own dead by railroading innocent men through the law courts. It is alleged that the detective in charge of the investigation is himself an active Fascist. There seems to be no doubt that anti-Fascists killed Fascists on May 30, and the murderers should be discovered and punished; but vicarious atonement by innocent men in political sympathy with the guilty men is hardly a sound principle of justice. Norman Thomas, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York, is chairman of the committee which is raising funds for the defense.

MAYOR THOMPSON of Chicago has had "words" with the directors of the Chicago Public Library and the directors of the library have had words with his Honor. The directors say:

> . . . We believe these books should be supplied to the library patrons that they may be acquainted with every shade of opinion. In this the Chicago Public Library is like all other libraries in the world, a depository of human thought; consequently much of its contents are contradictory. This exchange and freedom of thought we consider the primary function of a library and in keeping with the American ideal of a free press.

To this the Mayor could only reply:

> As your views evidently do not agree with those of the people and as you are expending the taxpayers' money against the will of the people as expressed at the polls, the honest thing for you to do is to resign.

Surely the situation has passed beyond the bounds of adult controversy, and the twenty-nine civic organizations which have just drawn up a protest against the antics of their exuberant Mayor have made a worthy but futile gesture. The Chicago Women's Club, the Chicago Church Federation, the Women's Trade Union League, and the Young Women's Christian Association are among the groups represented, all of them being part of the Joint Committee on Public School Affairs.

OBVIOUSLY THE ADMINISTRATION intends to make an impression on the Sixth Pan-American Conference when it opens in Havana, Cuba, on January 16. President Coolidge will go down to deliver the opening address; and in the whole history of American diplomacy we do not recall any list of delegates to a diplomatic conference so imposing as the roster of the men we will send to Cuba—Charles Evans Hughes; Henry P. Fletcher, former Ambassador to Chile, Mexico, and Belgium, and now to Italy; ex-Senator Oscar W. Underwood; Dwight W. Morrow, who has just left J. P. Morgan and Co. for the ambassadorship to Mexico; former Justice Morgan J. O'Brien; James Brown Scott of the Carnegie Endowment; Ray Lyman Wilbur, president of the Leland Stanford University; Leo S. Rowe, director-general of the Pan-American Union; and the new Ambassador to Cuba, who has not yet been named. The occasion is regarded, the Washington dispatches say, as "an opportunity to remove misunderstandings." Ex-Senator Poindexter has just returned from his embassy in Peru with news that South America is alive with fear and hatred of the United States; the same newspapers that announced this delegation carried the story of another "battle" in Nicaragua, in which one United States marine was wounded and six Nicaraguans killed. As Ex-Senator Poindexter points out, every such battle is heralded throughout Latin America as new evidence of Yankee imperialism. It will be hard to remove such "misunderstandings"; it is even possible that the Latins understand the significance of our policy better than do the people of the United States.

JAPAN'S WORKINGMEN cast their first ballots at the elections of members of the prefectural councils in September; and the results were anxiously watched as the first test of the new universal manhood-suffrage law. The government party led, with 602 candidates elected; the Opposition won 522 seats—a closer vote than was anticipated. But the most interesting sign was the appearance for the first time at a Japanese election of official representatives of Labor. The Government's repression of early attempts at the formation of Farmer-Labor parties had succeeded in splitting the Labor forces into four groups; but the embryonic parties nominated 200 candidates and elected 26 of them—twice as many as the Government expected. The Ronoto, most radical and outspoken of the groups, led by Ikuo Oyama, who last year was forced to resign his professorship of political science at Waseda University, won 23 of the 26 Labor seats; and in the seaport city of Kobe a Labor candidate led the poll. Politics in Japan are notoriously corrupt; Mr. Oyama's "radicalism" consisted largely in the bitterness of his attack upon bipartisan graft. Even relatively conservative journals express the hope that the advent of these pioneer Laborites will exercise a restraining influence and look forward to further Labor gains in the parliamentary elections of 1928.

S. PARKER GILBERT, the able American who is serving as Agent General of Reparations in Germany, has published the vigorous memorandum which he addressed on October 20 to the German Government. He warned it against its mounting expenses, suggesting that the proposal to increase the salaries of its civil employees, to give indemnities for private property lost during the war, and to increase school expenditures menaced the equilibrium of the budget. He objected particularly to the growing indebtedness of the states and communes—which seem to have borrowed more than $650,000,000 abroad—and he concluded that, despite Germany's extraordinary success in reconstruction, there were evidences of "overspending and overborrowing," of "artificial stimulation and overexpansion" which, if unchecked, would lead to severe economic depression and endanger the reparations payments. The German officials think Mr. Gilbert's fears exaggerated. Hitherto he has been an optimist, but any economist must regard the increased payments due in 1928 with a certain awe and doubt. What impresses us most, however, is the spectacle of this "unofficial" American lecturing the Reich on its finances. Mr. Gilbert was not appointed by the American Government, but he is inevitably regarded as its spokesman, and through it as the spokesman of the Americans who have lent hundreds of millions of dollars to Germany. Will Germany heed his warning? If not, what will we do about it? Our financial overlordship of the world is leading us into deep waters.

THE GAIN BY THE LABOR PARTY of more than a hundred new seats in the local elections just held in England and Scotland has this year a particular significance. Labor majorities in many borough and town councils and boards of guardians, and strong Labor minorities in many more, have, since the war, been a source of bitter annoyance to the Conservatives. By their power to vote unemployment and poor relief, these Labor councilors have won the support of large working-class constituencies, a support which in the long run is translated into votes for Labor in the general election. Labor councilors, such as George Lansbury and Susan Lawrence, have gone to prison for voting appropriations for relief in their boroughs, which have been judged "unreasonable" by the auditors. Going to prison has, of course, only had the further effect of increasing their popularity and that of the Labor Party; both Susan Lawrence and George Lansbury are now in Parliament. The Conservatives have tried by various devices to discredit the local Labor authorities and limit their power over the taxpayers' money. Parliament has tightened the control of the auditors—appointed by the Ministry of Health—and has changed the penalty for recalcitrant councilors from a prison sentence to disbarment from office for five years. It is encouraging to see the prompt answer of the voters to this effort to eliminate and undermine Labor's local representatives.

LEON TROTZKY AND GREGORY ZINOVIEV have been expelled both from the Executive Committee of the Communist International and from the Central Committee and Central Controlling Commission of the Communist Party. "Autocratic usurpers," "cheats," "despots," and "voting rabble rounded up to give a semblance of authority to the decrees of self-appointed dictators" are among the epithets which Trotzky is reported to have hurled at the Stalin-Bukharin bloc which ousted him. It remains to be seen whether Trotzky and his associates will be permitted to remain within the Communist Party, and what they will do if they are expelled. It has been the boast of Russian Communists that however rigid their control of politics outside their party, within that charmed circle criticism was free. Evidently Trotzky was too much for them to bear. His worst crime appears to have been the reprinting, on a secret non-Communist press, of Lenin's last "testament," and it is amusing to recall Lenin's words:

> Comrade Stalin, having become general secretary, has concentrated an enormous power in his hands; and I am not sure that he always knows how to use that power with sufficient caution. On the other hand Comrade Trotzky . . . is distinguished not only by his exceptional abilities—personally he is, to be sure, the most able man in the present Central Committee—but also by his too far-reaching self-confidence and a disposition to be too much attracted by the purely administrative side of affairs.
> These two qualities of the two most able leaders of the present Central Committee might, quite innocently, lead to a split. . . .
> Stalin is too rough, and this fault, entirely supportable in relations among us Communists, becomes insupportable in the office of general secretary. Therefore I propose to the comrades to find a way to remove Stalin from that position and appoint to it another man who differs from Stalin—more patient, more loyal, more polite, and more attentive to comrades, less capricious, etc.

WHEN KING GEORGE'S WHISKERS were replaced on the South African stamps by springboks and other local flora and fauna one weighty step in the development of South African nationality was taken. But the question of a flag for the South African Union presented greater difficulties. The Nationalists left the Union Jack entirely out of their original design, whereupon the old British stock tumultuously set out to prove that the theory of British stolidity was a myth. To judge by the temperature of the talk, civil war was narrowly averted. The Government lost something of its Dutch stubbornness. After the era of good feeling initiated by the Imperial Conference, General Hertzog proposed a compromise flag—the flag of Van Riebeek, the founder of the original Cape Colony, with broad orange, white, and blue horizontal stripes, a quartered shield to be set in the middle of the white stripe. One quarter of this shield was to bear the old Transvaal flag, one the Free State, one the Union Jack, and one four stars—to fill up. But patriotic Britons calculated that the Union Jack covered only one sixty-fourth of the whole, and demanded the shield alone as a substitute for this flag. The oratorical war broke out anew. The Rev. Van der Merwe stirred the cohorts by proclaiming that the shield was a mere "scab on the flag" which in due course would fall off. Now the Government has made further concessions. The shield is dropped; instead the three old flags are together to fill a third of the broad white stripe, so that the Union Jack mounts to one twenty-seventh of the whole flag's space; and in Natal always and in certain cities on state occasions the Union Jack will fly alongside the South African emblem. Apparently, everybody—for the time being—is happy. But some day the majority race of South Africa may demand a great black square in the flag—and if Negroes are civilized into becoming as big fools as white men, that will be another pretty row.

TEACHING IS STILL the chief function of our colleges and their faculties should consist of teachers, in the view of Ernest Hatch Wilkins, recently inaugurated as president of Oberlin. In his inaugural address Dr. Wilkins, who was formerly professor of Romance languages in the University of Chicago and for three years dean of its College of Arts, Literature, and Sciences, said that "If the teaching is good, the college is a good college, even though its plant be inadequate and its athletic stars be dim. If the teaching is poor, the college is a poor college, even though it have a Freshman Week and a psychiatrist." In regard to research among the teachers Dr. Wilkins defined his position thus:

> I have been clear enough, I hope, in my insistence that for college purposes excellence in teaching is the main thing. I do not regard interest in research as a necessary concomitant of college teaching. And I deplore the wasted energy of men who, under extrinsic pressure, attempt research though they have no gift for it. But if a man has, in addition to teaching ability, the gift of research—if he has really, in the intellectual domain, the adventurous spirit of the pioneer, if he combines wide-ranging imagination and infinite patience—then that gift is to be cultivated as a precious thing: precious not only because of the inherent value of its results, but precious because if rightly utilized in connection with his teaching it may vivify that teaching in the highest degree.

IT WAS STRANGE to find the rebel Shaw defending the apostle of castor oil as a cure for civil discontent. But it remained for Mussolini's censors to cap the comedy by reediting G. B. S.'s apologia for their chief, and for Gaetamo Salvemini to bring their antics to the light in a letter to the Manchester Guardian. "Mussolini achieved a dictatorship," Shaw wrote, "after marching to Rome with a force of blackshirts which a single disciplined regiment backed by a competent Government could have routed at any moment." When Shaw's remarks were reprinted in Italy, the censors cut out the words which we italicize; they did not harmonize with the official Fascist myth. Shaw wrote: "To tell us that Mussolini's extraordinary success was achieved by murdering one hostile deputy and administering castor oil to his supporters is childish." The censors omitted the murder, and changed the word "supporters" into "adversaries." At another point they inserted into Shaw's text a whole series of remarks of their own. Mr. Shaw has thundered at censors before; will he now renounce his sudden love, or, as Salvemini suggests, has "Kate at long last met her Petruchio"? Must some new dramatist write "The Taming of the Shaw"?

POLICEMEN IN AUTOMOBILES to keep the crowds in order, 57,000 people come to view the body which lay in state for four days, $100,000 worth of flowers—one piece rumored to have come from the Prince of Wales—breathless crowds standing all day in a cold November wind, crowding the church, fainting, moaning, crying—these were the dramatic periods that marked the funeral of a dancer and comedienne; this was the last gesture to Florence Mills by the members of two races, but chiefly of her own. Nor would we begrudge her one flower, one tear; she made thousands of people laugh; she could sing in a weird, wild way; she could dance. Most of all she was herself, and, being herself, she joined that small group of persons whose genius rests on their personality. That she was a Negro made it harder at first for her to get a hearing outside her own race, and after she once got started it made things easier for her. She was unique, and therefore wonderful. Inevitably she opened a path for other Negro performers: she did not need to present her race with laughter—they had it already; she presented an alien race with a strange, new kind of laughter, she made them like it, and they will demand it again and again.

Bloody Colorado

IT is the old, old, bloody story, with a few 1927 trimmings. The miners move from mine to mine today in motor cars; but when the coal company puts them out of the company houses they move into tent colonies that are no warmer than the Ludlow tent colony into which the State machine-guns poured their soft-nosed bullets on that gory April 20, 1914. A twenty-year-old bobbed-haired Mexican girl named Rosia, the Associated Press reports, leads the women's picket-lines in place of old Mother Jones, whom the mine police held incomunicado for ten weeks in 1914; but Rosia is old enough to recall that two of her brothers were killed in the coal war thirteen years ago. The memories of that war still dominate the canyons and arroyas of Southern Colorado; at Ludlow stands a statue of a miner and a miner's wife, with a child in her arms; and the inscription on the monument reads:

> To the memory of the men, women, and children who lost their lives in freedom's cause at Ludlow, Colorado, April 20, 1914. Erected by the United Mine Workers of America.

Not the United Mine Workers, but the Industrial Workers of the World are leading the fight in 1927. The reason lies in the history of the company-union plan devised by W. L. MacKenzie King, present Prime Minister of Canada, and put into effect by John D. Rockefeller, Jr., the largest stockholder in the Colorado Fuel and Mine Co., which dominates the mine field of that State. Mr. Rockefeller refused to deal with the more conservative union; and the result is that today a more radical union has his mines tied up and idle; and the company officials are insisting that without the aid of the dreaded State militia they can do nothing but close down or capitulate. Company unionism has raised its own tombstone.

There were strikes in Colorado—violent, bloody, frontier strikes in 1883, 1893, and 1903. In 1903 the companies came near to crushing the United Mine Workers; and thereafter they preferred foreign-born labor. Then came the historic strike of 1913-14. The companies owned the mine towns—their streets, houses, Y. M. C. A.'s, schools; and the striking workers were ejected from their homes on twenty-four hours' notice. The union housed them and their children in flimsy tents through the snowy winter, and the strike held strong. The militia kept searchlights playing on the tent colonies all night long; State troopers with drawn swords rode down parades of protesting miners' wives; the Governor ordered the newspapers not to print "news calculated to injure the State"; union organizers were shot in cold blood. Finally one morning the militia, led by an officer who told his men to "shoot every God damned thing that moves," poured death into the Ludlow colony and set the tents afire. Beneath one cellar floor two miners' wives and eleven children were found dead the next day, and estimates of the dead ran from twenty-five to forty-five.

Against that grim background the Rockefeller Plan was born. Mr. Rockefeller said that he would rather lose all the millions invested in the coal-fields than recognize the union there. The operators refused the Governor's proposals of mediation and even Woodrow Wilson's plan for a three-year truce. But when the strike was well over and the ashes of Ludlow were cold, the Colorado Fuel and Iron Co. installed its famous Employee-Representation Plan, one of the first and certainly the most-advertised of American company-union plans.

It would be pointless here to analyze the details of that plan. It was exhaustively studied and analyzed by two investigators for the Russell Sage Foundation in 1921. (Selekman and Van Kleeck: "Employees' Representation in Management: the Colorado Fuel and Iron Co.") The company superintendents did their best to make the men vote for representatives under that plan and to take an interest in its workings. Undoubtedly Mr. Rockefeller and his associates were genuinely concerned to develop a system of company unionism which might satisfy the men without taking control of their organization out of the company hands. They did give the miners better homes and schools, clubs and bathhouses, and a method, which sometimes worked, for preventing arbitrary discharge. But the miners knew that the plan was invented to defeat their union; it was operated by their bosses. Where they were allowed to, they continued their own organization.

In 1919 the company's workers joined in the national coal strike, and there were smaller strikes, despite the company-union plan, in 1921 and 1922. And now in 1927 the company's mines are closed. Its steel mill has had to stop for lack of coal, and its railway has ceased running. The company defeated the United Mine Workers, but the I. W. W. has taken its place. The mine workers even charge that the companies encouraged the I. W. W., hoping thus to divide the workers and crush both unions.

Must we have more Ludlows before the right of Colorado miners to have their own unions can be recognized? The story of the last few weeks is painfully and perilously reminiscent. The strike was called to begin on October 16. On the night of October 15 a gang of thugs, who advertised themselves as vigilantes upholding law and order, broke in the door of the I. W. W. hall in Walsenburg and sacked the place. According to the Denver Post and the Pueblo Chieftain other bands of armed citizens took the law into their own hands and attempted forcibly to deport the members of the I. W. W. But these Colorado miners are made of stern stuff. They did not flinch; they continued to strike. The walk-out spread. Singing pickets rode in their flivvers from mine to mine, carrying the news. The wives and sisters went along for the holiday, and when mine guards stood in the way they led the picket-lines. Scores were arrested; the miners announced that if pickets were being arrested they would fill the jails to overflowing. They refuse to plead guilty or not guilty: picketing, they say, is not a crime. The State Industrial Commission refuses to hear their plea on the ground that the I. W. W. is not a representative union, despite the evidence of the idle mines. The Governor has denounced the strike as "un-American," ordered the National Guard to be recruited up to full strength, sent airplanes to watch the picketers, and dispatched a group of national-guard officers to warn the workers against picketing on pain of martial law—and there the matter now stands.

It sounds perilously like 1914.

The Harvard War Memorial

ONE million dollars is the sum sought of Harvard graduates for the war memorial in memory of those Harvard men who died—on the Allied side; those who died because they conscientiously believed in Germany and her cause are not to be so honored, if we are correctly informed. Of this large sum not much over half has been subscribed. The reason for this is not difficult to seek: It is because a great modern church is to be erected on the site of the historic Appleton Chapel opposite to the Widener Library, thus further dwarfing, if not ruining, what is left of open space in that part of the College Yard.

Appleton Chapel is not a thing of great beauty; it belongs to no school or period, but it has been there a long time and, what is more important, it completely fills the need for a college church. But now it must go and the million dollars to come are not, as has been suggested, to recreate some beautiful old colonial church, say by Bulfinch; it is to build a tremendous modern cathedral of an entirely different type. The money is not to be productive. The income from it is not to help to do away with war and make impossible further useless sacrifices of young Harvard lives. It is not to be made into a foundation using its income to aid struggling students or in supplying some of the spiritual needs of the university. No, it is to go into a brick-and-mortar structure far larger than is needed, and Harvard graduates are being told that "the honor of Harvard demands that this honor of her sons be lastingly recognized." Jewish and Catholic graduates are being dunned like the rest for this Protestant memorial.

This blundering is the more remarkable because Harvard has on its own grounds the ghastliest example of war-memorial folly to be found anywhere. Memorial Hall, a monument of post-Civil War ugliness, stands unused near the Chapel. Long a dining-hall and the scene of Commencement exercises, it is now utilized for concerts and scattering lectures. It cannot be torn down, and no project has yet been worked out for remodeling and reconstructing it—no one dared suggest that the new war-memorial money be utilized to make a valuable structure out of the old Memorial Hall. No better proof could be given of the folly of attempting to build a monument for the taste and uses of the future. Yet the cry for a great big fashionable church goes on, and the Harvard Alumni Bulletin has been voicing with irritation a put-up-or-shut-up policy in reply to the many letters of protest which it has been receiving. It has declared the issue settled by the vote of certain organizations of alumni, and that is all there is to it. The error is not to be corrected.

Fortunately, men are continuing to speak out against it. Owen Wister, than whom no man was bloodthirstier in the war days, finds the proposed church out of place, and so does John Mead Howells, the architect who made the original suggestion that if it be a church it be a beautiful Bulfinch creation. The truth is that the day has gone by for this sort of memorial. Sensible people do not try any more to connect God and war. The small attendance at chapel will look ridiculous under its vaulted arches; if it is built there ought at least to be a Catholic chapel and a Jewish synagogue to keep it company. If Harvard University were as wise and as far-sighted as it is old and big, it would refuse to build any visible monument whatever.

An Enemy Worth Having

MOST personal organs, whether issued by an individual or a coterie, suffer in common from a distressing sort of anemia. Whether radical or conservative, devoted to imagism or to deep breathing, they look, feel, and taste so much alike that one can remember nothing about them except that they are printed on soft paper and bound up like one of Mr. Otto Kahn's speeches. Nothing of the sort can be said, however, of the substantial quarterly, The Enemy, edited and for the most part written by Wyndham Lewis. It is full of fresh ideas and intellectual excitement.

Mr. Lewis, who, by the way, recently visited America in a spirit less condescending than is usual with his countrymen, devotes most of the present issue of The Enemy to American affairs. He has one trait (and probably only one) in common with our own Mr. Mencken. That trait is the result of an insatiable interest in every phenomenon of contemporary society combined with a capacity to make an original comment on each. Whitehead is not too abstruse for him, nor Ring Lardner too popular, and in the midst of a discussion on Alexander's time philosophy he can see just how Anita Loos's fiction illustrates one of the most important tendencies of our age. Pages could not contain a catalog of his enthusiasms or his hates. He believes, for example, that Mencken and others have presented America with an inferiority complex which finds its expression in Sherwood Anderson's dithyrambs over the Negro; and he believes that the New York skyscraper is less the result of the narrowness of our island than of the competitive advertising of Big Business working among a people who have assumed that the biggest business will have the biggest skyscraper. In literature he is against James Joyce, Gertrude Stein, and all Montparnasse. He is against Mr. Lawrence's "dark God within" and against the "revolt of Asia" implied in Bolshevism. He is also against Bergson's philosophy of change, and he invents interesting classifications like the "time mind" and the "cult of the child" by which he can link James Joyce with Henri Bergson or Gertrude Stein with Anita Loos.

Mr. Lewis is a radical in the literal sense of the word—he is looking for the roots of things and as he digs down after them the dirt flies. But he accepts, on the other hand, very few of the dogmas of current radicalism and he is no part of the dominant Spirit of the Age. He sees no reason why the opponents of certain "radical" tendencies should confine themselves to dull platitude nor why all the daring and brilliance should be on one side. Perhaps, indeed, he is really that very rare and hence very valuable thing, an intelligent conservative who, for example, can criticize the ideals of the modern revolution without thereby implying that he thinks President Coolidge is a great statesman, and who can also have interesting doubts about James Joyce without suggesting any suspicion that he considers Thomas Nelson Page the greatest writer yet produced in America. As such we welcome him. For all those who fear to see radicalism solidify into dogma, the free play of his robustly critical mind and the suggestiveness of his opinions will be the source of delight. Even those who believe most firmly in all that he doubts will do well to read him, for he is an enemy worth having in a day when radicals seldom have a chance to match themselves against any except second-rate minds.

It Seems To Heywood Broun

A LITTLE biology is a dangerous thing. Particularly if it happens to be part of the equipment of a young Englishman. Let an Englishman putter around a laboratory for a year or so and he will emerge to write a novel, or a defense of the empire, or an essay on women. John Langdon-Davies took anthropology as well as biology and so his essay has become a whole book called "A Short History of Women." Biology and anthropology are both beautiful sciences to play around with. Like a good anecdote either serves to score any point you please; that is as soon as you get away from the strict confines of the particular science. For instance, here in America, it can be proved anthropologically that our immigration laws are right and excellent. It can be proved that they are all wrong. The deciding factor is the emotional complexion of the scientist who happens to be writing the article.

This is not to say that Mr. Langdon-Davies has done an unworthy book. My quarrel may be kept within small compass. To be sure I do prefer the biologists who refrain from taking a moral tone. It seems to me possible that Mr. Langdon-Davies has been unfair to "a worm-like animal called Bonellia." It is the male which moves him to indignation. "We must assume," he writes, "that in Bonellia, to be a male is part of the reward of successful parasitism, a reward purchased at the price which has always to be paid by parasites—beastly degeneracy." Now some of my best friends are parasites. It would not be impossible to write a defense of parasitism. Much of the grace, softness, and beauty of the world comes from those who cling and are supported. Even the Bible has kind words for the lilies of the field which spin no more than the male Bonellia does.

But what I had in mind was a defense of women. Langdon-Davies treats the more radical feminists almost as rudely as if they too were worm-like animals. Much that they say seems to him the most arrant sort of rubbish. It is reasonable enough to be indignant with anyone who misstates a present fact. A milder sort of impatience may be manifested against those who falsify events of the past, but when the future comes up for discussion I hold it is no part of wisdom to dismiss abruptly any guess, however fantastic may be its garment. In many fields the gift of prophecy is not given even to the scientific. And Langdon-Davies should know this, for in his book he quotes certain statements of men honored in their day whose words now seem to have dwindled to myth and superstition. Today's axiom can be tomorrow's folly.

God set a great, deep gulf between "This has not happened" and "This can never be." The younger biologist is far too sharp and short with "the ridiculous assertions of a certain type of extreme feminist who would have us believe that women, educated and trained like men, would have the muscles and stamina of men." "Women," this author decides, "are by nature the weaker sex." And he is dogmatic, too, in declaring, "No amount of gymnastics will make women on an average as muscular as men." Readily enough I will agree that at the moment of going to press women, by and large, seem less athletic than men. I rather think that this will still be true two weeks from Thursday. But, being no scientist at all, I should hesitate to hazard just what will happen one thousand years come Monday. Indeed, there is reason to quarrel with the phrase "by nature." I have heard a hundred things which men and women must deny themselves for all time because Nature is in opposition. But do these young biologists assume that natural law makes no provision for amendment? Nature is still going on and has never joined the standpat party. Perhaps she cannot spin about on a dime like the more fluid politicians, but give her time and Nature is quite competent to change her mind and ways completely. If in the course of ages there seems good reason to put male and female persons upon a physical parity Nature is quite capable of arranging it even at the expense of disturbing the biological dogma of John Langdon-Davies.

Nor am I at all certain that at least a close approximation of prowess may not be nearer than any of the laboratory men assume. They go, these scientists, to such obscure corners for proofs and tokens. The short historian of women bases many of his conclusions upon investigations made by Dr. Ales Hrdlicka among the Indians of North America. Among these findings Langdon-Davies records the fact, "Although women work hard all their lives among the Indians, they are more likely to become stout than the men." The young biologist puts this interesting phenomenon down to the sex difference in metabolism. It may be so, but I should like to know whether good Dr. Hrdlicka consulted whatever equivalent for Vogue existed among the Indians to ascertain just which figure was held by squaws to be most fascinating. As one who has seen the female form change all the way from Lillian Russell to Marilyn Miller within two decades I must admit that my faith is slim in the immutability of metabolism.

And while Dr. Hrdlicka was out among the Indians why didn't Langdon-Davies observe the headlines upon the first page of the daily journals? Is it nothing to a scientist that Trudy swam the Channel and Lenglen revolutionized the game of tennis? They are exceptions, to be sure, but Nature seems to be a scout in constant search for variation. Ederles of some other day may cross even broader expanses of tumultuous water sporting like dolphins as they do it. Nor is it so that Trudy is solitary in her prowess. In every long swim of the past season some woman has been well up among the contenders. Nobody knows just how many men in all the world can vanquish Suzanne at tennis. My guess is about two hundred, and even if this estimate ought to be higher there would remain thousands and thousands of men incapable of matching her skill despite the advantages of male metabolism.

The story does not end with the tally of a few women in golf and tennis and the water. The gap between good female golf and that of men grows slighter. Here at least the scientist should avail himself of facts since they are capable of being set down in figures just as precise as anything which Dr. Hrdlicka may have found among the savage redskins. No figures will be supplied here at the moment. Let it suffice that ten years ago it was almost unheard of for a woman to break eighty even at the shorter courses. Now the thing is a commonplace. To be sure, the golfing standard of the male has also undergone an improvement but not at the pace set by the women. An unscientific mind cannot be shaken from the theory that when two objects are moving in the same direction at dissimilar speed the one which goes a little faster is in time likely to overtake the other even though it starts out in the rear. Golf might be ruled out as not among the key activities of human life, but at that I think it may have more importance upon the growing equality of the sexes than the unfortunate habit of Indian women to grow stouter. Nor would it be a bad idea for biologists to take vacations now and then from their bonellia and other barnacles. It is one thing to show by graphs and charts that woman is the weaker vessel, but when a man gets on a tennis court against some girl with a good forehand drive his statistics will avail him nothing. Then he'll have to prove it.

British Finance and the Labor Party

By J. RAMSAY MacDONALD

OUR Tory press is once more working up frenzy over the new financial program of the Labor Party, and as the Liberals are beating drums for a revival, they follow suit. The United States is freed from our problems of national finance, but as our position is not without interest across the Atlantic and Labor views on finance had better not be taken from prejudiced or ignorant sources, an explanation of the new program may be helpful. The patrons of The Nation will not have forgotten the suppressed panic which preceded the assumption of office by Labor in 1924, the flight of capital which nobody missed here, and, later on, its sneaking return, diminished, I am glad to say, by its journeyings. The same panic will be tried again and, I make bold to prophesy, with the same results.

In 1922 the Labor Party committed itself to a levy upon capital for the sole purpose of paying off a substantial part of the national debt. It was not to be repeated; it was to be one effort. Nevertheless, the Tory press shrieked about thrift and confiscation, and only when it found that the mass of the people were wiser, calmer minded, and knew more about economics than it thought, did it settle down to argument. The Capital Levy was undoubtedly a good electioneering cry for us, and it was also a sound economic proposition. The political difficulties of the levy were never minimized by the party, however. When national stock was held in vast quantities by the people who would have to pay the levy, its collection would have been easy because the bulk of it could be paid in national bonds of one kind or another, and capital invested in industry need hardly have been touched. From that point of view, a levy now would not be so easy as in 1922. Moreover, sinking funds have been created, and movements in money have raised some doubts as to whether, at this time of day, a large decrease in the debt would be worth the effort required to pay it. The Colwyn Committee (so called because Lord Colwyn was its chairman) was appointed by the Labor Government in 1924 to inquire into the effect of our heavy taxation upon industry and to make recommendations. The chief value of its report is that it makes it clear that an income tax has but a small adverse effect upon national economy, and that the sinking fund should be raised from £50,000,000 or £60,000,000 to £100,000,000 per annum. Thereupon the discussion on the effect of a national debt has been revived, and at the moment the arguments are in favor of not fussing too much about it.

But the debt is a political problem as well as a financial one. A budget of £800,000,000 per annum looks alarming, and though the country has too much common sense to rush blindly into an economy cry, the taxation imposed does seem to have reached the limit, and if public opinion may not clamor for retrenchment it is not inclined to support expansion. Of this enormous budget about £380,000,000 is chargeable to the debt services. Various moralists may point out that the real value of the debt capital has doubled since 1918, and that those who gave the state ten shillings in 1914-1918 now get from a pound to thirty shillings in return; but no one has yet been able to devise a method of rectifying that anomaly short of doing serious damage to national good faith. So the burden is borne and will be borne. If there is retrenchment in our taxation or a determination not to expand, it is not the holders of the debt who will suffer; it is those who need social service like education, state insurance, pensions, health. That has to be understood, for that is the key to the Labor Party position. It will commit no act of bad faith to its creditors, but it will fight for an efficient system of social service.

An important consideration must here be noted. Generally speaking, the debt is held by the wealthy who complain most of the high income tax. But let us see what happens to them and their taxes. They receive their income-tax demand and dig a hole in their bank balance to pay it. In due course they receive their interest on their debt-holdings and with that fill up the hole made by their taxation. That simple transference from a bank balance to the Treasury and from the Treasury back to a bank balance is literally true when we think of the position of the wealthy class as a whole. The tax necessary to pay our debt is no burden upon the wealthy class whose sacrifices are in appearance only; and yet that appearance enables them to cry out for a crippling of the social services, and they find a willing ear in our present Government. That so much of the taxation paid by the rich finds its way back into their own pockets is one of the reasons why we find no traces of a shortness of necessary capital, and no limitation of the shameless and Byzantine display of wealth extravagantly and vulgarly used.

Nor is that all. The high budget totals give chancellors the excuse, not only for cutting down the costs of enlightened government, but for imposing indirect taxes upon necessities which keep the cost of living higher and reduce the real value of wages. Our poorer people are paying more for essential government than ever they did; our rich, far less than their just share. Our present system of taxation is ingeniously devised to make the rich suffer nothing and the poor pay for services which they are supposed to require by reason of their normal poverty.

To rectify this, the Labor proposals have been drafted. They advocate a surtax which will be graded but which will average two shillings in the pound upon unearned incomes of over £500 per annum. Were this done we should only be back to 1918, and when we remember how much of existing taxation is not a burden but a transfer, the real weight of taxation would not be much, if at all, heavier than it was before the war. When a political party talks about thrift it generally has its tongue in its cheek; when it uses it for electioneering purposes its tongue is always there. A Conservative paper which stated that if a workman who has saved £10,000 finds he has to pay a pound or two in extra income tax he will not save at all, had the same knowledge of life as the Liberal organ which informed its readers that when a workman saved £500 the Labor Party would begin to confiscate the rest, had of the English language.

Thrift will not be affected, the necessary supply of new capital will not be curtailed. The pull in favor of the financier and money lender in the distribution of national wealth caused by a big national debt will be modified in the interest of the masses of the people and the figures of taxation will be made to conform to reality of sacrifice and be deprived of the fiction which they now bear. Only this and nothing more will be the result of the new financial proposals of the Labor Party.

Higher Education in Chicago

By LAWRENCE MARTIN

WHEN "Big Bill" Thompson put on his whirlwind campaign in Chicago last spring he won on the strength of the thumping show he offered. He jazzed politics. In his strident and colorful burlesque he made use of such properties as faked tar-paper, rats named after his enemies, descriptions of his whiskered rival's method of eating eggs, and thundered revelations of the British lion's designs on Chicago's independence. He charged freely that Anglophile propaganda was having free play in the schools. He promised that as Mayor one of his first acts would be to drive the Superintendent of Schools, William McAndrew, "that stool-pigeon of King George," out of town. On the day of his inauguration Thompson appointed J. Lewis Coath as president of the school board. Coath vowed he would have McAndrew discharged before September 1.

In 1915—to place the show in its setting—Ella Flagg Young, then Superintendent, created the position of extra-teacher (commonly called teacher-clerk) for the purpose of assisting the principals of large schools. According to Section 129 of the School Law of 1917 all employees of the school system except superintendent, business manager, attorneys, principals, and teachers must come under the civil-service law. The school board ignored this law until the matter became an issue in the suit of Brennan, a stationary fireman, in 1925. In June, 1927, the State Supreme Court refused to review the Appellate Court's decision, making it mandatory upon the Board of Education to abide by the letter of the school law. On August 3 the attorney for the board, James Todd, prepared a resolution which, over the protest of Superintendent McAndrew, was adopted by the nine members present, to bring the board's action into complete harmony with the decisions. Particularly, it directed the Superintendent "to forthwith arrange for the transfer to instructional work of all members of the teaching force who have been assigned to any other line of employment," and "to forthwith make requisition for the appointment by the civil-service commission of such employees as may be necessary to carry on the clerical and business administrative activites of the education department."

Two weeks later the extra-teachers filed a petition for injunction to prevent enforcement of this resolution by the Superintendent and the board. Evidence was heard before a master in chancery, and the first and chief witness for the plaintiff was the Superintendent of Schools, who had been made technically a defendant. It was disclosed that Mr. McAndrew had opposed the board's resolution; that he regarded it as a personal matter directed against him; that he had taken no steps to put the order into effect; and that prior to the filing of the bill of complaint he had been in conference with the teachers' attorney without informing the board's attorney of his intentions.

Mr. McAndrew contended that the matter turned on the question whether teacher-clerks should be considered clerks or teachers. He maintained that they were teachers, that the resolution had been drawn without consulting him, and that the "haste and misunderstanding evident . . . justifies all legitimate means to prevent the resolution to be put into effect." Therefore, he declared, "as a defendant, I admit the allegations of the bill and admit that the complainant is entitled to the relief asked."

As a result of this clash between McAndrew and Todd, the latter brought resolutions before the board which Mr. Coath accepted as a mandate for the ousting of the Superintendent. Accordingly, on August 29 charges of insubordination were filed against McAndrew and he was suspended. But when he came to trial before the Board of Education thirty days later he was confronted with a bill of particulars enlarging the original complaint to include "conduct incompatible with and in direct violation of his duties as superintendent"—and unpatriotic acts.

It was specifically charged that the Superintendent was continually insubordinate and insolent, that he disregarded direct orders from the board, that he had refused to call teachers' council meetings, and that he had hindered withdrawal of a textbook written by a member of the school system. Another group of complaints stated that he

> Absented himself from duty without leave;
> Left his office frequently to go on lecture tours;
> Edited an educational magazine subsidized by a firm of book publishers;
> Introduced a program of education which caused confusion and impaired teacher morale;
> Employed various persons without examination.

Finally came the charges of unpatriotism and subversion:

> Recommended pro-British texts;
> Recommended texts in order to make the Declaration of Independence seem old-fashioned;
> For purpose of perverting the patriotic instincts of school-children, caused to be removed from school walls the picture, "Spirit of '76";
> Refused to recommend to the board that school-children donate sums for reconditioning Old Ironsides;
> Entered into conspiracy with Charles Merriam and Charles H. Judd and others to destroy love of America in the hearts of children.

Probably not one of these charges is well founded, and most of them are merely ridiculous. For example, while it is true that McAndrew did not favor the teachers' councils, the board itself refused three years ago to give official ear to the protest of the Teachers' Federation that he was not calling meetings, thereby becoming a party to the offense of which it now accuses the Superintendent. Such at least is the opinion of Margaret Haley, business manager of the federation and no friend of McAndrew. Undoubtedly McAndrew made lecture trips, but other Chicago superintendents have done the same without incurring the board's displeasure.

The charge that McAndrew had "introduced a program of education which caused confusion and impaired teacher morale" is peculiarly disingenuous. McAndrew's educational ideas are what led to his appointment as superintendent of Chicago's schools. The "program" he introduced included the establishment of a bureau of research, such as exists in most progressive cities, for the purpose of educational experiment and progress. The bureau was bitterly opposed by the Teachers' Federation, which claimed that the tests administered were harmful to the children and led to insidious discriminations between rich and poor. The anti-McAndrew feeling created by the federation is now being capitalized by the Thompson crowd to attack McAndrew for the very methods he was chosen to instal.

The Board of Education apparently has forgotten that McAndrew is being tried primarily for insubordination. Perhaps word has gone out from Boss Thompson's office to play up the patriotic stuff which worked so magically in the campaign last spring, and which may constitute Big Bill a national figure if the population of the rest of the country is as readily beguiled as that of Chicago. Whatever the reason, the trial, which started as a star-chamber on insubordination, is definitely committed to finding McAndrew guilty of scheming to make the United States a part of the British Empire.

Big Bill himself has written a letter of warning to George V, and has circularized nationally known men asking them to come to Chicago to testify regarding pro-British activities in the United States. In a country as heavily endowed with leisure and wealth as ours it is not difficult for Thompson to find cranks, alarmists, and publicity seekers to regale the world with old wives' tales of the schemes and machinations of the English Speaking Union and British bankers to bind America to Great Britain with hoops of intrigue and perfidy.

The definite charges against McAndrew of "aiming to poison American history with pro-British lies" turn on an "investigation" made by Congressman John J. Gorman, at the instance of the Mayor, of history texts for the purpose of discovering evidences of British propaganda. The Congressman's report, which purported to be a survey of the books used in the Chicago public schools either introduced or retained by McAndrew, bristles with inaccuracies and misstatements. Most of the books complained of were in use in the schools before McAndrew was appointed, many having been introduced during the previous Thompson administration. The history particularly selected for the patriotic wrath of Gorman, Muzzey's "History of the American People," is not used in the Chicago schools. Sentences quoted by Gorman are mutilated and lifted out of their proper texts; for example, in quoting Muzzey's sentence, "the Boston tea party was the last straw—the colonists had added insult to injury," the investigator omitted four words at the end: "in King George's eyes." As a result of these deliberate misrepresentations, Professor Muzzey has filed suit against the author of the report.

The first of the patriotism charges—that McAndrew caused the removal of the picture known as the "Spirit of '76" from school walls—is based on a statement by the Superintendent that the picture represented a belligerent spirit which was hardly one to hold up as the ideal for children. Principals of about a dozen schools in which this picture occupied a prominent place thereupon removed it. As to Old Ironsides, it has been for years the practice here not to dun children for money. The third charge, that of conspiring against the country with University of Chicago scholars through the teachers' courses offered at the university, is probably the most ridiculous of all. Here the main avenue of propaganda is Professor Schlesinger's text, "New Viewpoints in American History," which was the Mayor's target in last spring's campaign circus. There is talk of having a special history written for the schools, calculated to instil "old-fashioned" ideals. Milton Fairman in the Publishers' Weekly points out that "the city's book bill is one of the largest in the country—$989,000," and that those who profess to know believe that "the veil of patriotism is being used to disguise very mercenary motives. . . . A tidy fortune awaits the firm which publishes a 100 per cent American text for more than 500,000 children."

Finally, a word about personalities. It is believed by some that Mr. McAndrew was often brusque and tactless. Manifestly he failed to adapt himself to the situation which arose, but it must be admitted that to adapt oneself to Chicago's Coaths, Haleys, Todds, and Thompsons, and still not degenerate into a pussyfooter and an errand-boy is a tremendous contract.

Meantime the continuous vaudeville show goes on. Maintaining that the trial is illegal regarding all charges except the original one of insubordination (since he was not given the legal thirty days in which to reply to the others) the suspended Superintendent refuses to answer questions dealing with his alleged unpatriotic practices.

This fails to trouble the six members who vote solidly against him on every disputed point. The cards are stacked; the trial is a farce. One of the six is Trustee Hemingway, who brought the original charge. Another is Coath, Thompson's president, who is accuser, judge, and executioner-in-prospect all in one.

The two parties to the combat, including the trustees, sit on opposite sides of the room. In the front row sits the accused. His curly beard, white but tinged with red, sometimes bristles at the proceedings, but for the most part he leans back unconcernedly in a swivel chair, reading the afternoon paper from headlines to comics, or gossips with friends and colleagues, while Attorney Todd thunders on about Georges III and V, and defense counsel object, only to be automatically overruled by the honorable Judge Coath's ready gavel.

The trial is a political gesture, whose object is to drag the proceedings along until the end of McAndrew's term in January. Should he be discharged tomorrow he could seek legal review and might get an order of reinstatement. But by dragging out the case the Thompson six can drop the charges a few days before the end of the Superintendent's term, leaving him without legal redress.

Weeping the Bone

By ANITA BRENNER

MACBETH feared the ghost at the feast, but Mexico makes a feast for the ghost. All-Saints' Day and All Souls' Day, November 1 and 2, are the Mexican Hallowe'en and mark one of the gaiest holidays of the year. Each is a Dead Men's Day—the day the ghosts come home to eat, drink, and be merry.

In the villages the Indians perform the same rites as in pre-Spanish times, fitted into their version of Catholicism. The Aztecs believed that, except for warriors and women dead in childbirth, life hereafter had much in common with life on earth. Hence each corpse was buried with his personal sleeping-mat rolled around him, and was given food—if only a crock of beans—and other possessions he needed for the journey to the hereafter: strips of colored paper to pay whatever fees might be convenient, effigies of his family, servants, or himself, perhaps jewelry, and always a single precious stone, jade or coral for the rich, obsidian or basalt for the poor, which was called "the heart."

A small yellow dog, in ashes, always accompanied his master to the other world. Through the mountains that perpetually knock together and over the bridge made narrow and thin for the bad and wide for the good, to the river which was at the end of the journey, the canine trotted along. The river was wide and there was no way of crossing except to swim, and alone no man could do it. The dog, therefore, supported the man's hand on his collar, and thus helped him across. White or black dogs were said to be too proud to proffer this service. There was a famous dog market at Acolman, where were sold both fattened pups for the epicureans and the amiable yellow plebeian guides to the underworld.

Once a year the dead return. On All-Saints' Day the family watches at night as if at a wake—a Mexican wake—singing, praying, drinking, making love, telling tales. Not praying for the dead, but, in their own words, "praying to the dead." Each family sets a table generously spread with beans, chile, rice, tortillas, baked pumpkins, yams, and pulque or a bluish maize drink to wash it down. More delicacies are provided if the family can afford it.

On the second day—All Souls' Day—come the ghosts of the children. Sweets, cakes, fruit, and toys are laid out for them. There are candy skulls, pastry coffins, ribs and thigh-bones made of frosted sugar, tombstones, wreaths, candles, and whole funerals in miniature and in confectionery. Everybody goes picnicking to the graveyards and spreads the goodies on the tombs. The extra mourners receive special consideration at the feast, for helping to "weep the bone." But there is not much weeping, for the Mexican ghosts are cheerful ha'nts, with all the guitar-strumming and amorous, inebriate tendencies of more visible days. On the morning after it is over, the living eat the food the dead have left on the altar table.

An occasional note of sorrow strikes the basic chord of the Mexican symphony: A lone man, face down on a fresh grave, murmuring brokenly into the sod . . . putting his ear to the ground to listen . . . resuming the murmur. There is, too, a timelessness about the graves molded with yellow and purple flowers, wreathed in moving strands of many-colored tissue paper, set with flaming candles, and giving off the heavy incense of romero, the traditional blossom of the season and holy for centuries past.

The Indians are not the only ones to entertain their ancestors and dead acquaintances on Dead Men's Day. The most fashionable pastry-shop in cosmopolitan Mexico City yearly displays this sign: Buy Your Dead Men's Bread Here. The city cemeteries are as full of picnickers as the village graveyards, and the city candy-stores blossom with bewildering numbers of skulls—white, with luscious red cherries for eyes and luscious grins on their mouths—miniature funerals of expensive milk chocolate, funeral wreaths of tiny candied fruits, a fascinating array. And though the sweets and other dainties of the season are especially for the dead, no child in the city but wakes up on Dead Men's Day asking for his "funeral" or at least his "skull."

From "Dead Men's Day," published by Antonio Vanegas Arroyo, Mexico City

The pottery booths, multiplying for this carnival time, seem veritable dances of death. The small clay statuettes, on sale throughout the year, representing more or less realistically people in all classes and all professions, on Dead Men's Day are supplanted by equally realistic skeletons of those same people. There is the drunkard, a wobbly skeleton tightly clasping his bottle and his ladylove with coy expression on her fleshless face. There is the carpenter and the fruit-seller, the priest and the scholar, the poet and the prostitute, Don Juan and the president, a nun and a newsboy, the fat horseman of the sierras and the swarthy bull-fighter of the arenas—all in skeleton—not to mention the bob-haired modern girl and the foreign tourist—in sizes from half an inch to half a meter, and all caught in characteristic poses. It is an impressive travesty, and skilfully done.

The press, crystallizing the spirit of the moment, becomes a sort of dead men's record, and so strong is the suggestion that even ordinary pages of daily news appear fantastic, and one can scarcely make distinctions between dead and alive, between past and present, between fancy and fact. Special editions of comic publications publish political and theatrical caricatures, in skull and skeleton form, of dead and living notables, with an "epitaph" in verse depicting their virtues and fatal weaknesses. Satirical news items are printed.

A popular ballad suggests this very cleverly, under the pretext of "giving the newsboy his skull":

He knows what he sells is lies;
And all the news he releases
The daily the dead man buys
Tears into little pieces.

This daily takes care to tell
News of the opposite hue.
It makes a few bones and a smell
Of all that the live men do.

Black print in white is seen,
Truth appears out of lies,
The fat man becomes quite lean,
And the live man usually dies.

There is no blasphemy in this grotesque humor, nor is it indeed a conscious effort at humor. It is part of the Indian heritage, most amazingly common to all Mexico. It is at the same time the paradoxical Mexican mood—the vacilada—taking nothing, not even death, at its face value. Where death is, and has been, a familiar and terribly frequent guest, there is little room for sentimentalism. If this familiarity does not exactly breed contempt, it surely laughs at the European terror of an unknown visitor. It is a significant attitude. For here is the most tremendous of mysteries put into its physical place, implying that all other mysteries may, by the same token, be given their physical places.

Americans We Like

Alexander Meiklejohn

By LUCIEN PRICE

The Sixth in a Series of Personality Portraits

THERE is a tradition about one of the English cathedrals that its finest window was assembled from bits of broken stained-glass thrown away by the artisans in making the others. Four years ago last spring there was considerable stained-glass of a high quality thrown away by one of our American sanctuaries of learning. It is four years since Dr. Alexander Meiklejohn was eliminated from the presidency of Amherst College. As Brittingham Professor of Philosophy at the University of Wisconsin he is now being permitted to establish within the precincts of that institution an Experimental College which has opened its doors this autumn.

It is one of the laws of life that a steadfast creative purpose is able to create its own instruments. It is a rugged plant. Cut it down here, it sprouts there. By the same law it would appear that a man with a vigorous creative purpose finds himself automatically eliminated from a situation where he can work to less advantage and transferred to one where he can work to a greater. It has happened to more than one college president in our time. How disheartening it must be to have eliminated Woodrow Wilson from the presidency of Princeton only to find yourself confronted with Woodrow Wilson as war-President of the United States. Shortly after Mr. Meiklejohn's removal from Amherst I was permitted to read a letter which he had just received from ex-President Wilson. Analogy was written all over it.

Why was Mr. Meiklejohn removed from Amherst College? The dust of that affray having settled, the issues are now, I think, clear. Mr. Meiklejohn was removed from Amherst College for endeavoring to turn a delightful country club into an institution of learning. The immediate occasion was that he was making possible the teaching of upper and middle-class American boys to examine our modern civilization with candid eyes and to think for themselves. The agents of an alarmed ruling class put a stop to it.

To call Mr. Meiklejohn a radical is absurd. His impartiality is the despair of fanatics. His position quite simply is that a delightful country club is no place to prepare youngsters for their duties as citizens of a republic in an increasingly precarious age. This, be it remarked, would hold true equally for the crown princes of a ruling class and for a nobler type of youth attuned to higher standards of generosity and justice. And now the Athenian Academe which might have been established at Amherst has migrated to the shores of Lake Mendota.

On these shores, somewhat apart from the other buildings of the university, is a new dormitory for men. This is to bivouac the experiment and to house at least a part of its 250 students and perhaps dozen instructors. It is to be a college within a college—that desideratum of our elephantine universities: the small and highly personalized group enjoying access to the riches of a large academic community. One hundred and twenty-five have been admitted (on application) this year as freshmen; the rest will be admitted next autumn. They will enjoy full standing in the freshman and, in due season, the sophomore classes of the university. There is no attempt to choose exceptional students. The group is to be, so far as possible, a cross-section typical of the university. Lecture and class-room methods of teaching will be discarded in favor of that method of teaching through discussion in small groups which succeeded so well in certain courses at Amherst. The work of the first year is expected to be a study of the Hellenic civilization, especially that period of its flowering which is known as the Great Age. The second year's work, as yet undecided, will be a comparative study of some modern industrial civilization, perhaps that of England in the nineteenth century.

This choice is not surprising. The slant of Mr. Meiklejohn's mind is definitely Hellenic and there has always been in him a bit of the old Socrates. One trait of this is his relish of dialectic; others are his lively humor, his robust good sense, and his detachment from proselyting zeal. He has the serene confidence—Greek through and through—that, win in the short run though such zeal may, in the longer run the force of lucid intelligence and free inquiry can be relied on to carry the field.

In the history of such forces two thousand years—nineteen hundred and twenty-seven of them, to be exact—may be accounted a short run. And here, be it understood, I speak of the Hellenic tradition quite dissociated from Mr. Meiklejohn, the Experimental College, or the University of Wisconsin. I speak of it as it vitally concerns our land and time.

As things are in America today is there anything which young and active minds could study with more profit than the Hellenic civilization? A boy who has once seen our Machine Age from the outside is forever after protected from it. Never again will he be taken in by it, never again accept it as the be-all and end-all. To invent machines may require creative ability of a high order. But this creating of machines is the work of a comparatively few minds, and the use to which the machines thus created are generally put is not creative but acquisitive. Machinery can transmit, transport, disseminate, and popularize. It cannot originate. What, then, will be the quality of the cultural material thus disseminated? Could the age which hailed the printing-press as the salvation of society but see an American newspaper! And what will be the origin of the cultural material to be disseminated? That was the question of the Roman Empire yesterday. It is the question of the American Republic today. Wipe out America's merely material achievement (as time so surely does) and how much of the imperishable would you have left? How rich a spiritual heritage could American thinkers and artists bequeath to humanity?

Is a creative force to be liberated in the minds of our youth vigorous enough to originate a culture of our own, based, it is true, on our European traditions, but indigenous to our soil and conferring some unique enrichment on the human spirit? The clearest spring I know, of waters which embolden youth to know itself, to trust itself, to be itself, to "make music and create," is Hellas. The Greeks were of our own breed. Their blood runs in our brains. Their powers were not inhibited by a conception of conflict between flesh and spirit gnawing like a canker at the very core of life. No agonizing ascetics, they knew how to take nature naturally. They knew—as Hellenic spirits in every age have known—that it is more blessed to create than to enjoy. Or as that radiant and sunlit Hellenic spirit of Judea worded the same idea: it is more blessed to give than to receive. With this knowledge comes health of mind. A man exercising his creative faculty on a task which he can believe in as an ennoblement and enrichment of human life is a happy man. Passionate absorption in such a task generates of its own momentum a stern self-discipline. Its ethical code happens not to be yours or mine? That is none of our business.

Youth will no longer be dragooned. Veto and credo have collapsed. But sincere creative effort also creates a surrounding code of values. It is more noble to create than to enjoy. It is also more enjoyable. That is good which furthers creative effort. That is less good which hinders it.

It is to some such quarter that I look for that ennobled generation of youth which is so surely coming and for the standards of high conduct which such youth will so surely fashion for themselves. Our prophets of cynicism and unfaith have their value. They demolish shams. But ask them "Where shall I look for the good and the beautiful?" and your only answer is a scoff to cover their embarrassment. They do not know. It is easy to destroy. To create is difficult. Our apostles of demolition, our sitters in the seat of the scornful may do a useful work. But the world does not cherish the memory of what you destroyed. All the world cares to remember is what you created. The future does not care what you scorned. All the future cares for is what you loved.

The good and the beautiful, where are they to be found? The war, by deflating traditional Christianity, has jolted this question into the foreground. Does it strike no one as singular, to say the least, that directly the war was over came a flood of books—serious works many of which have had an astonishing circulation—on Hellenic culture?

Wherever it may be that the good and the beautiful are to be found, I believe Mr. Meiklejohn is one of those exceptionally well endowed for the search. He is one of the toilers along the levees of American education able to stop at least a few of the leaks through which the spiritual forces of our youth are bursting to the devastation of the land. Young lives that felt the glow of his intellect and the charm of his personality at Amherst have gone on blossoming and bringing forth good fruit. His power is all the more sure for being so difficult to define. Two years ago I happened into a city and a college on the Pacific Coast where he had sojourned and spoken. It was a year since his departure, and their minds were still full of him. What had he said? They were somewhat inarticulate, as people always are when they have been profoundly moved. What had he done? Well, this and that. But I knew what he had done. He had brought exhilaration. For he wields some sort of electricity of the intellect which is charged with the power of the spirit.

Who will breathe into the foul and fetid cabaret stench of our American neo-Rome a breath from the spirit of immortal Hellas? Who will teach us that we Americans have it in us to be something nobler than merely one more ant-horde of empire-builders, that we have it in us to cause another Athens to arise? That new Athens, that America of artists and thinkers, of free spirits and creative minds, must arise in many places. Why may not one of them be a dormitory on the shores of Lake Mendota?

EVERY country that is worth its salt has some craft for which it is world famous. France excels in cookery, England in cutlery, and Morocco in kidnappery. Without question the industry of kidnapping has been more highly and more artistically developed in Al-Moghreb Al-Aksa than anywhere else on our planet. From the time more than a quarter century ago when President Roosevelt made his electrifying demand "Perdicaris alive or Raisuli dead," down to the recent abduction of two of Governor General Steeg's nephews and the women who were with them, the highest-paid and the best-advertised kidnappers have been those of the country of the Farthest West.

* * * * *

THE fact that a Paris newspaper dispatched a representative by airplane to write the story of the latest Moroccan kidnapping, and negotiate with the abductors, is of itself proof of the quality of the exploit. The Drifter does not recall that a New York newspaper has ever hurried a correspondent by airplane, or even by ox cart, to negotiate for the release of any kidnappee in Mexico. But the Moroccan bandits have always known how to use the press. They have treated "the boys" right and the correspondents have made them rich and famous. This friendship between the newspaper correspondents and the captains of kidnappery is a matter of long-standing tradition. When the Drifter was in Morocco a good many years ago —just after the capture and ransom of Sir Harry Maclean —the said Drifter sought some information about Raisuli, the hero of the exploit, from an English newspaper correspondent living in Tangier. "Raisuli," said the correspondent pleasantly, "well, if you are interested, I'll invite you in to have tea with him some time when he is in town." The tea got put off, but the Drifter learned that Morocco's premier brigand was anything but a cutthroat outlaw; on the contrary, he enjoyed the acquaintance and respect of some of the leading European residents. He was especially respected in financial circles, having an account of impressive dimensions with one of the French banks.

* * * * *

RAISULI was not only Morocco's premier brigand, creator of the traditions that have made her kidnappery famous, but next to Robin Hood he was perhaps the best-loved man of his calling in history. Don Perdicaris, who indirectly made Raisuli a world figure through inspiring President Roosevelt's message, has himself testified to the courtesy, charm, and urbanity of his host. In an account of his stay with Raisuli—the latter would not for a long time hear of his leaving—Perdicaris said that the bandit chief was much put to it at first to determine what to do with the 70,000 silver Spanish dollars that were part of the ransom.

> To the great amusement of Mulai Ali [wrote Perdicaris], and to my own considerable astonishment, the solution of this troublesome question which Raisuli proposed was that "La Senora," as the natives called my wife, should receive the $70,000 from Torres and deposit the money to her own credit in Tangier at the bank where we were accustomed to cash our checks, and that he [Raisuli] might then draw upon Mrs. Perdicaris as occasion should require.

The counting of the ransom, wrote Perdicaris, was an occasion of great formality. Finally > "The silver," said Raisuli, addressing me, "has been counted . . . but these letters," showing me as he spoke a checkbook containing certified checks on the Comptoir d'Escompte, the French bank at Tangier, "of the value of these, which are supposed to represent $50,000, I know nothing. However, I will accept them on your personal guaranty, but on that condition only."

Perdicaris readily guaranteed the excellence of the bank checks, but he declined the suggestion that his wife should become Raisuli's banker. That, he explained, might lead to misunderstanding, whereupon Raisuli promptly withdrew the request.

* * * * *

POOR Raisuli! And magnificent Raisuli too! He has gone to his last reward—or should one say to his last ransom? For many years there were reports at periodic intervals that Raisuli was dead; and a short time after, he turned up again in the news dispatches in some fresh exploit. But for a couple of years or more there has not been a single report of the death of Raisuli. It must be, therefore, that this king of the kidnappers has passed from the scene, and the tea-party for which the Drifter has been waiting will never take place. THE DRIFTER

The American Plan

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

Sir: A few days ago I saw that General Somebody, whose name I have forgotten, has arrived in Nicaragua to supervise the election next year. In order to guarantee fair election, after the American plan, I respectfully suggest to the State Department that Messrs. Vare, of Pennsylvania, and Smith, of Illinois, be added, making a commission of three.

Reparations for Robbers

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: "Only Congress," wailed the New York Times in its headline at the time of the Supreme Court decision on Teapot Dome, "can repay Sinclair the millions he spent on property." On page 23 of that issue, under an obscure one-line head, was the statement that Colonel Robert Stewart, chairman of the board of the Standard Oil of Indiana, had no comment to make on the decision. Why do our newspapers step so lightly around the Standard of Indiana, which was a co-partner with Sinclair in building tanks and pipelines to steal oil from the American public? Sinclair merely did the dirty work of bribing Fall; the Standard spent half the millions "only Congress can repay."

This plaint about the cruelty of the Supreme Court, which allowed no legal redress for the money spent to consummate the theft, was the beginning, I take it, of an organized ballyhoo for the reimbursement of all hard-pressed oil patriots. Obviously, the taxpayers should repay them. I think that Congress should reimburse also every burglar who invests in a kit of tools for an abortive job, and every stock promoter who contracts an engraving bill for an unsuccessful fraud.

The Police of Monrovia

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In a recent letter to The Nation appeared the following, over the signature of Thomas L. Dabney, organizer of the American Negro Labor Congress:

> America is a land of oppression, murder, lynching and crude civilization. Nowhere, so far as I know, are police so ignorant, arrogant, crude, and uncivil as in America. For my own part I have long since lost faith in America to lead the world in anything except mob rule, murder, race prejudice, and oppression.

Good, brave men seldom become policemen, and such are subject to an extremely corrupting environment. But police methods tend everywhere to be brutal through mere consciousness of power in the minds of inferior men. Negroes are no exceptions. In Liberia, Africa, last December, very near a monument dedicated to the nation, on which a legend reads: "The Love of Liberty Brought Us Here," I saw the chief of police of Monrovia, a Negro, torture a Negro boy with scourge and fire (hippopotamus-hide whip and lighted candle) merely to cause him to confess complicity in a trifling theft. Scourging is the commonest torture among the Liberian governing class. I would not condemn the Liberian Republic in toto for this. One might remember that these Liberians, many of them descendants of American slaves, learned whipping in the fields of the South. They have not forgotten their lesson.

Have We Forgotten Centralia?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Silence from the liberal press, to its disgrace, surrounds an American Legion crime worse by far than any of its other outrages. While the Legion elite are drunk somewhere in France, where they dodge the ghosts of Sacco and Vanzetti, permit me to remind you of the Legion's most fiendish crime.

How about Centralia? There the Legion raided our I.W.W. hall on November 11, 1919, at the instance of King Hubbard of Lumberlust, now happily dead. Our members legally defended their lives and hall against the tools of the king. Four tools paid with their lives. They turned their parade into a funeral for themselves. Fellow-worker Wesley Everett, I.W.W. member, was unsexed and lynched that night by Centralia business men who had ordered the power-house of the city to cut off the lights. The doctor who operated on Everett en route to the lynching-ground received a high political appointment as his reward from the then governor, Louis F. Hart.

Eight men are in Walla Walla Prison on a frame-up murder charge. How long, liberals, how long? Shame on you!

REINCARNATION
THE HOPE OF THE WORLD
by
The Rt. Rev. Irving S. Cooper

THE doctrine of Reincarnation teaches that man is a soul, not has a soul. That he becomes embodied in ever-improving physical forms life after life, until all earth's lessons have been learned. That every human being is in course of growth from the stage of the savage to that of the Man made Perfect. It restores justice to God and power to man. Above all, it renders life intelligible.

"Reincarnation," writes Bishop Cooper, "is one of the long-forgotten teachings of early Christianity and it forms part of the esoteric doctrine of Judaism."

The Plague of Juveniles

By REBECCA DRUCKER

THE day is gone when the whole family waited eagerly for the next instalment of "Pickwick" and it was read aloud in the family circle, as we are assured, to the uproarious delight of old and young. The family circle has gone askew and lost literary unanimity among other kinds. Literature has shed its homogeneity in the vast onrush of writing and printing. The book business has expanded into the breach and made new classifications, some natural and some artificial. The classification of the "juvenile," having in mind books for children from ten to fourteen, is one created out of the sheer enterprise of the book business.

Obviously the great juvenile classics are among the most nourishing fare of childhood. Obviously, too, the book business cannot wait for the great juveniles to mature naturally. There would be no fall or spring list of titles. There might even be no "juveniles," for the "Gullivers" and "Robinson Crusoes," the "Alices" and "Huck Finns" were not written for children, or only incidentally came to be so. The awkward age for children is the awkward age for their parents, too. They may hold the high-minded attitude that from the age of ten, or perhaps twelve, the child may read anything, but it is usually with the vague hope in reserve that the "good books" of the past will content him indefinitely. They do not. The child comes up clamoring for the present. Elders waver when they think on what arid stretches a child may be cast in the complex adult literature of the present. This is the book publisher's chance. With vast industry and with great thrift of ideas the synthetic classification is accomplished.

Looked at from the outside this synthetic literature looks like a real one. All the departments of adult writing seem to be there in a kind of doll-house replica—fiction, biography, history, folk-lore, tales of travel, science, and invention. It is only on examination that one perceives that it is sleazily written, insubstantial in information, and makeshift in character. It is obviously conceded that an author needs less talent to write for a child than for an adult. No one doubts that less charm will serve to win the child. Besides, the purpose of all this writing is not to charm him.

Between the ages of ten and fourteen the child is presumed to be material for firm molding. The bulk of this writing is heavily utilitarian. It is to instil right sentiments, to guide and inspire him, and to render him useful information. The fiction device is a favored one for conveying information. Young children's books, being an organic part of literature, have undergone some development, but "juveniles" show few changes. The motor devices of the stories are high-powered automobiles, airplanes, and submarines, but the children who inhabit them are out of St. Nicholas of the eighties.

The sensuality and cruelty of childhood fairy tales are done with. In the "juvenile" no Rapunzel lets down her golden hair, no malevolent step-sister lies in wait, no Guineveres and Lancelots flame with ardor. There is no ardor and no carnality in this fiction. From the age of ten the child's mind is presumed to be wiped clean of all that elemental passion which surges through the tales of childhood. He is presumed no longer to have any dreams, any longings, any curiosities about those mysterious ardors that flamed so frankly then. The boys and girls of these stories studiously avoid any curiosity about each other, automatically they have become austerely companionable. If they are boys they do not waste any time wondering what girls are like. Girls are to them a very minor consideration. If they are girls they are pathetically anxious to prove themselves good athletic little comrades who resemble boys as much as possible. Some time in the, oh, very distant future, the author may roguishly hint, a deeper tinge will creep into this boy-and-girl friendship, but if he knows how this is to come about he leaves it a bleak and remote mystery.

In this fiction the parents are all benign and the children affectionate. If the parents are poor and rustic the children are even more filial. There is no disreputable like Huck Finn who loathes and fears his drunken pap, there is no liar and swaggerer like Tom Sawyer. None of the children live up a third floor back or ever heard of a strike or lay-off. Country children are, naturally, more democratic than city children. A sneak always finds retribution and a poor sport is the lowest of God's creatures. To be sure, in one tale one boy does confess to a lack of courage, but he performs even greater prodigies of valor in proof of a moral heroism. And no little boy or girl will hesitate to die for St. Mark's or St. Agatha's.

Does it ever occur to writers and publishers of this stuff to wonder what does go on in the mind of a twelve-year-old? They might read "The House Without Windows," the amazing story by a twelve-year-old published last spring, and know (Knopf: $2). They would find no such cloudy vapors as they imagine to exist in such a mind. A powerful sensuousness, a merciless logic, a vast sobriety inhabits there. Whimsicality, the silly ironical trifling of the old, is no part of it. Such an avidity for life, such quick perception, and such rapturous fancy as shames the old is in it. The little girl, Barbara Newhall Follett, who wrote it when she was nine and rewrote it when she was twelve, is an exceptional child only in her ability to make articulate moods and emotions that elude most children before they are old enough to put them down. She is exceptional, too, in her power to describe what she has in her mind and in the symmetry and soundness of her architecture. In this she is the superior not only of most children but of a good many adults. But the major interests of her mind are those of a child, and the tale is such as any child might tell itself.

Eepersip is a little girl who finds a house with things hanging at the window and little mats on the floor unbearable, and she runs away. Her parents grieve bitterly for her but it never occurs to her to pity them. She never goes back to them. She lives for a time in the woods, growing more and more a wild creature and taken by the creatures of the wild as an equal. This world of the elements is the House Without Windows. The facts of shelter and sustenance in it are half-heartedly accounted for by the young author, who doesn't trouble to keep it up. Then Eepersip goes to the sea where she lives in a cave, fearing neither wind nor storm nor elements and becoming half a sea creature. Then she finds her way to the mountains where, in the sublimity and silence of their heights, she lives in a fantastic fairyland of snow and ice and her ecstatic communion with the elements reaches a crescendo. She never thinks of her parents. She has a powerful distrust of all grown-ups lest they drag her back, and always craftily eludes them. She has slight need for humankind. Once she finds a beloved playmate at the shore whom she invites to share her life, but his parents snatch him back. Once she longs for the little sister who has been born since she left. She does indeed spirit her away and take her with her to the mountains, but the solitude saddens the younger child and Eepersip sorrowfully brings her back to the plains. But she herself cannot stay. She cannot give up the joys of her House Without Windows. She goes back to her mountains, holds the ecstasy of freedom more dear, and finally dissolving into the elements becomes one of the spirits of that place.

Now this is a powerful and poetic conception, and a subtle one too. But no one can say that it is an unchildlike one. It has a vast pertinence to the life around it. But what pertinence has juvenile literature to such a mind? Naturally the idea is not to develop little Eepersips who will quit the musty house, but to make good biddable little children who will live in it. And so we have fiction, biography, legend directed at just this suspected truancy of the child-mind.

The Western tales are by far the most refreshing of a miscellaneous lot of juvenile literature recently received. In the point of view of the writer of a good Western tale one is apt to find the peculiar combination of qualities that makes a natural juvenile. "Cow Country," by Will James (Scribner's: $3.50), fulfils the first requirement by not having been written for children at all. Will James's earlier tale "Smoky" became a juvenile success by that process of natural selection which determines the more enduring of childhood's favorites. "Cow Country," containing eight sketches of men and animals of the cow country, with the author's vivid illustrations, has the unforced simplicity and vivacity, the true and fresh observation that make the chief charm of this author's work. "The Log of a Cowboy," by Ardy Adams (Houghton Mifflin: $2), is that fine account of a cowboy's stirring life written for grown-ups twenty years ago, now a classic and revived by the Riverside Bookshelf. It falls most aptly into the juvenile classification. So does "Hands Up!", a series of sketches of the heroic figures of the old Western frontier, by A. B. Macdonald (Bobbs Merrill: $3).

"The Boy's Life of Hamilton," by Helen Nicolay (Century: $2), is the best of the biographies. It is a straightforward account of that statesman with the figure justly proportioned against the stirring times. "The Boy's Life of Lawrence," by Lowell Thomas (Century: $2), makes Lawrence out to be a cross between Tom Brown and the Grand Lama. "Heroes of Modern Adventure," by Bridges and Tiltman (Little, Brown: $2), is an illustration of the adult point of view which believes that the child cannot appreciate an adventure until it has been inflated.

"Jungle John" by John Budden (Longmans: $2.50), with a lively running commentary of drawings, is an exciting narrative of a small boy's adventures in the Indian jungle. It is written by a person who knows the jungle and knows boys and has no small aptitude for story-telling besides. There has been a determined effort to keep the spring of enchantment running by bringing the wealth of folk-lore before children. But by now the supply has run down to a thin trickle, and the Malayan and Amazonian and remoter Gaelic legends are merely queer and unintelligible. The publishers have shown a good deal of enterprise in bringing before the child the exotic and strange, and the result is occasionally valuable. But "Children of the Mountain Eagle," by E. C. Miller (Doubleday: $2), and "Saturday's Children," by Helen Coale Crew (Little, Brown: $2), are merely formulized travel tales inhabited by little pattern-children.

"The Trade Wind," by Cornelia Meigs, won a $2,000 prize offered by Little, Brown and Company. We are told that it was chosen from nearly four hundred manuscripts submitted and was the choice of experts in children's tastes. Yet it seems a dull and clumsy piece of work. It is the very apotheosis of the romantic novel synthetically achieved. If the prize had been frankly offered for the nearest approach to the Stevensonian formula this tale with its heavy paraphernalia of pirates, privateers, and gun-runners would have better deserved it.

What Books Shall My Small Child Read?

By REBECCA HOURWICH

SPECIAL books written for children appeared in England and America during the latter part of the eighteenth century. Anyone who has seen the Rosenbach or any other collection of early American children's books—for the most part pocket-size moral tracts, occasionally illustrated—realizes how we have lifted children out of that era of moralizing and depression into a period where the printed page is expected to be a delight to all the senses, a book a pleasure to see and touch as well as to read.

From a few dozen pathetic and barren books we have evolved to a bewildering profusion of gay and carefree books, books that spell romance and adventure, books that are of land and sea, and books never of land and sea but of whimsical fancy; nonsense books, books of specific instruction, ancient myths and fables popularized; books about birds, animals, and all the familiar objects of the world we live in; books of lasting beauty; books that make a sure appeal to children, that capture their hearts and minds and permanently hold them in their power; books of our own childhood which we read eight and ten times over, to which we always came back with fresh zest and interest, from which we could not bear to part; favorites of our own children, thumbed, worn, dragged from place to place, never wholly forgotten. And in equal profusion, also never wholly forgotten, simply terrible books.

We have traded old evils for new ones. For hell-fire and damnation we have substituted the same moralizing cloaked in sickly sentimentality. Presumably to protect and prolong infancy, at one time burdened with overpowering adult concepts and taboos, we have sifted and sorted and simplified into the classification juvenile, until juvenile is almost certain to be synonymous with innocuous, the humdrum stupid tales of the dull routine of commonplace people. These unimaginative, utterly worthless books are issued by the thousands, usually inspired by the failure of their authors to gain a publisher for their adult wares.

Hence the perennial question of every intelligent parent: What books shall my small child read? Shall a child be turned loose to steer his own course through the labyrinths of existing books, shall there be gentle unconscious pressure to left or right, or shall there be frank adult guidance? What shall be the underlying principles of such guidance? Most educators beg the question, and for good reason. There are very few data available on what constitutes satisfactory reading for children, either from their own or from an adult point of view.

The New York Public Library, which probably caters to the widest variety of tastes in the world, tries to apply the same standards to its Children's Department that it applies to other departments. Are the authors sincere, are the books genuine pieces of writing? Are they interesting, alive, beautiful to look at? Are they good literature? Will they interest the children?

There are people specializing in the study of child psychology who see all manner of evil resulting from undirected children's reading, and who would particularly proscribe fairy tales. They hold that at an early age a child is unable to distinguish fact from fancy, that in the realization of fact lies the child's adjustment to reality. If this groping for reality is handicapped and confused by tales of fancy, adjustment to reality is postponed with attendant difficulties, and sometimes never reached. They suggest tales of familiar objects, going from the familiar gradually to the unknown. They admit that some children learn to distinguish fact from fancy much earlier than others, and that it becomes largely a matter of the individual child.

To a degree one must accept this attitude. The problem still remains of how to feed a child's imagination, how to nourish the desire to lift oneself out of one's self, to find in reading that level of ecstasy which every book-lover knows and cherishes; how to balance adjustment to reality with the necessity for escape which is inevitable in adult life, and which finds a definite and valuable release in books —release that is not and cannot be possible if books are to give only an intensely practical fulfilment.

There is likewise the attempt to go to children themselves for the answer to the riddle of their reading, chiefly by stimulating them to efforts of their own. These books by children are excellent self-expression, but obviously a literature for children limited by the scant knowledge of child authors is narrowed down to crude confines.

To me the acid test is, Does the book compel the child's interest? Children are the true readers, disgracefully unappreciated by authors and publishers. Children are utterly unmoved by anything but the stirrings of their own responses. Hungry, eager, wide-eyed, and breathless, they stamp their approval; listless and bored, restless and irritated, they signify their disapproval. They are subject to the same vagaries of taste as adults. Some children prefer the grotesque, others are offended by it; some like to have the creeps of horror run up their spines through blood and murder tales, others shudder away; some like saccharine tales of little girls who die and go to heaven, others want animals and a bit more dash. Some children like all books, anything with type on it, while others for no apparent reason fasten on one book and dismiss another. I know of one little girl who objected to "Alice in Wonderland" because it was "just too silly," and who nevertheless was transported into ecstasies of delight by the antics of Mr. Milne's Heffalump in "Winnie-the-Pooh."

So secure is A. A. Milne's place among his readers that automatically the first place in the season's books for children goes to him. "Now We Are Six" (Dutton: $2), though not as fresh and original as its predecessor, is nevertheless a Milne. A runner-up for first place with A. A. Milne will be "Magpie Lane," by Nancy Byrd Turner (Harcourt, Brace: $1.60), and "Dimple Diggers," by Robin Christopher (Elm House: $2). A vital part of Miss Turner's book in which

> Young Prince Peter, suddenly once,
> For no real reason behaved like a dunce, is Decie Merwin's silhouettes, as provocatively saucy as the poems. Both the elf-like figures and the verses have subtler and deeper moods tinged with the flavor of genuine poetry. "Dimple Diggers" is exquisitely published, but the form is only a fitting background for the contents. Hide and Seek, typical of its spirit, begins:

> When I am alone, and quite alone,
> I play a game, and it's all my own.
> I hide myself
> Behind myself,
> And then I try
> To find myself.
> I hide in the closet
> Where no one can see;
> Then I start looking > Around for me.

Negligible as poems, Cecily Mary Barker's pocket series of "Flower Fairies" of the Spring, Summer, and Autumn (Macmillan: $1 each) have a definite charm in their water-color pixies, each endowing flowers with human attributes.

In "The Little Long Ago" (Dutton: $5), Laura Spencer Porter links the past with the present in a prose story that in its wistful appeal most nearly resembles the best of the season's poetry.

"Number Five Joy Street" (Appleton: $2.50) is the fifth of a series of short stories issued each year in book form. The work is a collaboration by well-known English authors, and has won a distinct place among children.

Caroline D. Emerson in "A Merry-Go-Round of Modern Tales" (Dutton: $2) gives an excellent example of what is meant by tales for children about familiar objects, tales in which reality triumphs over fancy. Lois Lenski, the illustrator, excellently interprets the author.

In "To and Again" (Knopf) the author, Walter R. Brooks, and the illustrator, Adolfo Best-Maugard, have shared to a nicety in producing a book about animals that is superior to all its animal contemporaries of the fall. Of the other animal books, "Mickey and the Monkeys" by Victorine Kirk (Viking: $2), has a dash and sweep to it, with an Irish lad dividing honors with the monkeys. There is a reprint of Richard Henry Horne's "The Good Natured Bear" (Macmillan: $1), with scissor cuts by Lisl Hummel. The story is laid in Germany —but it might have been anywhere—of the Bear who was a "foreigner to Society, who rode horseback with rather a round back, and his stirrups very short, but in other respects he sat well, like a portly gentleman on a journey, and held the reins with an air of consequence." A bear who tells his story to a group of children who are fond of him—as I was until he stepped out of character to make the happy ending. In "The Cat and the Captain," by Elizabeth Coatsworth (Macmillan: $1), cat lovers can follow the Cat, the Captain, and black Susannah through a hundred pages of large-type adventures, interpolated with cheery illustrations. If you are not biased in favor of cats, the tale fades out. "The Janitor's Cat," by Theodore Harper (Appleton: $2), is more literary, and apparently this is a virtue rather than a vice in cats. Tony the cat possesses magic of which only he holds the secret, and that in his whiskers.

There are a few books helpful for adults in teaching children music, sewing, simple cut-outs, and carpentry: "The Piece Bag Book" (Macmillan: $1.60), "Prince Melody in Music Land," with animated notes (Knopf); and "With Scissors and Paste" (Macmillan: $1.75).

"The Wind That Wouldn't Blow" (Dutton: $2.50) is the best of that increasing number of books which are a potential factor in real internationalism fostered by books for children about peoples and things that might otherwise remain of the unpleasantly strange. Arthur Bowie Chrisman has managed to put into his Chinese stories a lyrical quality and a quaint idiom, gently patterned with an undercurrent of humor.

There are also books on Sweden: "Children of the Moor," by Laura Fitinghoff (Houghton, Mifflin: $2.50); on Italy in Garibaldi's time: "Nimble-Legs," by Luigi Capuana (Longmans: $1 50); on Finland and Lapland: "Canute Whistlewinks," by Zacharias Topelius (Longmans: $2.50); on "Michael of Ireland," by Anne Casserley (Harper)—as much about fairies as Ireland; on France in the eighteenth century: "The Mystery of Castle Pierrefitte," by Eugenie Foa (Longmans: $2); and on Hungary, Turkey, Arabia, Java, South America, and other places all in one volume: "Tales Worth Telling," by Charles J. Finger (Century: $3.50). Grace Moon's "Nadita" (Doubleday: $2), treating of Mexico, and "Tewa Firelight Tales," by Ahlee James (Longmans: $2.50), about the American Indians, are about the strangers of our own continent.

The End of Art

Men Without Women. By Ernest Hemingway. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.

FROM Oscar Wilde to Aldous Huxley the favorite characters of our cleverest writers have been tired of everything except talk. Commonly represented as too lazy to work, too cynical to feel, and too disillusioned to believe, they have nevertheless never relaxed in their efforts to express themselves. Never weary of describing their weariness and never too bored to be voluble, they have polished their epigrams with a serious assiduity which seemed to belie the expressed conviction that nothing is worth the effort.

In many respects Mr. Ernest Hemingway is the heir of these gaudier sophisticates. He has received much of his education around the cafe table and, apparently, consorted much with the members of a generation which takes a certain pride in proclaiming itself lost. But either he has found them less verbally brilliant than they have commonly been represented or he has himself lost the last of their enthusiasms, the enthusiasm for things neatly said. Sometimes his characters are the illiterate heroes of the prize-fight or the bull-ring, and sometimes they are the bankrupt intellectuals who wander disconsolately from bar to bar in the forlorn hope that a drink will be more refreshing somewhere else, but the two classes have this in common: they are all but inarticulate. The one has never learned to express itself, the other has grown tired of choosing words, and so both talk the lazy, monotonous, undifferentiated idiom which is the common denominator of the relaxed intellectual and the roughneck. Spiritually the distinguishing mark of Mr. Hemingway's work is a weariness too great to be aware of anything except sensations; technically it is an amazing power to make the apparently aimless and incompetent talk of his characters eloquent, to make them say what they seem too inarticulate or too lazy to define with words.

Two men have descended after a winter's skiing in the higher Alps. "You oughtn't to ever do anything too long," says one. "No," says the other, "we were up there too long"; and something about the moment at which these remarks are introduced makes the reader suddenly weary both physically and spiritually. In another story a man and a woman are discussing (so we gather from oblique evidence) an abortion which the former is eager to have performed and to which the latter is wearily consenting. They have just tried a new drink. "'It tastes like licorice,' the girl said and put the glass down. 'That's the way with everything.' 'Yes,' said the girl. 'Everything tastes of licorice. Especially all the things you've waited so long for, like absinthe.'" Each of these conversations is in some sense quotable and therefore not entirely typical; each, too, involves the same trick (again repeated in the story of the drug addict who replies "They haven't got a cure for anything" to the suggestion that "they" have a cure for his disorder), and the trick consists in making the weary response to an individual situation imply a general hopelessness in the face of all situations; but much of the conversation is effective for reasons more difficult to analyze. It is apparently meandering and endlessly repetitious; it seems to require a page to make articulate the simplest idea; and yet this dialogue, standing almost by itself, is sufficient to make fourteen mostly very short stories both vivid and convincing. It appears to be the most meticulously literal reporting and yet it reproduces dulness without being dull.

Here, if you like, is art upon its last legs. For all his scrupulous detachment and his care never to say one word in his own person, Mr. Hemingway tells us both by his choice of subject and by the method which he employs that life is an affair of mean tragedies, and he tells us it as plainly as if he were devoting a treatise to the exposition of his ideas. In his hands the subject matter of literature becomes sordid little catastrophes in the lives of very vulgar people and its language the most undistinguished which can possibly be made by the most skilful manipulation to convey a meaning. And yet he possesses a virtuosity not short of amazing; once begun, none of his stories will allow themselves to be laid down unfinished. Mr. Hemingway's range may be narrow and his art "unimportant," but within the limits of what he undertakes in the present volume he is a master. These stories are painfully good. No one, whatever his artistic creed may be, can escape their fascination during the moments it takes to read them; and no one can deny their brilliance.

The Record of "Al" Smith

Up From the City Streets: Alfred E. Smith. A Biographical Study in Contemporary Politics. By Norman Hapgood and Harry Moskowitz. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

"AL" SMITH is out of luck. For years it has been his proudest boast, or happiest jest, that only once has he sullied the virgin purity of his mind by reading a book. And now come along two volumes he simply must peruse—even if he has to steal the time from the reading that holds him spellbound, which is the official reports, typewritten and printed, piled up on the Governor's desk, or from playing with the elk and the doe and the turkey and monkeys, the birds and the five dogs and the other animals which make up his private zoo. The first of these books was Henry F. Pringle's life of himself; the second is the joint study by Messrs. Hapgood and Moskowitz.

We have no hesitation in wagering that he will like Mr.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS
NEW YORK LONDON

Pringle's best; it sparkles, holds one's interest—the human interest—and it has at points dramatic value. The other one is frankly quite disappointing as the work of two men so well qualified to tell the story. It is heavy and often dull; its very title is banal with its reference to those sidewalks of New York of which Al himself must be supremely tired. In their effort to be meticulously just and accurate and altogether encyclopedic, Mr. Hapgood and Mr. Moskowitz have unfortunately dropped into the old "Come-little-reader-and-let-us-take-you-by-the-hand-style" which makes them start one chapter in this wise: "This book began with the big new city and with little boys running around the docks. In the fifty years since Al Smith began to play in the streets, life has become faster and more crowded. In the metropolis a building is scarcely finished before it is obsolete"; while another chapter assures us at the start that "we now understand Smith's major purposes," and still another soothes us at its beginning with the news that "as we approach a transition in Alfred Smith's life, from the period when he was merely a member of the organization to the period when he began to be a force for progress, we may well grant truth to more than one explanation of what brought the change about."

This is unfortunate because the subject of this biography is enormously important and any book about him ought to reflect in some measure the Governor's own crisp, breezy style, his genuine charm, his wit, and his native common sense. Where Mr. Pringle jumped about with scant regard to periods, this life is conventionally chronological and chronologically conventional. It sounds, moreover, as if written to order; as if the authors never for a moment forgot that they were advocates making a case to prove that Al is ready and fit for the White House. In their eagerness to make their book a complete record of the man to whom they have plainly given their hearts, they have included much that is trivial, as well as facts never before printed. But the record is complete; it is a compendium of all that anyone need know about the work of the best Governor New York ever had. And an astounding record it really is when thus massed by Messrs. Hapgood and Moskowitz. No one else in public life outside of Washington, and only one or two there, can offer anything like it. There is here compiled amazing evidence of the Governor's independence, courage, and shrewdness, together with a concise and honest statement as to his long progressive record, his personal rectitude, his deep humanitarian feelings, his most admirable defense of free speech and free thought in America.

But there is no indication of what Governor Smith really thinks on international subjects like America's policy in the Caribbean, in the Philippines, in China, or toward Russia. The League of Nations is not mentioned in this book, the World Court but once. The page being blank, the Governor will himself have to write on it between now and the Democratic Convention. As it is, no newspaper editor or politician who desires all the facts can be without this volume, and likewise no citizen who wishes to know truths about the man who will either be the next Presidential nominee of his party or be the cause, by reason of his defeat, of his party's again going on the rocks.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Two Highly Prized Novels

Jalna. By Mazo de la Roche. Little, Brown and Company. $2.
Children of the Ritz. By Cornell Woolrich. Boni and Liveright. $2.

SINCE we did not see any of the other novels submitted to the Atlantic Monthly competition we are quite powerless either to hail or to begrudge the ten-thousand-dollar award to Mazo de la Roche for "Jalna." But we are not powerless to say that it is beautiful, engrossing, and unusual—a novel whose interest and action flow out of its extremely live characters and gorgeous scenery. Furthermore it does not read as if it had been written for a prize.

Jalna is the East Indian name of a Canadian estate populated by the Whiteoak family of Victorian numbers. The matriarch of the household is a fierce, tyrannical old woman. Around her are grouped children and grandchildren—most of them men and all of them of decisive cut. There is Eden the poet and Piers who deals in pigs, there is heavy Renny and Finch, an ill-tempered, misunderstood neurotic boy, there is Ernest who makes the study of Shakespeare his lifework and Wakefield, a delicate nine-year-old with an alert and charming mind. And there are others. Into this lusty English family is thrown a young American girl of secluded upbringing who marries Eden only to find that she has in a certain sense married his family. In the narrow, self-contained, forceful circle terrible ingrown situations arise. Amid the harsh quarreling and cruelty of this nest of crows Alayne finally decides to return to New York and her polite publishing-house job. But Grandma Whiteoak reaches her hundredth birthday intact and with an air of triumph.

Cornell Woolrich achieved ten thousand dollars, too. But his novel bears only too evidently the marks of conscious striving for the luscious movie prize. However, what he does so openly is being done furtively by many a novelist of late with his mind's eye intent on flickering rewards. "Children of the Ritz" is reeled off rather than written. Every other line reads like a subtitle. We can imagine Mr. Woolrich laboriously going over his manuscript and "wising it up." The hero punches the villain in the end and bears off the heroine in a taxi. Fade-out. All the book needs is a license number and Colleen Moore. Ten thousand dollars for this slim and painfully studied manuscript! Cornell Woolrich is a clever boy.

Children's Books in Brief

Funnybone Alley. By Alfred Kreymborg. Illustrated by Boris Artzybasheff. The Macaulay Company. $3.50.

Lavishly written and illustrated, this book ought to make an impression on the children for whom it is intended. But we doubt that it will. Mr. Kreymborg has made it too clear that he is utterly fanciful, has said too often to his young readers: "Come, let us throw our minds around just for the exercise there is in it, and because there is virtue in doing so." We suspect that most children like to believe what they are reading, even when they feel it is absurd. Mr. Kreymborg urges them to read what he tells them is not true. So while he and Mr. Artzybasheff have collaborated on a gorgeous book, we fear they have produced a dull one.

Though her eyes are perfectly good her duties call for glasses. These glasses color all the events of the strange New Year's evening that follows. It is a delightful fantasy. For those parents that patronize pawnshops and find them a friendly institution, this book will be an invaluable aid to offset prejudice against them.

A New Book by

TRIGANT BURROW

The Social Basis of Consciousness

By a leading American psychologist, this volume expounds a theory extending from psychoanalysis: the theory that in considering an individual's consciousness and unconsciousness it is necessary to embrace in one view the social environment as well as the individual element, the observer as well as the observed, the physician with the patient.
Further Dr. Burrow, who is one of the foremost authorities in the treatment of nervous disorders, disputes the Freudian conception that these disorders primarily result from repressed sexuality. The book is in two parts: The Philosophy of the Neuroses; The Psychology of the Neuroses.

"He brings something of very great hope for the solution of human incompatabilities. Psycho-analysis already attacks problems of culture, religion, politics. Freud has given it a very clever machine for proving the rest of the world in the wrong, and one of the most triumphantly depreciatory attitudes the human heart has conceived. But Dr. Burrow's book seems to promise a more firmly based, a wider, and a more positive outlook upon our common life." - - THE NEW STATESMAN.

frog. Warmth and understanding pervade these stories of Chinese children engaged in festivals and games after the manners of their own land. The illustrations have a nice comical twist.

Sails of Gold. New Prose and Verse. Edited by Lady Cynthia Asquith. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

This is a compilation of pieces specially written for it and contributed by such English authors as Milne, Belloc, Blackwood, and Buchan. It is perhaps mean-spirited to suspect them of withholding their best, but in spite of the fine array of names the result is meager.

The Lion-Hearted Kitten. By Peggy Bacon. The Macmillan Company. $2.

An uncommonly diverting book. Miss Bacon has an adult following which will trail her through any number of velvet-hung galleries for the bland and devastating wit of her black and whites. This will now be increased by a large number of children to whom art is not even a name but to whom gaiety and veracity are everything. Of course, any adult looking at these apparently veracious jungle animals will see that Miss Bacon has turned the same cocked eye on the jungle as she has on the human zoo. But they have a thrilling awesomeness, too. The text is less distinguished, but pleasant.

The Tiger Who Walks Alone. By Constance Lindsay Skinner. The Macmillan Company. $1.75.

It hardly matters that this wild yarn of Central American revolution outdoes legend and history. The chile and jazz are condiments to as healthy a story of adventure as the season has brought forth. Miss Skinner knows and loves the faults and the virtues of Latin America and she has filled her book with a dozen characters from the life, with beasts and jungle and prehistoric weapons. Her melodrama has tropical exuberance, not mere artificial multiplication.

Gay-Neck. By Dhan Gopal Mukerji. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.25.

This tale of a boy's experiences while keeping pigeons in India, relating in particular the prowess of one heroic carrier-pigeon, gives a charming and glamorous picture of an Indian boyhood. Alas, the latter part of the book runs to mysticism and the magnificent pigeon becomes merely a symbol; but the charm of the early part of the book is undeniable.

Red Crow's Brother. By James Willard Schultz. Houghton Mifflin Company. $1.75.

The second in the exciting series of adventures of Hugh Munroe, the frontiersman, by an author who has fascinated two generations of boys with his many Indian tales.

I Know a Secret. By Christopher Morley. Doubleday, Page and Company. $2.

Mr. Morley seems to us to have an unfortunate manner with children. He goes through the motions of entertaining them with his eyes fixed eagerly over their heads on their elders. Mr. Morley's little impromptus are carefully formulated—a little whimsy for the young, a little wisdom for the old—and sometimes he reverses the order. The formula for entertaining the young by which animals are made to do everything like human beings is a very old one and has magic. But its magic is not invariable. Mr. Morley's use of it is rather less successful than Lewis Carroll's. Merely to make animals go through complicated human operations does not seem to us humorous of itself, though a vast number of writers for children seem to think so. Animals who open tea-shops and run little Ford cars and give lectures do not seem amusing. Mr. Morley's creatures are no more imaginative than the thousands of others who follow this routine. Mr. Morley only pursues whimsicality more relentlessly. What Mr. Oliver Herford once said of someone else applies to him. He has a whim of iron.

Art

Composograph of the Dance

IN any art the multiplication of divergent ideals is a confusion to laymen, and a resulting annoyance to the artist who would have his work valued in terms of his own aims. At the opening of a new season, let us roughly distinguish a few of the diverse faiths that hide under the blanket term "the dance."

The learned branch of the profession should be mentioned first, in spite of the fact that at the moment its foreground is being occupied by musical-comedy stars such as Marilyn Miller and Mary Eaton. The ballet, calling at the outset for the gifts and industry necessary to achieve support and balance on the very toe-tips, is the purest form of the dance, independent of aid from "stories" and elaborate costumes, and so, nearly a fixed quantity. In this school an American name is beginning to stand out: Harriet Hoctor has already the technique of a great artist, and she may have the soul to match it.

Radically different is the conception known—in various aspects or quite indiscriminately—as "interpretative," "Greek," "aesthetic" dancing, "music visualization," and so on; the vaguest and broadest of schools, where if there are rules there are few penalties. Very generally speaking, the underlying purpose is to convey what the accompanying music means to oneself; to add a silent instrument to the orchestra. Unless extraordinary appreciative and interpretative gifts concur, this object is not attained, and the encounter between artist and audience is resolved by considerations of grace, comeliness, personality, and character. The tragic name of Isadora Duncan stood for all these gifts, but unfortunately the communicable portion of her art consisted principally of the bare purpose—practically, the license—which has been mentioned. Her successor may not soon arise, although it is pleasant to know that her protegee, Anna Duncan, is a personage in her own right.

Thirdly, there is the cult of Oriental dances, whose prophetess is Ruth St. Denis. When the latter made and acted upon her first researches, she introduced realism in this genre to the American stage, and although her sources were literary and pictorial, today, just back from a two-years' tour of the East with her company, she is in a position to be dogmatic. Natural grace, a strong sense of rhythm, and imitativeness may enable a novice in this school to satisfy lay spectators, but Miss St. Denis's pupils work hard. They must learn an intricate code of positions and movements of body, limbs, and fingers, based on rigid ceremonial and religious conventions (Miss St. Denis herself has a charming "dance" of arm, hand, and finger positions painstakingly collected from dozens of Chinese statuettes and paintings), and such performances as Charles Weidman's superb Cinghalese devil-dance and Ted Shawn's "Cosmic Dance of Siva" involve difficult feats of motion and balance.

Last among the "serious" schools mentioned here are European folk-dances, which range from infantile simplicity to fast and virile figures calling for natural agility and long training; practiced by immigrant societies, classes of school-children, and for the sake of motion and local color introduced into operas and operettas. A characteristic example of the latter use was furnished last spring by the Neighborhood Players in the Hungarian cycle "Ritornell," wherein the spirited dances were combined with folksong, brilliant costumes, and a thread of legend.

All these distinct traditions, with others, are inextricably interwoven in present-day programs. The toe-dance is amplified by the Russians into story-ballets; the same corps present Oriental legends and folk-dances from the steppes, and the extraordinary Simeon Karavaeff performs the violent squatting peasant dance as a clog, or on his toe-tips. The Denishawn troupe study the easier and imitate the severe ballet work; Miss St. Denis "interprets" Liszt; both she and Mr. Shawn have Spanish solos; with each one occasionally encounters highly developed pantomime. By Angna Enters we find pantomime carried frequently clean into the domain of Ruth Draper, which is to say, quite out of that of the dance. The Neighborhood Players accept on faith the title of Griffes's composition "The Lake at Evening," and their young ladies, recumbent beneath a great blue veil, make its surface undulate as "naturally" as anyone could ask. This, one notes, "visualizes" the generally arbitrary label rather than the music, and belongs with such other imitations as Pavlova's "Mort du Cygne."

There are numberless further overlappings and gradations: toe-dancers who double in acrobatics or, like Miss Miller, in tap-dancing, or in the grotesque, like Bolm; Orientalists who are equally contortionists, and so forth; the combinations tending to become incongruous as genuine ability diminishes, or as show-directors put their ears to the ground. Audiences want, not an evening's instruction in ideals and means theretoward, but an evening's entertainment, and showmanship will see to it that that entertainment suits more than one taste, keeps not too far from earth, includes plenty of motion and color, and sends the unconcerned majority away happy in the conviction that it has seen, at least partly comprehended, and still had a good time.

Hare and Hounds

A YOUNG man who has been accosted by a prostitute in Hyde Park becomes involved in an altercation with a plain-clothes detective. He gives him a blow upon the jaw and the detective, striking his head upon an iron rail as he falls, is killed. After serving two years of a five-year sentence for manslaughter the young man escapes from a prison camp on the moors and for about forty hours he is a fugitive until, weary of being hunted but wearier still of the hesitations and perplexities of the people upon whom he must thrust himself for help, he surrenders. Such is the story told through ten brief but vivid episodes in Galsworthy's "Escape" (Booth Theater), and simple as it is, it is made the adequate vehicle of a typically Galsworthian comment upon men and society. During the course of his few hours of freedom the hero of the play traverses a cross-section of English society, and except for the two or three instances when he comes in contact with people whose sense of self-righteousness is sufficient to allow them to indulge their vindictiveness with a clear conscience, he finds a general if somewhat wavering disposition to help him. Most of those whom he meets obviously hope that he will get away and yet they are hardly less willing to give him up than they are actively to aid him. They rationalize their unwillingness into something which passes as a sense of their duty to society, but that something is really fear. The sight of a hunted man awakens their pity but it stirs in them also a realization of the comforts of their own security. Society has as yet no license to harry them and it is as well not to cross the imaginary line which separates the hunters from the hunted, since he who does not pursue may be pursued, and he who is not part of the pack is in imminent danger of becoming one of the quarries. When the dogs are in cry it is better not to be caught showing any suspicious solicitude for hares, and when society is demanding its revenge upon one of its members whom it has cast out pity can hardly hope to ask for more than the averted eye. "I wash my hands of this man"—that is as near to the heroic as prudence can ever come.

A sense, rather sad than indignant, of this weakness inherent in even the nicest and most amiable people is typically Galsworthian, and so too is his almost unwilling recognition of the fact that the most generous impulses of his characters arise in those parts of their souls least likely to be reached by any formal or organized agencies for moral cultivation. The thing which puts them on the side of the victim of unjust justice is merely a sporting instinct—an impulse to give the under-dog a chance—rather than any high moral scruples, and the thing which favors that sporting instinct is a feeling not of righteousness, but of a glad recognition of enough original sin in oneself to enable one to recognize and forgive it in others. Compassion, Galsworthy seems to say, is the purest and least dangerous of human virtues, and yet compassion arises only out of a sense of our own weakness and guilt. Let humanity beware then of ever becoming too good. Linked though he is by his sociological preoccupations with Shaw and Wells, a certain laborious, impartial fair-mindedness—something giving birth to all sorts of doubts and perplexities—contributes to Galsworthy's work the flavor which distinguishes it from theirs. They are so sure they know what is wrong with the world and so confident their program would set it right that there is a suggestion of shrill scolding about their indictments and something cocky about their conclusions. They propose problems only that they may emerge triumphantly with the answers, and they sweep difficulties away with the simple assurance that "we will change all that." Galsworthy, on the other hand, does not deal so lavishly in solutions. More a simple humanitarian and less definitely a sociologist than either of them, he neither has nor needs to have their faith in the perfectibility of human society or human nature because his mood is rather that of a somewhat melancholy tolerance than that of any dogmatist come to lead a straying humanity back to the right path. Tender-hearted almost, at times, to the point of sentimentality, he is wounded deeply by the cruelties and injustices of life, but he has too little faith in the value of anger to be angry at them. Perhaps somewhat old-fashioned in his faith in the maxim tout comprendre, etc., he broods over humanity far more than he instructs it or inveighs against it; but, perhaps for that very reason, he is more successful in his efforts to love that humanity as he finds it than are most of those who are surer that they can make something decent out of mankind at last.

"Escape" is well acted by the members of a cast all of whom are good in spite of the fact that many appear only briefly in one episode, and the leading role is played most ingratiatingly by Leslie Howard. It is serious without being either heavy or didactic, and in a season during which good serious plays have been few it stands out conspicuously as the best new drama now on Broadway.

The group known as The Playwrights Theater has taken up a new home in the little Cherry Lane Theater and is there presenting a satiric, slightly "expressionistic" drama of social revolution called "The Belt." It has for its theme the mechanization of a workman in a factory evidently intended to suggest Ford's and for its action the story of an uprising upon the eve of a shut-down. The play suffers somewhat from the fact that its theme has become stereotyped in the hands of the "experimental" dramatist but it is written with considerable force and has one scene—that at "the belt" in the factory—which is extremely well staged. "If," Lord Dunsany's amusing if somewhat thin fantasia, is being capably revived by the old Neighborhood company at the Little Theater. "Behold This Dreamer" (Cort Theater) has Glenn Hunter in its leading role and he, with Tom Wise and Sylvia Field, saves an obvious and heavily written play from being anywhere near as bad as it deserves to be.

"Not a best-seller, and probably never will be!"

Such is our "keynote," as the politicians put it, for the advertising campaign on FRANZ WERFEL'S new novel, The Man Who Conquered Death.

We hope we're wrong, but our experience with WERFEL'S earlier work, such as Verdi, A Novel of the Opera, and Juarez and Maximilian strengthens our literary pride, just as it prompts our sales misgivings.

After all, there are some authors meant just for the elect, and apparently FRANZ WERFEL is of that noble company.

A contemplation of the sales chart of Verdi—2,405 copies in two years, as against 55,000 abroad—does not depress us. Rather it imbues us with a snobbish, aristocratic, and not unpleasant thrill. This novel of the opera, for at least The Inner Sanctum and perhaps 2,403 other souls, belongs with Jean Christophe, Of Human Bondage and Moby Dick as an unforgettable adventure in reading, a memorable intimacy with genius.

We like to share such experiences, but—we hope the sales manager isn't peeking—not too indiscriminately.

Watch WERFEL!

For unmitigated ruthlessness, no reviewer of our time can match G. D. EATON, editor of Plain Talk. All the more potent, then, is his tribute to WILL DURANT'S new book, Transition, A Mental Autobiography:

Transition I recommend to everyone. It is superbly written and profoundly moving . . . I list the book as biography because it isn't a novel and because it isn't admittedly an autobiography—the first half as I started out to say, has all the tenderness and humor of Anatole France's Le Livre de mon Ami. No novel could be more touching and no poem more beautiful . . .

. . . One sees why DURANT is fond of SPINOZA. The men have much in common. I defy you to forget Transition. You can no more do it than you can forget the life of SPINOZA . . .

An Episode of Fascism

BY GAETANO SALVEMINI

ON September 9, 1927, a trial took place at Savona, near Genoa, which throws a light on life in Italy today. The accused were a group of men guilty of having aided and abetted the escape from Italy of Signor Filippo Turati on the night of December 11, 1926.

A law of November, 1926, punishes with imprisonment up to six years and with a fine up to an unlimited amount (which may therefore be equivalent to total confiscation of property) any person attempting to leave the country without a regular passport. It authorizes frontier guards to shoot at sight anyone crossing the frontier by irregular routes or in a clandestine manner.

Signor Turati was the leader of the Reformist Socialist Party and from 1890 to 1926 played a role in Italian political life comparable to that of Mr. Ramsay MacDonald in England. Though over seventy years of age and afflicted with serious heart-trouble, he, with some friends, escaped in a little motor-boat on a rough and starless night. Wind and weather drove them out of their reckoning, and when they made the coast of Corsica next morning it was on the opposite side of the island to that they had intended to strike.

All those who had frequented Turati's house in Milan, his intimate friends, even his doctors, were immediately arrested. Most of them were later released, while several were imprisoned or interned on the prison islands in the Mediterranean. Eleven were tried at Savona, among these being Ferruccio Parri and Carlo Rosselli who had accompanied Turati on his journey and had returned to Italy. Parri and Rosselli deserve to be known as two of the finest examples of the Italian younger generation.

Carlo Rosselli, who is 29 years old, fought gallantly in the war. He joined the Socialist movement in 1923 after the "March on Rome," when to be a Socialist meant facing prison and perhaps death. He was a lecturer in economics at the Commercial School of Genoa, and in 1926 left this post to found a weekly paper of political culture which was suppressed after an existence of a few months. His house was looted by the Fascists on July 15, 1925, because I had slept there two nights previously. When I came out of prison at 11 p. m., on July 13 the police advised me not to go to my own house to sleep as the Fascists would probably attack it. Not knowing whither to turn, I asked hospitality of my young friend. A manservant, who acted as a Fascist spy, informed the Fascists, and they looted the house in consequence, causing damage to the extent of 150,000 lire ($7,500).

Parri is a liberal. Before the war he was a high-school history teacher. Called up at the beginning of the war as a second lieutenant, he was promoted for conspicuous merit to the ranks of captain and major; he took part in nine offensives; wounded four times, he was four times decorated for heroism; he received the French Croix de Guerre and was mentioned in dispatches by General Nivelle. After the war he joined the staff of the Corriere della Sera and left only when in November, 1925, Senator Albertini was forced to relinquish the paper to the Fascists.

Arrested as accomplices in the crime of "unauthorized expatriation" of Signor Turati, Rosselli and Parri had the right by Italian law to receive "provisional liberty" (freedom on bail) awaiting trial. Instead of this they were interned on the island of Ustica. From the island, handcuffed like common criminals, they were brought to Savona for trial. While Rosselli was in Ustica, his young wife, an Englishwoman, gave birth to their first child.

The two young men, before the examining judge, fully acknowledged their share in Turati's escape and laid before the judge the following written declarations:

Declaration of Carlo Rosselli

The responsibility for my crime lies with Fascism. Fascism, by suppressing with blind fury and iniquitous laws any possibility of legal opposition, and by reducing to servitude millions of citizens, has forced upon them the tragic choice between abject acquiescence and exile. Fascism forces Italians to go into exile, and then unjustly accuses them of unpatriotism.

The moral foundation of our national life having been destroyed, nothing was left to the opposition leaders save to leave the country. Through the suffering and protests of our exiles the world will learn of our struggle in defense of European civilization. . . . It is an uphill fight today, not understood by the majority of our countrymen, and waged against a minority which is armed with all the power of a ferociously centralized state. But it is a fine fight for men who can never betray the cause made sacred by the blood of Amendola and Matteotti. It is in this faith that I have broken the Fascist law, determined to prove its futility and the impotence inherent in all despotism.

Filippo Turati abroad means for me and my companion a protest—backed by his forty years of service to the nation and to humanity—against the Fascist regime. In this grand old man, forced to leave his country because life worthy of the name was no longer possible, Europe will find a witness to the desolation to which Fascism has reduced Italy.

. . . My own humble endeavor is, I am sure, in line with that of the great ones who fought for Italian liberty. This continuity between the struggle of today and that of yesterday is exemplified in the history of my family. A Rosselli sheltered in secret at Pisa the dying Mazzini, an exile in his own country. It is fitting that another Rosselli, half a century later, should help to save from the fury of the Fascists one of the most noble and disinterested of his countrymen.

CARLO ROSSELLI

Declaration of Ferruccio Parri

I have not been guided by feelings of personal rancor toward the regime. My contempt for Fascism and my solicitude for the noble old man whose safety was threatened by it are only secondary motives in my action.

I served the Italian state in peace and war with loyalty and self-sacrifice. I have never followed revolutionary movements. Not caring for political strife, and having always remained outside party, I have no responsibility for the troubled post-war years.

Against Fascism I have only one cause for aversion, but that one is unalterable. It is aversion on moral grounds. It is an entire repudiation of the very atmosphere of Fascism. In this I am not alone. My ideas are those of thousands of young men who yesterday fought on their country's behalf and today oppose the empty rhetoric and jobbery which characterize the Fascist regime. To them Fascism shall render strict account of the tears and hate which stain its record, of the good which it has destroyed, of the wounds which it has inflicted upon the nation.

The regime can persecute and scatter us, but it can never stifle our opposition, for it is impossible to eradicate a moral instinct. . . . The ideals of liberty and of justice have been ever present in our history. . . . By our faith in these ideals we know one another. By its contempt for them we recognize Fascism. Against our persons Fascism can employ bludgeons and handcuffs. Against our faith it is powerless.

Fascism denounces us as anti-national. But having taught our national history in schools and fought in the Great War for an ideal of liberty and justice, I cannot but feel that the example of the Risorgimento and that of the war point out to us the duty of today. To those who most clearly see their way falls the honor of setting an example to others.

When all remnants of resistance were crushed I felt it necessary to make some protest in vindication of a better Italy. This protest could only be effected beyond our own frontiers.

I have with Signor Turati a bond stronger than all our differences: devotion to the same ideals and aversion to the present regime. Signor Turati, by his high-mindedness and by the dignity of his life, is well fitted to represent to civilized Europe all those of us who condemn the darkness which has fallen on our country and desire to see again an Italy free and equal for all Italians.

This is not on our part the desire for an easy martyrdom. But since Fascist law calls us to answer for our act, we acknowledge with pride our responsibility. . . . The law of a faction, in sentencing us, will honor us.

FERRUCCIO PARRI

On May 26, 1927, Signor Mussolini made a speech in the Chamber in which, throwing mud at his victims, he read letters from interned opponents who renounced their political past and asked for mercy. He gave no names. Rosselli, Parri, and another young man, Riccardo Bauer, who were all interned in Ustica, wrote to the Duce to declare that if others repented of their past they did not do so; they would refuse even to take advantage of an amnesty, since it was not they who should be amnestied but the Duce himself who should ask pardon from the Italian people.

On the eve of the Savona trial Turati sent to the presiding judge the following declaration:

DECLARATION OF FILIPPO TURATI

Last October I was in a bad state of health. On the advice of my doctors I requested the prefect of Milan to provide me with a passport for abroad, since it was evident that in whatever health resort I might visit in my own country I should be exposed to trouble from the Fascists, whereas a period of absolute quiet was necessary to me. I presented my doctor's certificate and an X-ray report, showing that I was suffering from serious heart-trouble and threatened with angina pectoris.

The prefect agreed to forward this request to Rome and promised me an early reply. The only answer that I obtained was that the following day a numerous guard of police was posted at the entrance to my house, where it remained night and day. I was virtually a prisoner. The police were under orders to keep me always in sight, even accompanying me in my carriage if I left the house. This meant complete isolation for me, since none of my friends dared visit me, nor could I go to see them on account of the alarm occasioned by the inquiries of the police agents in the houses I frequented.

I protested in vain to the prefect against this treatment. I asked that if any charge existed against me I might be sent to prison. Life became insupportable. I was under continual threat of assault and invasion of my house. On the occasion of the last attempt on the "Duce's" life at Bologna, the commissioner of police forced me, in spite of my protests, to leave my house by night, accompanied by police, to take refuge elsewhere, as "he was unable to guarantee my impunity from aggression and invasion from the Fascists."

To find a little quiet I decided to leave my home and go incognito to stay with friends outside Milan. One evening in November I left my home by way of a back-staircase and a courtyard leading to a neighboring house, from which I was able to depart unobserved in the semi-darkness, while my guards remained talking together. I was received in his small house in the country of Varese by my old friend Signor Albini. I remained there until December 2, when, realizing that I was being searched for assiduously, and not wishing to be the cause of persecution to my hosts, I left this refuge. The next day the prefect of Milan, accompanied by an inspector of police sent expressly from Rome, descended on Albini's house with a force of police.

It was only then that, finding myself followed and threatened wherever I sought refuge, I began to feel the necessity of leaving the country. It was not my wish to leave. I was literally hunted from Italy by persecution as unworthy as it was illegal. My real accomplices are those who forced me to leave against my will. It was only when I perceived that my persecution became every day more persistent and insolent and that wherever I took refuge I only brought trouble on my friends, that I resolved to escape by sea. The decision was made by myself alone at the last moment in the humiliation of finding myself, for no legitimate cause, spied upon and watched like a criminal. This abuse of power and the refusal to issue me a passport was contrary to the custom of any civilized country and to the law of Italy itself. My act was one of legitimate reaction to illegal treatment.

Parri and Rosselli accompanied me. I had begged them not to come. They insisted on doing so, not because their presence was necessary, but simply out of devoted friendship to me in such a painful moment. . . . I shall be grateful to fate—despite the anguish of this recent ordeal—if the exile which afflicts my declining years bears witness to my faith and makes me an instrument, however obscure, of civilization, even after the immediate facts have perished in oblivion.

The trial at Savona resulted in sentences of ten months' imprisonment for each of the prisoners, but the government is not satisfied with this and will appeal.

SUFFRAGE AS A REWARD for being a good little Fascist is the latest of Mussolini's ideas for the unification of Italy. At a meeting of the Fascist Grand Council over which the Premier himself presided it was proposed that the right to vote should be granted only to those who are considered active contributors to the welfare of Italy. Presumably members of Fascist guilds in the best standing will be among the elect; others may get into the charmed circle as best they may. And when they are in, when they are accorded the inestimable privilege of the vote, they will be permitted to vote for only one party—the Fascist—for the simple reason that only one party—the Fascist—will exist. Candidates are to be proposed by the Fascist guilds or corporations; their names will be gone over by the Grand Council in order that the chaff may be separated from the wheat. The Grand Council will add names of its own choosing and the combined list will be submitted to the select few who are permitted to vote. This is a neat and inexpensive scheme, but, like most good schemes, it might be improved upon. Would it not be simpler, for instance, to eliminate the nominations by the corporations, to have the Grand Council choose the candidates and also cast a proxy vote for the rest of the country? If the council was too busy it could delegate its powers still further: Il Duce could with one twist of the wrist cast a ballot for Italy, and the thing would be done.

PICTURESQUE TALES about a six-year-old King, a golden-haired Queen Mother, and the various mistresses of a former Prince cannot disguise the fact that in Rumania things are not going well. Most recently the spotlight has been turned on M. Manoilescu, former Under Secretary of Finance, just acquitted of the charge of complicity in a plot to restore Prince Carol to the throne occupied by his son. M. Manoilescu emphatically denied that Carol ever wished to depose little King Mihai; possibly he was right. But whether he was or not, the trial and its attendant excitement ought not to divert attention in the outside world from what is really happening in this troubled section of the troubled Balkans. Rumania is fast disappearing into the maw of a despotism as unyielding as that of Primo de Rivera in Spain. Censorship, military dictatorship, the helplessness of a child king are the weapons by which the Bratianu family is defeating Rumania. Premier Bratianu himself is a strong man; and he is able to place members of his family in subordinate positions in order that his commands may be carried out. If a coup were effected by which the exiled Prince Carol were actually restored to the headship of his country, one wonders how long he would last in opposition to so fierce and so experienced a political lion.

LORD WEMYSS, lately First Sea Lord of the British Admiralty, who was one of the advisers to the English makers of the Peace of Versailles, has demanded in the House of Lords that Great Britain denounce the Declaration of Paris of 1856 and reassert her "ancient historic right" to search neutral ships at sea and confiscate cargoes bound for enemy countries even though not contraband. The British Government, through its First Civil Lord, promptly replied that this was impossible and Lord Haldane paid his respects to the Admiralty which seems bent on rousing world opinion against England as rapidly as possible. What Lord Wemyss proposes is another blow at what remains of the war-wrecked structure of international law, instead of helping to rebuild it, and thereby he gives convincing proof of the menace army and navy men everywhere are to the civilized world. Only a few weeks ago a French admiral announced that in the next war France would attack unarmed ships with its fliers without regard to passengers or anything else, although this is precisely what was called piracy and murder on the high seas when the Germans did it by means of their submarines. Freedom of the seas is about as far away, if not further, than the disarmament solemnly promised by our beatified Allies and ourselves when we jointly concocted the Treaty of Versailles.

"AL" SMITH'S impressive State-wide victory had its darker aspects in New York City, where the "New Tammany" showed it had not forgotten how to use the old Tammany tricks. Judge Panken, running for reelection after ten years on the Municipal Court bench, was defeated by a combination of fraudulent tactics designed to outwit even the mechanical honesty of the new voting machines. "Floaters" to the number of several thousand, it is charged, voted and repeated their votes in the hotly contested districts, and election officials perpetrated glaring frauds which the Socialist watchers seemed unable to prevent or stop. Similar methods were used to defeat Charles Solomon for the Assembly. An interesting comment on these practices was quoted by several newspapers as coming from no less an authority than John R. Voorhis, Tammany man and head of the Board of Elections.

> The Socialists [said Mr. Voorhis] have complained that the Republicans and Democrats were trying to do them, and the Socialists were probably correct. There is nothing new in it.

But if the Socialists were defrauded of their fair gains in New York City, they did better elsewhere. In Reading, Pennsylvania, a city of 120,000, the whole Socialist ticket was swept into office; in Buffalo a Socialist was elected president of the City Council; and in Boston, where for ten years the Socialist Party has put out no city ticket, a Socialist ran second for councilman with a large vote, no doubt as a protest against the executions of Sacco and Vanzetti. In New York too the Socialist vote showed marked increases. Even in a year of flat reaction in the East, a faint breeze of protest has sprung up.

FOR THE SECOND TIME Westchester County in New York State has given an amazing example of intelligent independent voting. This, the richest suburban county in the United States and one of the most populous, again defeated a proposed new charter which concentrated power in the hands of a few political insiders. The system of governing suburban towns by a board of supervisors is an anachronism and they know it in Westchester. Twice, however, the voters have examined the document submitted to them and rejected it—rejected it though powerful business bodies and the still more powerful Republican boss, William L. Ward, championed each one. Boss Ward and the growth of this commuter community have together made Westchester a heavily Republican county. But the Republicans there will take no charter on anybody's say-so when they have reason to believe that a chief result of its adoption will be the fortifying of two or three men in complete control of the county.

POLICEMEN IN NEWARK, New Jersey, have an effective if not original method of stopping meetings which they consider objectionable. The organization which wishes to hold the meeting duly applies for a police permit, stating on its application the purpose for which the meeting is to be held; the chief of police examines the documents —presumably—and the permit is duly granted. Preparations for the meeting continue merrily. The day before it is scheduled the permit is revoked on some ground or other, and if an attempt is made to hold a meeting in defiance of police order, there are plenty of policemen on hand to arrest would-be participants or speakers for "disorderly conduct." This happened last week to the Young Workers' Communist League, which desired to celebrate the tenth anniversary of the Russian Revolution at a gathering on November 13. The permit was granted on November 9, Chief of Police McRell being fully aware of what the meeting was for; it was "revoked" on November 12, twenty-four hours before the meeting was to have taken place. About 200 persons assembled at the hall to listen to a few sentences by speakers addressing them from soap-boxes; seven men, including the speaker, were arrested and released on an aggregate bail of $900—somewhat excessive, one would think, for the crime in question. The American Civil Liberties Union is undertaking the defense of the men, but meanwhile the time for celebrating is past. If anything can create a red menace in America it is this kind of arbitrary police czarism. Unfortunately Newark is not unique. In the Pennsylvania coal-fields the police act as agents of the owners; there is no pretense of maintaining the constitutional rights of free speech and free assembly.

CHINA IS CARRYING ON with a normal supply of civil wars. In the North fighting has been suspended, possibly because of cold weather; on the Yangtze the Nanking Government forces have driven General Tang Seng-che out of Hankow. Since Tang joined the Canton forces two years ago he has been successively the hero of the radicals, then the bloodiest suppressor of labor and peasant unions in China, and finally a personal military chieftain living on the country he ruled. Tang has retired to his old province of Hunan, while the soldiers and even the generals who were under his command have been incorporated into the Nanking army. Nanking now promises a purely civilian government of the Wuhan cities about Hankow—but she has not announced how she will get rid of the soldiers. Another effort at civilian government, under some of the old leaders, is being made at the traditional base in Canton. But civil government is desperately fragile in China, and no group which rejects the support of the workers and peasants—the beginnings of organized civilian power—is likely to endure. Meanwhile the foreigners in China are behaving as foolishly as ever; on the anniversary of the Soviet Revolution a white mob stormed the Russian Consulate in Shanghai, apparently with the tacit consent of the avowed upholders of law and order.

A GALA DAY, totally unexpected, followed the formal ceremonies opening the Holland Tunnel under the Hudson River. Thousands of persons had been assembling before the New York and New Jersey entrances; when President Coolidge gave the signal which declared the structure officially complete crowds surged toward the openings, marched in where only motor vehicles are supposed to tread, and with songs and shouts and waving of hands and of flags announced that as far as they were concerned the tunnel was in use. Enthusiasts shook hands with each other across the invisible State barrier; and the tunnel police joined in the fun. Thousands who were there may never ride through its miles of smooth concrete. They did not care. They were celebrating the machine, as thousands celebrated the airplane in which Lindbergh flew the Atlantic. This particular machine was, as they saw it, fresh and uncorrupted; the symbol in some way they could not explain for all machines. Thus the radio might have been honored before a message passed over its secret wires; thus the dynamo just leaving the factory, the steamship standing helpless upon the ways. If these machines are put to unworthy uses it is no fault of the machine as such; while they are still new they are fit subject for popular rejoicing.

The History of William J. Burns

THIS Mr. Burns, whom the United States Government accuses of jury-tampering and of making false affidavits, is an old friend. When he boasts that he has done nothing for Harry Sinclair that he had not done dozens of times for the Government, he is probably telling the truth. It would be hard to go lower than the Department of Justice has gone in recent years, and government secret-service men have behaved very much like the animals known as private detectives. There is no lower job to which a human being can stoop. Generally speaking, the task of the private detective is not to prevent or expose crime; it is to provoke men into being worse than they are in order that they may be convicted, to another man's profit. And the private detective will commit any crime to gain his end.

When Mr. Burns resigned from his post as Director of the Bureau of Investigations of the Department of Justice in 1923, the Attorney General stated that Burns had been identified with the Government for twenty-five years, having served in the Treasury Secret Service before Harry Daugherty put him at the head of the Government's under-cover men. What Burns did for the Treasury we do not know, but in 1907 he picked a jury for an Oregon land-fraud case in such fashion that five years later, when the facts were revealed, the then Attorney General recommended a pardon, and President Taft, pardoning the man whom Burns had helped to convict, said that Burns's work was "the most barefaced and unfair use of all the machinery for drawing a jury disclosed to me in all my experience in the federal courts." But the statute of limitations had run, and Burns went free. In 1918 an Attorney General of the other party looked into the records and confirmed that judgment of Burns.

In 1917 Burns operatives were caught tapping telephone wires in New York City and were accused of entering offices at night to copy papers. Edward W. Edwards, secretary of the Allied Printing Trades Council, then asked that Burns's license be revoked, but Burns again escaped. When the Wall Street explosion occurred in 1920 Burns was very much in evidence. It was the work of Red plotters, he asserted before the streets had been swept; and he offered $50,000 reward for evidence convicting the plotters. Perhaps he felt safe; at any rate, one of his own agents later testified that he had written and mailed bomb threats at the behest of Burns officials, and added that a Burns agent had offered him bombs to plant in radical offices! When Burns denounces the "Red menace" in America, he is sometimes denouncing the work of his own agents.

That Burns was a persistent agent provocateur there is no doubt. He was not in charge of the United States Secret Service when it organized Communist Party sections and instructed its agents to fix meetings for a certain night, so that the Government could round them up wholesale—that was Chief Flynn's dirty work. But Burns provoked crime on a large scale through his own private detective agency. More than one of his ex-servants has confessed the role he played by Burns's orders. And when E. D. Lindenfeld was arrested in Warsaw, Poland, in 1921, charged with responsibility for the Wall Street explosion, Burns gave away his hand. There was "no question" that Lindenfeld's arrest solved the "plot," he said; at the same time he asserted that Lindenfeld had been, first, the agent in America of the Third International, and second, one of Burns's own under-cover men. Eventually, Lindenfeld's story dissolved in mist.

They were Burns agents, again, who persuaded the Communists in 1923 to stage their silly secret meeting in the sand-dunes of northern Michigan, and then tipped off the State police to arrest them all. Sidney Howard in "The Labor Spy" prints a series of unattractive reports made in 1923 by Burns agents who acted as I. W. W. organizers in the copper districts of Arizona when Burns was employed by the mine companies. Two of these Burns stool-pigeons were later expelled from the I. W. W. because they "acted as hired detectives of the Burns International Detective Agency and advocated force and violence after joining the I. W. W." The manufacturers' association of Erie, Pennsylvania, paid Burns $29,817 to defeat the molders' strike there. In Joliet, Illinois, only two years ago, a Burns detective was caught throwing a bomb at a non-union garage in an attempt to discredit a strike of automobile mechanics.

Burns was in charge of the United States Secret Service when the Sinclairs and Dohenys were looting the nation's oil and when Daugherty was selling favors at the Department of Justice. Indeed he was Daugherty's man; he boasted of their forty-years' friendship. And he used all the power of his office to stop the investigations and protect the scoundrels. He had the impudence to instruct his secretary, using a United States Government telegraphic code, to wire to Edward B. McLean, Fall's protector (who was on the secret roll of the Department of Justice as a dollar-a-year man), warning him of Senator Walsh's departure for Florida. When Senator Wheeler began probing into Daugherty's muck, Burns sent three United States agents to Montana instructed to "get something on Wheeler." In other words, he used his office against the people of the United States.

Side by side with his misconduct of public office Burns carried on the work of his private detective agency. Ostensibly he had resigned; in fact he wrote letters on United States stationery directing the operations of his private agents and stool-pigeons. And when he left office, he left it with the advantage of government associations. It was natural that Harry Sinclair should turn to Burns if he wanted to make sure of his jury. Burns was accustomed to that kind of work. The story that he instructed an agent to make out and swear to an affidavit, false from beginning to end, accusing a United States government official, does not surprise us. It is denied; it may be disproved; but it is in keeping with Burns's character and record.

We would not besmirch William J. Burns unduly. He belongs to his tribe, and is probably no better and no worse than the rest of them—the Flynns, Shermans, Thieles, and others who sell their thousands of under-cover men to anyone with money to buy them. It will do no good if Burns goes to jail, and the country settles back in the comfortable conviction that a distinguished sinner has been punished. All these private detective agencies ought to be put under a checkrein and made responsible for their acts.

Senator Borah Scores Again

THAT was a refreshing and vigorous utterance which Senator Borah made before the Woman's National Committee for Law Enforcement in New York on November 12. In unqualified language he demanded that the two parties and the candidates for the Presidency announce prior to the conventions where they stand on the Eighteenth Amendment, and whether they propose to enforce the prohibition law if intrusted with the government. He properly denounced the politicians who believe that the issue can be sidestepped. He admitted the right of those who believe that the Eighteenth Amendment should be repealed to agitate to that end as much as they please. The Constitution, he insisted, must be upheld and enforced and he at last met the issue of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments by saying that he was for the enforcement of the entire Constitution but that he deemed those amendments so faultily drawn as to make their real enforcement impossible.

In other words, he demanded that we face the issue which more than any other interests the American people today. That it should be necessary to make such a demand is surely proof of the way cowardice and hypocrisy rule our political life. We do not see why all Americans, whether Wet or Dry, should not rally behind him—all except those who today profit by the illicit liquor traffic, or desire to have the prohibition law remain a dead letter. Those who are opposed to the law on genuinely conscientious grounds have the right to violate it, but they do so at their own risk and must be as prepared to pay the penalty, even to going to jail, as were the conscientious objectors to military service in 1917 and 1918. Such men, if sincere, will want to work openly for the repeal of the amendment. The Nation has long urged a nation-wide referendum upon this issue; there is no reason whatever why a country which could find a way overnight to conscript the youth of the land could not devise a machinery to register the feelings of the people on the liquor question. If this is not done, then those who desire repeal should demand action of Congress and of the several legislatures and should stand behind Senator Borah in insisting that candidates say honestly whether they are Wet or Dry.

The Senator's contention, which is also ours, that this is the subject which interests the public most, is upheld by the press reports of the recent election. Held in an off year, the newspapers were interested only in interpreting the results from the angle of prohibition and their effect upon the political fortunes of Governor Smith. The defeat of the super-Wet Mayor in Detroit by a gentleman who never made a speech or gave a promise or appeared at a public meeting during the campaign; the race-track victory in Kentucky; the defeat, in an Ohio referendum, of the Anti-Saloon League proposal to legitimatize the practice of letting judges in prohibition cases collect their fees out of the fines imposed, have all been weighed and assayed, together with Governor Smith's latest victory in New York, as to their bearing on prohibition. Quite naturally the interpreters read the signs as their own prejudices would have them. One Washington correspondent declares the election a great setback to Governor Smith, the Wet; another asserts that it more than ever puts him to the front as the only possible Democratic candidate. He has achieved so strong a hold upon the New York electorate that he has now only to indicate his wish in order to have it carried out—an amazing circumstance. No one can deny the fact. Governor Smith rightly opposed one amendment out of eight—that which gave the Governor a four-year term but made his election coincident with that for the Presidency. The voters picked that amendment out and heavily defeated it—while the other amendments all carried easily.

But Governor Smith, for all his power and popularity, is still one of those covered by Senator Borah's demand. If he tries to sit on the fence regarding the liquor question he is lost. So he will be if he allows any advisers to make him believe it wise to truckle to the Drys. He is a Wet by habit and conviction, and everybody knows it. The public will rightly despise him if he switches to gain votes; it should certainly not permit him to be a serious candidate until he states frankly and honestly whether he is for the repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment or not, and whether he himself, personally, will obey the law if he enters the White House. In heaven's name, let us have some respect for mental integrity and state, whether candidates or not, under which flag we stand. The woman's committee declares that it voices the views of ten million women who desire the law to be enforced. Let the Wets marshal their cohorts.

The Naivete of the English

INDIA is shaken again. On November 8 Parliament was informed that the British Government had appointed a commission to report whether India is ready for a further measure of self-government. This fact in itself would not be enough to shake that country; for, when the Government of India Act was adopted by Parliament in 1919, it was specifically provided that the reforms were to be effective for a first stage of ten years, and before the expiration of that period an inquiry would be instituted into the results achieved and recommendations for the future would be made to Parliament. The commission has not been appointed any too soon. Two years are not a long time for an investigation of such profound importance to more than 300 million people.

What has shaken India is the personnel of the commission. It consists of seven members, among whom there is not one Indian. Not only have the avowed Nationalists like Pandit Malaviya and Pandit Moti Lal Nehru been ignored; but men like Mr. Patel, who has officiated with the greatest satisfaction to all parties as the first elected president of the Indian Legislative Assembly, have been passed over, as has Mr. Srinivasa Sastri, who was long a "moderate" and seemed to have the confidence of the Government of India, and even those Indians of ability, occupants of posts of trust, who have been staunch supporters of the British Raj. All Indians have been omitted on the ground that "the desire, natural and legitimate, of Indian members to see India a self-governing nation could hardly fail to color their judgment of her present capacity to sustain that role." Could any but the most self-complacent Tory Government in history have uttered a statement of such perfect naivete?

There lies nowhere in the announcement a hint that India is in any degree possessed of either the right or the ability to make decisions concerning her own fate. Rather she is like a child before its parents asking for a dime to go to the movies, or with forbidden jam on its lips; or, perhaps in a better analogy, a plaintiff before a jury—or is she considered a defendant at the bar?—without even a jury of her own lowly peers! This is the spark which is kindling India's flame of resentment and in some quarters threatening a boycott of the commission. Once more India's self-esteem has been shattered on British arrogance. We predict that in the future as in the past Britain will get small satisfaction from her policy of governing this proud people in the manner of condescension, not to say of insult.

Yet the problems of governmental reform in India are not merely technical ones of division of administrative responsibility; extension of the franchise; collection, control, and expenditure of revenue. They are, in their most troublesome aspects, rooted deep in social and political anomalies. Until the violent Hindu-Moslem hatred melts away, no satisfactory system of representation will ever be devised. Each element, distrustful of the other, clamors for a different method. The Hindus wish a single, general electorate, such as we have in this country. The Mohammedans, forming only one quarter of the country's population, insist on the election of representatives to the various legislative bodies by separate religious communities. Otherwise, they argue, and perhaps justly, they would never be represented and their rights would be ignored. A somewhat similar situation exists in the southern part of the country between Brahman and non-Brahman communities. Of a totally different character is the problem of the Native States, governed by hereditary monarchs and with greater or less degrees of independence as regards their internal administration. These are in no respect bound by the system of government prevailing in British India. But since they are scattered through all parts of British India like polka dots, they create an unusual disharmony of autocratic with representative government.

These problems and others with them have baffled many excellent British minds for decades. We wonder what this commission's seven members, who start so innocent of Indian affairs, will accomplish in two short years. We suspect that until Englishmen admit the equal right—we should say even a better right—of Indians to discuss the government of India, all the commissions in the world can do no better than mark time. Englishmen who cannot see the imperial color of their own minds are an obstacle to progress wherever they flaunt their naive complacencies.

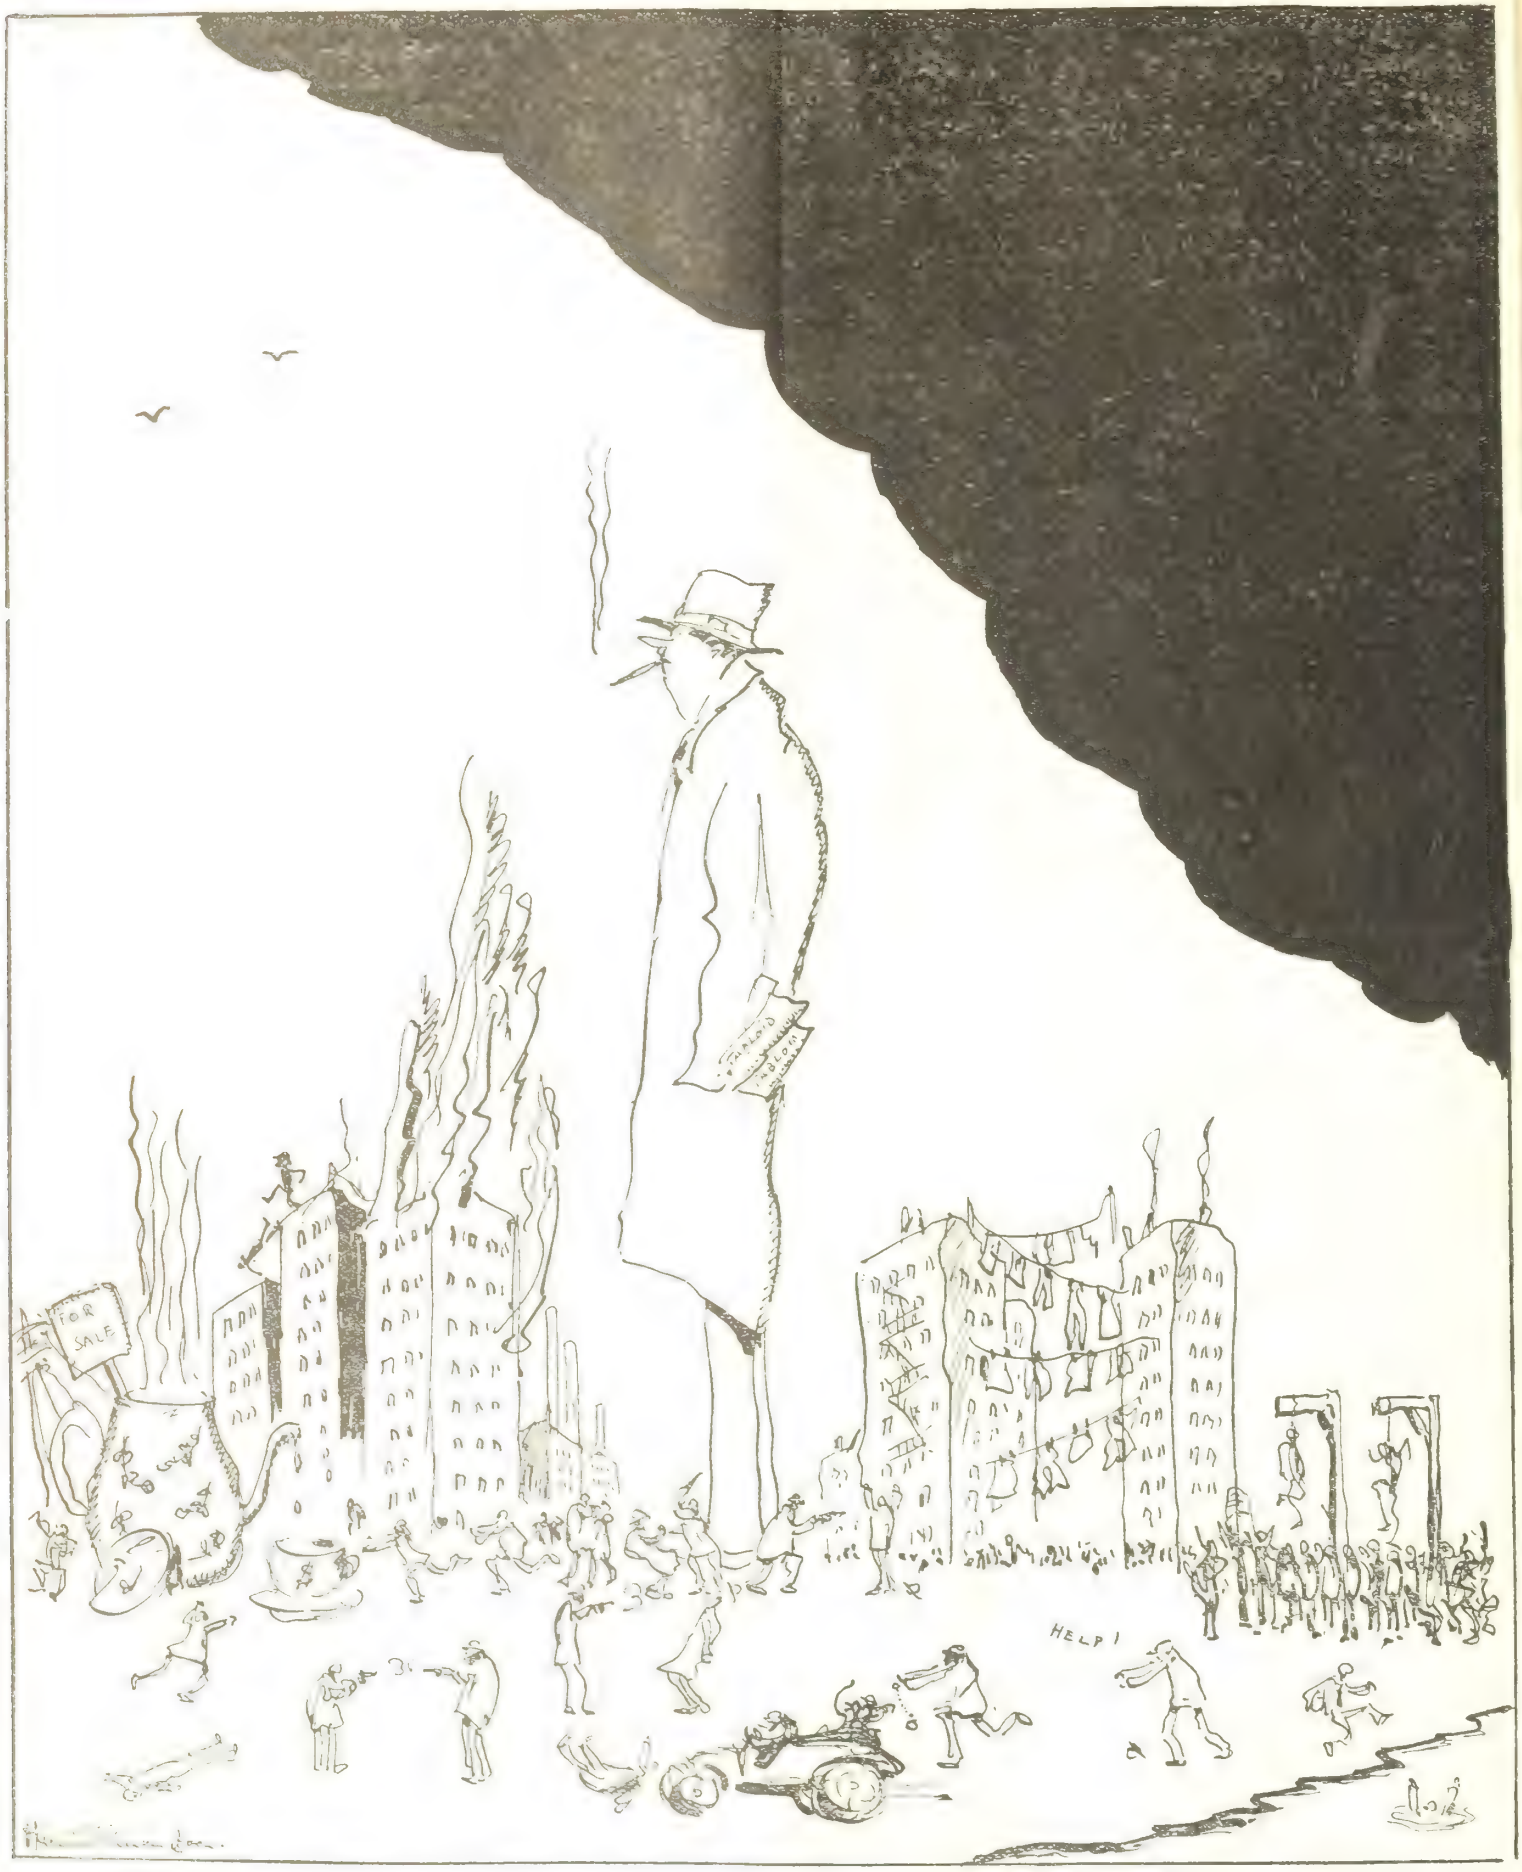
The Art of Translation

IT is seldom that writers of power are attracted by the "other harmony" of translation, and seldom, therefore, that first-rate work is done in the field. Dryden, who in the preface to a volume of pieces he had rendered from the classics announced in 1685 that "For this last half year I have been troubled with the disease (as I may call it) of translation," was a writer of great original power. And since he was also given to reflecting upon his processes as he worked, and was one of the ablest of critics, he was able to publish some excellent remarks upon the general subject of translation conceived as an art. He put his finger, for instance, directly upon the weakness with which most translators are afflicted. "The proprieties and delicacies of the English [language] are known to few," he justly said; "'tis impossible even for a good wit to understand and practice them without the help of a liberal education, long reading, and digesting of those few good authors we have amongst us, the knowledge of men and manners, the freedom of habitudes and conversation with the best company of both sexes; and, in short, without wearing off the rust which he contracted while he was laying in a stock of learning. . . . Thus it appears necessary that a man should be a nice critic in his mother tongue before he attempts to translate a foreign language. . . . He must perfectly understand his author's tongue, and absolutely command his own."

We do not presume to know how deeply experienced the average translator today may be in conversation with the best company of both sexes, but we are sure that in general no better counsel than Dryden's could be offered one who was about to undergo the pain of bringing life out of another language than his own. Dryden's counsel, in brief, was to become a great and fine writer. Now few can be that; and few, accordingly, can translate well. When in addition we consider the rewards that come to translators, often for work whose exasperating difficulties are never suspected by the reader in his armchair, the wonder is that there are any superb specimens of the art whatever.

"It seems to me," said Dryden on another occasion, "that the true reason why we have so few versions which are tolerable is . . . because there are few who have all the talents which are requisite for translation, and that there is so little praise and so small encouragement for so considerable a part of learning." The only substantial reward indeed, today as in other times, is praise; and there is little enough of that, while of encouragement there seems to be none at all. How famous is C. K. Scott Moncrieff, whose endless, noble task of turning Marcel Proust into the best conceivable English is brought to mind this fall by the appearance in America of "Cities of the Plain," the fourth instalment of "Remembrance of Things Past"? He is not a famous man, we fear, though he deserves to be ten times more so than most English and American novelists. His work must be its own reward, as was the case with the great translators in Tudor England, who did what they did because of a passion to see Plutarch, Suetonius, Froissart, Montaigne, and the rest in the King's language; as was the case with the Augustans, who hungered to see the classics silvered over with the beauties of a modern tongue; as is the case today with Aylmer Maude, Constance Garnett, Eden and Cedar Paul, Edwin Muir, and several others—most of them, it must be confessed, in England.

Elsewhere in this issue of The Nation will be found a partial list of titles appearing as translations in America this fall. The list, which incidentally makes no attempt to represent the work constantly going on in technical fields, may seem large to some, but to others who are aware of all that is going on in the literatures of Europe it will seem slight enough. The German language is represented best, with works by Emil Ludwig, Arthur Schnitzler, Hermann Sudermann, Jacob Wassermann, Franz Werfel, Stefan Zweig, and Sigmund Freud. France comes next, with André Gide and Marcel Proust at the head of its column. Spain and Italy send only a handful of volumes, and the same is true of the Northern countries; while of the new Russian literature about which we hear so much there is almost nothing to be seen. There is a committee for recommending American books for translation into Russian; must there be a committee for recommending Russian books to us?



The Optimist

"Oh, look at the pretty little birds!"

It Seems To Heywood Broun

I COULD wish "happy birthday" to Soviet Russia with a good deal more heartiness if I had not read the report by Roger Baldwin which was printed in The Nation. Of Mr. Baldwin's friendliness to the Revolution there can be no doubt, and his most unfavorable findings are hardly overdrawn since he advances them so apologetically. Though 100 per cent Americanism is still not my ideal, I may go all the way up to sixty-five or seventy if I hear many more excuses for the things which are amiss in Russia.

"The prisons were crowded," writes Roger Baldwin and explains, "the Government was nervous." But that holds just as true of terrorism when we have it in these United States. There never was any doubt in my mind that Mitchell Palmer was a sincerely frightened man. It was a nervous Massachusetts which killed Sacco and Vanzetti. The conception of Governor Fuller as an arch-fiend always seemed to me uncomprehending. He was not cruel but panicky.

If sincerity is the only test of right or wrong in governmental oppression I shall break at once into the Star Spangled Banner, for the heresy hunters of this land are as fanatical in their sense of godly inspiration as any you are likely to find in many marches.

"The cries of horror which accompany political executions of bourgeois opponents are all of bourgeois origin," says Mr. Baldwin. But that does not mark Russia as unique among the nations. When Fascisti murder a Socialist it is not the Fascisti who cry out in protest.

And, again, I find: "There is terrorism in Russia, but it is directed chiefly against a comparatively small class. . . ." Here, too, Russia follows the usual formula of governments which imagine they hear footsteps on the stairs. The conscientious objectors were not numerous in America, which was one of the very reasons why they were hounded. Mr. Baldwin himself fought against the police power of New Jersey during the strike in Passaic and he must have known that the people whose cause he espoused were but a handful hemmed in by the hostile.

Roger Baldwin has already done his share of suffering for liberty, but if logic holds him in strict allegiance he should top his six months sentence here for the right of free assembly, by going back to Russia and serving out another term for the glory of free speech. He believes, he says, in "the utmost freedom of opinion consistent with its maintenance." This introduces the element of interpretation. I would have freedom quite a little freer. Obviously a case might have been made against Debs under Baldwin's definition. The important question seems to me to be the authority which is allowed to pass upon consistency. We are told that the secret political police of Russia are doing the most effective job in the world. "Even the government chiefs are inclined to defer to its judgment of what constitutes public safety." Does this mean that such American liberals as disliked rule by Burns or Flynn or Palmer must go and apologize to these gentlemen?

In speaking again of the GPU, or secret police, Mr. Baldwin says: "Its operations are masked in secrecy; it encourages dread by making its arrests late at night; and rumor is the chief reporter of its decisions." Apparently America has less to learn from Russia than I had assumed. Even our amateurs in Georgia and Mississippi are up to these tricks. I would rather put my trust in a corrupt congressman, or governor, or mayor, than depend upon the mercies of the best policeman in the world.

Time after time the point is made that those in Russia who go to exile, jail, or death are only bourgeois. But it does happen that the bourgeoisie have flesh and blood and bones, and can feel cold and steel about the same as workers. I distrust the revolutionary faith in labels. Ten years ago, perhaps, there was some reasonableness in separating sheep from goats by tests based on economic gradations. By now there has been time even for capitalists to change their coats and see the light. Just how do you tell a member of the bourgeoisie if you happen to sit next him at a dinner table? Press hard upon his finger nail, I suppose, and watch to see if there is left a little splotch of purple.

During our dark days the discovery was made that it was not difficult to use the word "bolshevist" to include almost anybody who happened to be in disagreement with your opinions on whatever question. Unless human nature has been radically altered by the Soviets, I suspect that a bourgeois Russian is a political opponent who has just left the room.

As far as Roger Baldwin's article goes, I see in it nothing to uphold the hands of politicians here who would deny recognition to the Russians. In fact I don't see how we can fail to recognize them. The face which they turn toward us is certainly familiar. "Its rigid controls are regarded as temporary war measures." Surely we have heard that before. "Of perhaps four or five thousand arrested all over Russia last June, it was estimated that only seven or eight hundred were actually exiled." A. Mitchell Palmer showed the same sort of liberality.

Indeed, the discouraging factor about the Russian dictatorship lies in its strength and its efficiency. One rather expects political rebels to be stood against a wall in Mexico because there the possibility of overturn is really imminent. But there is nothing to show that Russia has not safely weathered its greatest dangers from outside interference. From this corner of the earth the talk of war by England sounds not unlike some speech delivered in Chicago. Nevertheless, it has sufficed to put out of the way men not popular with Soviet officials.

Our Security Leaguers urge upon us without cessation the virtues of military training. It promotes patriotism, increases chest expansion, and makes fine manly boys. I should think General Bullard would love the land of the Soviets where the rhythm of hob-nailed boots is never stilled. Russia is on the move, of that there can be no question, but is this a new road or are there ruts and wagon wheels to show that it is an old and familiar parade ground?

HEYWOOD BROUN

Time Out for Corruption!

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, November 8

ENGULFED by the tide of corruption against which it was launched, the Fall-Sinclair trial came to an ignominious and premature end November 2. To the old charges of bribery and conspiracy in the oil cases, there is now added the new and even more abhorrent one of jury-tampering. Again, in the factories and on the farms of America, men shake their heads and mutter the old axiom: "It's hard to convict a hundred million dollars in this country."

The proceedings which compelled Justice Siddons to dismiss the jury and declare a mistrial at a time when the case appeared to be going very badly for the defendants, resulted from a natural meeting between the Sinclair wealth and the peculiar talents of that famous jury-scouter, Mr. William J. Burns. Day and night, from the very hour the jury was sworn, eleven of its members were dogged and watched, and their financial condition, business connections, social relations, personal habits, and religion subjected to the most intimate and detailed scrutiny by fifteen operatives of the Burns Detective Agency, employed for that purpose by Henry Mason Day, one of Harry Sinclair's vice-presidents. Subsequently, called before the grand jury to explain his activity, Mr. Day declined to answer questions on the ground that he might incriminate himself.

The incident of Juror Kidwell, who discussed Sinclair's "democratic manner" in a soft-drink saloon, and boasted that when the trial was over he would have an automobile "as long as this block," was a minor element contributing to the mistrial, if an interesting one. The presence in the jury box of this young leather-worker, who spent his evening hanging out on street corners, and had never paid any attention to the oil cases "except maybe to glance at the headlines," was but the natural consequence of a rule which confined jury service to those who knew little or nothing about the most important public event in America since the war.

So long as ignorance remains the first requirement of a juror in the federal courts, and so long as intelligent interest in great public events is sufficient to disqualify a citizen for the highest exercise of his citizenship, there will be more "Eddie" Kidwells in the jury boxes, and more juries of the kind that sang "Bye, Bye, Blackbird," and shot craps on the floor as a preliminary to acquitting E. L. Doheny and Albert Fall. But that is another problem.

It has been remarked that things were going badly for the defense when Sinclair money and Burns genius collaborated to produce the mistrial which gives the defense a lapse of two and a half months in which to redraft their strategy and perfect new explanations. With indefatigable energy and the skill which reveals him as one of the truly great lawyers of the country, Owen J. Roberts had woven a deadly net of fact and circumstance around the hard-boiled oil magnate and the feeble Fall.

He had shown how Fall sought, obtained, and exulted over control of the naval reserves in the matter of leasing. He had shown the furtiveness with which the negotiations with Sinclair were begun, and the secrecy in which they were consummated. Other oil men had come on the scene, eager to bid. They were rank outsiders. The crafty Fall strung them along, putting one off, lying to another, and as a ludicrous climax to a comedy of double-dealing, cordially invited one to submit propositions when the lease was at that moment lying signed in his desk, ten days old.

Then the story of the reward. What a picture! Fall was in debt to his ears. The joint and several notes of himself and his son-in-law, Everhart, totaled $108,000, most of them long overdue. Fall's own note for $15,000 was three years past due. Times were hard in the cattle country. Suddenly, less than two months after the leasing of Teapot Dome, this New Mexican night of despair was shattered by a burst of sunshine from the East. Returning from Washington, where he visited Fall, and from New York, where he visited persons yet unknown, Everhart appeared in Pueblo, Colorado, with $230,500 in Liberty bonds. With these he paid the debts of Fall, himself, and their cattle company, and from the remainder deposited $70,000 to Fall's cash account.

Roberts deftly traced these bonds to the Continental Trading Co., a mysterious corporation which was born on the day that A. E. Humphreys by invitation met certain oil men in New York to sell them 33,000,000 barrels of oil. Those men were Sinclair; Robert W. Stewart, head of the Standard Oil of Indiana; Harry M. Blackmer, head of the Midwest Refining, a Standard subsidiary; and James E. O'Neill, head of the Prairie Oil and Gas, a so-called "independent" with strong Standard ties.

Humphreys sold them the oil; that is, he thought he had sold it to them until the last moment. When the time came to sign the contract, he discovered that the formal purchaser was the Continental, unknown to him, but fully guaranteed in the performance of its contract by Stewart, Sinclair, and O'Neill. This infant prodigy on the same day resold the oil to companies controlled by Sinclair, Stewart, and O'Neill at a profit of 25 cents a barrel, which, under the contract, would have amounted to a total profit of more than $8,000,000. Out of $3,000,000 thus accumulated, the Liberty bonds were purchased which passed through the hands of Everhart into the pocket of Fall. What became of the remaining $2,769,000 is an absorbing secret, in which the Department of Justice apparently has not the slightest interest. The entire sum was invested in Liberty bonds, but one wonders in vain who got the others.

Everhart, called as a witness to explain where he got the bonds, refused to tell on the ground that his testimony might incriminate him. His plea was upheld after his lawyer had argued to the court (out of the presence of the jury) that "to force my client to answer this question is to compel him to rivet the chains of the penitentiary upon his own limbs."

For the effect on the jury of this damning testimony and the even more damning refusal to testify, I quote from a statement made by a juror after the jury was dismissed:

> I felt, and I believe the other jurors felt, that the Government had made out a strong case of conspiracy. Of course, we intended to keep open minds until we had heard the defense. But certain things had to be refuted or satisfactorily explained before I could have voted for acquittal. There was all the secrecy, there were the bonds, and, worst of all, Everhart's refusal to testify. A man can't incriminate himself by telling the truth unless he is guilty. And if there was guilt in connection with those bonds, Fall must have shared it. Perhaps the defense could have explained it, but I didn't see how. There seemed to me only one sensible conclusion.

And this from another juror:

Remember, we only heard one side. But to my mind, all this secrecy and lying, and this refusal to testify, pointed to just one thing—guilt. How would the defense have explained it?

The enormously distinguished and incredibly suave Mr. Martin Littleton, chief counsel for Sinclair, in outlining his case to the jury had promised to show three things, namely:

1. That Fall never sought control of the reserves, but that the transfer was urged upon him by Secretary of the Navy Denby.

2. That the leasing was made necessary by the danger of drainage.

3. That the secrecy was due to military necessities.

Now the law may or may not be an ass, but those who contend it is will find a juicy argument in the circumstance that the Supreme Court of the United States, in canceling the Teapot Dome lease, has considered and rejected each of these three pleas. Moreover, it took occasion to comment on them specifically and in language that can be described as brutal. It said

1. That Fall persistently sought control of the reserves, and when he had obtained it wrote in "an exultant mood" to E. L. Doheny that it would no longer be necessary to consult the Navy Department in any leasing negotiations.

2. That there never was any imminent danger of drainage, and it would be immaterial if there had been, the only material fact being whether Fall had any good reason to believe that such danger existed when he made the lease. It held that he did not.

3. That "there never was any legitimate reason for secrecy."

Yet under the law and the rules of evidence, Littleton was permitted to make to the jury these pleas which already had been discredited and repudiated by the highest court in the land! Not only was he permitted, but he was entirely willing! Not only was he permitted and willing, but he was protected by the rule which prevented the prosecution from disclosing to the jury the Supreme Court's ruling!

Thus matters stood when the sleuthing activities of the Burns men put a summary end to the trial, and nullified all of Roberts's brilliant and effective work. It is likely that the grand jury will have reported before this is printed; if present indications hold true, there will have been indictments.

Meantime, Messrs. Blackmer and O'Neill sojourn pleasantly in Europe, defying all attempts to obtain their testimony. Have those great industrial captains who control the oil industry endeavored to persuade their fugitive subordinates to obey their Government's summons, and return? I have not heard of it. I heard the former Republican Governor of New York, Nathan L. Miller, declare that he had advised Blackmer to disobey the subpoena.

Fall and Sinclair were not on trial here, and they will not be on trial when the case is reopened in January. They have been tried by the Supreme Court, and found guilty. Justice itself is on trial. The jury system is on trial. The honor and patriotism of American business and industry are on trial. Shall I say that the ethics of the legal profession are on trial? Ah, I see the suave Mr. Littleton rising to object, and, like Mr. Roberts, I withdraw the point, and let the case rest on the record.

England's Economic Plight

By JOHN A. HOBSON

London, October 30

ALTHOUGH a few politicians and business men have been seeing visions of an approaching boom in British industry and commerce, hard facts and figures give them no support. The longest and deepest depression recorded in our modern industrial annals remains unabated. The slight signs of recovery, exhibited last spring in bank clearings, iron and steel output, and in exports, have passed away. The unemployment figure still stands well over the million, below which it has never fallen since the 1920 collapse of post-war prosperity. Large bodies of the younger workers have never been in regular employment: they have been kept living in compulsory idleness these many years upon the "dole" provided by fellow-workers, employers, and the Government.

The distribution of this unemployment is an interesting clue to our general economic situation. It is mainly concentrated in the industries dependent largely upon export trade, namely, coal, iron, and steel, and their related trades of engineering and shipbuilding, together with the cotton and woolen trades. The high rate of unemployment in the former of these two groups is manifestly due in large measure to the artificial inflation given them by the demands of war, though a good recovery of European and world trade would probably by this time have absorbed the enlarged output of which these trades were capable. For a good recovery would have precluded the erection of tariff barriers behind which continental nations have set up protected industries for the production of goods which otherwise they would have bought more cheaply from Great Britain. Thus our trade depression is closely linked with the bad politics and economics of a war-racked world.

The Balfour Commission in their "Survey" point out that the weakness in our export trade is not peculiar to Britain but belongs to the general state of international trade. For several separate expert computations indicate that the share of Britain in the total export trade of the world shows no considerable reduction. Indeed, the Balfour Committee find that in comparing 1913 and 1924 the proportion of British to world exports rises from 13 per cent to 14 per cent. But the actual reduction in the volume of our export trade by one-fifth is sufficient in itself to account for the bulk of our unemployment.

The trades which are prosperous and show little unemployment fall under two categories. First come those sheltered from foreign competition by the nature of the goods or services they supply, such as building, printing and paper, public utilities (gas, water, electricity, and transport), drink industries, laundries, and the distributive trades. Secondly, comes a cluster of luxury trades, beer, tobacco, motor cars, artificial silk, candy, and the broad class of amusements, sports, and recreations, such as cinemas, broadcasting, racing, and betting. The evident increase of expenditure upon these and other forms of luxury seems at first sight in strange contradiction to the prevalent belief in industrial depression. It is in part explained by changes in the distribution of the national income. Sir Josiah Stamp and Dr. Bowley, two of our most competent statisticians, have shown by careful analyses that the total real income of Great Britain and Northern Ireland has risen by 1 or 2 per cent since 1911, but that since the population meanwhile increased the income per head has fallen some 5 per cent. But the disposal of this income among the various classes of the community has shifted. Sections of the landed aristocracy, and many wealthy families divorced from industry and living on fixed-interest securities, have lost heavily. The same is true of retired middle-class people who have found the purchasing power of their savings halved, and of most professional families whose incomes have not risen proportionately to the rise of prices. On the other hand, the war left behind it a crop of profiteers, new rich, who have developed a great spending power. On a somewhat lower level of post-war prosperity may be placed large bodies of retail traders, especially in the drapery and other clothing trades and in certain food trades This continued prosperity of retailers throughout our period of depression is probably attributable to several causes. When wholesale prices fell substantially, as they did in 1920 and after, retail prices did not follow suit. Retailers were aware that their customers had got accustomed to the high prices of war and post-war years, and by formal or tacit agreement they conspired to maintain those prices, or to make reductions far less than corresponded with the cuts in the prices they paid to the wholesale merchant or manufacturer. Drapers have everywhere made good profits, largely from the increased wages and purchasing power which the new era brought to women, just as the brewers have gained much from the rise of wages in the unskilled male trades. Thus both among the industrial and the commercial classes large new sections have been endowed with substantial means to add new comforts and luxuries to their standard of living.

Taking the national income as a whole, we find a post-war distribution somewhat more favorable to labor, or rather to certain laboring classes. The Balfour Committee puts the matter quite succinctly in stating that

> It is a legitimate inference from the available data that, in industries in which time rates of wages prevail, skilled workers employed in industries directly exposed to foreign competition were in 1924 on the average less well off than before the war, while on the other hand unskilled workers generally, and workers both skilled and unskilled in the so-called "sheltered" industries, have, generally speaking, if with some exceptions, improved their average position as regards purchasing power.

Messrs. Stamp and Bowley take an even more favorable view of the working-class situation, finding that in some great industries "earnings have increased much more rapidly than piece or time rates" (owing to improved equipment and organization), that "there has been some change-over from time to piece rates," and some shifting from worse-paid to better-paid occupations—all factors counting toward a higher weekly income. Generally speaking, wage-earning women and unskilled men have made a substantial real advance in wages, while the great majority of skilled workers make at least as much as in 1911, for a somewhat shorter working day. Though these estimates are strictly applicable to 1924, there is no ground for holding that since then any material change has taken place. There are many less formal testimonies to the fact that in most industrial centers, outside the area of large unemployment, the standard of living of most workers is noticeably higher than in pre-war times, their leisure larger, and their expenditures upon cheap luxuries and recreations markedly enlarged.

These brighter features of the situation do not, however, dispose of the serious condition of our export trade and of the heavy burden of the million unemployed. Moreover, our brief survey, if correct, shows that we are barely holding our earlier position in volume of production, in a world where science has made so many and such rapid advances in technique and organization that in most industries large increases of output per worker are attainable. Moreover, the most seriously injured of our trades are those upon which our past industrial and commercial supremacy appeared to be most solidly founded, viz., coal, iron and steel, shipbuilding, machinery, cotton, and wool. To get these great industries once again in active and prosperous condition is a vital necessity to a country so dependent upon foreign trade. For though the decline in our birth-rate is rapidly diminishing the growth of population, there is no likelihood that we can sensibly reduce our dependence upon foreign supplies of foods and the raw materials for our industries. No agricultural reforms attainable at an early date could do more than offset the continuous, though declining, growth of our population. If, therefore, we are to make any progress in our standards of production and consumption, we must sensibly enlarge our export trade. This lesson has recently been driven home by some alarmist figures, published by the Board of Trade, relating to our trade balance. In 1925 the estimated surplus of our visible and invisible exports over our imports amounted to £54,000,000. For 1926 there was no surplus. We barely paid our way and had no balance for further investment abroad, in order to provide for further needs in the future. Yet, according to the Midland Bank statement for 1926, we invested not less than £112,000,000 outside this country! It has been suggested that foreign balances, put into London temporarily and at short call, have been utilized for loans abroad and are included in the Midland Bank estimate. But this would be too obviously unsafe. It is possible, indeed, that considerable sums, payable in New York and other foreign countries as interest on British investments abroad, have been reinvested in foreign loans without figuring in our records of import and export trade. But it is also probable that some considerable error has crept into the method by which this disturbing estimate has been obtained. For nothing can be more certain than that export of capital, in the form of investment, must be accompanied at no distant date by export of goods and services which must figure in the trade balance.

How to get a genuine move on in our export trade is a problem that is getting on the nerves not only of our business men but of our economists. Dr. Pigou (the successor of Dr. Marshall at Cambridge) urges a reduction in wages as a prime condition of reduced unemployment and improved trade. High wages and high prices in our sheltered trades mean high costs of production for our export trades and a corresponding inability to enlarge our foreign markets. He finds "strong prima-facie ground for holding that the wage earners have set their rates too high to allow of normal employment in present economic conditions, even although all the war-time maladjustments were overcome." Others lay chief stress upon the decline in the rate of savings, or provision of new capital. It is generally agreed that the new distribution of national income has had this result. Total savings, it is estimated, have fallen from something like 16 per cent of the general income, in 1911, to 12 or 13 per cent in recent years. This is imputed partly to general extravagance, a psychological war-product, partly to high taxation raiding the normal savings-fund. It is indubitable that some considerable reduction in the rate of saving has occurred. But those who hold this accountable for unemployment and failure of export trade, may be reminded that during this period of depression actual capital in the shape of plant has not been lacking, and that the financial world has been perfectly prepared to finance any business which could show that it could sell at a profitable price the goods which the available labor and plant could produce. It is difficult to understand why increased savings, that is to say, the application of more productive power to capital goods and less to consumptive goods, would under such circumstances do anything but harm. Cheaper money and cheaper labor might enable our export trades to secure a little more of the diminished export trade of the world. But it would be attained at a heavy damage, not only to the standard of living of the workers, but to the trades supplying their reduced demand for consumable goods.

It will not be by such niggling economies that Britain's trade recovery can be compassed, but by such reorganization alike of the technique and the government of industry as the ablest minds both among our business men and our politicians are beginning to plan. Broader-minded industrialists are awakening to these needs. The principle of combination is displacing the old faith in competition. Trusts and cartels which were anathema before the war are now in favor in almost every quarter. Even labor politicians support them as stepping-stones toward socialism. But successful organization along these lines demands industrial peace between capital and labor. Here also big industrialists show more liberal minds than heretofore. Sir Alfred Mond, president of the great chemical combine, has just launched a proposal of share-purchase on favorable terms to employees, in conjunction with a system of representative control through works councils, which, it is hoped, may reconcile the interests of the two main factors in industry and usher in a new era of peace and productivity.

How far or how fast such a plan is generally applicable remains to be seen. A strong monopoly in an industry like chemicals, in control of a lucrative and growing market, can well afford to purchase industrial peace by concessions that do not seriously weaken expert administration or the profits of big owners. But the trouble Mr. Keynes is having in his gallant effort to induce the Lancashire cotton spinners to enter an effective combine for their evident advantage well illustrates the difficulties which beset the path of industrial reformers in this country. The typical business man is still afraid of compromising his liberty by entering any close and binding arrangement with other firms. Nor is he easily persuaded to grant to a representative body of his employees any real voice in the control of "his" business. The strong survival of this absolute spirit of sovereignty is the great obstacle to industrial as it is to international peace. It is incompatible with the growing intelligence and self-respect of the workers. The organization of industry for successful production upon modern lines is first and foremost an organization of the wills and intelligences of all the human beings who by active participation are interested in the output. This is, indeed, an obvious truth, a truism, but to incorporate it in our economic system means the scrapping of a large number of obsolete yet obdurate ideas.

Ruth Elder's Revolt

By RUSSELL OWEN

"HOW do you like me now?" is Ruth Elder's attitude toward life. This girl who hopped into an airplane after powdering her nose and flew to what many thought was certain death, but which turned out to be a miraculous rescue in a year of desperate aviation, had her eye on the beholder.

In everything she does she seems consciously trying to be picturesque, and almost invariably she succeeds. The zest with which she impresses this side of her odd, and yet exceedingly simple, personality on people causes them to forgive her pose. Of course she poses, but she does it well and enthusiastically.

It is not conceit which makes Miss Elder lean against a propeller with her hands in the pockets of her knickerbockers and beam at the camera. Not at all. She wants her place in the sun, she wants to be admired, and she goes about obtaining admiration as methodically as she handed drills to the dentist for whom she worked. She is a thoroughly sophisticated, likable, and good-looking young woman, who knows what she is about.

Hers is a revolt which is common in these days, but with her it has taken an unusual direction. She was determined to get out of the commonplace if she killed herself doing it. Marriage and work as a stenographer and dentist's assistant had not satisfied her lingering desire to do something in the world which she could look back upon as having been a fair attempt at getting a "kick" out of life. She needed something more; and if fame came with it, so much the better.

One night in New York shortly before her flight Ruth Elder was talking with a man who had been deputed to persuade her to give it up. Aviation was suffering from the misfortunes which had overtaken so many men and women, and manufacturers were justifiably against any more disasters. The man asked Miss Elder to try and explain why she was determined to go on.

"Well, I've lived a while without amounting to a plugged nickel," she said. "I want to do something that will make people notice me, that may give me an opportunity to get somewhere in the world. That's why I want to make this flight."

"Is it worth risking your life?"

"Yes, it is. If I make it, I may amount to something. If I don't, it won't make any difference anyway."

It was probably the desire for thrills which made her learn to fly. Much to her own surprise she became a good pilot, due to her devil-may-care attitude. She learned to stunt a plane, doing with dexterity things which many older pilots never do better. Ruth was greeted rather skeptically when she came to New York, and doubts of her ability to fly were heard on Curtiss Field. It was a sheepish group which met her when she climbed out of her plane after showing them what she could do.

After that there was no doubt of her popularity among those who met her at the field. She was a thoroughly good fellow, she met everyone on his own ground. Pilots liked her and so did newspaper reporters. Particularly did the photographers like her, for she would pose at the slightest suggestion. She bounced about in her knickers and gay sweaters and bandeau, powdering her nose at intervals, standing with one foot on the running-board of an automobile or on the wheel of her plane—always looking as if she wanted to know if she wasn't rather nice. If the photographers had realized that once upon a time she had taken part in a bathing-beauty contest they would probably have asked her to dig out the bathing suit. And she would have done so.

But with all her feminine gaiety there is a solid streak of disillusionment and sophistication in Ruth Elder. She takes things as she finds them and expresses no surprise. She knows the world well. Certain little reservations she has, which are quite as odd as the rest of her. She doesn't smoke, for instance. But she will sit around a convivial board with a group of pilots and be at home.

A famous pilots' organization adopted her as an honorary member. That in itself means much, for it is hard to get into that secret order and no one can do so who is not a regular fellow. The night she was welcomed as the only American woman member the party was gay, and one man broke into enthusiastic profanity. He was thrown out by a dozen strong arms, but Ruth Elder smiled and told them to forget it.

Now Ruth has her place in the sun. Half of her purpose is accomplished. People know who she is because she took a method of freeing herself from anonymity which most persons—and particularly those who criticize her—would walk around carefully for a long time and then let severely alone. And some who laugh at her longing for the spotlight may remember the avidity with which they have pounced upon their own names in the newspapers. It is all a matter of degree, this desire for publicity, and Ruth Elder went after hers with a wholehearted frankness which seems rather admirable.

Someone asked Senator Thomas H. Benton, a famous old warrior of pre-Civil War days, why he scrubbed himself in cold water with a currycomb. Senator Benton said: "Because the Roman gladiators did it, sir."

It all depends on the point of view.

In the Driftway

TWO tragedies of the high seas, recorded in the newspapers lately, carry one back to the isolation which brooded over the deep before the coming of wireless telegraphy and are a reminder that modern inventions sometimes imperil life rather than safeguard it. The installation of a gasoline motor in the Japanese fishing smack Ryo Yei Maru, and the dependence placed upon it, seems to have been responsible for the harrowing fate which slowly overtook the crew of the vessel as it drifted over the solitary reaches of the Pacific Ocean. The Ryo Yei was picked up off the coast of Washington early in November and towed to Port Townsend. Two of the crew of twelve men were found, partly mummified, in bunks in the cabin of the smack. On deck were the whitened bones of seven or eight other men, the evidence indicating, so physicians decided, that cannibalism had been resorted to before the last members of the crew had perished of starvation. A note was discovered, written on March 6, last, saying that the ship had left Japan on December 5, 1926 (almost a year before she was found off the coast of Washington), and that the motor engine had broken down while the men were fishing, leaving the vessel to drift helplessly across the Pacific until food and water were exhausted and hope was abandoned.

* * * * *

THE newspaper accounts of the Ryo Yei spoke of the remnants of sails in the rigging, but it seems likely that these were of a makeshift or ineffective sort, because the note left by the crew made no mention of storms such as might have disabled sound canvas. If the Ryo Yei had carried reserve sails probably she could have made port.

* * * * *

IN the case of the other disaster recently recounted in the press, a gasoline motor was again in evidence, but in this instance a long-headed skipper possibly saved himself and the eight other men in his crew by getting rid of the motor rather than putting his faith in it. When the four-masted schooner Horatio G. Foss showed signs of foundering 200 miles northeast of Bermuda Captain William D. Potter decided to abandon the vessel and, as a newspaper put it, "ordered the heavy motor taken out of the ship's lifeboat to accommodate the crew." Perhaps he acted not so much to make more room—there were only nine men to be embarked—as to lessen the weight and make the boat more seaworthy. Anyhow the crew attempted to make Bermuda by the aid of oars and some jury-rigged sails.

* * * * *

IT was a narrow squeak. For six days and seven nights the crew of the Foss lived and fought Atlantic tempests in their open boat. The Negro cook, crazed with fright, lay in the bottom of the frail craft holding fast to a prayer-book and wailing religious songs. Once the men were within a mile of the north reef of the islands, but were caught by a contrary gale and buffeted away. Finally they were sighted and picked up by the steamship Volendam on her way back from Hamilton with members of the Savings Banks Association of the State of New York who had been in convention in Bermuda. Probably the bankers will never again assist in any saving as thrilling as that of the crew of the Horatio G. Foss.

Correspondence

Twenty-Three!

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Darwin didn't finish his job. It is curious to note how the theory of evolution, in application, skips a beat now and then. That Boston librarian, you remember, who canceled his subscription to The Nation—why should he still be an amoeba when you and I are so advanced?

I suppose it's all in the point of view. But "Honi soit qui jamais pense." Permit me to replace the eminent librarian's subscription with my own—just as good, and likely to last longer. If, further, you care to give me an idea of how many subscriptions you lost for your Sacco and Vanzetti work, I will undertake to make them all good—within reason, within reason. Be honest!

Humanity and Immigration Laws

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The following wireless dispatch was just received on our ship: "Unless insane seaman [is] American citizen, impossibility landing account immigration laws. Recommend making other port."

Now turn to this freighter whose captain, not an American citizen, has been suddenly struck down with violent frenzy. There are eleven cabin passengers on board, eight of them American citizens. When the dispatch arrived, they had to cling hard to their national pride. The next port is seven days away. On the ship there are only the most primitive accommodations for such contingencies—no doctor, and only first-aid medical supplies. The coolness and efficiency of the officers and crew are winning universal admiration from the passengers, but the strain is beginning to tell on us all. For comfort we know that some laws are enforced to the last jot and tittle. But we ask ourselves, during this week of Inferno to which we are condemned, whether it is not possible to bring to the attention of our law-makers the brutal inhumanity of an immigration law which gives no discretionary power even to officials in important ports.

Capital Punishment in Germany

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The Sacco-Vanzetti tragedy has given a new momentum in Germany to the question of the abolition of capital punishment. In view of the work of our American League for the Abolition of Capital Punishment I should like to call attention to a petition which has been signed by a group of notable German jurists and professors:

> The undersigned jurists acknowledge with satisfaction the measures of improvement, of prevention, and of protection with which the proposed new German Criminal Code endeavors to fight the causes of crime, and to find proper preventive measures for the culprit rather than merely exercising reprisals for the misdeed.
> All the more so do they deplore the retention of the death penalty provided for—and approved by the Reichsrat—which so grossly contradicts the spirit of this modern legal work, and which gravely jeopardizes the realization of that judicial community with Austria which was prepared with the valuable cooperation of the brotherland.
> Whereas, the death penalty never fulfils its purpose of intimidation by a public execution;
> Whereas, the general sentiment for justice, fostered by the growing enlightenment of the people, rejects it more and more;
> Whereas, society does not need in any way this brutal and for that reason brutalizing method of punishment for its protection;
> Whereas, finally, the best legal administration is unable to exclude grave miscarriages of justice, the undersigned petition the German Reichstag for the abolition of the death penalty.

The movement for the abolition of capital punishment in Germany has been going on for nearly sixty years and it is at present on its way to the Reichstag where it appears to those who know most about the facts hopeful of success. I read also that Russia is vigorously taking up the question.

Hendrik van Loon and Rosika Schwimmer

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: A few months ago when Henry Ford went to Canossa I was asked by one of the Jewish papers why, in my humble opinion, the excellent Henry, who cares not a whit for abstract ideas, had become so violently anti-Semitic. I ventured to suggest that Rosika Schwimmer was at the bottom of this primitive Fordian emotion. I said that this strong-minded woman seems to have been able to persuade Henry that the war would come to an end as soon as the belligerents of Europe had been made to understand in some visible way that the honest folk of America abhorred their sanguinary doings; that Henry had allowed himself to be persuaded and had filled a ship with rather nondescript enthusiasts; that many of those enthusiasts had turned the trip into a joy-ride, making Henry look ridiculous, and that as a result of this unfortunate affair Henry had turned anti-Semite."

I still believe that guess to be entirely correct. Mrs. Schwimmer with her brilliant power of plausible reasoning must have found it comparatively easy to influence the simple-minded First Citizen of Detroit. When the expedition turned into a farce, it was just as natural that the simple-minded F. C. o. D. should have revaluated his anger into a silly gesture of Jew-baiting. Ever since my mail has been filled with angry protests from participants in the famous peregrination to the Northland. I have been denounced in no uncertain terms. I have been accused of hitting a woman in the back. I have been told that I had become unfaithful to my own liberal convictions. I have been warned that if I did not retract every word, they, my correspondents, would refuse to buy any more of my books. In short, I have been called every sort of a wood-pussy for expressing what was and is my most sincere opinion.

Why this statement should have been construed as an attack upon Mrs. Schwimmer only the intolerant gods of self-righteousness know. What I said seemed all rather rudimentary to me. Mrs. Schwimmer was and undoubtedly still is a strong character, a woman possessed of tremendous strength of will, a woman who most unselfishly has fought the good fight for a less idiotic and cruel world. I never questioned her motives and I never so much as suggested that she was actuated by anything but the loftiest of ideals. Unfortunately, a man with limited powers of observation and meditation, like Henry Ford, must have resented the fact that he had allowed himself to be "talked" into something he really did not want to do, and must have given expression to his childish anger in some absurd fashion, like the editorial policy of the Dearborn Independent.

How anybody could construe my remarks and observations into praise of Henry and attack upon a woman (whom I regret to say we are not allowed to call one of our compatriots) is more than I can understand. Wherefore I deposit this outburst of liberal anger as Exhibit 456,346,682 in my private Museum of Psychological Mysteries, and remain as ever,

Your very obedient cartoonist,

French Literature Today

By LUDWIG LEWISOHN

Paris, October 1

THE French literary scene of the moment is hard to describe. There is activity; there is nothing salient. One has a sense of people rushing hither and thither with little to do. Or of people saying in their sub-consciousness: We have a great literature. It has always gone on and on—unthinkable that it shouldn't go on now. In this situation it is depressing to find men from the aged Paul Bourget to the younger and youngest quite sure that all will be mended if only time can be turned backward and the revolution undone. Luckily it can't. The glory of France is not wholly extinguished. She offers asylum to those whom Mussolini exiles; the other day in Strasbourg I heard thousands singing the Internationale in German without a policeman in sight. The Right and the Left were at one on Sacco and Vanzetti.

It is these vestiges of the great and lasting France that make contemporary writing seem so feeble and futile. It is full of a hard and tired exoticism as in the popular novels of Blaise Cendrars and Paul Morand, whose "Bouddha Vivant" is one of the successes of the year; there is hard and violent preciosity, as in the novels of Jean Geraudoux, or a weary and constricted naturalism, as in those of Francis Mauriac. The Tharaud brothers go on journalistically disapproving of the earth and M. Paul Claudel (quaint ambassador from an anti-clerical republic to a democracy) discovers with Chesterton that farce and faith are one ("Deux Farces Lyriques").

It is at least arguable that in France, classic land of the novel, the novel is slowly perishing. Hence perhaps the enormous popularity of the novelized biography—"Le Roman des Grands Existences." The Liszt of Pourtalès, the Wagner of Barthou have found their way, I believe, to America, as did the Shelley of Maurois. There is now a Rimbaud, a Rivarol, a Villon, a Descartes, a Baudelaire and, above all at this very moment, the Disraeli of M. André Maurois. Nor must I forget G. Oudard's "La Très Curieuse Vie de Law" and Dumont-Wilden's "La Vie de Charles Joseph de Ligne." Biography of one kind or another is usurping the role of imaginative narrative. One's attitude to this new genre must remain a matter of taste and instinct. To some scrupulous minds this mixture of fact and fiction is highly irritating.

I am not sure but what the most hopeful things in literary France today are, on the one hand, such scientific preoccupations as the R. Père Jousse's researches in the psychology of speech and, on the other, the unwonted hospitality extended to foreign literature as, for instance, in Stock's excellent series "Le Cabinet Cosmopolite." A unique phenomenon, the significance of which still eludes interpretation, is the evident influence upon all the most sensitive minds of France of the great German poet, Rainer Maria Rilke. Another phenomenon that may be noted here is the fairly sudden but widespread and not at all faddish interest in the Freudian psychology.

Anyone, however, who desires seriously and from a point of view that embraces more than the moment to gain an insight into the trend of literature and literary thinking in France can do no better than to read M. Paul Souday's three slender volumes (issued together and not obtainable separately) on Marcel Proust, André Gide, and Paul Valéry. M. Souday is not a great critic and objectivity is assuredly not his most shining quality. But he is sensitive, agile-minded, infinitely involved with the men and movements he delineates, and one can be immensely instructed by reading not only his lines but between his lines.

It is agreed on all hands that Marcel Proust is the last very great Frenchman of letters. There is not only M. Souday's volume. Gallimard is starting the publication of "Les Cahiers Marcel Proust" with "Hommage à Marcel Proust." Very well. And what, not seeking for a moment to deny the extremely high talent and even originality of that strange and unfortunate man, what was Marcel Proust? What were the sources of his work? He was a valetudinarian, a half-Jew, and a homosexual. Tragedy enough, heaven knows, for one poor devil in such a world as this. But elevated minds have been known to wring triumph from their inferiorities and abnormalities. Proust became a snob. In a series of volumes not yet completed he analyzed, with preternatural acuteness, with talent, with genius, if you will, the inhabitants of the Faubourg St. Germain. And by and large he took these ladies and gentlemen at their own valuation. . . . Is that an extra-literary judgment? I think not. But that discussion would lead me too far. It will not be denied, at all events, that the unbounded influence of a writer of this kind and character is hardly likely to make for a powerful, a manly, and a philosophic temper among the youngsters who come after him.

Then there is M. André Gide, luckily still alive and very flourishing and very acute and gifted and learned and a critic of a high order. In his more or less creative work he began with a complete nihilism, with "the most biting derision of the human mind, which neither truth nor error can affect." He proceeded to do something which he called the "pure novel" and which turns out to be the novel stripped as far as possible of all its elements of both life and thought. Nevertheless he imitates both Goethe and Flaubert in order to delineate a group of gentlemen who share the tastes in love and life of Proust's M. de Charlus and his friends. And finally, after describing in certain autobiographical volumes his "corydonneries arabes" he ends for the present with "Numquid et tu?" an account of his conversion, a tract that recalls the Salvation Army. M. Gide safe in the arms of Jesus! Satire could invent nothing further. And that—yes, I have stuck to literature and not moralized, for moral questions in literature are not questions of fact but of spiritual tone and tissue—and that is the second of the great writers of contemporary France.

Fortunately there is a third. There is M. Paul Valéry, a strict and profound thinker, a poet who at least in "Le Cimitière marin" touches greatness, an admirable stylist, a mind once free and elevated. Yet how tiny is his output and how melancholy and disillusioned and dry the inner spirit of his work. Here is a talent fine in tone and temper, but without richness or vitality or triumph. The last elected of the forty immortals has, perhaps, a touch of immortality in his work. He will not keep the young men from either exoticism or stultification, from Indo-China or Chartres. . . .

In a notable passage Rémy de Gourmont explained long ago how nearly all great and fruitful literary movements in all countries were first inspired and fructified from without, and how these movements lost thereby nothing of their native taste and tang. It is such a fructifying influence that is needed in France today and the country's soundest instincts are reaching out for it. The results may come slowly; they will be fascinating to watch.

German Literature Today

By ARTHUR ELOESSER

Berlin, October 15

TO understand present-day German literature it is necessary to go back a generation. In the year 1892, one of the proudest in the history of our letters, appeared "Die Weber," by Gerhart Hauptmann, "Blätter für die Kunst," by Stefan George, and "Frühlings Erwachen," by Frank Wedekind. Each of these three works, apart from its intrinsic value, expressed a different program of fundamental ideas; and together they represent the three most important currents that have enriched our literature to this day.

"Die Weber," appearing at a time when socialism was still a religion, a messianic ideal, remains the classical work of German naturalism, and is the noblest document of our social experience. To the east of us with the Slavs this naturalism assumed a religious tinge, while to the west among the Romance nations it became colored with atheism; yet its works always had in common the purpose of arraigning society. They taught the sacredness of suffering and brought consolation through the idea of redemption. Naturalism dominated German literature until it lost force through its own lack of ideas, or became dissipated by assuming the decadent attitude which heralded in a weak and tired mood the decline of the West.

When Stefan George stepped forth from esoteric isolation, with his "Blätter für die Kunst," he erected a temple to which the modern man with his burdens and sorrows was denied access. Art should have nothing to do with the present, with civilization, or with the needs of society; it should live for itself, imperturbable in that realm of ideas which makes Plato and Nietzsche contemporaries in a timeless world. As this school of pure form did not interest itself in the problems of the present, it was natural that it found its highest expression, not in the drama or the novel, but in the lyric. Today Stefan George is the only poet representing this art, the only priest in a temple of prophecy.

"Frühlings Erwachen" went beyond naturalism; and so did Wedekind's later works, in which he seemed to speak from a platform, endeavoring to persuade and convince us. It is astonishing with what scandalous and hypnotic audacity this Satan ventured upon the most secret problems of the sexual life, emphasizing not existing conditions but their inevitable consequences. Thus he presented a challenge: he wanted to make life once again healthy, fresh, and virtuous by freeing people from their miserable subservience to sexual humbuggery and from the curse of hypocrisy. All of his writings are arguments and documents whose passionate subjectivism protests equally against the passive faithfulness of naturalism to reality and against the marble-like objectivity of Stefan George's school.

Wedekind is the father of expressionism, which has also been called activism because it voices an appeal for action. All the plays which followed—and for a time the development of our literature centered in the drama—show his influence, while the role of naturalism seemed to have been exhausted in Gerhart Hauptmann. After Wedekind came Sternheim, Kaiser, Sorge, and Hasenclever; and among the youngest of the present day Bronnen and Brecht. Together they preached: You must change your ways or the world —at least your bourgeois world—will perish. All of these poets who had the accent of the future felt in their bones the coming war and revolution. The poets, too, and the storytellers preached the coming dawn. Franz Werfel appeared, like a new Jeremiah warning Jerusalem, and Georg Heym, who died young like Arthur Rimbaud, sketched in blood-red visions the terrors that would come over Europe.

It is the misfortune of the writers of today that war and revolution actually came. Furthermore, Germany lies half-way between East and West and today more than ever is forced to choose between them. The radical critic says: It is for you to mold the memory of the war, and to carry out the revolution in literature. Today all problems touch all mankind; and the bourgeoisie with its smashed ideals is no longer mankind. Its humanism is an anachronism, as is the whole European tradition of culture and art. Art, too, needs a dictatorship of the proletariat to free us from class and restore us to humanity. Look toward Russia, which makes such beautiful films. Do not be afraid of the new technique in the new art of movies, of radio, of the inventions which conquer time and space. Art, too, needs mass production. Solve the problems of the day; otherwise you will lose the tempo of the age.

Literature was expected to react immediately to all that stirred the people. Our poets were compelled to take long strides in order to keep step with the "tempo of the age"; and they were soon worn and breathless. Temporarily they eased the situation by depreciating the older generation and by overestimating their own contributions. Gerhart Hauptmann, they thought, was finished; while little Ernst Toller satisfied them. Stefan George was relegated to limbo and the too bourgeois Wedekind was counted only as the father of a technique of playwriting. To speak of the "tempo of the age" is to use a frightful slogan, because tempo has nothing to do with the technique in art. The century of Shakespeare and Bacon, as well as the eighteenth century, felt the buoyancy of conscious progress despite the fact that the thoughts of Goethe and Kant could be neither telephoned nor cabled.

The youth of today has not the good fortune to be represented by outstanding personalities. To some, absorbed in games and dancing, this inarticulateness means nothing; others sadly explain that their spokesmen lie buried in the fields of Flanders. Indeed an entire generation of literature seems to be missing. The novelist, Alfred Döblin, a sort of expressionistic fresco painter, was for a time regarded as a leading literary spirit, but he is now almost fifty and no longer radical. Franz Werfel has ceased prophesying, but writes plays adapted to the needs of the theater. The younger dramatists who were generally regarded as expressing the tempo of the age have not stood up. The lyric as always has its talented exponents, but today no one has the magic of Rainer Maria Rilke, who recently died, or the power of Richard Dehmel, whom the workmen called "Father Dehmel" though he was not at all political.

Those who are now in their thirties have no spokesman; those who are in their forties, although they experienced the war and the revolution and should have expressed their significance, have despite vigorous efforts proved equally sterile. The important and representative works today still come from the older generation. One need only mention Thomas Mann, who openly confesses to be a bourgeois.

"The Magic Mountain," in spite of what its author may have absorbed from the decadents and from Nietzsche, belongs to the tradition of Goethe and Gottfried Keller. Mann's motto is Humanity in the new-old sense, and this is true also of Wassermann, of Heinrich Mann, and of Hermann Hesse—even when they express themselves in terms of Buddhist ethics. Their ideal is a democracy which redeems itself through the social consciousness but, through cultivation of personality, becomes again aristocratic. The roots of our literature still receive their nourishment from that older source which fed them forty years ago. The post-revolutionary, radical critic cannot alter this. Personalities prove to be more steadfast than programs.

The expected transvaluation of all values did not occur, and we are in a period of restoration. Now one speaks in Germany, as in Europe generally, of "the new objectivity"—an abashed expression for our return not only to tradition but also to nature, both of which expressionism sought to ignore. Work is being done with greater care, and technique is again respected as the golden foundation of all art. Our poets again have their feet on the ground after a period of fluttering in the air. Writers are no longer judged by their politics, but by the talents with which the sacred partiality of nature has covered them. The creative man does not permit the dictation of his task or purpose; the more he follows his own individual destiny the more he will express his people and mankind. A period of calm has come upon our literature, and with it a greater freedom. If one may prophesy, our literature, emerging from feverish crises, shows signs of a healthier and fruitful development.

The National Myth

Political Myths and Economic Realities. By Francis Delaisi. The Viking Press. $4.

M. DELAISI here makes a brilliant essay in the economic interpretation of history. In the earlier chapters of his book he traces the growth of the national myth from the peasant's passion of ownership to the idea of a collective ownership of a country by its inhabitants, supported and strengthened by traditions, usually false, of unity of race and culture, and utilizing unity of language and religion for the feeding of the sense of sacred nationality. Tracing the rise of the national state in different European countries from the decay of the feudal system, he illustrates from the French Revolution the new force of the popular myth which inspired the collective consciousness and evoked such heroic efforts and sacrifices from the common people.

But the oft-told tale of the awakening of nationalism and the achievement of national unity throughout Europe in the nineteenth century is but a half-truth in the wider historical interpretation of the age. For while the nations were being thus consolidated and isolated politically by the policy of national unity and sovereignty, they were being disintegrated economically by the new world-system of international cooperation in production, commerce, transport, and finance. Political unity and self-containedness were confronted by economic interdependence. M. Delaisi sets out with an immense variety of evidence the fumbling efforts of statecraft and diplomacy to adjust the national unity to this economic internationalism. Two chief methods are discernible. A nation, fearing and resenting its vital dependence upon outside supplies and markets, may strive to make its economic system conform to its political by developing its own resources and protecting its home industries. But few great modern nations could hope to attain complete success by this method. Limitations of natural supplies and growth of population require access to external sources of food and raw materials, and markets for manufactured goods.

The national myth must be expanded into an imperial myth. Backward countries with the requisite natural resources and populations to exploit them must be brought under the national flag, as colonies, protectorates, mandates, or other forms of satellites. Thus the economy of the modern machine age breeds in the world of political states rival imperialisms, crippling the free development of the world along the lines of a national division of labor and exchange of goods, subjecting the weaker countries to tyrannical control by the stronger (the mission of civilization!) and embroiling the imperialist Powers in ceaseless diplomatic struggles, competitions of armaments, and resultant wars. The story M. Delaisi tells is not new, but he tells it with the more convincing instances which the red glare of the World War exhibits. Brushing aside the chatter of superficial history, he goes down to the bedrock of the economic struggle for his "origin" of the war, the struggles of the great industrialized nations for the countries and the markets of the undeveloped world, especially in Africa and Asia. Here lay the key to all the preliminary conflicts in the Boer War, the Russo-Japanese-Chinese imbroglio, Morocco, the instigated Balkan wars. All were movements toward stronger economic positions with incidental growth of political power and prestige.

M. Delaisi subjects the peace treaties to the scathing criticism they deserve and shows how on every hand they served to aggravate the trouble which the political mythologists pretended to cure. But while the greater part of the book is analytical and historical, it does not leave us in despair. "The origin of the trouble lies in our misguided interpretation of the facts. The difficulties reside not in the things as they are but in our conception of them: they are not material but psychological." M. Delaisi is no state socialist. The state must take a hand, but its interference with the free play of economic forces should be narrowly confined. He looks rather to a constructive government of the world, of which he sees the beginnings in several recent economic enterprises, the International Chamber of Commerce, the International Labor Office at Geneva, and the League of Nations regarded as an instrument for equitable settlement of so-called national disputes which are in their last resort business quarrels.

But to get the full use and growth of a genuinely international government, the extirpation of deep-seated national myths is the first essential. J. A. HOBSON

Youth of the Continent

The Gateway to Life. By Frank Thiess. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

Dusty Answer. By Rosamund Lehmann. Henry Holt and Company. $2.50.

THE thinking young men of contemporary Germany divide roughly into two classes: those who have swallowed Spengler and those who have rejected him. In the first division stand those who have thrown over the entire idealistic tradition of the continent, boiled their minds hard, and prepared themselves with a certain grim brutality to take their places in the nascent Germany whose watchwords are to be trade and technique. With a decisive bang they have closed their Goethes; and, should they open a book at all, it is likely to be the popular German translation of Mr. Henry Ford's "My Life and Work." It is the presence of these practical and energetic young men which makes good Americans feel more at home in Berlin than in any other European capital.

Opposed to them are the devotees of an ideology and a metaphysic deeply ingrained in the German character. They are the tender-minded, the idealists, the individualists, the followers of the Jugendbewegung. They are puzzled and horrified by the brutal realities of a post-war world. They turn with disgust from trade and technique. Unwilling to recognize the corpse of European culture which Spengler's sardonic finger would point out to them, they abandon themselves to high speculation on the cultural future of Germany. They are the Younger Generation, greatly concerned with itself as an important psychic unity. They issue manifestos about changing sex standards and talk unendingly of homo-erotism and the revolt against convention. They are eaten by the maggots of theory.

It is with this latter class of very youthful ideologists that Herr Thiess's interesting novel concerns itself. His characters are a group of over-emotional and over-mental high-school students who talk, study, fall in love, and talk once more in a small South German town. One after another, with a fierce despair, they try to enter into experiences which their highly strung and over-reflective natures foredoom them to be incapable of assimilating. One of them, the most dreamy and addled of the lot, commits a sort of absent-minded suicide. The others—talk. They talk terribly well. They have astoundingly profound ideas on Alcibiadean love, on the status of the family, and their favorite ideals-of-the-semester, purity and freedom. Compared with a representative group of American schoolboys, they sound like a grave collection of Kants and Spinozas. They scorn the philistine, the Spiesser; they have even passed beyond the fraternal idealism of the Wandervögel—"pasteboard romanticism" as Diedrich contemptuously terms the movement. Their seriousness is preternatural to the point of priggishness. Their spiritual agonizings would make Rousseau hang his heart in shame.

Herr Thiess follows the fortunes of his group of youngsters with so tender a sympathy that his thesis, though unspoken, becomes obvious. To him these adolescent idealists who have read Goethe and Nietzsche at sixteen and examine each slightest experience with a conscientious morbidity—to him these boys are the future of Germany. Herr Thiess loves goodness and sincerity and liberalism and freedom. And so it never occurs to him that his sanctimonious Diedrich and his weak-willed Wolf Brassen and his sentimentally masculine Willi Gast are the last evidences of the dying, not the living Germany. He ignores the obvious fact that their mental self-tortures and their excessive sensitivity are products of a decaying idealism; and that after this last flare-up of cloud-cuckoo culture Germany will, because it must, fall into line and divert the energy of its youth to laboratory and counting-house. His young and tender heroes are horrified at the mere thought of this other Germany. "Slave-morality," they call it, "slave happiness—smiting the foe in all the Vereins of the fatherland, mid beer and cigarette." But it is this very humorless contempt for what is really vital in the fatherland that makes them slightly ridiculous, as a sleep-walker is slightly ridiculous. And it is his passionate espousal of their dying cause that makes Herr Thiess seem a little antiquated and his book a little soft-headed.

Yet his novel enjoys the strength of its defect, for at least it is filled with a sincere moral optimism that lends it a kind of solidity. Miss Lehmann's widely heralded opus, dealing with a very similar group of young people in England, does not possess even this praiseworthy quality. Her style and outlook suffer from the same melancholy anemia which is the keynote of her character. She is so sadly aware that her young people are decadent and rotted at the core. Here we have a group of young men and women in whom the subconscious acceptance of a failing national destiny is so strong as to make them wearily impervious to all experiences save one, and that the most devitalizing and hopeless of them all—romantic love. They mill about and stew around in a sickly vortex of misapplied yearning, trifle dutifully with homosexuality, write love-letters by the ream, sigh, cynicize, and suffer. Over-intelligent though they are they are never one sufficiently intelligent to question calmly the entire problem of romantic passion, to examine it historically as a traditional national weakness, to assign it its increasingly insignificant niche in an increasingly materialistic civilization. They, too, like Herr Thiess's high-school students, are a refined end-product, except that instead of being the end-product of a Teutonic metaphysical tradition they are the decayed remnant of an English agricultural aristocracy whose sentimental ethos is becoming more and more irrelevant in a mechanized universe.

One is minded to recall that inexorable dogma uttered by the Jesuit in Thomas Mann's "The Magic Mountain": "It is an unloving miscomprehension of youth to believe that it finds its pleasure in freedom; its deepest pleasure lies in obedience." The young people in these two novels have not yet discovered their deepest pleasure.

Sorcellerie Evocatoire

Vers une Alchimie Lyrique. By René Lalou. Vol. 7; Le XIX^e^ Siècle, edited by René Lalou. Paris: Les Arts et Le Livre. 12 francs.

M. RENE LALOU is a critic who deserves to be widely read by English-speaking people. His recent work on the modern spirit in France, "Histoire de la Littérature Française," being historical in method, has doubtless tended to obscure his chief distinction as a critic, a distinction everywhere to be found in that volume, yet ambiguously placed. For M. Lalou is primarily—and this is no aspersion of his historical faculty—the aesthetic critic, as this function is understood, not in France, but with us. His critical gift is at its best in the breaking up and the weighing, one aspect against another, of the work of art itself; it is at its best in the present essay.

This volume, and indeed the whole series to which it belongs and of which M. Lalou is the editor, exhibits a new way of presenting problems raised by a writer or a school of writers. It combines the regular critical essay with the idea of the anthology, with the result that we get the model of what every critical anthology ought to be. From the time of the old English collections, like "Tottel's Miscellany" and "The Paradyse of Daintie Devyces," the possibilities of the anthology, a vehicle accidentally hit upon to meet a popular need, have not been much improved upon. Not the miscellaneous representation of persons, but the critical representation of a spirit or a tendency is the true direction which this form of bookmaking should now take.

M. Lalou's subject here is one of great importance to the contemporary scene of letters. French romanticism, besides its own great intrinsic interest, is at once the measure of all that has happened in France since 1860 and the source of those elements in modern English and American poetry which we have now assumed the habit of calling modern. For the poets who write in English, owing to the inaccessibility of their own heritage through the wall of the Victorian age, have looked to France for an example, if not to the romantics themselves, then to their successors, the symbolists, who proceeded from the greatest romantic of them all, Charles Baudelaire. In this instinct for sources the English poet was doubtless right. Gérard de Nerval and Sainte-Beuve, who gave the movement its strongest initial impetus, drew much from Wordsworth and Coleridge; Baudelaire was appreciably formed and matured under the influence of Poe.

No great movement in literature, however, as M. Lalou points out, can be resolved into the mere question of literary contacts. Gérard de Nerval, an older man than Baudelaire, exerted no very considerable influence upon him. Aloysius Bertrand, the author of "Gaspard de la Nuit," a book that contained all the properties of romanticism except their perfection in form, wrote out of the thin air, under no conscious influence whatever. The same thing is true, to a large extent, of the author of "Joseph Delorme"; though the habits of the analyst did much to convince Sainte-Beuve that his attitude was that of a sort of inevitable contemporaneity. Baudelaire, it is true, supposed himself to have been spiritually awakened by Bertrand and crystallized by Poe. But with them all the source of the romantic spirit went deeper.

M. Lalou's account of Nerval, Bertrand, Sainte-Beuve, and Baudelaire includes some very acute comment on the conditions that produced the romantic movement in France. To understand this movement, particularly for an American to disentangle it from the transformation and debasement it has suffered in the last half-century, it is not sufficient to isolate scientific materialism, or the decline of the aristocracy of France, or any single aspect of society as the sole cause. It is all causes together.

But if there is one distinguishing feature of French romanticism, it is the quality which is best described in the phrase sorcellerie évocatoire. The character of Joseph Delorme is dedicated to it: the disgust, the "spleen," the lassitude, the paralysis of the will, all conducing to a resignation to the stream of sensation, provide a psychological mechanism from which the poet escapes through those occasional accessions of "vision" that restore, for the moment, the balance of the intellect and the passions. It was due to a disease: the world of the European tradition had been, and still is even more radically, thrown off its origin, so that its recovery became a matter of fragmentary insight, no longer susceptible to ordered statement.

Transcendental Romanticism

The Life of Don Quixote and Sancho. According to Miguel Cervantes de Saavedra. Expounded with Comment by Miguel de Unamuno. Translated by Homer P. Earle. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

UNAMUNO is so complex a personality that, while from the affective point of view he appears sometimes organically constituted and in a certain sense consistent, from the intellectual he always appears radically antithetical and disjointed. Intellectually he is an explosion of irrationalities, a chaos of mutually exclusive tendencies. It would be very easy to dismiss him lightly and remark, in the words of Goethe for instance, that concern for immortality is something "for ladies who have nothing to do." It is not altogether difficult to abstract any one of the aspects of his thought for the purpose of analysis and point out its validity in view of one's own arbitrary criteria. But only a shallow mind can dismiss Unamuno permanently. His words cut down to one of the fundamental disquietudes of the human spirit; and reflection will always drag it back to the surface of consciousness, however much one may try to push it into the shadow. On the other hand intellectual analysis is utterly inadequate to deal with him. No one of the multiple aspects of his thought may be taken out of its psychological setting and remain fully relevant to his own world vision. And it is that vision—confused and darkened by despair though it may be—that is in him of ultimate significance. One faces then a dilemma: either one approaches Unamuno logically and does him a conscious injustice, or one leaves him entirely ununderstood in the hope that some time one may realize him completely.

The dilemma forces upon us the question of his attitude toward the method of abstraction. One of the reasons he has so persistently been called a voice of the past—which rigorously speaking he is not—is that he denies, in his usual emotional way, the validity of the rationalistic method as an organ of knowledge. Not that he puts it in these words, or has anything equally efficient to substitute for it. He feels keenly its inability to deal effectively with all the complexities it encounters; to deal, more exactly—for all his reasons are personal—with so unintelligible a phenomenon as his own personality. And it is precisely in this sense that Unamuno may be said to be fully within the modern stream. For his reaction against the limitations of the method of rationalistic analysis is another expression of that tendency which Professor Morris Cohen has so aptly called the "insurgence against reason," and which he finds characteristic of our modern thought. But Unamuno goes much farther in this respect than any modern: his attitude is radical; he will have nothing to do with logic or with rationalism; logic kills the letter as well as the spirit; values wither under its glare. Rationalism, with its method of hard-caked abstractions, produces shallow results and manages seldom really to tap those fountains of despair which run deep under the human conscience.

His aversion to reason finds expression in his ethical philosophy—if so roiled a reservoir of opinions as his may be called "love of wisdom"—among other ways in his truculent refusal to consider the obtuse, rock-hard realities of the world, which philosophers are compelled to take into account as the determining limitations of their thought. In his "Tragic Sentiment of Life" we have already seen that he considers the very quick source of his spiritual life an ineluctable conflict of which he is the victim, which a man rich in worldly wisdom—Santayana, for instance—easily glosses over by rationalization and polite surrender to fact. We may now see, in the present translation, how in the field of ethics, rather than the empirical moderation which the world has always counseled, he offers as the only important categorical imperative an utterly intemperate transcendental romanticism. For this is the meaning of his religion of Quixotism, found expressed not only in this book but in several other of his essays. The Mad Knight did not take the sorry untoward realities of this world into consideration. He had an urge, and because he felt it to be deeply seated he followed it passionately. He was guided by a vision, and because it was luminous to him he took it to be true. To the majority of us this is not wisdom but madness. Madness it was to Cervantes. But to Unamuno it is not madness but the most courageous, the noblest of all possible wisdoms. One thing however must not be forgotten: that Unamuno has lived his own ethical philosophy with a consistency and a passionate devotion equal to that of the Mad Knight himself. And like the Knight our commentator has quite frequently been called mad.

One cannot go that far. For platitudinous as it may be, it is necessary to remember that it is exactly within the heat of the conflict between these two antagonistic attitudes—between the clash of impulsive romanticism and the restraining moderation of reason—that progress, practical as well as moral, is at all possible. And though one may not have the inclination to go against giants which are windmills—for the urge to be a martyr is the privilege of the few—one may at least, in the ease and comfort of one's safe rationality, reserve a grain of admiration and gratitude for those who are devoted to the ideal well enough to risk dashing their souls against the boulders of obdurate reality. Of these, Unamuno is a pure type.

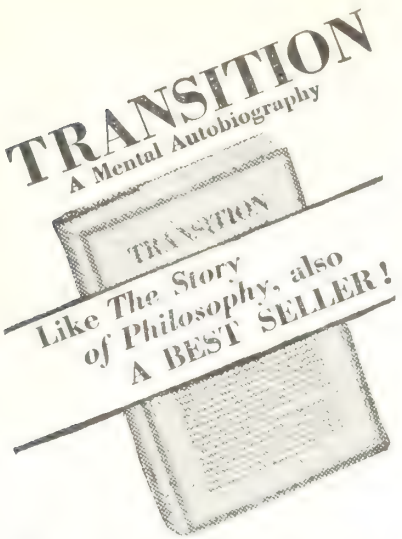
Aletta Jacobs

Memoirs of Aletta Jacobs. With an Introduction by J. Oppenheim. Amsterdam: van Holkema en Warendorf.

KNOWN throughout Holland since 1871, when she was the first girl student to enter a university; causing a sensation in 1883 by claiming the right to vote; shocking people out of their wits by taking up birth control later on; studying social evils with a view to initiating all possible improvements; creating a movement for woman suffrage; ignoring the opposition of her male colleagues to all her "dangerous" reforms—Aletta Jacobs, in her long and notable career, in her strife for women's and for human rights, has made a great many friends as well as a great many enemies. Even her enemies, however, have to acknowledge that only an exceptional energy, a warm woman's heart, a powerful will, and a very clear in-



Will Durant's New Book

This mental autobiography is the story of a philosopher in love with life. It is a frank and intimate story told with the sense of humor and beauty that characterizes his Story of Philosophy.

Ernest Sutherland Bates in the Saturday Review of Literature says:

> Has Mr. Will Durant, after writing the most virile history of philosophers that has been produced in our period, now also written the most vital autobiography? It seems so, to one reviewer at least.

G. D. Eaton in Plain Talk says:

> I defy you to forget Transition; you can no more do it than you can forget the life of Spinoza.

John Haynes Holmes in the Herald-Tribune says:

> This is a thrilling story. I picked it up with a groan on a night when I was sick in bed with a headache, sore throat and 102 degrees fever, and finished it with shouts before the bed-lamp was extinguished.

No wonder Transition has already joined The Story of Philosophy on the best-seller list — is even a bit ahead of it at the moment.

This summer The Roving Inner Sanctum spent memorable hours in SCHNITZLER'S enchanted garden on Sternwartestrasse, and tonight we are there again, on wings of song and on pages of prose such as only ARTHUR SCHNITZLER can write.

Daybreak is the latest novelette in the series launched by "that opal flawlessly cut," Fraulein Else, and carried forward by Beatrice, None But the Brave, and Rhapsody—even the titles carry the nuance and lure of Vienna.

That life and love are games of chance is the underlying idea of Daybreak.

To save a friend from a gambling episode and financial disgrace Lieutenant Willi himself becomes involved in a debt ten times as great and, in desperation, turns to his uncle's young wife who had played a part in a casual amour of the past; there is a situation of SCHNITZLER and Vienna all compact, and the story develops to its climax before the second Daybreak.

From SCHNITZLER'S house The Roving Sanctum went to the Beethoven section of Vienna to meet FRANZ WERFEL, author of Verdi, a Novel of the Opera, Goat Song, Juarez and Maximilian and The Man Who Conquered Death.

Of The Man Who Conquered Death we shall not speak here, contenting ourselves with this quotation—the total review from HERSCHELL BRICKELL of The New York Evening Post:

> FRANZ WERFEL, the young Viennese author of Verdi, A Novel of the Opera, which SIMON AND SCHUSTER insist is one of the great overlooked books of the times, has done a gripping short novel in The Man Who Conquered Death, published by the same firm at $1.50. This is a novelette with the unrelenting power of a good short story, a bitter theme handled with sure effectiveness.
> An old doorkeeper who has lost his job takes out insurance which will pay his wife a pittance if he reaches the age of sixty-five, and for this reason he hangs on to life with a terrible determination long after the doctors in attendance have agreed that he should be dead. His struggle for the goal in the face of these odds has in it the very essence of drama, and the ending, when, after beating death, the old man is left a mere heap of bones, is tremendous.
> You will search a long time for a book of this compass any more moving than The Man Who Conquered Death.

PITY, says WILLIAM A. DRAKE, is the outstanding attribute of WERFEL'S genius: "It is the moment of sublimity which comes into being when one person, in the shock of a tragic instant, abandons his own security in commiseration for the peril of another: the whole-spirited response to a generous conception of life, which recognizes the identity of all living creatures in the embrace of nature . . ."

Poor sales copy perhaps, but true talk.

tellect could have carried her through the endless difficulties of her pioneer life.

Born in 1854, Aletta Jacobs spent the first part of her life in a Groningen village where her father was the village doctor. Brought up in a spirit of democracy very unusual in those times, she considered it quite natural that the girls of her family should be treated as equals with their brothers and that she should at an early age decide to become an M.D. like her father and her eldest brother. It was only much later that she found out the obstacles she had to face. It was only by special consent of the Prime Minister, Thorbecke, that she could enter Groningen University and begin her studies in 1871. She settled in Amsterdam as the first woman physician, looking even then extremely young and incurring a good deal of sharp criticism.

Her medical practice brought her into touch with social evils which gave rise to much suffering among women and children. A new world opened to her and another part of her pioneer career was started soon.

It is to be seen from these "Memoirs" once again how much the younger generation owes to those pioneer workers all over the world. And besides it is refreshing to have the difference between past and present put before us in such a delightful way—with such humor and at the same time with such deep feeling. Not only can we follow Dr. Jacobs's personal career. She also gives us a vivid picture of the development of social and political life in Holland as well as in several other countries. Is it surprising that the war was an awful blow to such a one? With Jane Addams of Hull House she started a world movement for the reorganization of international relations. With them a good many women from warring as well as from neutral countries joined in what proved to be one of the hardest tasks ever taken up, especially in the countries at war.

The English translation, for publication in the United States, is almost finished, we hear. We can only hope that it will be as well received abroad as it was in Holland.

New Utopias for Old

The Next Age of Man. By Albert Edward Wiggam. Bobbs-Merrill Company. $3.

The Right to Be Happy. By Mrs. Bertrand Russell. Harper and Brothers. $3.

READERS of Mr. Wiggam's previous books will recall the burden of his biological song—how the superior stocks of our populations, privy to birth control, were failing to produce their quota of lusty young Nordics, while the inferior stocks, either ignorant of or indifferent to the lore of Mrs. Sanger, were continuing to procreate their kind with great abandon. As a result America was rapidly becoming an overcrowded apartment house for morons—morons headed for a social hell for sheer lack of brainy leadership. A sad state of affairs if true—and Mr. Wiggam offered plausible reasons for patriotic alarm. In the present volume Mr. Wiggam continues to discourse on heredity, environment, genetics, eugenics, and what not in his best Sunday supplement manner, and until near the end appears to be alarmed as usual lest the better stocks of our people be petering out. But the darkest biological hour, it seems, is just before the scientific dawn. For, lo, in his final chapter Mr. Wiggam appears as the journalistic John the Baptist of a new messianic hope—salvation through the inhibition of the female sexual hormones, or safe, sane, and salubrious birth control through the simple process of a woman's swallowing an occasional synthetic tablet.

Heretofore, as Mr. Wiggam points out, birth control has required a certain amount of intelligence and attention, and thus only the more civilized classes have availed themselves of its technique. The effect has, therefore, been dysgenic—tending to recruit the race more and more from the lower orders. Obviously an easier and simpler technique was needed—something that the proletariat would find as fascinating as swallowing a dose of Peruna. Well, according to Mr. Wiggam, we shall soon have that very thing. Certain biochemists, he tells us, have lately discovered that the female reproductive process is under the control of two hormones—the one stimulative, the other suppressive; others have isolated this suppressive hormone and are now able to inhibit the menstrual process by hypodermic injections. Before long, he believes, biochemists will have reduced this hormone to tablet form, and such tablets will be on sale at every drug-store. Plainly this will mark a crisis in human affairs—a biological advance, according to Mr. Wiggam, second only to that which occurred when Pithecanthropus learned to walk on two legs. For when birth control becomes perfectly simple and fool-proof, only the more intelligent, upright, and forward-looking couples will as a rule desire to have children (or, at all events, more than one or two), and thus will be set in motion a highly eugenic process of natural selection, efficacious beyond any scheme that Galton ever dreamed. It is a glorious vision that Mr. Wiggam sees, and he trumpets it with apocalyptic fervor.

If Mr. Wiggam finds the key to his eugenic Utopia in biochemistry, Mrs. Russell is equally confident that humanity may be transformed by a bouleversement of bourgeois morals. Heretofore, she says in effect, Western civilization has been dominated by "an absurd Judiac-cum-Christian synthesis," unhappiness has been considered the normal state of man; one was supposed to forego the joys of earth in order to attain the joys of heaven. But heaven fades into mythology along with the Elysian fields and Valhalla, hence it behooves us to find our happiness here and now. We need a new ethics in which happiness shall be predicated as the right of the individual—as the normal state of man. Happiness, rare as it is in the modern world, is really a very simple matter. It is a matter of recognizing certain human impulses, instincts, or needs as vital, and giving these impulses intelligent expression. These vital impulses derive from the two great main-springs of human action—hunger and love. The hunger instinct in a large part of the population is now far from being properly satisfied; society needs a better distribution of material things, and science can point the way. But above all, society needs to modernize its ethics with regard to sex.

Here we come to the central feature of Mrs. Russell's book. It is essentially a plea for a liberalization and beautification of ethics in the matter of sex. "Sex-love," says Mrs. Russell, "is the most intense instinctive pleasure known to men and women, and starvation or thwarting of this instinct causes more acute unhappiness than poverty, disease, or ignorance." Specifically, Mrs. Russell favors such a modernization of ethics as shall allow pre-marital intercourse without social disapproval, cheap and easy divorce for such couples as choose to have it, and open extra-marital relations aesthetically arrived at for such as desire variety now and then to give spice to the sexual life. Where children are desired—and Mrs. Russell rates children extremely high in the scale of values—"a few years of agreed sexual fidelity" will serve the purpose. As for the social consequences of her new freedom, Mrs. Russell speaks with assurance, visualizing only a vast increase of human happiness, with little or no cheap promiscuity and running amuck. Finally, she pleads, let us have done with medievalism and build a new civilization, a civilization embodying all the security, freedom, and beauty that twentieth-century knowledge can give.

Like "Hypatia," Mrs. Russell's previous compact and outspoken little book, "The Right to Be Happy," breathes a spirit of deep sincerity. Though less eloquent than "Hypatia" and too attentuated in style, it nevertheless rings at times with a dithyrambic fervor. No one, I suppose, has written more beautifully of sex and parenthood since Edward Carpenter laid down his pen. If ordinary men and women possessed half of Mrs. Russell's apparent integrity, intelligence, and sympathy, I should think that her new freedom might work with some suc-

Books in Brief

The Oldest Biography of Spinoza. Edited by A. Wolf. The Dial Press. $2.50

The oldest biography of Spinoza appears here in a more accurate text, made possible by a newly discovered manuscript, edited with critical introduction, English translation, and notes. Otherwise it is, of course, the "Life" attributed to Lucas and reprinted almost thirty years ago in Freudenthal's "Lebensgeschichte." The apparatus and presentation of the work are excellent and some of the corrections brought in by the new manuscript are edifying; in all it is worthy to succeed to Professor Wolf's earlier translation and study of Spinoza's "Short Treatise." Of the "Life" itself little more need be said than that it contains information which sounds in the main authentic and which is not to be found elsewhere—and that it is written with an interest and an insight which make it, apart from questions of accuracy, an extraordinary narrative of an intellectual career. Students of Spinoza will be grateful for a more easily accessible and more accurate text, but it is possible too that those who taste only of literature may be pleased to find a flavored seventeenth-century biography.

The Development of the Theater. By Allardyce Nicoll. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $10.

Professor Nicoll is an indefatigable scholar who happens to have devoted himself to a study of the theater. On previous occasions he has plowed undismayed through mountains of materials, he has edited worthless old plays quite as gladly as good ones, and he has written various volumes, including a history of the drama of the English Restoration which is so admirably exact upon minor points as to be almost unreadable. The present volume is, however, of a different sort. With the aid of two hundred and sixty handsome illustrations it traces briefly the development of the physical theater from the beginnings to the present day and supplies the reader with all that is essential for an understanding of the influence of this development upon play production. Here Professor Nicoll's scholarship assures the accuracy of his statements without oppressing the general reader, and there is no other place in which that reader may find a more satisfactory treatment of the subject.

Stage Antiquities of the Greeks and Romans and Their Influence. By James Turney Allen. Longmans, Green and Company.

A new volume in the Our Debt to Greece and Rome series.

Down Stream, and other Works. By J. K. Huysmans. Translated from the French with a Critical Study by Samuel Putnam. Chicago: Pascal Covici.

A translation of "A vau-l'Eau" and other minor works.

Dialogue Between a Priest and a Dying Man. By Marquis De Sade. Translated from an unpublished manuscript by Samuel Putnam. Chicago. Pascal Covici.

An argument for atheism written by the man whom psycopathology has helped make famous.

The National History of France. Vol. I. The Earliest Times, By Funck Brentano. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $5.

Funck Brentano is correct in his ethnology but chauvinistic in his views. He attributes to the inhabitants of France, who were then divided into quarreling tribes, a consciousness of national unity based on a territorial conception which did not then exist in any part of the world, and minimizes the Roman and Teutonic elements in French culture, ascribing to the aboriginal Celts a larger influence in forming the national character than seems in accord with the facts.

Drama

A Fiasco

MUCH was expected of Philip Barry's "John" (Klaw Theater). The author had previously written two failures rather generally regarded as too good for the public; the producing organization was the Actor's Theater, responsible last year for "Saturday's Children," one of the best of our comedies; and the chief actors employed were recognized stars. This, however, was one of the occasions when all signs failed and it can only be said that all the implicated parties worked together in perfect harmony for the production of a fiasco.

Of those concerned the author comes off decidedly best, for he had at least an admirable intention to start from. The John referred to in the title is the man generally described as "the Baptist," and the play is, or rather tries to be, concerned with the tragedy of his personal failure. Conceived by Mr. Barry as a man with all the passionate force and all the narrow limitations of most evangelists, it is his fate to be an instrument for the achievement of a purpose which he is incapable of understanding. A nationalist, a man of violence, and preeminently the prophet of a revengeful God, it is not within the compass of his soul to comprehend the Messiah whose advent he has been foretelling. He has seen Jesus, he has liked him even, but it has been so impossible for the two men to know one another that when John, in prison, is told of the new turn-cheek doctrine preached by his erstwhile disciple he can only set it down as a malicious lie, and though, at the moment of his death, he knows that Jesus is the Messiah he goes to that death gladly only because he is sure that the new leader will have the adultress Herodias stoned as the law commands and wield again the war-like might of the Jews.

Not only is the conception intellectually interesting but—and this is more important still—it has the stuff of great tragedy in it. This John is exactly the large but imperfect man of whom Aristotle spoke, and death, coming upon him in a moment of exaltation, affords exactly that sort of situation which we properly call tragic—one, that is to say, in which the moment of external catastrophe coincides with the moment of internal triumph and a man dies in the full possession of his soul. John has not failed for himself, and because he can accept death gladly we, too, can accept it with that exaltation which makes the genuinely tragic as far removed from mere pathos as it is from comedy. Nor does the fact that the peace of his soul is founded upon a misapprehension, that he accepts his fate because he does not understand it, do anything except intensify the interest of the situation. It complicates heroism with irony and it makes John not merely a triumphant failure but a glorious dupe as well.

The play fails, not because of any lack of spiritual insight on the part of the author but simply because he has not been able to manage his narrative. Exposition, often unnecessary, clogs his action, and his story will not move forward. There is a long, meandering first act that barely succeeds in introducing the subject, a second largely concerned with irrelevant affairs in the home of the Tetrarch, and then, finally, a concluding scene too short to do more than suggest how effective the play might have been. As for the actors, they behave as though they had lost faith in the play sometime before the first curtain rose. Ben Ami plays with a heavy meaningless violence; Margaret Anglin recites her lines listlessly; and Anna Duncan, in the role of Salome, can scarcely be heard. Perhaps the fact that a dancer was chosen for the latter part and then not allowed to dance will serve as a sort of symbol of the general ineffectiveness of the whole, and in any event judgment upon "John" can be passed in a single sentence: It is excellently conceived, badly played, and still worse acted.

"Coquette" (Maxine Elliott's Theater) is a rather subtle study concerned with a village belle who lets a lover be shot because she cannot bring herself quickly enough to the point of confessing that the "honor" which her father is defending is only a myth. The central character is finely drawn and the social background—that of the anachronistic South—skilfully suggested. Perhaps the play is somewhat too subdued in its methods to make itself heard on Broadway, but it is quietly acidulous and played with more force by Helen Hayes than those who have seen her only in more syrupy roles might be inclined to anticipate. "The Fanatics" (Forty-ninth Street Theater) is a somewhat overexplicit but nevertheless amusing comedy which comes here after a great success in London. It is devoted to a defense of trial marriage and in spite of a slight tendency in the direction of talkiness it makes its points with a good deal of humor. "Take My Advice" (Belmont Theater), a pure and simple-minded little farce, is also well enough in its not very distinguished way. In "A Connecticut Yankee" (Vanderbilt Theater) Mark Twain is brought up to date in a tuneful, colorful musical comedy. He appears rather grotesque in modern clothes, but is amusing nevertheless.

Disarmament and the Labor Party

By RENNIE SMITH

London, October 10

WE are painfully reminded in these days that the world will not run to general disarmament with the speed of the fabled hare. For example, in 1919 concrete suggestions were put forward by America for a peace that would be based on social justice and not on revenge. But the peace treaty was a peace of revenge. In the peace treaty itself there was a cogent need for the establishment, on a principle of equality, of an all-inclusive League of Nations. In practice we got a league raised on the blood-sodden ground of a military victory. While America wrapped round herself the proud mantle of isolation, Germany and Russia alike were scowled at as enemies. Or, to take the latest example, President Coolidge called for naval disarmament. At once the political barometer of general disarmament, carried from cold and shadow into the sunshine of hope, registered the new degrees. But, alas! the invitation to disarm only ended in more harm. They who foregathered as friendly guests, speaking a common language, departed with burning ears. The common people in three continents are left in bewilderment and anger, asking: What next?

Workers for peace in pre-war days sought to instruct princes, through Hague conferences and in diverse ways, that disarmament by itself would never fill the bill. They emphasized to the point of weariness, with many to hear and few to understand, that without the establishment of the neutral arbitration court, to which all possible causes of war could be referred for settlement, the prospects of disarmament would fetch but a small price in the market. They searched anxiously for the foundations of a security-in-common to replace the security associated with the possession of arms.

It is to the credit of those responsible for the foreign policy of the Labor Party that years ago they perceived the need for a synthetic program to bring about peace. That is why they were among the first to advocate an all-inclusive league of nations to replace the international anarchy of our time. That is why, in 1915, men like Mr. Brailsford and Mr. Sidney Webb in their private thoughts and public utterances were busy raising that fabric of international life whereby the judge and the arbitration court could displace the soldier. The Geneva Protocol of 1924 gathered together the wisdom of a generation's political thinking and the ghastly finger-pointings of a world war into a political document of epoch-making importance. Mankind is not unmindful of the debt it owes to American thought. Those triune foundations of peace—arbitration, security, disarmament—were in the Protocol, laid broad and deep in the society of nations. It is not an accident that the Protocol was championed by a Labor government in Great Britain. Nor is it an accident that Mr. Ramsay MacDonald revitalized the League by appearing in person at Geneva, there to move the imagination of the world by clothing himself in the language and the spirit of this profound instrument of peace. Was it not logical, too, that the newly arrived Tory Government should be the main agent in the world for the rejection of the Protocol? The Tory Government, when it rejected the Protocol, rejected by a process of reasoning based on nineteenth-century practices of the sovereignty of nations, a practical policy for the building up of that international security which alone can replace the security of the national sword. And at the Imperial Conference the British Tory Government not only declared that the time was not ripe for the application of obligatory arbitration in the realm of international disputes, but it has systematically rejected every offer that has come from other countries to conclude such treaties. Men cannot gather the figs of disarmament from these wild thistles of polemic against pooled security and the international judge.

An attempt is to be made by 1931 to redeem the failure of the Coolidge Conference. Before that time we shall have had at least one new government in England. It would be within the program of a Labor government, in harmony with its outlook on foreign policy and of the logic of its history, to be willing to negotiate on the issue of the outlawry of war and for the conclusion of an arbitration treaty which would undertake to submit in the last resort every judgment to a third party for pacific settlement. Similarly, it would be true to itself in desiring to apply, between Britain and the United States, that principle of common security which could give an international meaning to the "freedom of the seas" and could slay those ghosts of cruiser rivalries and blockade in war time which haunted the Coolidge Conference. Lord Cecil's resignation from the Cabinet, from Geneva, and from the General Disarmament Commission is the impressive proof, if one were needed, of how right Labor's diagnosis is. Lord Cecil, in his letter to the Prime Minister, writes:

> . . . I cannot conceal from myself that on the broad policy of disarmament the majority of the Cabinet and I are not really agreed. I believe that a general reduction and limitation of armaments is essential to the peace of the world, and on that peace depends not only the existence of the British Empire, but even that of European civilization itself. . . . Much that happened during last spring was to me of a disquieting nature. Over and over again I was compelled by my instructions to maintain propositions in the commission which were difficult to reconcile with any serious desire for the success of its labors. . . . I look back on the refusal to accept the Treaty of Mutual Assistance, the unconditional rejection of the Protocol, the Ministerial declaration against compulsory arbitration, the partial failure of the Preparatory Commission, and now the breakdown of the Three-Power Conference. . . . In each case the policy I advocated has been more or less overruled. . . . For the truth is, however unwilling I am to recognize it, that in these matters my colleagues do not agree with me. . . .

Do you want disarmament? the Labor Party asked some time ago. Then work for arbitration and security at the same time. The harvest will come. General disarmament of a kind that will leave the Washington agreement behind; a general disarmament that will pass at once to the atmosphere of that all-round and radical disarmament imposed with corresponding obligations on other states, on Germany, Austria, Hungary, and Bulgaria under the peace treaty of 1919 and the Covenant of the League of Nations. The Labor Party has drawn a second lesson from the failures of this year. How easily statesmen can neglect the pledges they have by solemn treaty given. For the four late enemy states have carried out a process of disarmament on land, on sea, and in the air, which is the only model in existence for the guidance of other states in the post-war world. And these four states, all now members of the League of Nations, can and do put forward a claim for the application of this model by other states, which is, both in respect of treaty obligations and of moral principle, irresistible. Germany is limited to six battleships of 10,000 tons, and six cruisers of 6,000 tons. Submarines are totally prohibited. Her army is denuded of tanks, armored cars, and heavy artillery, and is reduced on a voluntary basis to 100,000 men. Military aircraft and the manufacture and research associated therewith are totally prohibited. If these things can be done for four states, why can they not, in principle, be done for fifty-four? The display of tanks on Britain's Salisbury Plain this summer would thereby become illegal, and our military aircraft exercises of this year would disturb the sky no more.

The world cannot run permanently on two standards of disarmament. Either the 1919 standard must win the general consent of the other states, or the four states now subject to its drastic measure will, sooner or later, provoke an irresistible movement to be released. When these are the issues, the choice of responsible men cannot be in doubt.

GEMS FROM THE PRESIDENT'S SPEECH before the Union League Club of Philadelphia on November 17:

> America is much more than a geographical location. It is a combination and a relationship. It is the destiny of a masterful pioneering people . . . determined to be free.
> Our country is the result of incomprehensible triumph.
> Rightly understood there is no more sensational story of human experience. Society is made up of constants and variables. The variables attract us by their contrasts and are always appearing in the headlines. But the constants always predominate, always push ahead in the march of progress.
> History is littered with nations destroyed by their own wealth. It is true that we have accumulated a small, but a blatant, fringe of extravagance and waste, nourished in idleness, and another undesirable class who seek to live without work. A successful people are always a mark for the vicious and the criminal but these are conspicuous mainly by contrast. The great mass of our people, whatever their possessions . . . know that the doctrine of e[illegible] the doctrine of surrender and decay.

The Nation hereby offers a reward of one hundred dollars to any reader who can convince its editors that a more "blatant fringe" of buncombe and senseless hokum exists in any speech of any other President in our history, the preeminent Warren G. Harding alone being barred.

THE CUT IN THE BRITISH naval building program from three 10,000-ton cruisers to one of 8,000 tons comes in the nick of time. Undoubtedly the credit for it must be given to Lord Robert Cecil, whose admirable fight against his former colleagues in the British Government gives promise of offsetting some of the compromises and errors in the career of this erratic but engaging statesman. Beyond question there will be a most serious drive for big navy appropriations in Washington just as soon as Congress assembles. All our timid patriots and all the demagogues of the Mayor Thompson school will unite in urging that we outdo in armaments the very ally to whom we swore eternal fealty only ten years ago. That we are building against her is now perfectly obvious; our fleet has outstripped Japan's and there is no one else to arm against. Our jingoes will, of course, see in the cutting of the British Admiralty's building program a victory for us. We prefer to believe that a sober second thought is responsible for the change. Liberal and Laborite in Great Britain alike insist that the delegates to the Geneva naval conference gravely misrepresented British public opinion. Press dispatches refer to the "wave of pacificism now sweeping over England"; that tide has been rising in England ever since the end of the war.

INDIANA IS HOUSECLEANING. Clyde Walb, Republican State chairman, under fire from the Indianapolis Times, announces his retirement from politics. The Times, continuing its good work, has revealed Mr. Walb's activity in behalf of T. Guy Perfect, a wealthy resident of Huntingdon, Indiana, who had been convicted of seducing a 14-year-old girl. Mr. Walb's work coincided with the investment of $2,500 by Mr. Perfect's family in Mr. Walb's construction company. Meanwhile, four of the nine councilmen of the "majority faction" in Indianapolis have been indicted by the Marion County grand jury, on charges of accepting bribes to break down zoning provisions in the city. The grand jury has extended its investigation into the State House, and is now following up charges of corruption in connection with the Insull public-utility interests. When Indianapolis's mayor went to jail the distraught city council, several of its members themselves under indictment, settled a tangled question temporarily by choosing a Democrat, L. Ert Slack, for the place after thirty-eight ballots. Although Mr. Slack has been conspicuous as attorney for the Klan and for the "majority faction," he has pledged himself to a clean-up and his first acts seem to confirm his pledge. Much credit for the thorough job of setting Indiana's house in order is due to William H. Remy, Marion County prosecuting attorney, and to the present Marion County grand jury and its foreman, William J. Mooney.

"BAWLING AT THE VOTERS" is what Professor William B. Munro of Harvard University calls the efforts of various civic organizations to get people to go to the polls regardless of whether they know or care anything about the candidates or questions involved. Speaking recently before the National Municipal League, Mr. Munro described the practice of encouraging citizens to "certify their lack of knowledge" at the polls as ridiculous and more dangerous to the community than complete indifference toward the "slacker vote." A day or so later John Hays Hammond of the National Civic Federation expressed almost the same idea. "Doubling an uninformed vote only clogs the election machinery and is a liability instead of an asset," he said. "The various slogans, such as 'Vote as you please, but vote,' and the buttons inscribed 'I have voted; have you?' mean little in themselves in terms of enlightened citizenship." We are glad to see these indications of agreement with the position The Nation has taken in regard to all these recent campaigns to "get out the vote." But neither Professor Munro nor Mr. Hammond gets to the bottom of the trouble, which is that the two major parties purposely sidestep all the real political issues of the day so that there is no essential choice between their candidates and platforms. "Get out the issues" is the slogan of The Nation. Once that is done, the vote will take care of itself.

THE EXPULSION from the Communist Party of Leon Trotzky, Karl Radek, L. Kamenev, Gregory Zinoviev, and eighty-odd of their companions-in-opposition forms a striking sequel to the love-feast of the recent anniversary. No sooner had the guests gone home from Soviet Russia's birthday celebration than the press announced this apparently final rupture in the ranks of the ruling party. Barring compromise amounting to surrender on the part of the Opposition, these erstwhile leaders appear to be cast, not only into outer darkness, but into idleness, penury, and possible starvation. Their jobs and their homes, no less than their opinions and political activities, are in the hands of the dominant majority. No good Communist—and, in the party or out, not one of the Opposition members would admit he was anything else—can earn a living by ordinary means. He cannot buy and sell; he cannot write articles for the foreign "bourgeois" press (and no Communist paper the world over would print his views); he is untrained, usually, for factory or farm work. His dissidence condemns him to an idleness which must look little better than prison. It is difficult at this distance to understand why a Government like that in Russia, powerful and held in power by the strong logic of economic forces, should not be able to make use of the very unusual abilities of these political heretics—who are, at the same time, honest revolutionaries.

PERHAPS, AS REVOLUTIONARIES, they are too honest, too stubborn. They see the revolution being swept into strange bypaths that may or may not rejoin the high-road toward communism. They cannot sit back and say nothing while concessions to the peasants create what they believe will be a vast and stolid bourgeoisie of small landed proprietors. They cannot contentedly watch Russia plunge into an era of industrial activity based on close economic relations with a capitalistic world. The Revolution, they say, is revolution only if looked on as a phase of a world movement. The Government must pursue a policy of "permanent revolution," using every means that is necessary to dominate the peasant masses and to propagate communism in other countries. But the energy of Russia is pushing in other directions—toward production, reconstruction, industrial development, rather than toward world revolution. Trotzky and his associates are playing the ungrateful role of obstructionists, and as such they seem doomed. A strong and ruthless majority, which has on its side the temper of the people and the logic of events, wipes them out of political existence.

REORGANIZATION OF THE COAL INDUSTRY has been urged by every investigating committee which ever honestly peered into this industrial morass. But nothing has been done. Now President Green of the American Federation of Labor is to call on President Coolidge and place before him charges of brutality and lawlessness on the part of State troopers, deputy sheriffs, and coal company police in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and West Virginia. The appeal, drawn up by the Council of the Federation, says:

> We call upon the churches, the educational institutions, and all liberal-minded and free institutions and organizations to come into Pittsburgh, to see what we have seen, to learn for themselves, to behold this degradation and oppression and brutality, to witness this economic and social tragedy, to learn of the perversion of the judicial processes and of the feudalistic police control in the State of Pennsylvania.

These may seem strong words; but a dreadful and by no means recent situation amply justifies them. It is not enough to say that the children of miners are hungry and without shelter; or that miners' wives are enduring daily hardship because of the refusal of their husbands to work. Possibly, whatever the merits of the situation, those who feel the need to strike must be prepared to bear the consequences of their decision. But no strike, no injustice whether to employer or worker can ever justify the strong-arm methods now in force in the striking counties. Mounted policemen who ride down women and children are not to be endured; armed thugs who beat up defenseless strikers are not to be endured; agents provocateurs who try to stir up trouble and, failing that, testify that trouble is brewing, are not to be endured. President Coolidge would do well to cease talking about prosperity until these things are stopped.

MR. HEARST has been publishing in his papers a magnificent series of documents which are supposed to brand Calles and Mexico for all time. Apparently they are facsimiles of original orders by which President Calles directed that various large sums of money be paid to his friends in all parts of the world. If the documents had been more modest it might have been easier to believe them. But, after beginning with payments to the Nicaraguan Liberals who were finally defeated by the United States Marines, they continued to show payments for revolutionary propaganda in Russia and China. The thought of little Mexico financing Russian and Chinese revolution is a real triumph of the human imagination; but we have reason to believe that the original set of documents included others which seemed too preposterous for even Mr. Hearst to publish. The New York Telegram comments upon another evidence that Mr. Hearst's editors did not entirely trust the accuracy of their own revelations: Between editions they altered the date appearing in one of these "photostat copies!" Indeed there are several instances in which the artist of the documents seems to have got his dates mixed.

THE GERMAN POLICE, meanwhile, have discovered a real international financial plot—a plan to ruin Soviet Russia by flooding the international market with forged chervonetz notes. The original conspirators were Caucasian revolutionaries, and according to the press reports—this part of the story has not yet been confirmed—they had the interested support of Sir Henry Deterding, head of the Royal Dutch Shell Oil Company, who is supposed in Russia to have been responsible for the break in Russo-British diplomatic relations. The Berlin correspondent of the New York Times makes the natural guess that favorable oil concessions had been promised him in the event of success. At any rate, millions of forged chervonetz notes were manufactured in Frankfurt-am-Main and shipments for various European capitals had been prepared when the German police got on the trail of the forgers. With the cooperation of the French police they have arrested the apparent leaders, but the ramifications of the plot touch so many highly placed European personalities that the police have been instructed to keep further details secret.

CAMBRIDGE WITHOUT DR. CROTHERS must lose something of its charm. For, though an immigrant into the Harvard community, he struck such deep roots that the younger generation came to regard him as one of the founding fathers. Brought up in the pioneer West, a graduate of Princeton, ordained in the most un-Bostonian Presbyterianism, he was for more than thirty years pastor of the Unitarian First Parish of Cambridge, which in a large sense of the word is the Harvard Church. And he did maintain the elder Harvard tradition. He preached a bland liberalism which concealed, as did his Atlantic essays, its heretic implications beneath a polished surface. The hysterias of the Boston community never found expression through this adopted son from the West; often enough that community never realized how he was chuckling at it. But several generations of college men have left Cambridge a little more civilized because of his spirit.

IN THE DEATH of Frances Gardner Davenport the United States loses a historian of distinction. She was educated at Radcliffe, the London School of Economics, Cambridge, and took her Ph.D. at the University of Chicago. At Radcliffe she came under the influence of Professor William J. Ashley, who one autumn handed her some manor rolls that he had purchased in England for Harvard. She spent many years on these and allied documents, visiting the manor itself, and in 1906 published the "Economic History of a Norfolk Manor." After teaching a year at Vassar College, in 1905, she went to the newly created Historical Department of the Carnegie Institution where, under Dr. J. Franklin Jameson, her most important work was accomplished. As the compiler and expositor of "European Treaties Bearing on the Economic History of the United States" Frances Davenport will be known as long as United States history is studied. Her first volume was published in 1917. Two others were complete at her death save for some last checking up of authorities, bringing the work down to 1713. Each treaty is preceded by a careful exposition of the political and economic history bearing upon the document—terse writing, impregnable as to fact. No journey was too great for this historian to take to study original archives, no language too difficult for her to master if new material was to be found. Her patience was extraordinary and her lively interest in her work never flagged. "I knew I took a subject that needed a lifetime," she said a few weeks ago. "I see now that it needed more than one."

AT THE UNIVERSITY OF WEST VIRGINIA President Frank Butler Trotter banned a peace lecture by Kirby Page, which had been arranged by the student Y. W. C. A. The R. O. T. C., the American Legion, and the D. A. R. had protested; furthermore, "too much turmoil had been caused by the invitation." In the face of such circumstances what could be done by a fearless college president but obligingly to cancel the meeting? Much the same academic pusillanimity exists at the College of the City of New York where President Robinson has just suspended two students because they criticized compulsory military drill. This action, Dean Klapper explained, was to bring about "as complete a cessation of propaganda as possible by the student body." Last year a student referendum on the compulsory R. O. T. C. went against it by a vote of 2,092 to 345. To placate the students the faculty instituted the hypocritical alternative of civilian drill—but scheduled it at the most inconvenient hours and prescribed a $7 uniform for it—military uniforms were free.

RUTH ELDER, who failed to fly across the broad Atlantic, succeeded in breaking down the taciturnity of President Coolidge. Her place was side by side with his at the recent White House luncheon for aviators. According to the press reports he "engaged in animated conversation with the woman flier." Also we are told that "his face was wreathed in smiles." But New England character is staunch and not every Vermont trait fell before the young lady of the Loew circuit. The headline of the little story, President Gives a Token, suggested a departure from the program of national economy which has so distinguished the present Administration, but the body of the news was reassuring: "When the guests were preparing to leave, the President reached over by his plate and picked up his place card which he offered to his companion. That is the favor she is treasuring." Mr. Ibsen's spendthrift in "The Wild Duck" gave away the menu. Still there is just the possibility that on the back of his place card Mr. Coolidge may have written his telephone number.

THOSE WHO ADMIRE MUSSOLINI have said that he has brought about a restoration of the glory that once was Italy. And yet it is not fantastic to assume that a recent comment of the Premier may well have caused Raphael to revolve rapidly within his grave. Howard Chandler Christy who does covers, painted Mussolini after three brief sittings. "Many artists have placed my face on canvas," remarked the Duce, "but you are the first to have placed me there." Later he told the wife of the American illustrator: "It is a better portrait than was ever painted of me." Somewhat irrelevantly the Associated Press correspondent who described the meeting of the creator of the Christy girl and the founder of the new Italy added that Mussolini had brought his country "from the confusion of five years ago to its present position." Accordingly, if digressions are to be permitted, one may be allowed to recall a poem by another American, Franklin P. Adams, during a Christmas era in which it was announced that Mr. Christy would illustrate the poems of Walter Scott:

> The stag at eve had drunk his fill.
> "I fear," he said, "I shall be ill-> Ustrated"—here his eyes grew misty—
> "By artist Howard Chandler Christy."

The Tariff, Agriculture, and the President

While the President has not thoroughly studied the Nagel report he came out firmly today against its salient provision, which hits at the fundamental Republican tariff policy he and his party propose to maintain.

THUS a Washington dispatch appearing two days after the publication of the report of the Business Men's Commission on Agriculture, headed by Charles Nagel, the former Secretary of Commerce. We venture to say that Mr. Coolidge had not studied the report at all when he gave out that statement to the press, but it would have made no difference if he had. He and the crowd that control the Republican Party have closed minds on this question of the tariff, even when the demand for a change comes from one as high in the councils of the Republican Party as Charles Nagel, and from so representative a group of American business interests. To the President the tariff will remain a sacred fetish until he is convinced that more votes are to be had by recommending a reduction. To date the only objects upon which tariff duties have been reduced under that famous flexible-tariff provision which gave the President the power to raise and lower duties, are live bob-white quail, millfeed, cresylic acid, and paint-brush handles! How the American producers of quail and paint-brush handles allowed this to happen we cannot understand. They must have been asleep on their jobs, for during the same period the President has increased the rates of duty upon fourteen articles, of which one of the most important is pig iron.

Undaunted by this record the Business Men's Commission on Agriculture was appointed jointly by the National Industrial Conference Board and the Chamber of Commerce of the United States. Besides Mr. Nagel, the Commission had such distinguished members as E. N. Brown, chairman of the board of the St. Louis and San Francisco Railway Company; Alfred Swayne, vice-president of the General Motors Corporation; and Paul M. Warburg, whose reputation as an international banker and student of finance is known of all men. The Commission was, of course, not authorized to commit its parent bodies by its findings, but it has gone on record as saying that "efforts should be made more nearly to equalize, as between agriculture and manufacturing industry, such benefits as the existing protective-tariff system can afford to both." While opposing any legislative measures of the type of the McNary-Haugen bill, the Commission believes that there should be "intelligent and discriminating effort to diminish gradually those trade restrictions and tariffs on manufactured articles which tend to reduce the foreign market for our agricultural products." So far as this goes it is sound advice; practically, it is not worth the paper it is written on, since after five years of the Fordney-McCumber tariff the President has been interested only in reducing the tariff on quail, millfeed, paint-brush handles, and cresylic acid.

Much more hopeful is the Commission's recommendation of a federal farm board to be appointed by the President, to advise the agricultural world as to planning of production and marketing of crops, and to encourage the farm organizations and private companies in creating and financing corporations to buy and sell farm products under stabilized prices. In other words, it desires a federal board to do indirectly what the farm representatives in Congress have wished the government itself to do. For the rest, the Commission urges cooperation and the usual remedies for our agricultural distress, such as better education of the farmer, better live stock, the utilization of machinery, calamity insurance, and standardizing farm products. In addition, the Commission is afraid of cooperative-marketing organization on a large scale, but urges a carefully planned policy of land utilization under what might be called a National Agriculture Foundation, which should also be charged with eliminating misfit farmers and with controlling the movement of population from the farms to the cities and vice versa. In view of Mr. Warburg's presence on the Commission its recommendation for extending farm banking and serving agricultural credit needs by fewer and stronger banks is of great importance. It realizes that the farmer has a just grievance in the credit situation, and to remedy this it also urges the establishment of agricultural credit corporations and farmers' mutual associations under government control. Finally, it recommends a reduction of freight rates.

Most of these recommendations are sound and useful. They ought to help the leading farm organizations, who have as yet been unable to agree upon farm legislation, to come to a joint understanding so that they may concentrate upon a relief program. But if they should agree in demanding a reduction in the tariff on the articles that the farmer must use, it is obvious that the President would give them no aid or comfort. Yet the knowledge that the tariff is a fundamental stumbling-block to our obtaining those additional foreign markets which the farmers must have for their surplus products, whether the government markets their crop or private organizations do so, is gradually permeating wider and wider circles. Thus, speaking on November 18, before the Academy of Political Science in New York, Norman H. Davis, one of the delegates to the World Economic Conference, pointed out that the mere fact that we have changed from a debtor to a creditor nation in itself calls for a reconsideration of the effect of the tariff upon our economic life and that of other nations. He correctly declared that "the real test of our tariff policy will come from the need of additional markets and the necessity to safeguard and recover our foreign loans and investments."

That Europe cannot recover unless our and other tariff barriers are reduced has been certified not only by the leading bankers of the world in their memorandum of last year, but by the World Economic Conference and every gathering at which the matter comes up for discussion. But the interests of America and of the world are invariably side-tracked by the men in Washington who control the Congress and insist upon giving relief to a struggling Europe only in the categories of quail, paint-brush handles, millfeed, and cresylic acid. This list is an exact measure of the strangle-hold which the manufacturers have upon the country and the pettiness of the minds charged with formulating the national and international policies of the United States in these difficult economic times. American agriculture is being depressed to the danger-point, and Europe invited to organize against us.

Curzon Weeps

SO persistently has T. E. Lawrence, "uncrowned King of Arabia," kept in the public eye that some have found his professed desire for obscurity suspiciously paradoxical. It is, they say, only by design that so clever a man as he could fail so signally in an effort to avoid publicity, and they have accused him of knowing only too well both how reluctance adds value to revelation and how mysterious shadows make high romantic lights stand out in bold relief. But, however that may be, he has real stories to tell, and even if there be a touch of the unconsciously histrionic in his genius he has played a great role well. Just about the time that the famous limited edition of his memoirs was published he was discovered serving under the name of Private T. E. Shaw in the Royal Air Force. Now, while he is still regularly performing the duties of that humble office, Robert Graves, the poet, comes forward with an authorized book in which is told how Lawrence, dressed in Arabian costume, came to Buckingham Palace, refused the decorations which King George was offering him, and in plain terms rebuked his sovereign for having broken faith.

It seems that in 1918 Lawrence, whose genius had played a large part in uniting the Arabian tribes in behalf of the Allies, discovered that the British Foreign Office had made him the unconscious instrument of a betrayal. It had promised independence to Arabia but at the same time it had repudiated this promise in a secret treaty with the other Allies in which a division of the country as part of the spoils of war was agreed upon. When Lawrence discovered that he would be unable to fulfil the promise with which he had won the confidence of the people he was leading "a longing for death to end his shame" came upon him, and though he survived the war he refused the thanks of the Government he had served because he did not care to receive honors for having succeeded in a fraud. Shortly before he had protested to the Peace Conference he had, at a meeting of the Cabinet, made even the implacable, imperturbable Curzon weep—a phenomenon (says Graves) "horribly like a medieval miracle, the weeping of a church image"—but it was all in vain. King George, having heard Lawrence say that he might soon be fighting with the Arabs against England, could only express an unwillingness to believe that his ministers had broken their word and permit him to refuse the proffered decorations.

Lord Stamfordham, private secretary to the King, has issued a statement in the course of which it is said that "the King has no recollection of Lawrence's saying that the part he had played in the Arab revolt was dishonorable to himself and to his country and government," but the statement acknowledges the chief features of the interview as reported by Graves and it throws little additional light upon the incident. There is, however, one other detail highly characteristic of Lawrence and highly significant as a revelation of his character. He had come to the palace in the company of Prince Feisal and he was clad in the white robes of an Arabian chieftain. "Is it right, Colonel Lawrence," demanded one of the officials of the court, "that a subject of the crown and an officer should appear here clothed in a foreign uniform?" "When a man serves two masters," Lawrence replied, "and has to offend one of these, it is better for him to offend the more powerful."

There is something in the gnomic form of this retort and something also in the proud, impolitic Quixoticism of its content which suggest the East. Lawrence's memoirs may be, as Bernard Shaw has called them, "the greatest story of heroism by a hero since Caesar's 'Commentaries'" and he himself is certainly a typical example of those racial sports which seem so "un-English" in spite of the fact that England has probably produced more of them than has any other country, yet everything about him suggests that he not only came to understand very thoroughly the peoples whom he led but that there was something in his temperament which predestined him to a sympathy with them and their ways. A certain sort of dignity is characteristically Arabian and it is so, perhaps, because circumstance has denied to the Arab every other sort of greatness. His pride must be Quixotic because he has no power, and, since he has neither wealth nor possession, the magnificent gesture is the only kind of magnificence he can afford. "When a man serves two masters and has to offend one of these, it is better for him to offend the more powerful"—that aphorism sounds as though it had been uttered before the door of a tent by a man who had nothing but honor to lose. Such sentiments cannot be afforded by anyone who owns very much or who happens to be serving an empire. When Lawrence talked Curzon wept and whether his were crocodile tears or not it is perfectly certain that he could never have understood Lawrence one-half so well as could those tribes whom the latter had led and unconsciously betrayed.

The Glozel War

IN that high, calm realm where the scientists pursue eternal truth, war has broken out; and it is a Stone Age war. The scientists of France are fighting bitterly, and, as with all French wars, the area is spreading to include all Europe. The Serajevo of this world war is Glozel.

Glozel is a hamlet in the clay hills of Auvergne, not far from Vichy. Three years ago the peasant Fradin, plowing his fields, came upon what appeared to be the remains of a low brick wall. The local doctor became interested and dug further; soon he produced a variety of small unglazed tablets, variously scratched, and he announced that the scratches were a Neolithic alphabet—antedating, though related to, that Phoenician alphabet from which our Western writing is derived.

If Dr. Morlet was right Stone Age men, long before the invention of bronze, made the supreme human discovery of a permanent method of written communication. The horizon of history was pushed back, perhaps, a dozen milleniums. M. Salomon Reinach, president of the Academy of Inscriptions, visited Glozel, watched the excavation of more tablets, and pronounced the Glozel collections genuine.

Other scientists had their doubts. Some thought it curious that the Glozel letters corresponded to a late form of Phoenician, whereas if they were the ancestors of Phoenician script they would be expected to be more like the earliest known Phoenician characters. Dr. Morlet continued his digging, and shortly produced new tablets, bearing more characters, this time resembling the early Phoenician. More marvels followed. Dr. Morlet unearthed an engraving of a reindeer, indicating unsuspected relationships between the Neolithic art of the period to which Reinach had assigned Glozel and the art of the cave-dwellers of the Old Stone Age. Skeptics pointed out that reindeer had vanished from France long before the Neolithic period. Then, came the reply, it is not a reindeer but some other species of deer. The question was referred to the Norwegian specialists in reindeer. Unquestionably, they replied, the animal was a reindeer. Then, M. Reinach and others asserted, a few reindeer must have persisted in France long after they had been supposed to be extinct.

M. Camille Jullian, the Gallo-Roman historian, entered the controversy with a new thesis. After an attentive examination of reproductions of the Glozel tablets he announced that the "Neolithic" letters were merely a degenerate form of illiterate Latin, and insisted that he could translate some of the inscriptions himself. The Glozelians called up new forces. A dozen professors visited the scene and attested the impeccable Neolithic character of the inscriptions. But some of the greatest French scholars held aloof. The Abbé Breuil, France's greatest Paleolithicist, after some hesitation, announced that he did not like the unhealthy propagandist climate of Glozel and that he would retire to the pleasanter atmosphere of his Paleolithic caves. René Dussaud, of the Louvre Museum, a member of the Institute of France, published a brochure attacking Glozel as pure fake. The "Neolithic" tablets were impudent forgeries —"Neo-modern," he called them. He said that the most interesting were found by the peasant Fradin and Dr. Morlet when no one else was present, called one of the supposed "tombs" a medieval blast furnace, and pointed out that it was remarkable that such soft tablets should have been preserved unbroken, fairly close to the surface of the ground, in fields which cattle had trod in dry weather and wet for centuries. Dr. Morlet replied, accusing some of the leading anti-Glozelians of mere personal spite. They had shown, he said, a willingness to declare the relics genuine if they could announce them to the world and win the glory. A few neutral scientists impartially decided that some of the tablets were genuine and others false.

The Government took a hand. The Minister of Public Instruction decided to send an official commission to excavate on the spot and determine the authenticity of Glozel. Dr. Morlet replied agreeing, but insisted upon exercising a veto against the membership in the commission of certain savants whom he distrusted. The Ministry declared that it must choose its own scholars, and Dr. Morlet then refused to admit the Government's commission. Thereupon the Government took steps to declare the field a "national monument," which would give the Government control; and finally the International Institute of Anthropology, meeting in Amsterdam, took up the war. A Portuguese partisan of Glozel and one of its French antagonists nearly came to blows, and an armistice was declared only after the appointment of a neutral commission, consisting of one Belgian, one Swiss, one Spaniard, one Czech, an Englishwoman, an Alsatian, and two Frenchmen.

At last accounts the international commission was camped at Glozel, personally excavating with its own international trowels. Every night its members cover their pits with plaster of Paris, so that no midnight prowler can insert false tablets into the guaranteed authentic international trenches. So far as one can judge from the dispatches, the result is likely to be two contradictory reports. The New World may yet be called upon to enter the war. But whatever may be established as to the origin of Glozel's "Neolithic" alphabet, the world should at least have learned from the war something about the infallibility of science—and of scientists.

Justice or Dignity

FOR "improper guardianship" children may be removed from the custody of their parents; and "improper guardianship" conjures up pictures of cold and hungry children, of children bruised and beaten, or foolishly pampered. But when ten-year-old Russell Tremaine was taken from his parents in the State of Washington and put in a detention home, and when later he was given to a private family for a six months' "trial" to be followed by adoption if he should "suit," there was no question of beatings or foolish pamperings or lack of nourishment. The Tremaines are decent, law-abiding citizens of the State; they belong to a nonresistant religious sect, the Elijah Voice Society; they are absolute pacifists and as such they were opposed to having Russell take part in the flag salute at school—and they "refused to acknowledge that the State had a right to compel school-children to be indoctrinated with the principles of nationalistic patriotism and flag worship." They kept Russell at home and proceeded to educate him according to their own beliefs. And the sovereign State of Washington, in return, put Russell's father in jail and carried Russell himself off to a detention home.

This incredible proceeding took place two years ago. The Tremaine parents have tried to visit their son and are not permitted to see him—or, now, even to know where he is being boarded out. His father wrote of him:

> The supervisor of child-placing . . . said little Russell was hungering for someone to love him. That at the "home" for some time he would eat little and lay awake nights and sob and was developing a nervous twitching of the face and they were afraid he might lose his mind. This of course was intense agony for me to listen to.

The sovereign State of Washington, in the dim way peculiar to governments, seemed to have an inkling that torture was being unnecessarily inflicted on certain of its citizens. Judge Hardin of the Juvenile Court wrote to Mr. Tremaine that if he would promise to send Russell to a private school or to public school at least for the first eight grades, the boy would be returned to his parents. But the Tremaines were consistent in their faith. They wished, they declared, to send Russell to school; they preferred public schools to private; but they asked to be assured that he would not be forced to take part against his will in a ceremony that was contrary to his own faith and that of his parents; and finally they could not recognize the authority of the judge or the courts that would urge such a course.

And here, for the moment, the matter rests. Russell is completing his six months' trial. He is liable for adoption at the end of this period. Judge Hardin, representing the sovereign State of Washington, is evidently a little at a loss. And the Tremaines are still deprived of their son. Government, not for the first time, finds itself in the unpleasant dilemma of having to be cruel in order not to admit of making a mistake, or sensible and merciful and at the same time frank to admit error.

The State of Washington seems to fear for its dignity. But dignity suffers only through blindness or ignorance or wilful injustice. And dignity is nothing against the spectacle of a boy deprived of his parents, of parents deprived of their child, when they are willing and eager and capable of bringing him up as a useful, intelligent citizen and an honest man.

What the European Public Wants

The same scene the next day when new rumors about the new Ford car are announced.

It Seems To Heywood Broun

THE trouble with college football is the amateur spirit. I am starting off with the assumption that present conditions in the game are less than ideal and undoubtedly a majority will agree that the barring of Bruce Caldwell from the Yale team was an unfortunate and silly performance. His offense against established standards was technical. Both Harvard and Princeton invited Yale to waive the rule under which he was dropped from the squad. He had, as you remember, played a few minutes of freshman football at Brown and therefore could not represent the Blue in either of its final contests. The athletic authorities at New Haven chose to adopt a legalistic attitude in the face of the situation.

"Rules are rules and must be enforced," said the members of the governing committee. Whether the first stone was thrown by a man with a flask or without one the newspaper reports failed to mention. The philosophy that rules must be enforced simply because they happen to be set down upon some parchment is always unfortunate. The world will not profit if men come out of Yale and apply this principle to the multitudinous facts of national life. It is my experience that the introductory remark, "This is a government of laws not men," nearly always precedes some iniquitous proposal.

But any attempt to follow out this particular point would necessitate a file of dissenting decisions by liberal justices. Let us merely confine ourselves to the more simple proposition that amateur sport practically always entails the creation of codes of practice. There is always the elaborate set of specifications defining just what constitutes an amateur, and regulations invariably breed like rabbits. Back in the bad old days the colleges were only slightly concerned with the antecedents of any talented player. If he could kick or plunge or skirt an end nobody cared to question by just what process he had arrived at that particular institution of learning. There are still freebooting colleges which expect a coach to arrive each autumn bringing behind him the nucleus of a successful eleven, but it was many years ago that the mentor of a well-known team made the famous remark, "In the second half we had to use two students."

Even in our own day [illegible] attributing the falling football fortunes of Yale to growing enthusiasm for Phi Beta Kappa. I believe that college football was a far less menacing factor in educational life when professionalism was regarded lightly. This may need a bit of developing. My theory is that football is an excellent pastime for those who watch and a dreary, bruising bore for all the players. In many conversations with a large number of former varsity athletes I have found not more than two or three who enjoyed their days spent on the eleven. To be sure, a few spoke gratefully of the manner in which the game had helped them in the bond business and a number felt that the sport served to build character. However, I am speaking of enjoyment, and I have a suspicion that any person who has been mauled by some experience must almost inevitably try to ease the sting of his wounds by pretending that his suffering made in some way for righteousness.

Obviously football fails as recreation for those who serve it. A candidate for an eleven spends only a small proportion of his working time at the game itself. To practice tennis it is customary to play tennis. The mechanical opponent invented by La Coste is still a rarity. Drills for basketball, hockey, and baseball consist largely of scrub encounters. This is not true of football. Stars are far too precious to risk them very much in scrimmage, and so football practice consists of many tiresome hours spent in tag drills, running through signals, tackling the dummy, and other kinds of manual labor. And after hours there are chalk talks and lectures on tactics which can hardly be much more fun than courses in anthropology or medieval history. The old game was less dependent upon tactics. Sheer power was enough, and though the boys went back to their rooms aching in joint and muscle no great tax had been put upon the mind of any player.

Today a football season is arduous enough to endanger the academic integrity of any but the most brilliant students. The men who can learn much in a little time get through their courses but naturally not unmarred. In this situation it seems to me that professorial practice represents an extraordinary and topsy-turvy attitude. The boys who fail in examinations are barred from play. It is their betters who are permitted to make the sacrifice for dear old Harvard. No one should be allowed to play college football until he has proved beyond question that his mental attainments are not significant.

Professionalism would solve this difficulty. If all the members of an eleven were students by courtesy alone, the standard of learning in the college would not suffer by their participation. When the last whistle blew these hand-picked representatives of alma mater could hibernate until the following season. Naturally there would be no three-year rule or any regulation barring transfers. Under such a system tradition would have room to flourish and it is easy to imagine the adoration with which the undergraduate would point to Biff or Slogger who had grown gray in the service of Yale as fullback. Even today it seems a pity when the ban comes down upon some brilliant star who has no talent except to squirm and keep on going in a broken field. Since there is distinctly an aesthetic value in the spectacle it seems a shame that brilliant practitioners should be compelled to return once more to the ranks of the humdrum.

Football is maintained chiefly to please and excite the alumni, and a number of excellent college presidents have been broken because they failed to supply the graduates with a winner. But surely it is the duty of an educator to educate and not to keep an eye peeled for a good roving center. Give the game bodily over to the alumni and let them club together and provide a football team. If it fails they will have no one but themselves to blame, and there will be no more talk of dwindling endowments because the president has failed to attract material for a successful eleven. If Princeton paid a living wage there could be no possible objection to having the Tigers tour the country as widely as they pleased to spread the culture of that institution. Many a big Eastern university is well aware of the advertising value of victories upon far-distant gridirons. However, you will find few in authority willing to be frank in admitting as much.

With teams composed of mature men drawing adequate compensation there would be an end of all silly bickering about unnecessary roughness. A man on salary respects the dignity of his own health and that of his opponents and will make no useless tackles beyond the sidelines or heave himself upon some foeman who is already downed. Clean, hard, and skilful football might be expected from men allowed to develop team-work over a span of ten or twelve seasons. Furthermore, the game would be enlivened by the chance of promotion. No good running back would need spend all his athletic years in the obscurity of Geneva or Grove City.

It does not seem to me that undergraduate or even graduate enthusiasm would be dimmed too much by the fact that mercenaries occupied the pivotal positions. As far as football goes a red shirt should be ample to make any player a Harvard man. In one respect I will admit there might be a slackening in emphasis. No harm is done by having the sixty or seventy thousand spectators grow delirious during the entire duration of four periods, but reasonable objection can be made to the fact that college frenzy begins long before the big game and lasts well beyond its finish. Professionalism should tend to restore proper perspective. Under such circumstances excitement ought to diminish very rapidly after the spell of the actual spectacle was ended.

In this Utopia I picture rival undergraduates meeting without recrimination or souvenirs from goal posts.

"You beat us fair and square," says Harvard '49 to Tiger '50. "That left halfback is the fastest man I ever saw to start and harder still to stop."

"Well," says Tiger '50 with cheerful pride unscarred by swank, "he ought to be good—he cost us $15,000."

Presidential Possibilities

II

Alfred E. Smith

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

The second in a series of studies of the candidates

"WOULD you vote for a Tammany Hall roughneck like 'Al' Smith? Would you have 'Al' spitting tobacco juice about the White House as he does in the Governor's room at Albany? Do you believe in electing to the Presidency a man who drinks too much for his own good, and is politically a rampant Wet? Would you vote for a Catholic in the White House ? Do you believe in having as President a man who boasts that he has never read a book? Would you place in his hands the critical foreign affairs of this country when he does not know the difference between Albania and Abyssinia, or Angora and Anatolia? Can't we find a single gentleman in all America to grace the White House?"

These are the questions one hears whenever Alfred Smith's candidacy for the Presidency is discussed among the privileged and the prosperous. You cannot listen to them without becoming convinced that Governor Smith, if nominated by the Democrats next June, will become the acid test of our democracy. To millions his religion will be a fatal bar; to millions more his opposition to prohibition will be unforgivable. To multitudes of others "Al" Smith is still a Tammany heeler wearing a brown derby on one ear with a cigar in one corner of his mouth, who by dint of the aid of Tammany Hall has succeeded in having himself elected Governor of New York no less than four times; reluctantly only do they concede his ability, his industry, his extraordinary talent for administration. They are unmoved by the fact that "Al" Smith's appeal is to the common people of Abraham Lincoln; they want in the White House what is known as a gentleman, a Wilson, a Taft, a Roosevelt. They are not willing to grant that Alfred Smith is by every precedent and tradition as much entitled to the highest office in the land as was Andrew Jackson, the frontier bully, cock-fighter, and duelist; or Andrew Johnson, the trader who never learned to read or write until he was married; or James A. Garfield, who drove a mule-team and steered a canal boat on an Ohio canal. For generations we have boasted that any child born under the American flag could rise to the Presidency if he merited it. The equality of opportunity in America, the ability of the lowliest born to achieve fame and fortune have been our stock in trade; they are our most-often cited arguments against any change in the society or government which we have.

How many of us are ready for an unread and uncultured man in the White House? Well, let us not spend much time on the fact that he has come up from the sidewalks of New York. That story is, as I have said before, worn threadbare; "Al" Smith himself has doubtless had enough of it. The man himself is simple, boyish, straightforward, and fascinating. He has a keen mind and he has wit and humor; he often sparkles—when not speaking as an official. He has Lincoln's understanding of the plain people they both sprang from, and he, too, frequently makes a point by a story which brings a laugh and goes home. He can sing a popular song and dance a few steps with all the zest of life that marked him when he was still on the sidewalks and a "parlor entertainer." He has a rare genius for friendship. More than that, he has a native common sense to guide him where the sophisticated so often fail—it has not been educated out of him—and he has a heart besides. Why was it that a murderer condemned to death had his sentence commuted although not a soul appeared before the Governor to ask for his life? Because to the Governor that fact made it seem his especial duty to inquire into the case. If the man had no friends then the Governor must be his public defender, must be doubly certain that no error of justice could come to pass. So personally he inquired into the facts and personally he decided that the man should not die.

It is not difficult to appeal to his sympathies, and yet the man who sits behind the Governor's desk at Albany is no soft and malleable person. Like many another man in public life he has grown harder with each year, and is often irritable. He is developing the impatience of the man who is master of his job and finds it harder and harder to put up with the ineptitudes, the fumbling, and the dulness or selfishness of the stream of persons who come to him for every conceivable purpose. He can do and still often does an extremely kindly act—even for a man he dislikes. But his glance is more steely, his determination more fixed. He can still tell a funny story, but when he ends it and becomes the Governor again he is the hard-bitten public official, with deep lines in his face and all the dignity and self-possession and self-confidence that anybody need have either in or out of the White House. He has his play hours, he can unbend, but the years of office-holding and of exercising great authority are leaving their marks. When he hits out now he hits straighter and harder than ever, as his political adversaries know well.

Never before has the business of the State marched along as under Governor Smith. He has worn himself out on it; it is the breath of his body; the life of his soul. It fascinates him beyond anything else. A public document is his novel; a complicated set of figures entertains him more than a theater. An extraordinarily retentive memory makes it possible for him to get up on his feet and be cross-examined as to the business of the State for hours on end without ever making a slip or hesitating for a figure. He works early and he works late; he knows where to get his material and he knows just whom to turn to in order to have that material put into the best shape for his use. He knows how to listen, and he will adopt without hesitation, in their entirety, suggestions that come to him from men and women whom he completely trusts. Public life has been his high school, his college, his post-graduate course, and when a supreme test came to him in the Constitutional Convention in New York in 1915 he proved how well he had learned. There were great public men, distinguished lawyers, and scholars in that convention, but "Al" Smith, the product of Tammany Hall, outshone them all. More than that, he has graduated from the sophistries and the bunk of the ordinary politician. He spoke with amazing frankness in that Constitutional Convention. He often deliberately pokes fun at men in public life, exposes their absurdities and hypocrisies with all that flair for acting which has been his since the days of early youth. His devotion to his task is beyond all question. He has been for years planning for the Presidency, but he has been shrewd enough to see that the best way to move in that direction was to be the best possible Governor of New York, and he has publicly scorned those of his predecessors who tried to be Governors of New York when they had their eyes riveted upon the White House. This is the man who has such a hold upon the voters of the State of New York that he has only to express his opposition to a constitutional amendment to have it snowed under by more than a half million votes, who can be Governor of New York as long as he wishes to. He has won the confidence of the great mass of Republicans and Democrats, and he has merited it. He has been the best Governor, all in all, that New York has ever had.

Let us go back to our questions. Does "Al" drink and does he drink too much? Well, I am reliably informed that he drinks every day, and the number of his cocktails and highballs is variously estimated at from four to eight. It is positively denied that he is ever intoxicated, much gossip to the contrary notwithstanding. He is a Wet, and he lives up to it, and for that consistency he is to be praised. Every journalist knows dozens of nauseating political hypocrites who will go before any W. C. T. U. meeting, eulogize the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Act, and then go and get drunk a few doors away; every journalist knows Senators and Congressmen who "vote Dry and drink Wet" wherever they happen to be; who, like the eminent Warren G. Harding, will uphold the cause of temperance and indulge in hard liquor to the wee sma' hours. One may differ with "Al" Smith on his attitude toward prohibition, but no one can call him a hypocrite. One may regret with all one's heart, as does the writer of these lines, that, being in an exalted position, he cannot set an example of abstinence to the millions whose State he governs, but at least one knows where he stands. If there be any Progressive who puts the prohibition issue above all others he will, of course, vote against "Al" Smith, and by the same test he ought to vote against a large majority of our politicians—"Wet" and "Dry."

Could I vote for a Catholic for the Presidency? I certainly could and I certainly have voted for Catholics for lesser offices, and to the best of my ability I propose to repel, wherever I can, as utterly unworthy of America, the suggestion that a man's religion has anything whatsoever to do with his fitness for the Presidency or for any other office. If there are persons so small as to believe that a vote for Smith is a vote for the Pope when Smith's cabinet at Albany at this moment contains only one Catholic to thirteen Protestants and one Jew, they belong in the class with those who still believe that women are nationalized in Russia, and that the Jews are organized in a gigantic conspiracy to control the world and to commit ritual murders on the sly. One may search "Al" Smith's record at Albany from end to end only to find that if anything he has leaned backward so far as his co-religionists are concerned. The Republicans, having tried their utmost for years to find something damaging to Alfred Smith, have never yet dared to insinuate that in choosing men and women for office he has been influenced by the religion they profess.

The Catholic church blunders almost as badly in our politics as does the more powerful Methodist church. It has cardinals and archbishops who are stupid enough to dabble in politics and so afford ammunition to those who are determined that no Catholic shall ever enter the White House. But the average plain American, if he believes in fair play and a square deal, will never be kept from voting for "Al" Smith because he grew up in the Catholic church. The final proof of this is that in a Presidential year, 1920, he won a million more votes in New York State than did the Protestant Democratic candidate for the Presidency.

Well, what are the policies for which Governor Smith has stood at Albany? They are unquestionably progressive ones. One often doubts when one reads his solemn, conventional strictures upon bolshevism and socialism, notably that at Cornell in 1919, whether he really knows how far-reaching some of his own recommendations are, whether he has the faintest idea as to what socialism really is. I have frequently quoted from his annual message to the Legislature in January, 1920, the following nine recommendations:

1. A minimum wage.
2. The eight-hour day for all women workers.
3. Maternity insurance for expectant mothers.
4. The extension of workmen's compensation to cover occupational illnesses and accidents.
5. The appointment of State physicians and nurses in rural communities now destitute of medical aid, in cooperation with those communities.
6. The ownership, development, and operation of all water-powers in the State.
7. State-owned and operated grain elevators in three cities, after the manner of the Nonpartisan League experiments in North Dakota.
8. Control and supervision of the entire milk supply of the City of New York on the theory that every child is as much entitled to pure milk as to pure air and pure water.
9. The municipal operation of public utilities.

This from a man who declares: "I am unalterably opposed to the fundamental principles of the Socialist Party!" Of these nine proposals, four have actually been accepted by the State.

Some of these recommendations go further than those of any socialistic platform I can remember, especially his insistence that the State guarantee to the child as pure milk as he is now—supposedly—guaranteed pure water and fresh air. It is perfectly obvious that if a Eugene Debs or a Victor Berger had offered a platform like this, the great New York dailies would have rent him limb from limb for his dangerous radicalism. Think of that suggestion of "Al's" that the State begin the socialization of the medical and nursing professions by taking over the doctors and nurses to supply the communities that are without them! Isn't that dangerously socialistic? As for his recommendation of State grain elevators, that came first when the New York Times and our other great journalistic saviors of society were denouncing the North Dakota Nonpartisan League for building warehouses and grain elevators and otherwise putting the government into private business; yet no one denounced Smith. Viewed from the standpoint of the days of Grover Cleveland, Alfred E. Smith is a dangerous radical.

Adequately to set forth the progressive measures he has sponsored in addition to those mentioned above, would take almost an entire issue of The Nation. He has from the beginning fought for better working conditions for men, women, and children. His greatest opportunity to improve working conditions came in consequence of the Triangle factory fire with its terrible sacrifice of 145 girls' lives. The Legislature constituted an investigating commission of which the present Senator Wagner and "Al" Smith were the chief and the most useful political members. In consequence the session of 1913 was marked by the passage of an unprecedented number of labor bills, epoch-making in their improvement of labor conditions in the Empire State. Smith not only sponsored these bills but fought them through the Legislature. As a result the State Federation of Labor declared: "We doubt if any State in the Union can now compare with our Empire State in its present code of labor laws." Read any one of his annual messages and it is amazing how many subjects he touches upon that relate to the social progress of the people of his State. Take that of January 6, 1926, for example. It records the fact that New York leads the country in human-welfare activities. It deals with education, public health, institutional care, conditions of employment, housing, recreation, child welfare, and the rehabilitation of the unfortunate. Through "Al" Smith's activities a hundred million will have been spent upon the institutions of the State which had been gradually falling behind the needs of the people during the administrations of his predecessors. He has consistently built for the future, especially for the ever-growing army of insane, thanks in large part to the fifty-million bond issue which he obtained from the State. It is largely because he has had to build for the past and the future that he has had so heavily to increase the expenditures of the State and has been attacked by the Republicans for his extravagance. Apropos of his financial policies the Governor annually issues a financial statement of the State's situation which is a model of clearness and compactness—comparable only to the best bank statements.

In the message of January, 1926, also he asked that the Legislature declare that labor is not a commodity and demanded a revision of the use of the injunction in labor disputes. He appealed once more for the forty-eight hour week for women and minors, and for a minimum-wage board. He asked for an extension of the emergency rent laws and set forth a plan for the solution of the tenement problem in New York City which was in large part adopted by the Legislature, with the exception of his plan for the creation of a State Housing Bank similar to the Federal Land Bank, which proved too socialistic for the Republican leaders. (But the Governor still thinks that they will have to come to it if the bad tenement is to be eradicated.) To the question of the parks he has given unending attention, and nothing is more to his credit than his refusal to allow rich property owners of tremendous political and social influence to divert him from his plan to establish State parks on Long Island—the owners of large estates did not want the "masses from New York" pouring out in their direction. He has been a genuine social crusader, and there is no doubt that this is largely due to his admirable group of advisers. It must be admitted, however, that they could have done nothing for him had he not had an open mind and a remarkably sympathetic understanding and appreciation of the needs of the people of his State. You can talk social reform to a hundred men; only those will react whose hearts and minds are attuned to the gospel preached.

Even more to Governor Smith's credit is his keeping his head during and immediately after the war. He talked of course the usual lies about the war and its aims during that struggle, but with much less hate and bitterness than did most others, and he refused to see red when the war was over. He pardoned the Communist James Larkin and other political prisoners. He opposed the stupid and un-American ousting of the Socialists from the Assembly in 1920, promptly invited them to his home and called a special election at which all of the five Socialists were re-elected. He vetoed the bill permitting teachers to be questioned regarding their loyalty and political views, with a penalty of dismissal if their views were not entirely satisfactory to their examiners, and he also vetoed a bill requiring private schools to submit their courses of study to the State for approval. He vetoed a third bill under which the Attorney General could institute proceedings before the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court against any candidate whose views he considered radical. His are admirable veto messages; there is dispute as to who wrote them, but there can be none as to the name signed to them and as to Governor Smith's entire belief in them. As Mr. Henry F. Pringle has said of them, they are statesmanlike papers and they throw much light on a side of the Governor's character which has not been sufficiently emphasized. They prove, like his opposition to a censorship—though he did sign one bill to padlock theaters producing improper plays—that he is opposed to abridgment of freedom of thought and utterance, and that he has sympathy and tolerance for views other than his own.

Finally, I must also mention his admirable water-power policy upon which he has fought all the great power combinations within the State, to prevent the exploitation by private capitalistic interests of what is the heritage of all the people. Again, he has done everything possible to develop the State Barge Canal, except to furnish the traffic that it so sorely needs to justify itself, and he has advocated whole-heartedly its use by the federal government as a part of the proposed ship canal from the Great Lakes to the sea. In all of these matters his course has been truly progressive and beyond criticism.

In conclusion, I do not urge all Progressives to support Smith. By no means. He has still much to do and much to say before Progressives can give him their complete confidence. He is still a Tammany man; against its excesses and wrongdoing in New York he never protests publicly, although he has at times used his influence to procure better nominations or to compel the Hall to indorse a bi-partisan judiciary candidate. But about the corruption of the courts and the police and the elections he has nothing to say—Tammany still steals elections with utmost brazenness. It remains an organization for public plunder. It is outwardly whiter; it has better figureheads and has drawn some fine young men into its ranks who hold the futile old idea that an organization like this may be reformed from within. It no longer waxes rich out of petty pilfering from prostitutes and gamblers and saloonkeepers and the criminals it licenses to prey upon the community; it makes its money much more easily, but on a much larger scale.

As for the prohibition issue, Governor Smith must tell the public exactly where he will stand if elected, whether he will continue to have his drinks in the White House or not, and whether he will determinedly uphold the Eighteenth Amendment. In foreign affairs he remains an unknown quantity. It is true that in 1926 he personally insisted that the Democratic State platform contain an indorsement of the World Court, and that in 1920 he made many speeches favoring Article X of the Covenant of the League of Nations and defending every part of the Wilson program, probably without much real understanding of what it was all about. But the public has a right to ask how he stands today. Will he again seek to put this country into the League? And how does he stand as to the Caribbean? Does he believe that the flag follows every American dollar across the seas and the Rio Grande? It is much to his credit that he has said apropos of Mexico: "My personal attitude is that . . . no country has the right to interfere in the internal affairs of any other country"—but that is precisely what Mr. Coolidge has said while intervening in Nicaragua and threatening to intervene in Mexico. Will Governor Smith specify his position by adding to the words quoted above "as has been done by our brutal and bloody interventions in Haiti, Santo Domingo, and Nicaragua"? Will he, too, hold to the policy of a huge army and navy when the world is sick almost beyond hope of recovery from the use of force "without stint"? Does or does he not believe in tariff reform?

As an administrator Governor Smith has no equal in America, not even in Herbert Hoover. But it is honest, radical, popular leadership that the country needs infinitely more than a great administrator in Washington. Will he always be for the people, or will he stand in the last resort with those whom Woodrow Wilson called "the bosses and their masters, the great capitalists"? What guaranty is there that he whom the corporations have regarded so complacently in New York, whom Wall Street has never feared, will become the regulator of big business? He has never formulated any deep-lying political philosophy. Doubtless he will be taught much, particularly about foreign affairs, before the convention meets, but he cannot quickly acquire the background of experience and the personal knowledge of the national and international events of his lifetime which is so necessary to an intelligent conduct of the affairs of the Republic.

Of all the candidates, Governor Smith on his record gives the fairest promise of progressive leadership along social and humanitarian lines. It is today, however, but a promise. Great masses of Americans, many of whom now never go to the polls, long for the coming of one more brave outspoken man, long again to "see one straightforward conscience put in pawn to win a world." These voters are to be had, but they must be convinced and won. From now until June is the Governor's opportunity to demonstrate that as he has been in New York so will he be in the nation. He in himself is to be the acid test of America's democracy.

Interior

BY DOROTHY PARKER

Her mind lives in a quiet room,
A narrow room, and tall,
With pretty lamps to quench the gloom
And mottoes on the wall.

There all the things are waxen neat
And set in decorous lines;
And there are posies, round and sweet,
And little, straightened vines.

Her mind lives tidily, apart
From cold and noise and pain,
And bolts the door against her heart,
Out wailing in the rain.

"Mother Metropolitan"

By G. FINDLEY WILLISON

> I believe in unions and strikes. No doubt they are sometimes wrong. But it is a fact that when you are in a fight, combatants are not to be separated by saying some are sheep and some are goats.

THIS handsome statement was made some time ago by President Haley Fiske, of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, but in the present efforts of the Bookkeepers, Stenographers, and Accountants Union to organize the 10,000 clerical workers in the Metropolitan's home offices in New York City President Fiske has discovered a "Bolshevist movement that is city-wide." In this discovery he has found adequate excuse for refusing to countenance the present effort to organize his staff. If such stale nonsense is to be dignified by serious notice, the revolutionary character of the union may be judged from its A. F. of L. affiliations. Nevertheless, his excuse, however feeble, is the nearest thing to recognition the union has yet received from the junto in command of the Metropolitan Life—which, as a "mutual" company, belongs in its entirety to policyholders, including some 17,000,000 workers and members of their families.

But it is the misfortune of these policyholders, and perhaps also the misfortune of Metropolitan employees, that their control over company management cannot even be fairly described as nominal. This has been sharply pointed out by so conservative a critic as Insurance Superintendent Beha of New York who has recommended legislation to give at least the State a voice in mutual company affairs in the interests of both policyholders and the general public.

Faced with the fact that the majority of the "owners" of their company are workers, the Metropolitan managers have had good reason for not proclaiming their private opinions about union activities among their white-collar workers. Their opposition, though tacit, has been unremitting. Two years ago the Bookkeepers, Stenographers, and Accountants Union, relying upon Mr. Fiske's affirmations of the right of labor to organize and strike, sought to gain his consent for the unionization of the company's home office staff. Letter after letter from union officials went unanswered and every effort to secure a personal interview failed. Last year renewed attempts to approach Mr. Fiske met with no greater success. Last month, in a public letter to the press, the union returned again to the charge—determined to succeed at the very least in smoking out the Metropolitan and putting an end to its equivocation.

Employees have not joined the union, so Mr. Fiske declares, because of the "simple fact that they are satisfied and do not care to join." This fact is hardly credible in the light of data collected by union investigators, supported by evidence volunteered by Metropolitan employees. Salaries for a large percentage of the girl clerks start as low as $12 a week, ranging from that figure to $16 a week at the end of three years. Average typists receive from $16 to $18 a week, while bookkeepers' salaries run from $18 to $25, rising to maximum of $33 a week between their tenth and twentieth consecutive years of service.

To these salaries must be added the value of the free lunches, cheap group insurance, wholesale dentistry, and medical care—the last also provided free of charge to employees. The company also contributes an amount approximately equal to that contributed by the employees to provide a small pension for loyal workers who survive to the age of sixty-five and maintains its own sanatorium for those who break down meantime—a sanatorium which in thirteen years has had to treat more than 4,000 employees. And in addition, of course, there is the fiction which the company tries desperately to create that "Mother Metropolitan" is interested in nothing but the welfare of her charges.

This paternalism is not pure philanthropy. As proof that they are not merely indulging their natural generosity with other people's money, the officers justify the expense to policyholders by showing in dollars and cents that the welfare and uplift work more than pays for itself in more labor obtained at less cost. As for employees, this dividend-paying charity does not give the great majority of them sufficient added value to make their real wages anything like the decent living-wage minimum.

Employees have no voice in the management of the company or of their several offices. They have no appeal from summary dismissals or from arbitrary salary cuts and deductions. Extra pay for overtime work is the exception, not the rule: "Once in a while our work requires our office staff to stay half an hour or an hour after hours, but not often. When we really (!) have a volume of extra work, our employees are paid for their overtime," thus speaks Vice-President W. T. Dobbins, chief personnel officer. Above all, employees justly fear the consequences of any concerted action to modify working conditions or wage scales. What attitude would the company take toward those who joined the union? "Why, they'd lose their jobs, of course," said the secretary of Vice-President J. V. Barry.

Certainly, as Fannie Hurst has written of the Metropolitan, "It is not a pretty social picture, that of an organization dealing in billions paying out its employees in low wages camouflaged by such showy paternalism as wholesale dentistry and the mid-day meal thrown in free." And "dealing in billions" is no figure of speech. With more than $13,500,000,000 of life insurance in force, the company has no serious rival in its own field. More, the Metropolitan probably stands today as the world's largest and richest financial institution of any kind, as has been claimed by Mr. Fiske. On December 31, 1926, according to the State Insurance Department's official report, its total admitted assets had reached the staggering sum of $2,108,000,000—nearly equal to a tenth of the combined resources of national banks in the United States, Alaska, and Hawaii.

The company's total gross income last year exceeded half a billion—$595,596,500. Per working day during 1926 it received gross revenues of $2,500,000; it paid to policyholders or added to reserves $1,405,000; it wrote $9,940,000 of new business; it increased its assets $835,000. On its books were 34,240,000 policies, both "ordinary" and "industrial." In the latter class are included all policies for less than $1,000 with premium payments arranged on a weekly or monthly basis to suit the purse and convenience of workingmen. There were more than 17,200,000 such industrial policyholders, who paid gross premiums last year of $241,830,400. Gross premium income from all policyholders totaled $492,270,500.

And after more than adequate reserves had been established and allowances made for any and all liabilities, as the company is legally required to do under the supervision of the State Insurance Department, the Metropolitan closed its books last year with a surplus of $122,236,000.

In no business is a reasonable reserve more necessary than in the life insurance business—but there is no need, as a mere glance at the Gain and Loss Exhibit of the various companies over a period of years will show, for the large surplus being accumulated under one heading or another by the mutual companies today. This overgrown surplus could be used (1) to pay company employees a decent money wage and (2) to reduce the cost of insurance to policyholders.

Again, mutual companies each year pay policyholders what they call "dividends" which are nothing more than a partial return of premium overcharges. Last year the Metropolitan paid policyholders more than $52,000,000 in such returns—the size of these returns from year to year depending upon investment income, mortality savings, and the actual cost of operating the company. Against these so-called dividends could most properly be charged any added cost of operating the company on a living-wage basis.

In contrast with its labor policy, which is "economical" with a vengeance, the Metropolitan's policy in other particulars seems somewhat extravagant, as revealed in the Insurance Department's report.

Last year, in salaries and all other compensation to officers and home office employees, the company paid out $13,560,000. Approximately $1,940,000 of this amount was paid in salaries alone to 178 officers, including all those in or above the $5,000 salary class. This left a sum of $11,620,000, slightly more than five times that paid to 178 individuals, for distribution among some 10,000 other home office officials and employees below the $5,000 salary mark. As this class included large numbers of relatively well-paid section chiefs, supervisors, speed-up experts, etc., what was left for thousands of plain honest workers is conjectural.

These individual salary items, more particularly, also appear: Haley Fiske, president, $150,000 per annum; Haley Fiske, Jr., divisional sales manager, $40,360 (including commissions); Archibald F. C. Fiske (another son), third vice-president, $27,000; Frederick H. Ecker, vice-president, $125,000; Frederic W. Ecker (son), assistant treasurer, $20,000; then, running far behind Messrs. Fiske and Ecker come three vice-presidents at $39,000 each per annum, another executive at $36,000, another at $35,000, another at $32,500, still another at $31,000, and on their heels a panting phalanx of sixteen struggling upward from the $20,000 mark. Altogether, in salaries alone, twenty-seven company officers collected $944,575 last year for managing the affairs of the Metropolitan, a sum which exceeded by many thousands the $913,980 spent by the company to provide more than 10,000 people with some 3,120,000 lunches during the year.

Among the company's general disbursements are listed these interesting items: $37,650 for service medals, presumably to improve the morale if not the pay of weary veterans; $137,993.35 for conventions; $11,060 for "legislative expenses" (unspecified); $30,000 to the Association of Life Insurance Presidents, organized after the insurance scandals of 1906 to improve the moral and social tone of the business and do its official lobbying.

If the policy of the Metropolitan is not one of ruthless exploitation of its white-collar workers, President Fiske and his board of directors might make a start in the right direction by applying to the salaries of their worst-paid workers the considerable savings brought about by reductions that readily suggest themselves in many items of overhead, including officers' salaries.

The Passport Nuisance

By EZRA POUND

"THE American people does not think." Very well, no mass of 120,000,000 people ever has thought; it takes but the most rudimentary knowledge of crowd-psychology, unanimism, etc., to know that thought does not occur in such aggregates. Why expect our nation to surpass, all so easily and so undesigningly, the records of the past and "great nations of antiquity"?

"The American people does not remember." Another age-old quality or defect of the populace, the traditional populace. Americans under thirty do not remember pre-war Europe, for the natural reason that they mostly never saw it; and in consequence they cannot be expected to become especially enraged over particular imbecilities that have developed in Europe since 1914 or 1918.

Elder American tourists have not all of them been in Europe before; and we are, let us suppose, the most patient and nebulous race of beings that have ever moved on this planet. The majority of tourists appear to believe that European conditions were always as bad as they now are; their historic perspective does not reach back to, let us say, the causes of Wilson's first election. We are, as a nation, educated to look not to the past but the future; as the simple-minded freshman is told to look up—while you slip a bit of ice down the front of his collar.

The post-war annual exodus to Europe is divisible roughly into three or four parts: (1) The studious, I mean the young, actively acquisitive explorers; (2) the cultural, I mean the patient old ladies who have been saving up for some time; (3) the drunks (a post-war phenomenon—this—in any such quantity as to demand special treatment), and (4) the shoppers. I suppose these are all particularly patient classes. The old ladies have learned patience; the young are still accustomed to being interfered with by college deans and other such formenifera; the drunks are so relieved by the prevalence of certain facilities that they are ready to put up with anything; the shoppers are notably idiots, and besides they usually have attendants to take trouble for them. (So also have the envoys of the Standard Oil and other legendary monsters with whom the bureaucracy distinctly does not monkey.)

While Europe still "groaned under tyranny" I wandered about the face of this continent, I went on foot into its by-ways for sixteen years with no "papers," that is to say with no brass checks, no government's petty officials' permission, nothing in fact, but for one year (1911, I think it was) an unstamped membership card to the Touring Club de France, and a tin button of that fraternity which helped me to get into a small inn at Chalus when covered with twenty miles of mud.

This comfortable period is "over"; not permanently, if I can help it, but at any rate suspended; and this suspension has continued for six or eight years too long. To trace the remote causes of any ill odor is a thankless task, especially if the search reveal such national treasures and sources of civic pride as the late Bryan, the late Wilson, and the unfortunately still extant personnel of the United States Department of State. It is, alas, almost wholly forgotten that Bryan gave Wilson to America; and that Wilson subsequently introduced into international affairs an academic mind; a mind used not to dealing with adults, but to administering petty formalities to an adolescent scholastic body. And whatever ultimately be said by Mr. Wilson's apologists, and whatever final praise be given to his aims and aspirations, there remains at least one private conviction that during his rule the civic organization of America suffered very great damage; that the individual welfare of the citizen went by the board; that the powers of all classes of officials were extended beyond the limits of decency, and beyond limits compatible with the permanent safety of the commonwealth.

Yes, these are very large words. Let 'em stand. What, gentle reader, are bureaucrats? Hired janitors who think they own the whole building. The French, being more given to speculation than we, have recently produced several students of bureaucracy, several authors who have studied the fonctionnaire as one studies other poisonous insects, and even tried to explain and account for his actions, his inhibitions. The result is not encouraging. One can sympathize with a tyrant, led on by some megalomania or some dream of ultimate benefit to the race or some decoration of his own personal glory; one can sympathize with the crook who does it for excitement, or the poor devil who steals to feed himself or his family; but for the rond-de-cuir who sits in an office devising, in perfect safety, some inane means of annoying others, one can have no tolerance.

Mr. Wilson might have made a fairly successful Emperor of Byzantium; in the year 853 few of his habits would have greatly annoyed the populace of that city. But a President who exceeds his functions naturally encourages the small fry to follow suit. There had been, before Wilson's election, very few Democrats; the supply for normal appointees was short, and for the abnormal war demands, still shorter. The war produced, if not a new ruling class, at least a new zealous bossiness.

I had my first meeting with the new civic order during the armistice. I was living in London. I was told that I "could not go to France unless I had business." I naturally had business. I received a lot of other improbable information from the under-sub-vice-assistant. My wife could not possibly accompany me unless she were ill. I naturally produced doctors' certificates. I could not move about in France; I must go to one place and stay there. At this point I was rescued by an elderly intelligent official from another department who took two hours off and swore to several contradictory statements in a manner showing great familiarity with the mind-ersatz of officialdom.

I went to France. When I got to Toulouse I found, as I had suspected, that the under-sub-vice-assistant's information was false. The young chap at the mairie told me I could do as I liked, and that I was free to walk into the Pyrenees. A few miles from the Spanish border an officer on horseback rode up behind me and asked where was I going. I said "Mt. Segur." He said "All right, go there. I am looking for French deserters."

This was, you perceive, before the so-called Peace of Versailles, and before all Europe had gone crazy over formalities. I had no trouble till I got back to Paris and entered the American consulate. There the vice-assistant-second-sub categorically forbade me to return to my home in London. I said: "I live there," and suggested that he ask the assistant-first-vice or some one higher up concerning the regulations. He disappeared behind a partition, and returned with a request that I "get a letter" from my employer, evidently knowing no strata of life save one where everyone has an employer. It was next suggested that I find some sort of "reference" for myself. Every American I had known in Paris before the war had left. I knew no one save the Ambassador whom I had met two days before. I thought vaguely that he might have other things to do—at that particular time—than look after passports. However, I stepped into a taxi and drove round to the embassy. The embassy dealt with the consulate, and I proceeded about my lawful occasions.

That was 1919, and Europe was, confessedly, in a mess, and errors might be exceptions. But what in heaven's name has that temporary confusion to do with 1924, 1925, 1926, 1927? What has it to do with the unending boredom of waiting an hour, a half-hour, three hours, in countless bureaus, for countless useless visas, identities, folderols?

England is not richer than we are; England is not less exposed to the immigration of undesirable units. The British passport costs seven shillings, sixpence (less than two dollars); it is good for seven years. Visas to other countries have either been mutually abolished or their cost reduced to a trifle.

The American official and executive group does not desire the comfort and convenience of the American individual. And what is more, we have one of the clumsiest systems of communication between individuals, and unorganized groups of individuals, that exists in any allegedly representative government. Apart from our tendency to put up with anything, and our instilled duty to be humorous instead of taking action, the normal American has no idea whatsoever as to how he should or can deal with any executive infamy. That, I take it, is part of the price we pay for having our national capital tucked away in a corner. The English who do most things badly are at least able to get at their rulers. Someone takes little Whiff or old Jiblet out on a golf-links and wrings his figurative neck; someone knows so-and-so and the matter gets a few moments' attention. Anything causing inconvenience to ten or twenty thousand literate people can be got on the floor of the House of Commons in, I should say, forty-eight hours. In the United States this could only happen if the issue affected some very large organized business.

Our ideal public servant was given a one-column-wide, four-inch newspaper boost some months ago: "Aged 70 and a bachelor, has not taken a vacation for 20 years, has never indulged in sports or other games, but occasionally enjoyed a good cigar."

I have left out the international aspects of the passport nuisance. The mass of mutual irritation between individuals of one state and officials of another ought to be weighed; but for the space of this article I have tried to consider only the relation of the American to his own government, and more particularly the government's attitude to the individual, as summed up let us say by a little dialogue between one American in England and his consul.

The American, gently: "Forty dollars is a bit heavy for passport and visa fees on a little journey of six weeks."

Consul: "Aw! We dun' care wether yuh trevul er not."

In the Driftway

DURING one of the Drifter's visits to Russia he was walking on the steppe beside the muddy river Kuma, when he saw a red rooster for the first time. If he were pressed the Drifter would have to admit that he had seen the species red rooster at other times and places; yet he repeats that he saw it that day for the first time, displayed against its right and inevitable background. It was in the mud season between winter and spring, after the snow had left the steppe and before the tulips have sprung up among the wheat, when the great plain is a flat sea of sticky, black ooze. Here and there rise out of it villages consisting of rows of identical huts, also made of mud. Occasionally a peasant is to be seen moving about on it, but not unless his errand is unavoidable, for the task of lifting a foot from the ground is too painful to repeat often. The peasants sit by their stoves at this season and make toys and embroideries and look out of their doorways, or if they are very rich, their windows, only to see if the mgla or cloud-ceiling shows signs of lifting. And they might look out to see a neighbor or a red rooster.

THE tail of the rooster which the Drifter saw for the first time was curved like a fountain, and made of long, supple feathers in a rusty shade of red. His throat was sleekly furred with tiny feathers overlaid like tiles, in a proud arched line. His rose-red crest made a dissonance with the russet which was arresting and oddly pleasing, always against the neutral monotone of the steppe. He strutted along beside the winding fissure of the Kuma, on slender red feet that hardly pricked the mud, arrogantly conscious of dominating the landscape and of being the father of Russian art.

LOOKING around for [illegible] to a question, the first mujik artist might have seen mountains and waterfalls, but not unless he lived in the Caucasus. He might have seen flowers and birds, but he would have had no time to paint their pictures, seeing them in the summer when he was busy with his crops. In the season when he had most time to spare for kustarni or handicraft, he would not have found a bit of life anywhere except his own domestic animals, and the only spot of color in his existence would have been his red rooster. So he painted the rooster on his wooden boxes, and his wife embroid red the rooster on her towels and iron-pieces in various poses—parading the ridge-pole of the cottage, extending a foot in a commanding gesture, wings spread in flight. All this was in crude scarlet and black—it was peasant art.

NOW mount a few degrees in the scale of evolution. Look at the paintings of sophisticated Russian artists. What distinguishes them most strikingly from their counterparts in other countries? Their frequent juxtaposition of orange-red and rose, their swirling curves and spirals—the colors of the rooster on the steppe and the lines of his plumage. Other subjects by this time have taken their share of the field, but the rooster motif recurs through painting and literature and even music. The Coq d'Or symbolized nothing less than the sun; the related fable of the Firebird ran through stories and songs before it became Strawinski's famous ballet. Other countries, too, have roosters, the Drifter admits; there are French national emblems and chanteclers and Spanish cock-fights. But there is something thrifty and domestic about a French chantecler, something brutal and perverted about a fighting-cock. Nowhere else does the bird dominate with such pomp and dignity, yes, majesty, as in Russia. THE DRIFTER

The New Pacifism

On Irish Films

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. Broun condemns the protest against screen caricatures of the Irish race because no other race has objected to ridicule. Does it follow that, because my neighbor refrains from protesting against damage done his property by ruffians, I must be condemned when I protest against damage to mine?

He condemns the protest because Irishmen of a past generation seemed to enjoy the sentimental, totally unreal stage Irishman of the Chauncey Olcott type, preferring it to the drunken pig-in-the-parlor stage-Irishman of an earlier period, now being revived on the screen in such productions as "The Callahans and the Murphys." But the Olcott characters were a [illegible]ed improvement upon their predecessors.

Finally, Mr. Broun condemns the protest on the ground that Irish-Americans protested violently against "The Playboy of the Western World," pronounced by the critics a masterpiece, upon its first presentation and then did not protest when the play was revived. But this is not unusual in the history of literature. The critics might even flatter themselves that they had educated public taste!

Mr. Broun has overlooked the salient feature of this protest. While our writers may, at times, depict other nationalities as vulgar, stupid, or brutal, all Irish characters are represented as being abnormal or subnormal. They may be sentimental fools or vicious fools, but never normal human beings. What [illegible]ular writer would depict his Irish characters otherwise than [illegible]ntric, asinine, ignorant, or vulgar?

If by their protest this committee can rid the stage and screen of even a modicum of the banalities, vulgarities, and indecencies with which a tame, submissive public has too long been flooded it deserves the heartfelt gratitude of every American who seeks entertainment not filth in the theater.

Our Passion for Arbitration

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: At the time when the League World Court was under discussion in the Senate of the United States there was a great deal said as to an alleged vital difference between arbitration on the one hand and the judicial settlement of international disputes on the other. It was vigorously maintained in certain quarters that arbitration was a process resembling compromise and that "judicial settlement" was the only royal road to the reign of law. It was further maintained that the Permanent Court of Arbitration at the Hague was the representative merely of "arbitration" (that is, of compromise), whereas the new League World Court had emerged into the clear sunlight of "judicial settlement."

Dismissing and admitting all claimed judicial merits for the Permanent Court of International Justice, it becomes interesting now to note the definition given to "arbitration" by the Inter-American International Commission of Jurists in its report on "public international law" to be presented to the Pan-American Conference at Havana next January.

In Project Twelve of this report, Article 19, I find the following statement:

> Arbitration has for its object the legal solution of conflicts by means of judges chosen by the interested states.

I note with interest the word "legal." I note with equal interest the word "judges." The eminent jurists of the United States and of the Latin American countries who produced this report did not say that arbitration was a give-and-take solution nor did they say that the arbitrators were horse-traders. They called the arbitrators judges and they gave to the process of arbitration the quality of law.

They then, in Article 22, make the following statement:

> The permanent tribunal of arbitration, organized in conformity with the provisions of the "Convention for Pacific Settlement" of the Hague of 1907, shall be competent for all cases of arbitration.

In other words, arbitration is law and the Permanent Court of Arbitration is a tribunal for settlement by law.

I make two deductions:

1. We Americans do not need to go to the Permanent Court of International Justice to get law.

2. Since we do not hasten to the Permanent Court of Arbitration to get it for any of our difficulties, we indicate clearly that our interest in it is thoroughly academic.

Ocean

By THOMAS HORNSBY FERRIL

Then laying seven pencils parallel
Beside her notebook in the desk, she slipped
Into the noon; twelve brazen hours fell
From a successful tower on the tight-lipped
Thing of the earth who walked until she dipped
One slipper and the other in the sea
At evening.
"O great Ocean, I have kept
Silk on my thighs and ribbon on my knee
And moved through afternoon as quietly
As any cloudy bird and I am here
To meet no lover.
"Ocean, I was free to come.
"Ocean, I am afraid of fear
And came here unafraid. Why must there be
A girl who comes at evening to the sea?"

A Heavy-handed Rascal

"Boss" Tweed. By Denis Tilden Lynch. Boni and Liveright. $4.

MR. LYNCH has written an immensely readable book in relating the sinister story of Tweed's rise and downfall. After reading it, and reflecting about it, I have come to the conclusion that William M. Tweed was not the creator of his own destiny; nor a "boss" at all except in so far as he represented powerful moneyed interests in New York City politics. Behind this husky vulgarian and coarse manipulator of the people's money there are dimly defined figures of more adroit, but not less unscrupulous, personalities. Now and then they come to light for a brief moment. When the New York Times and its following began to hound Tweed out of office and into jail a committee consisting of John Jacob Astor—the largest owner of New York City real estate—and five or six other millionaires of the churchgoing, highly respectable type met to consider the state of affairs. After pawing over a few innocuous papers these pillars of society rendered a report in which they declared Tweed free of wrongdoing. They held him up to the community's eyes as a statesman of impeccable ideals and virtuous habits, though unfortunately maligned by the invidious.

That is what I have in mind when I say that Tweed was a tool rather than a boss; and in the end he was a victim.

At the time of his whitewashing by the Astor committee he was floundering in a stream of stolen loot. It was even then a notorious fact that he and his friends had taken at least thirty million dollars from the city treasury—but most of it was passed along to other and more obscure persons. Everybody knew that he was a thief; everybody knew that New York was the most corrupt municipality on the continent. Why then did the white-collar committee indorse him? The simple answer to this question is that he remitted their taxes in wholesale fashion. This was revealed—as Mr. Lynch shows—in the investigation that followed his downfall. Though he and his gang had taken thirty or forty millions—r aybe more—the ominous shadows in the background had swindled the public, through Tweed, of at least ten times that amount.

As a rascal he was both thoroughgoing and picturesque. But he failed in the more refined and artistic qualities of the grafter's profession. His methods were so crude as to border on the grotesque. For example, we find him making the city buy several hundred benches at the rather fantastic price of six hundred dollars a bench, when they were actually worth five dollars a bench. And the plastering of the new courthouse cost not less than $646,000—the contractor being one of Tweed's friends. Even worse: there were vouchers of cash paid to T. C. Cash, a name in which a pun lies concealed. In one payment the wholly fictional T. C. Cash received $64,000.

No thieving politician of today would think of such heavy-handed proceedings. There are more deft ways of going about it, but Tweed was not a slick rascal, and he disdained hypocrisy. When his peculations were exposed he said calmly: "What are you going to do about it?" Bravado, of course, for while this bold front was maintained we see his henchmen slipping around to the owners of the Times and offering to buy it at a price of five million dollars, which was probably five times more than the newspaper was worth. But the Times declined to sell.

Mr. Lynch's book is comprehensive as well as vivid and dramatic. He explains "Boss" Tweed by setting forth the life and social ideals of the time. He has, in fact, written a history of New York City in the sixties and seventies with Tweed as the central figure.

In his capacity for portraiture Mr. Lynch reaches a high degree of distinction. I thought I knew Jay Gould, for I have just finished reading a voluminous treatise on him and his financial methods, but Mr. Lynch depicts him more clearly in two or three pages than does the author of the five hundred pages I have recently read. In similar fashion he visualizes the Draft Riots of 1863, the Gold Conspiracy, James Fisk and Josie Mansfield, and most of the outstanding figures and events of the period.

This book has the three-dimensional quality which should be a characteristic of genuine biographical work. In it you see people, and not merely names and words; people who move to and fro and do things in such comprehensible fashion that we are able to understand their motives.

Tenuous Matter

The Analysis of Matter. By Bertrand Russell. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $6.

TO a sturdy common sense a naive realism has always been an adequate philosophy to live by. And if that realism was challenged it could with a dogmatic reliance on sensuous experience meet the challenge as Dr. Johnson did in his emphatic but dubious refutation of Berkeley. To such animal faith the knowledge of an external world held no mysteries and its crude realism hindered a more adequate sympathy with reality. Familiarity with the world makes it seem obvious and for common sense the obvious needs no explanation.

But if common sense has stuck too close to its perceptual data, physics in its speculative flights has almost forgotten them. Today the tenuous abstractions of physics present a world astonishingly different from the vivid natural scene unfolded in perception. Yet if the laws of physics are to be verified, it must be through a correlation of its abstractions with the more concrete elements of this perceived world. For any critique of empirical science therefore an interpretation of general laws in terms of perception becomes imperative. The works of Einstein, Weyl, and Eddington have introduced radical and paradoxical changes in such fundamental concepts as matter, causality, and space-time which the old Newtonian metaphysics cannot express adequately. The new physics demands a reconstruction in metaphysics, and Mr. Russell has made the first important step in this direction.

The problem, it is true, was recognized by such advanced thinkers as Poincaré and Mach, but they lacked the necessary technique for its solution. The more subtle apparatus of mathematical logic, whose application Russell had illustrated in his earlier work on "Scientific Method in Philosophy," supplied this technique and made Whitehead's and Russell's contributions to our subject possible.

In what is one of the most suggestive chapters of his "Scientific Method" Russell had foreshadowed much of his present analysis. Two tendencies in this most recent of Russell's philosophical attitudes unite in what has vaguely been called neutral monism. In this philosophy "matter is less material and mind less mental" than the traditional metaphysics supposes them to be. It has therefore a materialistic element most prominent in Russell's "Analysis of Mind" and an idealistic trend expressed in his "Analysis of Matter." The old sharp distinction between mind and matter is abandoned for a "neutral stuff" postulated as the stuff of reality.

Russell's materialism, however, is saved from the fallacies of the simple determinism that the seventeenth century so naively accepted, and his idealism is free of Berkeley's difficulties. On the one hand his metaphysics is not irreconcilable with the fact that for modern physics "atoms might as well be possessed of free will, limited, however, to one of several possible choices," and for him—as for Peirce—science "need not assume that there are laws everywhere." On the other hand, where for unperceived events Berkeley invoked a God, Russell appeals to the logic of a causal theory of perception.

The bald economy of that logic dispenses with many of the traditions of physics and philosophy. The principle of the conservation of mass has been invalidated by relativity physics, and Russell finally disposes of substance. It is an insubstantial matter he leaves to us, being simply a group of events ordered about a center.

> We perceive events, not substances, that is to say, what we perceive occupies a volume of space-time which is small in all four dimensions, not indefinitely extended in one dimension (time). And what we can primarily infer from percepts, assuming the validity of physics, or common sense, is groups of percepts, again not substances. It is a mere linguistic convenience to regard a group of events as states of a "thing" or "substance" or "piece of matter." This inference was originally made on the ground of the logic which philosophers inherited from common sense. But the logic was faulty and the inference is unnecessary. [illegible] a "thing" is the group of which each [illegible] has been its "states" we differ nothing in the detail of physics, and avoid an inference as precarious as it is useless.

If these conclusions seem startling when it is remembered that they are based on empirical science, it is because empirical science is still regarded by many in the light of the simple mechanism of the Greek atomists. Modern atomism, particularly as exemplified in the well-known work of Rutherford, tends to regard matter as a conceptual construction characterized by certain determinate limit numbers, such as atomic numbers. If we restrict physics and our philosophy to observable quantities—as indeed we must if our [illegible] any meaning—Russell's conclusions seem inevitable. Matter for physics and therefore for philosophy is a series of events. The persistence of "one piece of matter" throughout a series of transformations is not to be expressed on the doubtful hypothesis of the indestructibility of matter but in terms of such concepts as Minkowski's world-lines which give the spatio-temporal function of events. This leads to a view of the physical world as a logical structure having a certain kind of reality but not the reality we attribute to perceptions. The resulting philosophy is saved from extreme idealism by the postulate of the neutral stuff. It is not very clear what this neutral stuff is. Is it a Spencerian unknowable or a Kantian "ding an sich"? Or are we perhaps to identify the neutral stuff with events? One could wish that Mr. Russell had dwelt longer on this theme.

Such brief review can give but inadequate account of the depth and scope of the book. It is undoubtedly the most thorough treatment of the subject that has yet been published, and Russell's recognized familiarity with modern physics and psychology makes it also the most authentic. In this book, written before Bridgeman's recent treatise though published after it, Russell has anticipated much of the admirable work on scientific method. It is written with his usual clarity and delightful rigor.

The Strategy of Lee

An Aide de Camp of Lee. Being Papers of Colonel Charles Marshall, Military Secretary. Edited by Major General Sir Frederick Maurice. Little, Brown and Company. $3.

THE war studies of an American staff officer of our Civil War edited by an English general? It sounds fantastic. But Major General Sir Frederick Maurice is one of the best-informed students of the war between the American States—witness his admirable life of Robert E. Lee. He has now taken the unpublished papers of Lee's military secretary, Colonel Charles Marshall, and edited them into this volume dealing with Lee's most important battles and particularly with the moot points of those conflicts, General Maurice himself sitting as a judge upon Colonel Marshall's contentions. The result is an extremely valuable contribution to the literature of our Civil War, one which must find an important place in every collection dealing with that struggle. Thus, his account of what went wrong with Lee's strategy and tactics at Gettysburg is set forth for the lay reader more clearly and in briefer compass than we remember to have seen it anywhere else. General Maurice upholds Colonel Marshall in placing the blame for Lee's coming unexpectedly upon the Federals and having to fight on the terrain chosen by them upon General J. E. B. Stuart's misinterpretation of his orders, which deprived Lee's army of its eyes. Marshall's testimony tends to prove also that even under this handicap Lee could have won had his orders been correctly and promptly carried out by his corps and division commanders.

Colonel Marshall's story of the surrender at Appomattox is of course historical material of first importance, but that has, we believe, been printed before. His, and General Maurice's, interpretation of Jackson's highly successful maneuver at Chancellorsville helps to end another long controversy as to whether the credit for it belonged entirely to Jackson or to Lee. They lean to Lee. But General Maurice points out how on several occasions General Lee's failure to put his orders in writing or to make them entirely clear to his commanders was responsible for bloody and abortive attacks and lost opportunities that yielded [illegible] of decisive victories.

In a Fog

My Heart and My Flesh. By Elizabeth Madox Roberts. The Viking Press. $2.50.

THIS is one of the most beautiful books of our time—in spots. In spots it comes out into the open, it discloses a view to the mountains or down into the impenetrable valleys of the mind. And when the view seems especially superb, when the valleys are exposed most sharply, down over the scene floats a fog, a thick, syrupy fog of English style, style merely for its own sake, and life is obscured, the feel of flesh and heart is gone.

There are sharp places in the book; there is the place where the mulatto half-sister of the heroine fingers the knife with which she is about to kill her lover, when her voice and Theodosia's voice blend in a dreadful duet of death, when Theodosia will have the mulatto girl kill to avenge her own unfaithful suitor, when the song of their two voices rises above the fog and holds the reader bound and still. There is the old widowed aunt of Theodosia, living out her life in one room of her huge house, sitting all day by the hearth fire on which eight sticks of wood a day are all that is allowed, cooking coarse pones for the half mad old hounds that lie at her feet or stir about the empty house, and sleeping at night on a pile of rags in her storeroom so that her bed may be always undisturbed. There are the pure-bred cattle at the end, Betty Hawthorne the prize milker, the young bull in his prime, strong, proud, his creamy coat covering the pink of his flesh; there is Caleb at the end, offering Theodosia Betty Hawthorne for her own cow, offering her himself, his fertile acres, his neat barns; and Theodosia, while she yearns toward him, thinking of Frank, in whose arms, unresisting, passive, she had lain.

These scenes and others in the book are clear and unforgettable, but the story of Theodosia herself is not. She it is, perhaps, around whom the fog clings most closely. She never quite comes out, as her Aunt Doe does, as Lethe comes out when she holds the murderous knife. Men are said to love her but she is not lovable; she is a mummy wrapped in white wool, a mummy with thin hands and a half talent for playing the violin, a mummy without passion, without even the fear of passion. Around her visible figures move; her Aunt Doe, her philandering father, her grandfather withering by his fire, her father's bastard daughters Lethe and Americy. But where Theodosia herself should have drawn them together, where indeed she is said to draw them together, to be the center about which they revolve, she is instead hidden in the fog of wool, lifeless, incredible.

In "The Time of Man," with which this book will inevitably be compared, Miss Roberts wrote in her own particular way a magnificent symphony which had as theme the imposing figure of a woman in whom life ran richly. Her second symphony is confused. The harmonies are sound and lovely; the theme itself is blurred. And this is a pity; for when she can command it, Miss Roberts wields as strange and compelling a prose as exists today; and when, on the other hand, it escapes her, the reader is left floundering in a blanket of words.

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

A Referendum on War

Give the People Their Own War Power. By Thomas Hall Shastid. Ann Arbor, Michigan: George Wahr. $2.

"WE have tried leaving the war power with the politicians," says Dr. Shastid, "tried it for ages, and they have made this world a hell and frustrated all the higher hopes of intelligent people." Therefore, he continues, let us now take this power away from the politicians and put it into the hands of the people, where it properly belongs.

To this end our author proposes two amendments to the federal Constitution. The one declares, in effect, that neither in peace nor in war shall the United States nor any of its subdivisions or agencies give or loan any money to foreign Powers "without first submitting the question to a vote of the people" at an election especially called for this purpose. The other declares, in effect, that no war or wars shall be made or declared by the United States without the question being first submitted to a vote of the people as above described. The first few pages of the book are given up to exposition of the meaning of these amendments. The rest is devoted to an exhaustive series of questions and answers covering this and many other phases of the peace question.

Dr. Shastid's writing is clear, direct, sincere. His thesis, once vigorously supported by the late Mr. Bryan, has recently taken on a new and greater dignity through its espousal by Ambassador Houghton in his Harvard commencement address last June. Persuasive as it is, as a frank appeal to democratic responsibility, the idea still leaves us cold. For we would take away the power to make war not only from the politicians but from the people as well! A war has never seemed to us to be any more moral or any less destructive because it had popular support. Make war a crime, never lawful nor right under any circumstances, and we may get somewhere. But our rejection of Dr. Shastid's program involves no rejection of his book. Any intelligent discussion aimed at getting rid of war is valuable. In this sense, "Give the People Their Own War Power" is a welcome addition to current pacifist literature.

JOHN HAYNES HOLMES

Contemporary French Masters

Since Victor Hugo. By Bernard Faÿ. Translated from the French by Paul R. Doolin. Little, Brown and Company.

WHEN Mr. Faÿ published this work in 1925 under the title "Panorama de la littérature contemporaine," I must own I was one of the many French critics who thought that his so-called synthesis was even more incomplete than ambitious. It was impossible not to feel that when he wrote those articles Mr. Faÿ had been more eager to point out a few individual figures than to give a full historical account of the evolution of French literature during the last fifty years. Taken as a general survey, the book was always superficial and frequently incorrect in its statements. The more modest title of the American translation suits it much better; even then it must be used cautiously. Mr. Faÿ is always "authoritative"; but to produce evidence for his assertions would appear to him mere pedantry. I cannot decide if he may be believed when he speaks of "the anti-French review The Nation of New York"; I am sure he must not be trusted when he says that Taine "vulgarized" the ideas of Renan, and that "naturalism was a brief episode in our literary history," or calls Jules Romains "a brutal but gifted writer, who aimed to reveal the soul of the crowd, so dear to the naturalists, by the methods of the symbolist poet."

"Since Victor Hugo" will however be useful to the American student if he reads it as a collection of essays. The historical chapters about schools and general movements must not be taken too seriously; but the biographies of Rimbaud, Mallarmé, Barrès, Proust, Valéry, and Gide are worth reading. To those masters Mr. Faÿ gives their due tribute of admiration and his essays may stand as valuable introductions to their works. As regards our contemporaries, his last chapters show what was the price of stocks on the Paris literary 'change, two years ago. On the whole it has not altered too much, though Dada and surréalisme have not yet brought to light that "discipline of a great epoch" Mr. Faÿ praised them for.

Modern Witchcraft

The Place Called Dagon. By Herbert S. Gorman. George H. Doran Company. $2.50.

MR. GORMAN here attempts a strange and almost impossible task—the recreation in a contemporary New England environment of the malefic atmosphere of the ancient Salem witch-cults, a portrayal of the Dionysiac and insane urges that stir beneath the tight-lipped repressions of a group of New England farmers. The recent researches of Jane Murray which establish beyond doubt the actual existence of these witch-cults lend a certain air of scientific verisimilitude to this bizarre and dreadful tale. That Mr. Gorman has successfully concocted what is known technically as a "thriller" is undeniable. But the seriousness of his initial idea and the careful quality of his very distinguished prose indicate that he is trying to do much more than that, that he is endeavoring to effect in the reader that willing suspension of disbelief which is never created by the mere thriller. Herein he achieves but a partial, though considerable success. From the souls of his starved and smoldering New Englanders he draws strange and terrible things, things black and deformed—and one actually falls under the spell of his incantatory power. But that spell is too often broken by a Gothic over-plotting, a too-relentless and inclusive piling up of a Poesque atmosphere and the introduction of a rather irrelevant and unconvincing romance. Altogether a strange and original tale which is not difficult to lay down.

C. P. Fadiman

Books in Brief

Bugles in the Night. By Barry Benefield. The Century Company. $2

The story of an old veteran's Platonic and noble protection of Alice Kibbe, a helpless waif who was being thrust into dark ways. The strange pair struggle in New York and struggle in Brooklyn and have whimsical adventures even in those settings. Alice finds a curious lover and her quaint old protector dies jubilingly on the last page. The fantasy and feeling in the book are commendable, but unfortunately a little overdone.

Sir Dominy and Madame Jean and Other Tales. By Martin Armstrong. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

Properly speaking the writings of Mr. Armstrong are not short stories at all. By this is meant that Mr. Armstrong's gift is purely descriptive and that, although capable of being fanciful to extravagance, he lacks the power of imagination which can raise the narration of an incident to a revelation of life. In this latest volume, as in the others, he is uniformly successful in producing cleverly conceived and well-written sketches on a variety of themes; and yet the skill with which he carries each tale to its satisfactory conclusion cannot hide the lack of finality and authenticity in his work. Whatever pleasure the reader finds in the book is obtained through watching Mr. Armstrong start a happy connection out of the thick of experience and chase it in concentric circles until it is brought down by one of his uncommonly felicitous phrases. Nothing more deeply emotional than the hunter's instinct is stirred by the performance.

The Plague in Shakespeare's London. By F. P. Wilson. Oxford University Press. $4.25.

Not all of the plagues which visited Europe found a Boccaccio or a Defoe to keep their memory fresh. Some passed quite unchronicled by any considered writer and two of those which visited England in 1603 and 1625 received their chief treatment at the hands of the lowly journalist. Thomas Dekker, who retains just enough interest for us to enjoy the reading of his plague pamphlets. The present study was begun with the purpose of illustrating those pamphlets, but grew into a small book in which contemporary theories, methods of treatment, etc., are described along with a brief account of the course of the plague and its effect upon the imagination of Elizabethan England. The book is agreeably written, thoroughly documented, and interestingly illustrated with reproductions of old documents and prints.

Note. In Mr. Fadiman's review last week of [illegible] "Dusty Answer" appeared the words: "the soul-searching examination which is the keynote of her characters." The last word should have been "characters."

Drama

Pauline Lord

So extraordinarily vivid is the personality of Miss Pauline Lord that she renders it almost impossible to judge as a play any piece in which she happens to be appearing. She has created a character which has an independent existence apart from any of the roles which she is called upon to play; that character is one which is quite evidently an expression of her temperament; and she transfers it almost intact from play to play. She does not so much interpret as live, upon the stage at least, the character of a certain specific, tragically bewildered woman, and though she speaks the lines which the dramatist has assigned to her she seems to be enacting in an almost somnambulistic state some episodes in a dream-life of her own.

In one respect her position in our theatre—if a sufficiently grotesque comparison be permitted—not unlike that of Charlie Chaplin in the world of the cinema, since, though her plays have no more connection with one another than his scenarios have, she is, like him, so much more vivid than any of the incidents she enacts that we are not only more interested in her than in her roles but even come to feel that it is all somehow a part of the life of the same personage in spite of the fact that neither logic nor chronology would permit us to consider it all one story. Nor is, indeed, the comparison quite so grotesque as it might at first sight appear to be. A certain persistence in pathetically frustrated impulses, a certain hopeless reliance upon desperately gay little gestures, makes the figure which Miss Lord has created a sort of tragic analogue of Charlie; and though it happens that the great admiration which I have for her is hardly to be compared with my very mild appreciation of him the fact remains not only that each has created a more or less fixed, legendary figure much more solidly real than any of the stories in which it is seen, but also that the two have in common a certain engaging, incompetent good-will at the bottom of their souls. The psychology of Mr. Chaplin's creation has often been called child-like. The rapidity with which he yields to impulses and the helpless, depreciatory gesture with which he gives himself up when he has been caught in any naughtiness has been compared with the espièglerie of some ultimate child and the comparison is equally apt for that character which Miss Lord portrays. She seems a child who, with no equipment except a child's gaiety, has been called upon to function in a hard adult world and upon whom burdens too great for her to understand, much less bear, have been laid. Perhaps, indeed, it is just here that we must seek the secret of the almost unendurable pity which she awakes. There are few adults who do not feel, at times at least, that they have grown up too fast, that they have not really changed so much with the passing of the years, and that they are merely compelled to pretend a maturity and competence which they do not really feel. Much of their own predicament which they do not dare to admit they recognize in that [illegible] which Miss Lord evokes and in playing her they play themselves.

Never, I think, since "They Knew What They Wanted" has she appeared in a play in which she moved us as well as she did into it, and "Spellbound" (Earl Carroll Theater) is, except for her own luminosity, obscure enough. Said to be based upon a crime committed a few years ago, it tells the story of an unstable, imaginative woman who allowed herself to be married to a cold domineering man and who then, because of a certain inability to distinguish between day-dreams and reality, inspired her lover to free her by committing a murder which she did not really wish. It is continuously interesting, it has two or three scenes of great power, and it threatens at moments to explore an abyss of pathological passion at the bottom of which lies the sadistic husband in the arms of a perverted wife who fiercely relishes some dark corner of her soul the tortures he inflicts. But

Some months ago The Inner Sanctum suggested to CARL DICKEY, editor of The World's Work, that he ask eminent persons in all ranges of American life, excluding only professional critics, to state frankly what books they were reading—and why. Thus originated a fascinating and spirited innovation in book reviewing. And yet the idea is haunting and embarrassing The Inner Sanctum, for it seems to be working out like a Machiavellian publicity stratagem for SIMON AND SCHUSTER.

The October roll-call, for example, reveals five out of ten notables reading The Story of Philosophy—and in most cases featuring it first. Note the range of interests represented:

JUDGE BEN LINDSEY
BERNARD M. BARUCH, financier
DR. F. P. KEPPEL, President of the Carnegie Corporation
PRESIDENT MAX MASON, of the University of Chicago
MAJOR GENERAL JOHN F. O'RYAN

For years we have been trying to find out what kind of automobile HENRY FORD drives, what species of delicatessen MR. HEINZ privately fancies, and what a great big librarian really reads for his intimate exhilaration after a hard day in the bookstalls. Thanks to The World's Work one boyhood craving is now appeased, for we are informed that CHARLES MOORE, acting chief of the Division of Manuscripts of the Library of Congress, is now enjoying the salty stinger of Trader Horn. "It is a trump," he announces, "I shall miss none of Trader Horn's forthcoming philosophy."

While confessions are in order, The Inner Sanctum breaks down and owns up to reading this week:

The Selected Papers of Benjamin Disraeli
My Life in Advertising, by CLAUDE C. HOPKINS
Studies in Words, by C. S. LEWIS
The Algonquin Round Table, by WOOLLCOTT, PARKER, LEACOCK, BENCHLEY, KAUFMAN, CONNELLY, ADAMS, SHERWOOD, BARRY, and ALEXANDER WOOLLCOTT

This was a particularly turbulent and thrilling day for The Inner Sanctum in a few minutes we placed printing orders for 55,000 books, including:

20,000 more Trader Horn
18,000 more Story of Philosophy
10,000 more Transition
3,000 more Cross Word Puzzle Book No. 8

Printings on The Story of Philosophy now total 200,000 copies.

For Trader Horn the figure is now 92,000 copies.

The advance sale of SAMUEL CHOTZINOFF'S forthcoming BEETHOVEN biography, Eroica, is coming along staunchly, but it took a sudden spurt this week when an enigmatic middle western dealer thought he detected a "t" in the middle of the title.

the play never seems entirely certain of the impression it intends to convey, and one seems to see superimposed upon one another three separate unfused things: First, the outline of an actual crime; second, a conception of the author's never wholly detached from the real events which suggested it; and, third, that more or less fixed character which Miss Lord carries from play to play. But though one is never quite certain what the piece is about Miss Lord holds one fascinated. I spoke of that something trance-like in her manner; it casts upon the spectator a similar spell from which he cannot awake, so that he hardly cares to ask what the play is about so long as she is upon the stage.

It would be easy to make out a logical case against Miss Lord as an actress, to argue that she tyrannizes over every role instead of interpreting it. But this is one of the cases where any such logical protest is impotent in the face of a power which merely brushes every objection aside. Whatever her rank as an actress Miss Lord's is the most extraordinary temperament to be seen in our theater.

The events in the life of Samuel Pepys which are recorded in the comedy "And So to Bed" (Shubert Theater) are supposed to have taken place a few weeks after the close of the diary. The susceptible Samuel gets surprised by King Charles in a lady's boudoir, hides in a chest, leaves an incriminating flageolet behind, and, in general, comports himself as a farceur would have him. The atmosphere is well preserved and the piece is made charming by the introduction of several old songs, including Mr. Pepy's own much-beloved "Beauty Retire." It is acted acceptably by Wallace Eddinger as the diarist and brilliantly by Yvonne Arnaud as that "poor wretch," his wife.

"Nightstick" (Selwyn Theater) is a crook melodrama with more than the usual number of thrills.

China — Seen from Moscow

By LOUIS FISCHER

Moscow, October 5

FENG YU-HSIANG and Chang Kai-shek are styled "traitors" in the Soviet press and the Pravda prints its Chinese news under the title: In the Land of Counter-Revolution. The Chinese revolution, Moscow believes, has temporarily spent its force.

Stalin and the Opposition are busily engaged in the game of placing the blame for the failures in China at one another's door. This placing of the blame assumes acceptance of responsibility—one reason why the Russian view of the Chinese situation is so interesting and important.

The Opposition was doubtful, it seems, about the wisdom of the Cantonese drive to Hankow and Shanghai. Its result, they argue, has been the loss of Canton Province to the revolution. For two years or more the Kuomintang, Chang Kai-shek, and Borodin sat peacefully in Canton without organizing a real revolution among the mass of the people. Wampoa and a good army nucleus are fine things, they argue, but no sooner was Chang Kai-shek's military force marching north than the little and big tuchuns began to lift their heads and assert themselves as masters of the situation. The Opposition answers: "That is because less attention was paid to the internal affairs than to anti-foreign affairs"—an unspoken and perhaps unconscious charge that the Stalin majority neglected the proper development of the Chinese revolution in order more quickly to spike the British.

Without the Northern drive, the "administration" in Moscow insists, the revolutionary spirit along the Yangtze would have lain dormant. The repulse of the reactionary militarists made the masses conscious of their strength, enabled trade unions and peasant committees to spring up, and made it possible for Nationalist propaganda to take root.

The Opposition's sharpest criticism centers around events after the capture of Hankow and Shanghai. Karl Radek, who is no longer rector of the Sun Yat-sen University here, would have had the International Settlement at Shanghai occupied by the Chinese workers and middle classes without army intervention and with as little damage as possible to foreign property. With two million Chinese in the settlement itself, he thinks, no Sikhs or gunboats could have prevented it. That would have destroyed a source of reaction that has served to corrupt Chang Kai-shek.

When Hankow was taken, Radek continues, the workers should have been armed with munitions from the Hanyang arsenal, next to Mukden, the largest in the country. Instead of allowing feudal, landowning officers to control the army, a real Red Guard should have been established. Above all, village and city soviets should have been organized, and the Communists should have bolted the Kuomintang.

Stalin and Bukharin still hope that at least the Left Kuomintang can be salvaged. Trotzky, Zinoviev, and Radek had despaired of the Kuomintang as early as April, 1926. Today the Opposition urges a frank Communist program in China carried out by Communists alone—this though the Chinese Communist Party is weak, lacks leadership, and has made innumerable serious mistakes. "If there can be a purely capitalist state in Manchuria," Radek said to me, "there is no reason why you cannot have a Soviet state in the South."

Willy-nilly, the Communists in China will probably soon be forced to work independently. The Russian Opposition insists today, and the administration will very likely insist tomorrow (when the Kuomintang has expelled the Reds), that the coming year or two in China must be devoted to preparing the ground for the next stage of the revolution. Meanwhile, the feeling in Russia is widespread that China can never be united under a bourgeois regime. No one general can do it and no combination of generals will work effectively.

The Soviet Government, however, wishes to maintain amicable relations with all Chinese governments and regrets its inability to send a prominent personality to Nanking, despite its suppression of the labor movement. Every Chinese government today is anti-imperialist; it has to be. Even Chang Tso-lin, the Manchurian war-lord, is not a mere Japanese puppet; he works with Tokio when he needs Tokio, but in matters of customs, internal revenues, and currency he is as anti-foreign as any zealot in the Kuomintang. It is the Communist thesis that anti-imperialism in China is today a product of unescapable, objective conditions. (Anti-imperialism alone, Radek interpolates, is not revolution.) Incidentally, the Bolsheviks silently hope that this fact will keep the Japanese from encouraging Chang Tso-lin to seize the partly Russian Chinese Eastern Railway. That—they believe, and hope the Japanese will fear—would whet his appetite for Japan's South Manchurian Railway.

Russians believe that Japan's star seems to be on the ascent in China. "The Japanese," a Russian said to me, "will take the place of the British on the Yangtze." Tokio's relations with Chang Tso-lin are close and decisive if not cordial, and the Nanking group, who need support, cannot turn to the Americans (because they won't give it), or to the British (because trafficking with them would ruin their prestige), or to the Russians because of Nanking's persecution of the labor and peasant movements. The Japanese remain. Russia is still extremely popular in Nationalist circles, and not long ago Nanking publicly courted Moscow's good-will. Nor can Feng break with the Bolsheviks. Feng is a man of the North; his domain borders on Soviet territory. As a matter of fact, he is regarded here as a good bet in the coming revolution. The ex-"Christian" general was never a Bolshevik, but he is a peasant and a son of the people. The Russian Bolsheviks place their greatest faith in the Chinese peasant movement, and perhaps the policy will now be to groom Feng as its leader, provided he consents to cooperate with the Communists at home. It is generally admitted that Moscow has more reliable figures on the Chinese village than most people in China. According to these data, half of all agricultural land in China is rented by the peasants—in Kwangtung, Honan, Hunan, Hupeh, and Shantung the percentage is higher, in the North lower. Rentals vary from 50 to 70 per cent of each harvest. The landowners are usually merchants and officials living in the cities.

This, the Communists submit, is the objective basis for the Chinese economic revolution which has not yet set in. The Nationalist-anti-imperialist-Kuomintang episode was only its prelude, if a very necessary one. And, say the Bolsheviks, the cause of the hundreds of millions may take months and years to succeed but succeed it must.

Nationalization of land, railways, and some pivotal industries; soviets; a workers' army; lower taxes, customs autonomy; encouragement of artisan production; and communist control—these form the program for China on which Stalin and the Opposition will probably agree before the next chapter of the Chinese revolution opens.

PRESIDENT GREEN of the A. F. of L. and President Lewis of the United Mine Workers of America, with their respective committees, have called on President Coolidge. One quarter of a million miners are on strike, they said; miners' wives and children are cold and hungry and homeless; thugs patrol the mines and beat up the strikers; coal mining at best is a wet, filthy, dangerous occupation; at worst, when a living wage is not paid, it is not to be borne; and when, as now, the price of coal is being artificially depressed an investigation into the industry as a whole is pressing. President Coolidge heard them courteously; at the close of an hour's talk he turned to Mr. Lewis. "What town," he asked, "is the center of the mine strike?" Mr. Lewis named a town in Pennsylvania. The President touched a button at his desk; a secretary entered. "Bring my hat and coat and a traveling bag," the President said, "and come back in ten minutes prepared to go with me to X....., Pennsylvania." In fifteen minutes by the clock Mr. Coolidge stood up. "Will you accompany me, gentlemen?" He turned to the telephone. "Tell my wife I shan't be home for dinner." They followed him meekly into a waiting motor; they were mute as they boarded a train, as it sped through autumn fields. The President said nothing, apparently deep in thought; no one interrupted him. At their destination he turned to Mr. Lewis. "Come with a representative of the miners in this district to a conference at eight o'clock tonight." He dismissed the motor and asked to be directed to the mines. Nor would he permit any one to accompany him. He spent the afternoon talking to strikers and their families, to police, to mine guards, and finally to the president of the mining company, breathlessly summoned by telegraph to meet the President of the United States. He was conducted through a mine, he sat down in half a dozen miner's houses. During the half day he spent thus he said little and listened much.

AT EIGHT O'CLOCK he was ready for his conference. "Gentlemen," he said, turning first to the leader of the operators, then to the spokesman for the miners, "gentlemen, this strike must be settled and settled quickly. If you"—to the operator—"cannot run your mines and pay a living wage, the government will. You can doubtless confer more freely by yourselves although I am at your service if you want me. In seven days if you and your associates"—with a sweep of his arm he included miners and operators alike—"have not reached a decision, the government will interfere." He stood up and made as if to leave the room and then—and then we woke up! We shook the sleep from our eyes. There was no conference, there was no Presidential ultimatum, there was no personal investigation of the mine strike. The president of the American Federation of Labor and the president of the United Mine Workers of America had called on the President of the United States. But President Coolidge was not galvanized into action by the tale of the miners' troubles. He opined that perhaps the matter might be referred to the Interstate Commerce Commission or maybe to the Secretary of Labor. He passed the buck. And he will continue to do so. What is a President for, anyway? He shakes hands, he attends banquets, he makes speeches. He obeys the orders of big business. And for some reason which we are unable to ascertain, everybody—except the miners—seems reasonably satisfied.

CONGRESS OPENS with a multitude of pressing questions demanding attention. It is to be a short session because of the inevitable desire of the members to go to the Presidential conventions and to enter early the Presidential campaign. So the tendency will be to dodge important votes as much as possible. Some matters cannot, however, be sidestepped—the Mississippi flood relief and prevention, reduction of taxes, aid for the farmers, Muscle Shoals and Boulder Dam, and probably the merchant marine and the return of the sequestered enemy property. Here are issues enough to keep Congress at work for a long time, in addition to the usual appropriation bills, and the seating or unseating of Senators-elect Vare and Smith. What Congress lacks, of course, is clarifying principles. Should there be government ownership of the fleet and not of the great power plants? Ought Congress not to declare itself as to this whole question of super-power and water-powers? Then there is evidence that the Interstate Commerce Commission will turn back to the national legislature the question of railroad consolidation. For seven years the commission and the railroad presidents have wrangled with this question without being able to reach any solution—the presidents cannot agree among themselves though warned that their failure to do so will give great impetus to the movement for government ownership of all railroads. Irrigation and immigration, the size of the navy—these are still other problems with which Congress must deal, and all the time its members will be thinking first and foremost of the elections and their personal destinies. For the Progressive group the session brings a magnificent opportunity. We look forward with confidence to their embracing it.

AS TO TAXES, the determined efforts to relieve business of more of its tax "burdens"—how light they would seem to a British or German business man!—will probably result in a decrease of from $225,000,000 to $250,000,000 in government income. That prospect has not satisfied that pestiferous organization of big business, the United States Chamber of Commerce, which has for some time past been working itself up to the point of believing that to it belong the functions both of the Executive and of Congress. Its demand that the reduction be $400,000,000 has had the extraordinary effect of drawing fire from the usually impassive Mr. Coolidge—we do not recall a similar outburst against Big Business since that gentleman entered the White House. The Democrats will demand more than the Republicans will be willing to grant, not because of principle, of course, but merely in order to spar for the position of being most friendly to the dear taxpayer. As for the inheritance taxes, the House Committee on Ways and Means has for the moment scotched the movement to remove them, but the lobby will be heard from yet. It is reported to have fat-salaried agents at work arguing that the federal inheritance tax should go because it encroaches on what ought to be the special taxing ground of the States. This is a specious and dishonest plea and we are sorry, indeed, to see that Governor Smith has been beguiled into a reserved approval of the move. Of course, the intention is, first to persuade the federal Government to abolish the tax, and then to induce the individual States to follow Florida in abandoning it as an inducement to multimillionaires to live within their boundaries. The Nation wishes to go on record again as opposing any tinkering with the inheritance tax and any reduction of revenue at present. It believes the policy of reducing the national debt as fast as possible to be the sound and desirable one.

"POLISH-LITHUANIAN WAR THREATENED," the headlines say. Which indicates how easily we forget. For Poland and Lithuania have been technically at war since 1920; they have never made peace. Their war is one of the scandals of the League of Nations closet, and it is natural that the Great Powers should resent Russia's action in calling attention to the danger there. Under the auspices of the League Poland and Lithuania signed an armistice on October 7, 1920, settling their frontier. Vilna, her capital, was naturally left to Lithuania. On October 9 an independent Polish general, Zeligovski, seized the city. The Powers protested; the League summoned Poland and Lithuania to Geneva and announced that, under its own auspices, it would hold a plebiscite in Vilna district. It instructed Zeligovski to get out. But he did not, and Poland refused to oust him, though the League took steps to assemble an international army to put him out. The Poles calmly thumbed their noses at the League, and in the end the League pusillanimously backed down. Poland annexed Vilna; the League and the Great Powers recognized its act of violence. Year after year little Lithuania has gone to Geneva with fresh hopes, but each time her complaints have been referred to a committee for quiet burial. Recently there have been rumblings indicating that Poland was preparing to pocket the rest of Lithuania. Pilsudski made a martial tour of Vilna; Lithuanian revolutionists admitted receiving help from Poland; the Polish arsenals worked on night shifts. Naturally and properly, since Poland's other neighbors were neglecting their duty, Soviet Russia voiced a protest. And France and England dare to call it a provocative act.

INDEED, THE ATTITUDE of the Powers toward Russia's participation in the Disarmament Conference is impudently amusing. Russia, the dispatches from London and Paris declare day after day, is going to Geneva to make trouble. She is allying with Germany, and horrible visions of a Russo-German bloc at the conference fill the newspaper columns. But what will this Russo-German bloc do? Apparently it plans to point out that Germany is disarmed, that France has the largest army in the world, that England is spending more on armaments than before the war. It plans to denounce the French metaphysical plea that nations must have security before they can disarm, and to assert that disarmament makes security. In short, they plan to disturb the Disarmament Conference by boldly proposing disarmament!

DOWN IN THE BALKANS there are more martial rumblings. France and Italy are playing for the balance of power—and the result is a series of treaties of friendship which belie their names. France has long acted as the protector of Jugoslavia. Two years ago she proposed a tripartite Italo-Franco-Jugoslav peace pact. Italy refused it, apparently resenting France's assumption of a role in the Balkans. Instead Mussolini put through in December, 1926, the Treaty of Tirana which made Albania, theretofore a sort of no man's land between Italy and Jugoslavia, almost an Italian province. France waited; finally, on Armistice Day, 1927, she signed a mild-looking "treaty of friendship and arbitration" with Jugoslavia. The French insisted that the treaty had been drawn up eighteen months ago, and was as innocent as her pacts with Czecho-Slovakia, Belgium, Poland, and Rumania. But the official communique added that the two governments were "in perfect agreement in all questions touching the two countries," and the Jugoslav press frankly shouted that the treaty would put Mussolini in his place. Mussolini is a man of action. Eleven days later he signed a new treaty with Albania binding it for twenty years to an "unalterable defensive alliance" with Italy—further asserting his de facto control of the mountain principality. And so it goes. Mussolini is now seeking to strengthen his alliance with Jugoslavia's northern neighbor, Hungary; and to defeat the French effort to bring Serbia and Bulgaria together. Meanwhile, both France and Italy are arm-deep in the Rumanian muddle. Yet doubtless, when the League meets at Geneva, the representatives of both countries will loudly proclaim their passionate devotion to the cause of peace.

STRAWS IN THE WIND have been pointing to the weakening of the Bratianu power in Rumania. After the acquittal of M. Manoilescu, charged with Carolist plots, newspapers became so bold that the old, rigid censorship was reestablished; but not before all sorts of rumors had been carried across half a continent to Carol in Paris: Bratianu was ill and helpless; the people had cheered Manoilescu's acquittal; Bratianu had offered Carol any sum he would name to renounce the throne again, publicly and in writing, before his father's death; Bratianu had refused the dying Ferdinand's request to see his son once more—so the rumors ran. And on top of them, with censorship clamped down over press and tongue, with a dramatic suddenness that any political lion might envy, the lion, Bratianu, the strong man of Rumania, died. When dynasties crash, their falling timbers may crush a nation. So Rumania lies for the moment dazed and helpless. Smaller men scurry around to form a ministry, a regency. Carol in Paris must be filled with hope—if not immediately of the throne, then for a place on the Regency Council and a voice in the government. Jon Bratianu's brother is head of the ministry in his place, but little is expected of him. So desperate is the political situation that a council meeting was held on the funeral train which bore Bratianu's body to its rest. The future of Rumania, and with it the future of the Balkans, is in the air. So must the future always be at the end of a dictatorship. Which is one of the merits of that much-abused form of government—democracy.

AGAIN THE STANDARD OIL of New York offends capitalistic decency by entering into another agreement with the Soviet Government for the purchase of Russian oil. This contract, making the fourth between the two parties, calls for 60,000 tons per year for a period of six years. With it the Standard's total purchases will amount to approximately 1,700,000 tons. Distributed annually the contracts call for about 400,000 tons of oil per year. These successive contracts and steadily increasing figures may be hailed as the signs of a coming rapprochement between the Soviet Union and the United States as, indeed, they seem to indicate. But more important is the strengthening of the credit position of the Soviet Government, making it more likely that it will be able to obtain capital in the United States. Sir Henri Deterding of the Royal Dutch-Shell, who has been bitterly opposed to any trade relations (in oil) with Russia, has of course opposed these contracts of the Standard Oil. In fact, he has retaliated with a price-cutting war against the New York Standard in India, and threatens to extend it to other important markets. With this fourth contract, therefore, the Standard Oil simply widens the rift in the "solid" capitalistic front against Russia. And to make matters worse for the Royal Dutch-Shell, Spain has now joined the ranks of defection, ordering one-half of her oil supply from Russia. For a while after the break with England things looked bad for Russia—as though Sir Henri might have his way—but now Mr. Stalin has some reason to smile.

"GO SOUTH TO TENNESSEE"—this is the slogan of the Tennessee Electric Power Company. In the Textile World for November 12 it gives some interesting "facts and figures about labor in Tennessee" to encourage the southward migration of capital. We quote:

> Supply—Native Anglo-Saxon workers—the type that seeks to profit to the fullest extent through gainful occupation rather than attempts to reduce the number of working hours per week. . . .
> Hours—Day and night operations are permitted in Tennessee mills for both male and female labor. Women may be employed a total of fifty-seven hours per week. Double-shift work reduces overhead costs.
> Wages—Latest data give average weekly earnings of textile operatives, male and female, as $13.63. Last census report showed $16.44 as the average weekly earnings of employees in 4,589 industries.

Furthermore, one learns that Southern industries, besides paying a weekly wage nearly three dollars below the average of the country, "operate almost without exception on an open-shop basis."

RAYNA PROHME was one of those flaming personalities who leave a blaze of light behind them. Yet she groped, as most young Americans do in this erratic age; the University of Chicago, the literary coteries of American cities, meant little to her. She drifted to China with her second husband, William Prohme—and there she suddenly ceased drifting. She became a part of the rising tide of Chinese Nationalism. Beginning as subeditor of Eugene Chen's People's Tribune in Peking, she rose to responsibility. A slight wisp of a red-haired girl, she had the courage of her big convictions. One Chinese editor was shot; the others did not dare visit the office; Rayna Prohme produced the daily paper almost single-handed. When Chang Tso-lin's men threatened to suppress it, she moved the paper to her own home, and edited it under the extraterritorial protection of the American flag—extraterritoriality never served a better purpose. Later, she went with her husband to Canton, and after the victorious northern expedition of the Nationalists, to Hankow. There again she edited the only English-language Nationalist paper in China.. Her last act as editor was to publish Madame Sun Yat-sen's despairing Appeal to the Chinese People (published in The Nation for September 21) against the orders of the militarist who was bloodily suppressing the labor and peasant unions. Then, with Mrs. Sun, she left for Moscow, where she died. Though ostracized by colonial-minded Americans of the Chinese cities, and distrusted by her own Government's officials, Rayna Prohme's passionate devotion will be remembered in China when consuls and ministers are forgotten.

"CHARLES F. DOLE IS A SAINT," John Haynes Holmes wrote in the review of "My Eighty Years" which appears in this issue of The Nation. "He will feel at home and enjoy congenial company when he gets to heaven." The words were prophetic; Dr. Dole has gone to meet that company since the lines were written. What Dr. Holmes wrote of the prophet in Jamaica Plain leaves little to be added. He lived an exciting life; unlike the novelists he found virtue interesting and made it infectious. Some thousands of us must be decenter human beings for our contacts with and memories of Dr. Dole.

Peace or War?

PEACE and war—the press is full of news relating thereto. The Disarmament Conference of the League of Nations is meeting at Geneva with the Russians in attendance. The British press is still stirred by the cut in the Admiralty's building program and the extraordinary public manifestations of a desire that England shall disarm and keep out of dangerous foreign entanglements. "Disarmament," Ernest Marshall cables to the New York Times, "has been easily first among the week's topics. Speeches innumerable have been made about it both in and out of Parliament." The politicians, he says, "realize that a generation which is still scarred by the wounds of war wants peace preserved and believes that the old Roman doctrine that being prepared for war is the best way of avoiding it was exploded in 1914." Mr. Marshall also reports that, in addition to Field Marshal Sir William Robertson's recent unqualified denunciation of war and his demand for disarmament, another distinguished general who fought with honor in the World War is standing for Parliament as an advocate of universal disarmament. As for Lord Robert Cecil, he has not only resigned from the Cabinet on the disarmament issue, he is constantly speaking on the question. Indeed, he has just stated in John Bull that war is "international madness"; that the world must "disarm or perish"; that delay is most dangerous, and that "every month we delay, the old vested interests, material and moral, strengthen their hold." This weekly declares in a special issue devoted to disarmament and peace, that a million British men ought to refuse to fight under any circumstances.

Yet Europe is shivering with alarm over the Polish threat to Lithuania, with its possibility of another war between Poland and Russia, the unsettled conditions in Rumania, and the continuing menace to peace which is Mussolini—a menace little diminished by the new offensive and defensive alliance between Italy and Albania. Russia herself is kept in a constant state of unrest because of her fear of an attack headed by the British. So the daily dispatches from abroad speak of "half a dozen" places in the Near East where hostilities may flare up at any moment. Lord Robert Cecil has thus the best of arguments for declaring that there is no time to lose, and Lloyd George has joined Foch in declaring that a new world war will be here within ten years if things continue as now. So apparent has been the menace to peace that a War Danger Conference has just been meeting in London and was addressed, among others, by General von Schoenaich, a former German army officer now an ardent pacifist, and, in the form of a communication, by Henri de Jouvenal, lately one of the French delegates to the League of Nations. Speaking to this conference, Francesco Nitti, the former Premier of Italy, declared that never had the nations "armed themselves in so mad a fashion as since the existence of the League of Nations." He, too, deems war inevitable if Mussolini remains ten years at the helm of Italy. That dictator's plan of making a great Italian empire Nitti characterizes as the creation of the "vanity of a madman." At this same conference America was denounced by Englishmen "as undoubtedly the most ruthless and aggressively imperialistic nation at present," and as "the source of the greatest danger of future wars." "They cry peace, peace, but there is no peace."

And in this emergency where stands the United States? Well, President Coolidge has signalized the opening of the Disarmament Conference by saying that "there is no short cut to peace any more than to any other form of salvation." The Borah proposal to outlaw war is something to approach with fear and trembling, he is quoted as saying, the chief obstacle to the plan being in his mind that provision in the federal Constitution which gives Congress the sole power to make war. Next, blowing hot after this cold draft, Mr. Coolidge is quoted as comforting himself with the thought that a treaty providing for the outlawry of war, "while it would amount to a declaration of policy [sic], might be helpful in promoting the sentiments of peace." Here we have the characteristic attitude of the statesman in office toward any new proposal for exorcising war. He fears; he trembles; he vacillates; he wonders if public sentiment will back him up; he hopes that it will help to strengthen the spirit for peace, but he sees constitutional or other difficulties in the way; finally he issues a statement as confused as the one above. To take his courage in both hands and to insist that the obstacles shall be overcome and the definite advance toward peace made—that is beyond him.

Naturally Senator Borah challenges the President's position, with all the weight of his standing as a high constitutional authority, and declares that the reverse of what the President says is true; that there is nothing in the Constitution to prevent the United States from entering into contracts with other nations to outlaw war. If the President were right it would then be his duty, in our judgment, to work for a constitutional amendment to legitimize the proposal which is one of the great steps toward peace that the world can take promptly. We do not claim for it that it will end all war. We do maintain that it is one of the steps to remove the evil which Lord Robert Cecil is correct in saying must be banished or it will destroy the world.

We are aware, of course, that President Coolidge sincerely desires to achieve something notable for peace before he leaves office for good. Trustworthy information which comes to us from high sources makes it plain that he is talking and thinking a good deal about it. The danger lies in his timidity and in that ineptitude which made him ruin the tripartite naval conference at Geneva by failing to ascertain diplomatically in advance of its meeting what could be accomplished, and by selecting a second-rank diplomat and a belligerent naval officer to represent the United States. So, while he feels himself compelled to throw cold water upon Senator Borah's plan for the outlawry of war, he makes no mention of Ambassador Houghton's far-reaching and vitally important proposal to take the war-making power out of the hands of the "little groups of men" who constitute cabinets and governments and to put it into the hands of the people themselves by ordaining a referendum on war. Here is another constructive plan which, as we have already pointed out, is a great contribution to the discussion. That Europe is so filled with talk of disarmament and war prevention is the most hopeful sign that the calamity may be averted. But why should not America sound the note of courage and of leadership instead of one of doubt and vacillation?

The Negligible Graduate Student

TIME was when the graduate student in America stood obscurely but definitely as a symbol of pedantry. It was he—the understudy of the professor—who represented "mere" learning, and who was thought to be the kind of man one could never get an opinion from without having first to listen to a confusing number of hems and haws and qualifications. He burrowed away in the stacks of university libraries, digging up data for a book which after appropriate delays would be published between gray paper covers and never cause a ripple in the stream of contemporary life—though eventually, perhaps, what he had discovered and recorded might influence other scholars. In a word, he was a scholar, and paid the penalties as well as reaped the rewards of being that. The world has ever been respectful of scholarship, even when it laughed at it, just as it has bowed to authority of any sort with sometimes an embarrassed smile on its face. The world, even, has had its furtive admiration for pedantry, which it has never tried too hard to distinguish from scholarship—and which may not be so different from it after all, save with respect to the "value" of the thing that happens in the one case or the other to be the object of research. And who is to decide that question of value?

Now all is different, if we are to accept the recent report of Frederic J. E. Woodbridge, Dean of the Graduate Faculties at Columbia University, to President Butler. Dean Woodbridge is speaking, of course, for Columbia; but he intimates that he may be speaking for other American universities as well, and we believe that he is. He dismisses three-fourths of the graduate students under his charge as "negligible." And negligible to what? To life, as is the conventional charge? No, to scholarship itself. In other words, most graduate students are failing in the one thing the world has left to them to master. They lack the one thing which would justify their existence: a disinterested love of learning. Mr. Mencken has long been making fun of the American professor because he is not enough of a professor, because he tries to keep up with the merry world, because he wants to seem something else than the thing he is. Now the dean of the largest graduate school in the country adds his condemnation of the student who is not enough of a student to be content with researches which shall merely result in a contribution to knowledge.

What three-fourths of the graduate students want to do, says Dean Woodbridge, is to improve themselves. In contemporary America this is by no means a strange desire—the strangeness, indeed, consists in someone's suggesting that it is insufficient. Are we not brought up on advertisements which remind us of our need to get ahead in society and which intimate that we can do so by becoming proficient overnight in French or in the art of after-dinner speaking? But here is an educator disapproving of those who believe that "more education will do something for them personally, make them happier or socially more prominent or effective." Here is a dean regretting that "study is regarded as an instrument for personal improvement rather than an inquiry into the nature of things." The nature of things! The words come strangely to the ears of a generation so skeptical about ultimate things that it does not even consider the necessity of examining the grounds on which those things are dismissed. They come strangely, but they should be heard. It is extremely important that we should go on producing dispassionate scholars—or pedants, if one likes. It is necessary, now that so many academic subjects have become in Dean Woodbridge's phrase "socially exciting and intellectually provocative," that we should give a few men and women elbow-room in which they may devote to these subjects "competent study, wide information, matured judgment, and ripe experience."

The amount of elbow-room now at their disposal is indicated by the fact that last year there were 3,439 graduate students at Columbia; the other graduate schools of the country we understand to be proportionately crowded. This is of course too many. Dean Woodbridge's proposal for reducing the number is to eliminate from the departments of pure research all persons who do not want degrees, who cannot give all their time to their studies, who want to "learn a little more," or who want to "improve themselves." Such students can go into Extension or can read at home. An eminently practical proposal, in our opinion.

The Norton Centenary

IN Boston they have been celebrating the centenary of Charles Eliot Norton, long one of Harvard's most distinguished and useful teachers, long one of the most vigorous patriots and critics of this country. This dual role of teacher and faultfinder is rarely easy to play; it was certainly never so in Cambridge. But Charles Eliot Norton was an aristocrat, a "Boston Brahmin." He could speak his mind as he saw fit and no one dared to seek to oust him, not even in the troublous days of the Spanish War when he and others united to oppose that needless resort to arms and the subjugation of the Philippines. We had not then, as later, in the World War, broken with the historic tradition which permitted Americans to differ publicly with a war policy of their government, but the one hundred per cent patrioteers were already sufficiently numerous to assail the great Harvard professor of fine arts. He gave them not as much attention as one bestows upon snarling curs. His record was there and that of his family. Accuse him of treason one could not. But lesser charges were freely made—he was, they said, a silk-stocking, a thin-skinned, thin-blooded theorist, too far removed from the robust affairs of life to count.

To the average undergraduate, Professor Norton was a phenomenon to be thankful for—his fine-arts courses were the easiest "snaps" in the curriculum—but a phenomenon not to be understood. For during his lectures Professor Norton talked about everything in the field of customs, morals, and politics that interested him, as well as of the arts. His admonitions as to what constituted the right American policies were heard too often by deaf ears; the undergraduate of thirty or forty years ago was far less interested in politics and foreign relations than are the students of today. None the less the seed by no means fell wholly upon barren ground. There are plenty of Harvard graduates who acknowledge their great debt to him and honor his memory. They were not those who called him cynical or pessimistic or a "little American," for they responded to his profound sense of injury when his government erred and turned its back upon its noblest traditions. Were he living today he would find tragic confirmation for plenty of his forebodings and for many of his prophecies.

Beyond this Professor Norton was one of the members of the faculty who aided President Eliot most in carrying out those great scholastic reforms which meant so much not only to Harvard but the entire college world—even though he could not induce Mr. Eliot to see that Harvard was developing a barbarous architecture under his leadership, or move him to plan for a harmonious physical development of the university. He would have been among those horrified by the great college lately erected upon the banks of the Charles for the deification of all the gods of business—and would generally find himself but little in sympathy with many of the university developments of the day.

To his delightful house came scholars, artists, writers, men of affairs from all over the world, and to it also came for help many students who, if worthy, never failed to meet the courteous, considerate, generous response they desired. He was that greatest of teachers—a great, powerful, fearless personality. As for The Nation, it could hardly have come to life in 1865 but for Professor Norton's support and wise counsel. If it was quite a different Nation from that of today, we are none the less bold enough to believe that much of what it is today would appeal to him, for his mind never grew old, and to the end he saw through the gaudy political tinsel of his day and tilted at the shams of the hour. Harvard does well to honor Charles Eliot Norton, for he will always be one of its priceless possessions.

To Err Is Human

JUSTICE is sometimes dumb as well as blind, and outrageous blunders are made even in England, whose courts are generally believed to be the fairest and most accurate in the world. An amazing instance of fallibility has finally been officially acknowledged in the release of Oscar Slater after he had spent eighteen years in prison at Peterhead.

Slater's conviction has been called England's Sacco-Vanzetti case, and the agitation over the latter was helpful in bringing to a successful head efforts which had extended over years to obtain the imprisoned man's release. But except for the fact that Slater's imprisonment enlisted the sympathy of a considerable number of prominent persons, among them Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, there is little similarity between the two cases. There was apparently no hysteria or prejudice to account for Slater's conviction, and fortunately no political or industrial pressure was brought to bear to prevent his release or make impossible an unbiased review of his case. Most fortunate of all, although Slater was found guilty of murder, his sentence of death was commuted to life imprisonment two days before the date set for the execution—because of doubt even at that time of his guilt—and so it was possible to free him when one of three identifying witnesses recently signed an affidavit saying that she had not meant to identify him positively as the man she saw running away from the scene of the crime. She had been influenced to do so, she said, by the prosecutor. In this we are reminded of the ugly work of District Attorney Katzmann in the Sacco-Vanzetti trial in inducing Captain Proctor, a firearms expert, to make a misleading statement to the jury. But whereas in England a recantation by one witness was sufficient to obtain Slater's release, in Massachusetts the repudiation of his testimony by Captain Proctor was not considered of enough importance by the judicial machinery of the State to gain even a new trial for Sacco and Vanzetti.

Slater was arrested in 1909 in New York City as he stepped ashore from the steamship Lusitania. He was charged with the robbery and murder of an aged woman in Glasgow. Slater obtained the services of an American lawyer, William A. Goodhart, now practicing in Baltimore, but did not fight extradition, although United States Commissioner Shields, before whom he was taken, did not think the evidence presented was adequate proof of guilt. Mr. Goodhart had intended to represent Slater at the trial, but an unexpected moving ahead of the date of beginning made this impossible. Mr. Goodhart remained convinced of Slater's innocence in spite of his conviction, and went to work to unravel the mystery, learning that a brooch which his client was accused of having stolen from the murdered woman had in fact been pawned by the convicted man four months before the crime. With this and other clues in his possession, Mr. Goodhart obtained the aid of Conan Doyle in working for Slater's release, but progress languished until the Sacco-Vanzetti case stimulated the effort to get at the truth.

The Slater case is only another of many convictions which have later turned out to have been unjustified, even in the unusually fair and accurate judicial processes of England. The false conviction of Adolf Beck has become almost as famous as that of Alfred Dreyfus and Jean Calas in France, the latter of whom was broken on the wheel although Voltaire subsequently established the man's innocence. Beck was falsely convicted twice, just as was probably true of Vanzetti. In 1896 Beck was sentenced to seven years' penal servitude for a series of robberies from women. He was released after five years, but in 1904 was convicted of similar offenses. At the first trial Beck was "positively identified" by ten women and at the second by five; in each case a handwriting expert testified against him. Yet eventually Beck's innocence was so conclusively established that the British Government indemnified him for his imprisonment to the extent of $25,000. An earlier case was that of William Habron, sentenced to death in 1876 for the murder of a policeman. On account of his youth—he was only eighteen—Habron's punishment was luckily commuted to imprisonment, and two years later a man convicted of another killing confessed also to the crime for which Habron had been imprisoned. The confession was substantiated and Habron was released with $4,000 as compensation. Priscilla Biggadyke was not so fortunate. She was convicted in 1869 of poisoning her husband and was executed. Later, in a deathbed confession, a man admitted that he had entered Mrs. Biggadyke's kitchen, unknown to her, and put poison in a pudding which she was making.

The possibility of an error which can never be rectified is one of the strong reasons for the abolition of capital punishment. Even with the best judicial machinery there is a possibility of error in any single case and a certainty of it somewhere in the combined record of many cases. But even this certainty of error is only one of many reasons for putting behind us the savagery of civic murder. The practice of deliberate and complaisant killing by a community is degrading and brutalizing to it. The effect is to weaken the respect for life, to accustom people to take it wantonly, and so to encourage the very crime which it is mistakenly designed to prevent.

Our cave-dwelling ancestors helped themselves.
The Mediterranean peoples of classical times were first-rate pirates.
The medieval folk robbed their neighbors whenever they had a chance.
Even Napoleon's heroes knew good plunder when they saw it.

It Seems To Heywood Broun

GENE TUNNEY and Upton Sinclair have recently spoken disparagingly of pessimism. "Satirists and cynics are seldom healthy," was Tunney's contribution while Sinclair in "Money Writes!" expresses the opinion, "All truly great art is optimistic." I differ with both fighters. Gene is a good heavyweight and Upton an excellent novelist, but neither approaches championship rank in criticism.

"The individual artist," says Sinclair in support of his theme, "is happy in his creative work, and its reception by his public; the public is active and sound, occupied in mastering life and expanding the social forces. It is only when those forces exhaust themselves that the art public enjoys contemplating moral impotence, and that the individual artist does not know whether life is worth living. The fact that practically all great art is tragic does not in any way change the above thesis."

But Sinclair's thesis is vastly damaged by the fact that it rests upon a number of assertions which are not possible of proof and which very likely are not true. If I said that Shakespeare was fundamentally pessimistic in his attitude toward life another might challenge my assertion and we could argue until daybreak. Even more time might be consumed in discussing the problem of whether he was happy in his creative work. Certainly an artist may blast himself for the sins of the people and get no more than a curious and morbid joy out of the sacrifice. I would not even say that it was any part of his business to expand the social forces. Much has been done in marble and on canvas which leaves the economic system of the world precisely where it was before.

Upton Sinclair calls upon all the writers of the earth to produce "a socialist novel" and if I read him correctly his definition is a tight one. I gather that among the moderns it includes none except himself and Theodore Dreiser. Theirs is the direct approach but a writer may go round about, though if he does Upton Sinclair will assail him as slacker in the great war of the classes and the masses. As excellent a revolutionary as Cabell is scorned by the man who did "The Jungle." To Sinclair "Jurgen" and the rest are "ivory-tower art" and "ivory-tower art consists of cruelty and sensuality." Indeed he expresses the opinion that "'Jurgen' is one of the most depraved and depraving books ever published in America."

Readily enough I will agree that James Branch Cabell left the Lees and the dregs of Virginia exactly where he found them and has not raised a finger to put the proletariat within the houses with white columns. But revolution can and must go deeper than faith in any economic system. In order to get about the business of making a new world there first must be acute and gnawing dissatisfaction with the one we have. Upton Sinclair promotes precisely that feeling when he endeavors to point out that our packers and our press men are corrupt, but I do not understand why he fails to recognize the fact that Cabell is essentially on his side. Indeed the Virginian is more thoroughgoing, for he says that life of this particular moment in the world's history seems to him so dull and dreary that he will have nothing of it but create instead a land of kings, pawnbrokers, and dryads. Very possibly he does look at marriage as Sinclair charges, but that, for good or ill, must be a part of any radical upheaval. There will not come, here or elsewhere, a state brand new and shining which confines the scope of its change wholly to wages, hours, and the ownership of factories. When gold bonds are no longer legal tender others will be loosed as part of the turmoil.

With good reason Upton Sinclair feels that he himself will be raised high with kingdom coming. An appreciable measure of the revolutionary work has been his, while I can remember none in which I have engaged beyond splitting a ticket to support a Socialist for president of the Borough of Manhattan. Still, tragically and ironically, it may happen that Upton Sinclair will fret more in Utopia than I. He is a member of that curious and numerous band of the rebellious Puritans. He would curtail the sufferings of man and also his pleasures. I fear the suburban paradise which he fantasies for workers will not quite hold the spirit of an army unleashed from grinding labor.

Saddest of all will be the fate of the collected works of Sinclair when all the wide world flows with milk and honey. When every wrong and every privilege is down who will care to read "The Brass Check" or even yet "The Jungle"? Quite possibly the emancipated worker will turn instead to the poems of Amy Lowell, despicable though they seem to Upton Sinclair. I assure him that beauty is there though he asserts he cannot hear it. As a matter of fact, anybody who writes poetry or paints a picture or sings a song is a rebel. The very act of embracing an art form for expression is a denial of the sufficiency of things as they are. It is not necessary for the leavening of the world that all the blessed should deal articulately with slums and sweatshops. I think it is much better if they do not. Certainly Upton Sinclair has no right to toss upon the ash-heap of parasitism such writers as give to the world no definite program for the creation of an almost perfect state. He sneers at Anatole France, who surely was among the mighty who stirred the wide vats and set up fermentation.

To be dogmatic, Tunney is wrong about his cynics and Sinclair about his optimists. In cruder terms this is the old argument about constructive and destructive critics. The man who tears down a house which totters cannot be denied some share of the credit by the architect who rears a new one. Many of the most inspiriting commentators upon existence have been those who said that life was not worth living. At this particular hour I happen to think it is, but it will not harm me, or Upton Sinclair, or any other to be asked every once and so often to stand and deliver upon the challenge of a searching "Why?"

"Pessimism," Sinclair writes, "is mental disease. It is that wherever and under whatever circumstances it appears, in art and philosophy, as in everyday life. It means illness in the person who voices it, and in the society which produces that person. If it continues unchecked in an individual, it is a symptom of his moral breakdown; if it prevails in the literature, art, drama, politics, or philosophy of a nation it means that nation is in course of decay."

All this is near-sighted nonsense. Most of the men who say "I was never sick a day in my life," are liars and if truthful highly unfortunate. A good rousing sickness is part of the necessary experience of persons who are ever going to amount to anything. Even better is the adventure of such as have been told "There is no hope; you are going to die." Pessimism is the very food of striving. Indeed I would revise Sinclair's formula to read that any nation is in a perilous position if there are not many who go about and say that everything is wrong, always has been wrong, and always will be. There never yet came a messiah who was not preceded by an advance guard of gloomy prophets.

To be much more specific, I would name Henry L. Mencken as the most invigorating publicist now writing in America. Mencken has given a lifetime of devotion to pointing out the unutterable follies of life in general and more particularly life in this land. If he has ever made a suggestion as to how conditions could be altered or even expressed the remotest hope of amelioration that paragraph escaped me. He is not ill and America seems to me as yet too unripe to be decaying.

The pessimist plays upon a brassy bugle. His familiar complaint is, "I can't get 'em up." But after a while we do get up and it is the trumpet notes of despair and not of triumph which serve to wake us.

War in Colorado

By FRANK L. PALMER

Walsenburg, Colorado, November 26

COLORADO again has paid in blood for the dominance in its coal industry of John D. Rockefeller, Jr.

On Monday, November 21, some 600 members of the families of striking miners in northern Colorado marched to the Columbine mine, as they had gone every workday morning for three weeks, singing and laughing, happy in the success of a strike which had left only one mine in the whole district operating. They were convinced that they had the support of Governor Adams in holding a mass meeting wherever there was a post office, and they held this opinion with good grounds. There is a post office and a public school inside the Columbine fenced camp. The miners believed they had a right to go in; the guards might threaten but they would not shoot. So their leaders searched them for guns or knives and sent them out on the picket line assured of their safety. The new dominant stockholder, Miss Josephine Roche, had given orders through her representative, Merle Vincent, that the gates were to be left open and that there was to be no shooting, even though the mine were destroyed. Governor Adams, hearing that machine-guns were there, had ordered them removed Saturday. Coal operator, State executive, and striker seemed united against violence.

Yet at least five persons were killed (the strikers still claim another was slain) and some score of others were seriously wounded. The strikers charge they were shot down by the machine-guns; certain it is that the machine-guns were not taken out of the camp as ordered by Governor Adams, but were set up before, during, or immediately after the massacre. The guards had been ordered not to fire, yet they threw tear-gas bombs into the strikers' ranks, infuriated them into throwing stones, and then killed them because they threw the stones. The guards charge that four shots were fired over the camp by striking snipers. There is no charge made that in the crowd of men and women who were fired on there were any who used weapons. The casualties among the State police consisted of three men hit by stones or fists and one man who had his finger cut. The killed and seriously wounded were all strikers.

Immediately after the massacre thoughtful observers in Colorado began to ask why it should have happened at the Columbine. The Saturday previous the strikers had marched to the camp, met the sheriff who asked them not to go in, put him at the head of the parade, and marched back to town for doughnuts and coffee with him. The Rocky Mountain Fuel Company, which owns the Columbine, is almost the only company in Colorado which is dominated by such a person as Josephine Roche, with anything like liberal ideas. The I. W. W. leaders have constantly preached peace. It seemed that no one wanted trouble—yet it occurred. Why?

Of course it is not true to say that no one wanted trouble. It is only true of the executive heads. Under Governor Adams, the State police are headed by Louis Scherf, former captain in the Colorado Rangers under the notorious "Pat" Hamrock, and thoroughly trained in labor-hating policies. Directly in charge of the force at the Columbine was Sam Lee, worse even than Scherf. Thomas Annear, chairman of the Industrial Commission appointed by Governor Sweet, had said that there would be no strike. Feeling the stigma placed on the commission by his complete failure to estimate the situation in advance, he had become frantically eager to get the men back in the mines at any cost. Yet nine days before the massacre he had said: "This is the most peaceful strike the State ever saw." After the massacre he announced that Louis Scherf ought to have a gold medal for his "bravery"! The Industrial Commission had been saved, it seemed, and his charges against the I. W. W. had been proved. It is very significant that Mr. Annear, as the newspapers reported, "just happened" to be at the Columbine that morning. Especially is this significant when it is known that the State police sent to Denver at midnight the night before for their steel helmets! Adjutant General Newlon of the National Guard had disagreed with the Governor for some time because the troops had not been ordered into the field, and later because martial law was not declared. He "happened" to be at the Columbine with Thomas Annear. So that, despite the Governor's apparent desire for peace, at least three men in his force at the scene of action wanted trouble.

In the company group a similar situation existed. When Miss Roche gained dominance in the Rocky Mountain Fuel Company (she does not have complete control), she called Merle Vincent to represent her interests and become general manager. He discharged Walter Belk, one of the most notorious gunmen of the Ludlow strike, from his position at the Columbine. Vincent took the position as general counsel which had been held by Judge Jesse G. Northcutt, the man largely responsible for the fighting in the 1913 strike; and he removed General Manager Peart. General Manager Peart's son, Ted Peart, was still superintendent at the Columbine. The Pearts, both father and son, belong to the old Northcutt-Belk days. Merle Vincent, who had ordered the gates left open and the strikers given access to the property for their mass meetings, was not present on that fatal Monday morning. Ted Peart was; though he resigned his position on the following Friday.

Whether accurately or not, Miss Roche has been quoted as saying that she would "sell her stock for fifty cents if there were any bloodshed." The Denver newspapers have reported for some time that John D. Rockefeller's Colorado Fuel and Iron Company was eager to buy the Rocky Mountain Fuel Company. It is certain that the C. F. and I. wanted the militia in the field to help break the strike.

From certain standpoints the Columbine massacre was a success. Undoubtedly suspicion has been thrown upon the principles for which Miss Roche and Merle Vincent stand within the Rocky Mountain Fuel Company; perhaps Miss Roche is tempted to sell out her holdings and give up. The newspapers have made it appear that the Governor was wrong in refusing to send in troops and in ordering machine-guns away from the camp. The Industrial Commission is probably more firmly in the saddle and Thomas Annear's bitter attacks on the I. W. W. are apparently justified. Gaining control of the Columbine may be well worth the financial cost to the Rockefellers. And no Rockefellers were killed in the massacre.

But of course there is always the danger that the truth will become known.

For a year organizers for the United Mine Workers have charged that I. W. W. organizers were at work in the C. F. and I. camps under the company's protection. They have said that the company allowed them there to offset United Mine Workers activities, while the regular union organizers were driven out of the camps. They have warned that conditions were so bad in the mines that the companies might find themselves with an I. W. W. strike on their hands.

Then in September came the notice of demands for a wage increase to the Jacksonville scale, the six-hour day, and better conditions, with warning of a strike. The workers made the same demands for the enforcement of already existing laws as were made in 1913. There is still almost no such thing as a properly elected check-weighman in Colorado, despite the law. And other laws are flagrantly violated. The notice was drawn up with the advice of two attorneys and was legal as far as the men knew how to make it so. After the thirty days required by law had passed and the Industrial Commissioners were still busy telling the miners not to follow an "illegal, un-American organization," and telling the State that there would be no strike—the men walked out. Two weeks later, the Attorney General pronounced the strike notice illegal. This makes it a crime to strike, to incite others to strike, or to do almost anything helpful to the strike. Of course the ruling is being ignored. It is interesting to note that among those who are asserting that the strike is illegal and is being led by outsiders, is William H. Young, now labor member of the Industrial Commission. He has forgotten that in 1919 a strike of steel workers in Pueblo was led by a printing pressman and that no notice of any kind was given the Industrial Commission. Yet this same William H. Young was that pressman.

Before the strike was called I. W. W. organizers bragged that 4,000 miners would walk out. Actually, 5,500 struck. And the strike spread. Despite the fact that the Scripps-Howard Rocky Mountain News has been saying for four weeks that the strike was almost over and the men were going back to work, new mines and new fields are closing. The Colorado Springs district was not affected until November 19. Now it is practically shut. Industries are closing for lack of coal. Only an unusually warm fall has kept Denver from suffering and, even so, coal is being shipped in from outside.

One of the most important factors in the strike has been the constant campaign of the newspapers to connect the I. W. W. with violence. And there has been violence in the strike. The Saturday night before the strike was called Walsenburg business men met and decided to "run the wobblies out of town." With Mayor Pritchard leading, some 80 men marched to the I. W. W. hall, shot out the windows, smashed in the door, and took private records out and burned them. Newspaper reports naively said, after describing the incident, "So far there has been no violence." Neither Mayor Pritchard nor any member of his mob has been arrested.

Later a group of the newly created State police went into a meeting and began arresting the speakers. Their tactics inflamed the crowd and there was a fight, with various reports of chairs and knives being used. No one was seriously injured. The violence at the Columbine is well known. Some mine property burned in the southern field; the fire was blamed on the I. W. W. until it was discovered that the burned property had been abandoned several years before. In short, there has been one mob—of business men; there has been a massacre where police were hit by stones and one hurt his finger—while five strikers were killed and a score wounded; there has been a free-for-all fight over the right of free speech. "It has been the most peaceful strike the State ever saw."

Back of it all lies the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company and the Rockefeller Plan. The miners have been reduced in pay time after time under the "plan" by the subterfuge of calling in their representatives in the company union and explaining that the wages would have to be cut or the mines closed—or that a wage cut would widen the sales field and give the men more day's work. Since they have worked an average of 184 days a year for the last six years, that is important. The wage cuts have come, but the number of days worked has not substantially increased. The miners are controlled by the "plan" and they know it. Real conditions are much the same as they were before 1913. The petty bosses instil fear by the threat of discharge or the offer of favoritism. The old phrase, made famous in 1913, "down the canyon," still strikes terror to the hearts of C. F. and I. miners. And it is no idle threat.

The future of the strike will depend on food. The miners are standing solidly despite everything, but the cry of hungry babies is worse than the whine of bullets. Colorado is a long way from the sources of generous support and apparently not enough men and women have yet died to open purse-strings. Operators, the State, death cannot break the strike. Slow starvation may.

A Sacco Revolver Expert Revealed

By ARTHUR WARNER

ON October 8, last, a bootlegger by the name of Ernest J. Yorkell was murdered in Cleveland. A few weeks later Frank Milazzo was arrested with a revolver in his possession. A detective sergeant who was instructed to trace the history of the revolver reported his belief that the weapon was the one used in the killing of Yorkell. The revolver was thereupon sent to an expert in New York City together with bullets taken from the dead man. The expert found that the bullets had been fired from the revolver, upon learning which the Cleveland police charged Milazzo with the murder of Yorkell.

Milazzo presumably would have gone to trial and might have been convicted, but the Cleveland News suddenly confounded the police with the information that the revolver in question had not been sold until November 3, nearly a month after the murder. This statement was confirmed by the records of the manufacturer and the retail dealer, the murder charge against Milazzo was dropped, and an inquiry was ordered into the work of the detective sergeant who had incorrectly reported the history of the revolver.

Such a case, involving an inexcusable mistake on the part of a trusted police officer and a complete fiasco in the findings of a so-called ballistic expert, is important enough as it stands to deserve circulation through the country, although apparently it has received no publicity outside of the neighborhood of Cleveland. But the facts become immensely more significant when it is known who the revolver expert is. He is Major Calvin H. Goddard, a former military man, who last summer announced that he had determined by new and positive tests the guilt of Nicola Sacco. Major Goddard compared the revolver taken from Sacco when he was arrested with a bullet from the body of the paymaster's guard murdered at South Braintree, Massachusetts, and was convinced that the bullet had been fired from the revolver. Major Goddard conducted his tests on June 3, last, and communicated the results to Governor Fuller and his advisory committee on the Sacco-Vanzetti case, but the findings were not made public until after the report of the Lowell committee against Sacco and Vanzetti. Then, on August 10, they received wide circulation in the newspapers and must have had appreciable effect in confirming public opinion on the side of the Lowell report. Major Goddard described his method as follows:

> The instrument in question is nothing more than a highly perfected form of comparison microscope, employing optical principles long known. The model used was, however, especially designed for investigations upon bullets and shells and, to the best of my knowledge, none other equally well adapted to this purpose has been constructed.
> Its function is to fuse into a single one the images of two bullets or shells so that in case they bear identical markings the composite picture produced will reveal, after the identical markings have been located and brought into proximation, what appears to be a single object rather than the fusion of two objects.
> Unless two bullets have passed through the same barrel, they can never be so fused as to present the appearance of a single bullet, the picture always revealing marked differences in its two halves. This holds true also for shells which have or have not been fired in the same arm (those from the same arm matching, others failing to match).

As a result of his tests Major Goddard reached the following conclusions:

> 1. That Fraher shell No. 3 was fired in the Sacco pistol and could have been fired in no other.
> 2. That the so-called fatal bullet, being one of four from the body of one Berardelli, was fired through the Sacco pistol and could have been fired through no other.

"Permit me also to add," recited Major Goddard, "that I conducted the tests outlined for the simple reason that I knew the comparison microscope would reveal with mechanical accuracy and in a manner which no human opinion could refute the facts in the case."

Two days after the appearance of Major Goddard's findings in the press he issued a reply to certain criticisms, saying:

> As to . . . the soundness of my methods, I can only say that leaders of the bench, bar, and police, as well as men of the highest standing in the technical and criminological worlds both in this country and in Europe, have passed upon them. They have been inspected by the technical staff of a large government department and that staff has indicated a desire to apply some of them to its own use.
> The work has been described by former Deputy Police Commissioner Joseph A. Faurot, who is himself known as the "father of finger-printing" in the United States, as "a science as infallible, as practicable, as revolutionary, and as valuable as finger-printing itself."

Two clarifications need to be added to this recital, one in justice to the Lowell committee and the other to Major Goddard. Although the latter's findings were submitted to Governor Fuller and his advisory committee, it does not appear that they weighed appreciably in the conclusions reached. William G. Thompson, counsel for Sacco and Vanzetti, said that he had been assured that the Goddard statement had not influenced the Governor or his advisers in their decision. Certainly no reference to it is made in the Lowell committee's report. On the other hand, the Goddard findings did have an influence on public opinion, publication taking place just at the moment when the newspapers were printing most on the case and when many persons, for the first time, were trying to get at the facts or reach conclusions in their own minds. The Nation received a number of letters inquiring about or discussing Major Goddard's findings.

In fairness to Major Goddard it ought to be said also that he attributes the mistake in regard to the Cleveland crime to a possible confusion of bullets. After the revolver had been taken from Milazzo it went to the city chemist's office, where bullets were fired through it for purposes of comparison with those taken from the body of the slain bootlegger. Major Goddard suggests that the two sets of bullets may have been confused and he may have received as those taken from the dead body the ones that were fired through the revolver in the city chemist's office. The Cleveland officials deny any possibility of confusion, but Major Goddard's explanation is given for whatever it may be worth.

Where does this leave expert testimony? Does it discredit that kind of evidence in our courts or elsewhere? Not necessarily. This is a scientific and a technical age in which science and technology must be called upon to help wherever they can reasonably be employed. But the Cleveland episode emphasizes the fallibility of all such methods and suggests that the community at large should be alert to check the claims of experts by its own reason and experience.

The American method of employing experts in court trials plays especially into the hands of the know-it-alls. In order to earn a fee an expert has to take a stand on one side or the other—and be sure of it. There is no room for doubt or the more judicial expression of opinion in which the truth commonly lies. Probably few experts knowingly bear false witness merely to earn a fee, but in the long run they must take the stand or starve or quit.

If we are to continue to employ experts in our courts—and undoubtedly we are—they ought to be called, as in some European countries, not by the opposing lawyers but by the judge; they should be selected because of their general reputation, and their opinions on the case at issue ought not to be known to anyone until expressed in court.

What Business Wants from Congress

By LAURENCE TODD

Washington, November 30

NO public competition with private investment: that, in substance, is the demand which organized business will make upon Congress in the session just beginning.

Whether one examines the legislative program of the National Association of Manufacturers or that of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, or looks into the activities of the compact new Joint Committee of National Utility Associations, or speaks to one of the hundred special representatives in Washington for some one industry, the inquiry brings this consistent reply. Business desires aid from the government, but it requires first that the government refrain from competing with private initiative.

Water-power is the spearhead of conflict, at the moment, between the forces of organized business and the elements that seek to adapt government to the service of the commonalty. Seventeen billions of dollars of investment, according to George B. Cortelyou, chairman of the Joint Committee of National Utility Associations, is represented in that body. Its chief component parts are the National Electric Light Association, the American Electric Railway Association, and the American Gas Association. Its director is Stephen B. Davis, former solicitor of the Department of Commerce under Mr. Hoover, and now vice-chairman, under Hoover, of the American Delegation in the International Radio-Telegraph Conference. Its counsel in Washington—described by Senator Hiram Johnson as its chief lobbyist—is Josiah T. Newcomb. What Newcomb asks of the new Congress is significant—the leasing of Muscle Shoals power plant to private interests, the abandonment of public construction of a power plant at Boulder Canyon on the Colorado River, and the shelving of the resolution offered by Senator Walsh of Montana, inquiring into the power trust and other recent rapid consolidations of investment capital.

For several years past the National Electric Light Association has sought to convince the American public that electricity is sold in this country by private corporations at a low cost. It has promoted the publication of arguments seeking to show that the publicly owned giant-power system operated by the Ontario Hydro-Electric Commission is not selling electricity at half the rates charged in the United States. Yet so rapidly has risen the tide of public interest in Ontario Hydro-Electric, and so firmly have the hopes of consumers been grounded upon declarations against the private-power monopoly by Governor Smith of New York and former Governor Pinchot of Pennsylvania that the Electric Light Association has joined forces with the street-railway and gas companies' federations, to deal directly and openly with Congress. It now proposes to stop the current of public enthusiasm for a government-owned giant-power system based on the Muscle Shoals and Boulder Canyon power resources. Moreover, it is determined that the Senate shall not look critically into the mergers, consolidations, purchases, recapitalizations, and other steps which have advanced the General Electric group to domination not only of electric power but of the radio industry.

Senator George W. Norris delivered a speech at a reception given in his honor, last spring, by the National Popular Government League, in which he declared for the Ontario plan and said that the government should proceed to develop a chain of power plants across the country, which would duplicate the Ontario performance. That is, they would cut in half the present charge to consumers for electric current, and would correspondingly stimulate the electrification of industry, commerce, and housework. This speech created such anxiety in the offices of the power companies that Newcomb delivered an address on October 13, before the Southern Appalachian Power Conference at Chattanooga, devoted to denial of the existence of a power trust and declaring that "the progress desired and the solution of the problems presented" in the industry today "are constantly being delayed and obscured by government ownership projects. These schemes are inadequately prepared. Practically none of them is ever put through."

That none of them shall be put through the new Congress is the practical task which Mr. Newcomb has set himself. To his aid have come the rival general organizations for promotion of business measures before the national legislature—the National Association of Manufacturers and the Chamber of Commerce of the United States.

In the resolutions adopted by the N. A. M. at its convention in Chattanooga in October the water-power issue is obliquely dealt with in connection with the problem of Mississippi flood control. Federal action and federal responsibility for prevention of future floods are demanded, but if dams at reservoir sites are to be built, power plants in public hands are barred. Thus: "Such plan for control of our greatest and most dangerous river should be shaped with that single object in view and relieved from the handicap of any other plans or secondary proposals which interested groups or sections or partisan interests may seek to attach to it."

The Chamber of Commerce is of opinion "that flood control of the Mississippi River is a work of such magnitude and urgency that it should be dealt with in legislation and administration upon its own merits, separate and distinct from any other undertaking."

If there be ambiguity in these phrases, there is none in the further declaration by the chamber in its official current program issued on October 17, that

> In the National Chamber's confession of economic faith this principle stands paramount—that government scrupulously refrain from entering any of the fields of transportation, communication, industry, or commerce, or any phase of business when it can be successfully undertaken and conducted by private enterprise. The chamber, to be sure, recognizes that the utilities, invested with a public interest, are subject to government regulation, but it insists that such regulation be so exercised that it become not burdensome as to cost and not palsying to that initiative without which adequate and efficient service is impossible.

One of the second-rate powers in the world of business-representation in Washington is the American Mining Congress. Early in November it issued a press statement.

> Government ownership or control of business is opposed by three-fourths of the replies to a nation-wide questionnaire by the American Mining Congress which was sent to a selected list of 500 leading authorities on banking, taxation, industry, production, and transportation, as well as to editors, economists, engineers, college presidents, lawyers, and clergymen. . . . During the past two years there has been much discussion as to the proposition for the invasion of the government into private industry. Its ramifications lead from municipally operated street-railway and lighting systems into State-operated insurance and construction of public works by day labor instead of by contract; construction service by navy yards for outside parties. . . ., etc.

At a conference staged by the Mining Congress in Washington for December 1 to 3, Phil P. Campbell, former Congressman from Kansas and now identified as counsel for oil interests, is scheduled to talk on Federal Control—the Bugaboo of Industry.

If the power lobby appears certain to hold the center of the stage in Congress with its fight against the beginning of any public experiment in production and sale of electricity, the shipping and railroad groups will be no less busy defending their sectors against the common foe. In the programs of the National Association of Manufacturers and the Chamber of Commerce is the demand that the American merchant marine be developed as a private enterprise and that railroad consolidation be left to the railroad owners. The N. A. M. declares firmly against public ownership or operation of transportation facilities "wherever private ownership and operation is possible." The chamber is "unalterably opposed to government ownership of land carriers as it is opposed to government ownership of ocean carriers." The chamber says that > Experience of ten years of government in the shipping business has proved beyond cavil that American business has not that degree of confidence in a government marine that must prevail if the American marine is to meet commercial needs in peace time and defense needs in war time. The chamber, moreover, is opposed to a proposal coming before Congress for yet another costly experiment in government shipbuilding in furtherance of government ownership.

> But the chamber is not content with mere opposition. It is in support of sound measures to encourage private investment in shipping enterprises. . . . Congress can assist in bringing this about and at materially less cost to the taxpayer than by supinely accepting the defeatist propaganda that government ownership is the only way to keep the American flag on the seas.

Former Chairman Hurley of the United States Shipping Board has come forward with a proposal, which may possibly be in line with this declaration, that Congress provide for a loan of $500,000,000 at 2½ per cent interest, to private shipbuilders in this country.

The ubiquitous Joint Committee of Mr. Newcomb, realizing the need for general propaganda against the public ownership doctrine, has issued a pamphlet entitled "Government—Federal, State, Local—Fails in Industry." It begins with selected sentiments from Abraham Lincoln and Herbert Hoover, enters into a misrepresentation of the degree of success achieved by public ownership in Ontario and elsewhere, quotes George E. Roberts of the National City Bank to prove government operation of railroads, navy yards, and mints inefficient, and finally comes to a symposium entitled Great Minds Speak.

Calvin Coolidge is selected as the first great mind. The first sentiments quoted from an address delivered when he was Governor of Massachusetts are these: "The alternative to private ownership and control is public ownership and control. Broadly extended, this is communism." Other great minds, quoted in balanced statement, are William Howard Taft, Charles Evans Hughes, Herbert Hoover, Senators Watson of Indiana and Fess of Ohio, the late Cardinal Gibbons, and John Spargo.

Spargo raises the question of a broadened capitalism:

> Unless I misread the signs of the times, the great need of the world, the fundamental requisite for economic rehabilitation, is a vast strengthening of the capitalist system of the several countries. This requires a tremendous augmentation of private enterprise and the incentives to such enterprise. It requires a great strengthening of faith in the security of investments and the opening up of all possible channels for investment in productive enterprises. It requires the development of a vast army of investors in every country.

This is the most effective line of opposition which lobbyists in Washington have found, in recent sessions, against sentiment for public ownership. Newcomb's organization will demand the private leasing of Muscle Shoals and the blocking of the Swing-Johnson bill for construction of the dam and power plant at Boulder Canyon, in the name of the "vast army" of shareholders and bondholders in public-utility enterprises. Newcomb has already suggested, at a luncheon given to a selected group of press correspondents in the capital, that investments in the industry should not be disturbed by the threat of government competition or by government inquiry into private business affairs.

For this reason the public-ownership advocates, stubbornly holding out against the "vast army" of investors, hopefully will quote the American Economic Review's discovery that, of the stock of a big railroad in the hands of "employees," 89 per cent is owned by officials, 8 per cent by higher-paid clerical employees, and only 1 per cent by engineers, conductors, and other manual workers. Wide diffusion of stock ownership, as a realization of public ownership under efficient private management, will be claimed by the spokesmen of organized business to be the most significant fact in American economic life today. The fact will be denied by the spokesmen of organized labor as well as by the public ownership specialists. And in face of that dispute as to fact the session will muddle through.

Americans We Like

Florence E. Allen

By EMILY NEWELL BLAIR

The fifth in a series of personality portraits

WHAT Judge Allen's quality is I do not find easy to say. Some persons might call it serenity or poise. But it is much more than that. It is the sort of calm that comes out of a perfect balance of all opposing elements, perhaps that old-fashioned thing, a soul—at any rate whatever it is that produces unity.

To find this quality in any woman today, whether in a homemaker or a nun, would be surprising, but to find it in the woman who has pioneered in politics, in law, in journalism, the first woman judge of a court of general jurisdiction, legal and equitable, civil and criminal, the first woman judge in a court of last resort, a candidate for the United States Senate, is far more so. The struggle for success lays its mark on each human being who essays it, but it lays it even more cruelly on the women who seek competition on even terms with men politically, industrially, in any way except emotionally—a strident voice, a hardness about the eye, clenched hands. "We're all," said one the other day to me, "a little hard-boiled with the process, you know."

But Judge Allen is not hard-boiled. Her voice is thick and, even when raised in appeal, round. Her near-sighted eyes are whimsical and restful. Her hands lie flat and still. All around her is a little pool of peace. Yet she has campaigned a great State for two public offices. Perhaps this incident may give us a clue: When she ran for her present office, that of judge of the Supreme Court of Ohio, she had little money for campaign expenses and no time to make trips. But each week-end she went to some nearby town and spoke on Sunday morning in the local church. She did not make an appeal for votes. She discussed the subjects of the day and urged the attention of her congregation to them. She appeared to people, discussed matters before them, and left the candidacy to them. The League of Women Voters and other associations sent questionnaires to her, asking her stand on important issues. She answered them briefly but fully. The answers were already made in her own mind. To trim them, to arrange them so they would not offend or could be construed in several ways never occurred to her.

She likes people. It was no trouble to shake their hands, smile into their faces, and listen if they had something to say. That was all there was to it. Of course, had she tried to "win" them, to find out what they wanted, to flatter them, to put herself over—that would have been different. But never in her life has Judge Allen set out to "charm" anyone, to capitalize herself, to "sell" her personality. She would not know how.

She has her work. It is a big job, that of being a Supreme Court judge. It comes first. Her day's program is planned to make it effective. She rises early and does her exercises. She takes a long walk. She goes to her office, does her work, goes home. Then there is company, a little music, perhaps a party, but nine-thirty sees her in bed.

Yet she is by no means a person of limited interests. For two years after leaving college she studied music in Berlin where she was musical correspondent for the Musical Courier and the Continental Times. For three years she taught in an exclusive preparatory school. At the same time she was working for her degree of Master of Arts in political science and constitutional law and conducting the musical column of the Cleveland Plain Dealer. While studying law she lectured on music and current political history for the New York Board of Education and before women's clubs in New York and Philadelphia. After her admission to the bar, of course, she practiced law. In a short time she was made assistant prosecuting attorney of Cuyahoga County, Ohio. Then she was elected judge of the Court of Common Pleas and two years later was elected to the Supreme Court of Ohio.

I received my first impression of Judge Allen at a suffrage conference in Chicago in 1914 when the two suffrage associations were at loggerheads about the so-called Shafroth Amendment. One group, headed by Ruth Hanna McCormick, was sponsoring this measure as "opening wedge" legislation, while the other was urging concentration on the then apparently hopeless Susan B. Anthony Amendment. Mrs. McCormick had called in the leaders from the Midwestern States to explain her amendment. There was much feeling on both sides, some of the women regarding any question as to their leader's policies as treason and others attacking this position violently. A young woman arose. She analyzed the suffrage situation, gave a résumé of its history, and assailed the wisdom and constitutionality of the Shafroth Amendment. Tactics she swept aside. There was our goal. There was a direct road to it. Ours to take it by the strength of our cause and of our faith in it.

I cannot remember any other speech and my memory of hers is due not to the forcefulness of her manner or to the logic of her argument but to the sincerity which animated it, a sincerity so passionate that it placed her at once above all partisanship. I have never since been able to imagine her tied to or absorbed by any organization. She may work with it for a definite purpose but she will never be used by it or have it direct her.

Beliefs she has, of course, even convictions, and in this day when they seem rare. But there are others who have both. What differentiates her from the other advocates of causes is the passion of her sincerity. This sincerity is something entirely apart from fanaticism, because it has its roots in reason rather than in emotions. One feels certain that she comes to her beliefs after much serious debate within herself, after weighing the pros and cons, with an ability to see both sides and judicially to weigh them and arrive at what is for her the truth. After she has done that, she serves these beliefs to the uttermost.

My second impression of Judge Allen was also gained from a situation. I was campaigning with some officials of the Democratic organization in Ohio and we were speaking to a group of party workers. One of the women present asked the county leader what they should do about Judge Allen who was then running on the ticket for the Supreme Court. It was well known that she was a Democrat but she was running as an independent and there was another nominee who was generally regarded as the Democratic candidate.

The county chairman, new to women voters, told them in simple terms fit for the comprehension of political novices that Judge Allen had had her opportunity to run in the primaries and seek the approval of the Democratic organization, but, since she had preferred to run as an independent, no matter how fine a Democrat she was personally, all good Democrats should vote for the Democratic nominee. Then Judge Allen could enter the next primaries as a Democrat and they could vote for her. Although I was not familiar with the Ohio law, it had occurred to me while he was speaking that the law was possibly written to procure a non-partisan judiciary and that Judge Allen was running under it and not under the "arrangement" whereby the political organization sought to make it a dead letter.

The women, who were Ohioans, did know the law. They also knew their Judge Allen and rallied to her support. For, though the politicians tried their utmost to make it appear that she was a wolf climbing over the partisan fence, these women knew, as did thousands of men, that here was a candidate who went straight to the heart of the matter and, without excuses or explanations, acted on her belief that the judiciary should be non-partisan.

Next to her sincerity I put this ability of hers to go to the heart of a question, past traditions, rules, habits, customs, and the arguments of political sophists. There is no circumlocution about her. She thinks clearly as well as passionately. And she thinks clearly about vital matters—equality, honesty, peace, crime, justice.

Perhaps most of her friends would place emphasis on her courage. It would take courage, one would think, to do many of the things she has done—give up a good position to study law, enter the practice of law handicapped as a woman, run against all popular traditions for a judgeship, run for the Senate against a most popular Democratic ex-Senator. But I doubt if it took courage for Judge Allen to do any of these things. I think that she sees so clearly what she should do, and has such a passionate desire to do it, that the question of whether it is easy or hard does not seriously occur to her.

But I should never call her aggressive. An aggressive woman is one who exerts herself to get what she wants regardless of the claims of others. Judge Allen does not impress me as reaching so much as standing. The English phrase "standing for election" expresses her mental attitude toward public office and her method of campaigning. She does not run or seek. She stands. She does not exert her force. She merely presents it.

An element of this force is her capacity for compassion—not pity, not even sympathy, but a deep sadness over the sufferings of the world. One feels this in every speech she makes. I do not think that it came to her after she lost her beloved brothers in the war. I cannot imagine Judge Allen basing any conclusion or belief on personal experience. She is too much the student. The way she attacked this subject of peace shows that. While she still had no influence, while there was nothing she could do for the cause of peace, she said nothing. But she spent most of her vacations studying the problems of peace, going to the League of Nations at Geneva, and traveling to various capitals in Europe to discuss peace with students and statesmen. She made a thorough study of international law.

But once having mastered her data and reached her conclusions, she brought to her conviction for the outlawry of war such passionate sincerity, such directness of thought, such depth of compassion that a United States Senator, hearing her at an enormous meeting in Washington, wrote her speech next day into the record and, when I thanked him, said: "I didn't, in fact, know she was a Democrat but I knew it was the best speech I had ever heard on that subject, bar none, and I thought it should be preserved."

I make her sound formidable. And she is not. She is the sort of woman to whom any child on a train would appeal for help. She is the kind to whom business girls flock with their troubles. She has a fine sense of humor. She asks no quarter because she is a woman. She yields no precedence because she is one. Not that she is unfeminine. As a matter of fact she is typical of the eternal feminine—the maternal. She would do to serve as a model for a statue of the Motherhood of the Race.

One of the things hoped for by the suffragists of old was that suffrage might make available for public service specially gifted women, thus increasing the all too small supply of brain and character for that purpose. Here we have such a woman. Twice an electorate has recognized its opportunity. Once by making Florence Allen judge of the Court of Common Pleas, once by making her judge of the Supreme Court of Ohio. She was defeated for the nomination for the United States Senate. But she will probably run again. Let us hope she does. She brings qualities to public life that are needed, although, if we are to judge by results, seldom desired.

In the Driftway

TO succeed in life as a stowaway one should not be fat. Of course there are other occupations in which avoirdupois is no asset. It's no help to a man who is looking for a job as a living skeleton in a circus or to a debutante who is making her bow in society. But especially is fat to be shunned by him who would win his way as a stowaway, for a stowaway must be quick to take advantage of an opening—especially one the size of a ship's porthole. Ettore de Stefano and Joseph Smutney are entitled to a triple A rating as stowaways. Giovanni Sarni isn't—and all because they are lean while he is fat. All three came over in the steamship France a year ago—without visas and without tickets. They were detected, and when the ship reached New York they were handcuffed and locked up to be returned to Europe. But one night before the ship sailed Stefano and Smutney rubbed soap on their wrists, wriggled out of their handcuffs, climbed through a porthole, and swam to freedom. For they were lean. Sarni had to remain aboard and go back where he came from. For Sarni was fat and stuck fast in the porthole.

* * * * *

BUT though satisfactorily lean, Smutney was not equally wise. In a vest which he discarded in order to facilitate his exit through the porthole he carelessly left the card of a man in Culver, Indiana. A detective of the French Line found the card, went out to Culver, and Smutney was taken back to New York and deported while the steamship company recovered the $1,000 fine assessed against it for letting him escape. Smutney told the detective he thought Stefano had been drowned in trying to make shore from the ship.

Smutney hadn't stopped to make sure. It's every man for himself in the profession of stowaway—as in most other callings.

* * * * *

BUT Stefano was not drowned. He got ashore, looked the landscape over for a few months, and then returned to Europe—probably in the same way in which he came over. But he had learned to love America, and a month or so ago he returned to New York in the steamship Paris—in the stowaway class, as usual. Again he was imprisoned aboard the ship for deportation. This time he had no convenient porthole, so he escaped by breaking a lock. The same detective was called upon. This time Stefano had been careless. He had left a photograph of himself and a diary kept under the name Hector Stevens. The detective recognized in the photograph his man of a year before, took the trail, and finally learned that a Hector Stevens had been employed at the Hotel Biltmore but had left on account of a skin disease. The detective began a round of clinics and recently found Stefano at the New York Skin and Cancer Hospital. He was taken to Ellis Island and again, since the officials could think of nothing more original, ordered deported.

* * * * *

BUT Stefano knew a better trick than that. He stripped to his underwear, got out of his detention room at Ellis Island, and plunged into the frigid bay to swim to Jersey City. Probably he would have succeeded but a couple of tugs were inconsiderately using the same part of the bay at the time. They got between him and the pier he was heading for and, chilled to the marrow, he was obliged to give up. Stefano was once more put behind lock and key at Ellis Island, and as the Drifter has read of no further escape he fears this splendid young stowaway was this time shipped back to Europe. But not for long. Even now he may be on his way back to the golden land of opportunity—in his usual fashion.

* * * * *

IF Stefano comes back—or rather when Stefano comes back—the Drifter thinks he should be permitted to enter without further molestation. In fact Mayor Walker should send a tug down New York Bay to welcome him. He has earned the right to enter. Doubtless immigration laws are necessary evils, but there should be some provision making exceptions for persons of special merit and achievement. The Drifter doubts if all of our recent transatlantic fliers have carried passports properly visaed for the countries in which they have landed. Yet none of them has been denied admission or summarily deported. Congress should amend the immigration laws so that anyone successfully smuggling himself into the country three times should be permitted to stay. That would accommodate Stefano upon his next arrival, which is as it should be. For Stefano is not only a great stowaway; he is in the making a great American. He has the qualities of daring, resourcefulness, and ingenuity which have made America what it is. We are letting in thousands of inferior individuals while keeping a man of Stefano's mettle out. Probably he would not be so adaptable for a job in a Ford factory as some of the others. But he would make a dauntless taxi driver, a fine movie actor, or a successful politician. A successful politician has to know above all things how to crawl out of a tight hole.

That Fifteenth Amendment

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: About two months ago I mailed to every United States Senator a letter asking whether they considered the Fifteenth Amendment ("the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude") less sacred than the Eighteenth; why Congress should appropriate $30,000,000 in one year to enforce the Eighteenth and not one cent to enforce the Fifteenth Amendment; whether they would support legislation to enforce the right of colored citizens to vote. I received in all six replies.

Senator Borah writes that the Fifteenth Amendment cannot be enforced on account of its phrase "by any State," which makes all the difference in the world between it and the Eighteenth Amendment.

Senator Fletcher of Florida writes that no Negro in his State or any other Southern State has ever been denied the right to vote.

The remaining four Senators are just as unequivocal and clear-cut in their views on this national problem.

Newark, N. J., November 14 A. A. GOLDEN

From Mrs. Sacco

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Right after the legal assassination of my husband and of Bartolomeo Vanzetti the press spoke—and is now speaking—of groups, of organizations born here and there, with the compassionate purpose: some for the collection of funds for my maintenance and that of my children, made orphans by the plutocracy of the State; some for the collection and publication of memoirs and writings of the two martyrs and of the various phases that characterized the seven years of persecution and torture; some for erecting to them a monument; and some more—as real jackals—using the names of Sacco and Vanzetti as an advertisement that would attract the multitude, for the sale of commercial articles, etc.

Companions and friends from France write and send to me newspaper articles that mention subscriptions opened for the families of Sacco and Vanzetti. While I thank those who, in these years of atrocious Calvary, disinterestedly took to heart the fate of the dear martyrs and did not leave either me or my children deprived of assistance, I cannot remain in silence and therefore protest against whatever is speculation as an offense to their memory and to the principles for which they made the supreme sacrifice of their young lives.

If the nobility and wisdom of many people of high standing had turned into a struggle against the present system and social order, in order to make impossible, in the future, the repetition of fearful crimes such as that accomplished on August 23 by the State of Massachusetts, they would have obtained the acknowledgment and applause of the good. But, since many of these people are at the same time backers of that same system of things that prosecuted, tortured, and assassinated my husband and his companion, Bartolomeo Vanzetti, this arouses disgust if not contempt.

Always thanking the friends from France for their good intentions, allow me to say that the names of Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti would be better remembered if action and work are dedicated to the defense of the persecuted and condemned victims of class hatred, and to the restoration of rights and liberty of the peoples that in Europe—as well as in the rest of the world—are choked and ruined.

The Perils of Paris

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In your article from Paris dealing with the visit of the American Legion I was surprised to read some severe remarks on their conduct here. I was not in close contact with them, but as I observed them in the streets and public places they seemed to be very well-behaved. I thought a good many of them were in low spirits. They used to hang about the sheds in the Cours la Reine in a disheartened sort of way. I think many of them probably realized for the first time since the war that nine years have passed since the armistice was signed. They were not prepared for the Paris of today—the hard, violent city which is not only utterly different from the Paris before the war, but from the Paris during the war, the Paris they knew more or less.

Some of the legionaries drank wine on their visit, as they had a perfect right to do. The French would have been very much hurt if they had not. Personally, I never saw one of them drunk, or even in an exuberant mood. I should not suppose that, taken as a body, they spent much money here. The French commercial class, as shrewd a lot as there is in the world, had discounted their visit before they arrived. "The legionaries are not the kind of Americans who spend money in Paris," was what the shopkeepers and hotel-keepers said. The French Government spent several million francs to entertain the Legion. I very much doubt if the money spent by the legionaries in Paris came near covering this outlay of the city of Paris for their entertainment.

While on the question of conduct of Americans in Paris, I would call your attention to something very singular. Many of your readers have heard Ambassador Herrick's celebrated remark about Lindbergh. "Lindbergh left Paris as pure as when he entered it." In fact, the "purity" of Lindbergh, and the danger for him in the temptations with which Paris is supposed—I don't know why—to be infested, received a good deal of attention from specialists in these matters.

But now comes Miss (or Mrs.) Ruth Elder here along, and not a word have we heard about the dangers of Paris for her. There are now several American Protestant churches in Paris. On the Sunday Ruth Elder passed here I could not of course go to all of them, but I managed to go to three. I was much disappointed. There was some perfunctory allusion to the Elder performance, but not one minister thought fit to lecture her about the snares spread round her feet, or to enjoin her to leave Paris as pure as she entered it. Do they think Mrs. Elder is better able to take care of herself than a big, husky fellow like Lindbergh? And yet Lindbergh lived in Mr. Herrick's family, and went to bed at ten every night, while Mrs. Elder faces the crowd in pantaloons, with a man who is not her husband, and did not go near a church on Sunday. Do the ministers think she is past saving? Or that she is in no need of advice? Anyhow, it is very strange that it is the young man who is so jealously guarded and sedulously kept on the right track and not the young woman. The New York Herald Tribune (Paris edition) which has become quite wowser of late years and runs the Rev. Dr. Cadman's advice on the editorial page, even suggested that she should see some of the "night life" of Paris—whatever that is. It is not the night life in the Salvation Army barracks, at any rate. It was as much as any one's life was worth to mention the word "night" in connection with Lindbergh. I thought of sending him Young's "Night Thoughts," but counsels of prudence prevailed.

Covering the Legion visit was a certain amount of big melodrama stuff. The ash-tray story, for instance. Some bright party got it into his head to manufacture and distribute an ash-tray with a picture of a legionary dancing with a naked woman. Nobody took much notice of it till it was spied out by a reporter of l'Œuvre. Immediately Gustave Téry, the editor, loosened up his big batteries. The thing was an insult to the French woman, the French mother. Other papers joined in. The manufacturer was hunted out, and as he proved to be a Swiss or German he was expelled.

Yet the idea, after all, was harmless enough. It was simply a rather vulgar way of letting the Legion know that they were in for a great time. And who is to say that the woman was meant to be French? Every nationality, including Americans and Japanese, are to be found in the dancing and supping places nowadays. The night cabarets, which are, I suppose, the high spots the New York Herald thought Ruth Elder might visit, are often run by a Greek or other Levantine, manned and womaned by Russians and all varieties of Slavs who pass for Russians, as well as Persians, Armenians, Finlanders, and Magyars, with a Frenchman as landlord, and sometimes—though rarely—the cashier French also. As long as his rent is punctually remitted the French landlord does not trouble about what the "barbarians" do in his house.

The English papers were much amused at the care the French police took to purify Paris for the Americans. But the truth is that the measures were necessary for the protection of the decent people of Paris.

Through Sports to Peace?

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: For the first time I find myself in entire disagreement with one of your editorials. I, too, would feel gloomy about the peace mission of sports had I not participated in international contests in many countries.

American school-children are drilled and trained to be biased and prejudiced in sports and this partisanship sometimes finds painful expression in international games, creating the impression abroad that Americans are not good sportsmen.

During the first days of the Olympic games of 1920 at Antwerp a group of American Boy Scouts were instructed to give an American yell before each trial, concluding with the name of the representative of the United States. The yell was repeated in a fortissimo after an American victory, but the boys were silent after a defeat. But the atmosphere changed rapidly; in those days many a prejudice was broken down and many friendships established across national and color lines.

After the great explosion of a chemical factory in the Rhineland in the summer of 1921 the Groupement sportif—a sport association of civilian Frenchmen working in German occupied territory—organized a sports meeting for the benefit of those who had suffered. This meeting, attended by German and French civilians, and officers and privates of the French army, contributed substantially to a better feeling between Germans and French. Football games between German and French civilian teams subsequently became an ordinary occurrence in the Rhineland. I regard the German sport movement also as an expression of revolt against the rigid regimentation of the old Turnvereine. Sport has helped to break down many class barriers in Germany and there more than anywhere else sport, with its international competition, is something approaching a "moral equivalent for war."

Some years ago it was the custom to send warships as good-will messengers to other countries; today athletic young men fulfil such missions with greater effect. Many peculiar conceptions of Finland and the Finns have been dispelled by the visit to these shores of such splendid athletes and fine sportsmen as Kohlemainen, Ritola, and Nurmi. Did not Lindbergh, Chamberlin, and Byrd and his companions prove themselves splendid ambassadors?

Competitive sports in the United States of America are keen, hard, and ruthless. Great publicity, social prestige, scholarships, remunerative positions, "political jobs," all make losing hard. There is little sport for the joy of it. Fortunately in the rest of the world, where sports have not been commer-

Political Science

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: My son, a student at Hamilton College, writes me:

> Tuesday we took our political-science field trip into Utica. And what a raucous time we had! We certainly got all the first-hand details. I was sent to one of the polls to solicit Republican votes. No attention was paid to the 100-foot rule and we even had representatives inside the building. The chief function of the ward committeeman was to appear at stated intervals with a bottle of Scotch and disperse the same. Even the policemen came in for that. Votes were bought left and right, the top price being two bucks. Our man won, rather unexpectedly, and you should have seen the Republican Club that night! Most of the men were propped up against the wall, and I guess they had to pour some officials into bed. It's a great town.

For Greco and Carillo

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In a recent editorial paragraph dealing with the Greco-Carillo case you said that I was chairman of an American committee of defense. I am happy to announce that Italians and Americans interested in the case have been able to set up one joint committee on which every radical and liberal group, party, or faction interested in the case has been able to unite. To those who know the strength of feeling that often divides us the achievement of this unity must seem a good omen worthy to rank with Clarence Darrow's consent to take the case.

Nevertheless this is no time for false confidence. Those who demand victims, even innocent victims, to satisfy their lust for revenge for the murder of two Fascists in the Bronx on last Decoration Day are relentless and unscrupulous. Not for one minute do we suspect that the trial judge who will sit when the case begins on December 5 will be a second Webster Thayer. Unfortunately, in these cases involving a necessarily expensive defense it takes more than a fair judge to save poor, radical, alien workers from a frame-up. A conservative budget calls for $20,000. This must be raised. It is a small sum to deliver us from a repetition of such anguish as we knew in the Sacco-Vanzetti case and to save American justice from another such tragic blight.

Of this united Greco-Carillo Defense Committee Robert Morss Lovett is chairman, Arturo Giovannitti vice-chairman, Marguerite Tucker secretary, Filipo Greco treasurer, and Stuart Chase auditor. We are happy to announce that the editor of The Nation is one of its members. Temporary offices are at 70 Fifth Avenue, where your contributions will be promptly acknowledged.

In the interest of accuracy in a difficult field of fact, this exception to the general [illegible]

This Unbelieving Nation

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I do not write to The Nation with the least desire or expectation of having anything printed that I write but simply to satisfy myself. You interest me greatly and I read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest what you print, and do not believe one word of it.

Why? Simply because you are on the side of the poor, the oppressed, and the exploited! For my part I hate the poor! Damn 'em, they only make me uncomfortable by their misery! Through all the ages the money question has lain at the heart of all social evolution.

All history is but the story of the struggle between those who have and those who have not. I trace it through all the life of Israel, and the prophets are ever fulminating against the rich and pleading for the poor. Jesus, the last of the prophets of Israel, did the same. The primitive Christians and the apostles sounded the same note The Nation is sounding today, and it never amounted to a row of pins and never will.

Nothing amuses me more than people who tell me that their objection to The Nation is that it is so unbelieving and skeptical. God save the mark! At heart you are a bunch of idealists, prophets, and primitive Christians. The mystery to me is where you get your courage for all this great faith you display! During your Sacco and Vanzetti spasms one would have thought that Jesus Christ or Saint Francis of Assisi was running your editorial pages. You drove some of my female friends on the coast here nearly insane with sympathy for those men. You were certainly the victims of a veritable hysteria that characterizes mystics. But it is no use! You live in the world of Calvin Coolidge, G. O. P., and the crowd that stoned and built the tombs of the prophets and crucified Jesus Christ.

What Is Happening in China's Kuomintang

By ROY CORT

[The following article is by an American who was closely associated with the work of the Kuomintang until after the Hankow-Nanking split. It gives an authoritative picture of the views of the Left Kuomintang, led by Mrs. Sun Yat-sen, which has been mistakenly denounced as "Communist."]

I

IT has been plain for a long time that the Kuomintang—the Chinese Nationalist Party—was a heterogeneous organization into which all sorts of nationalist-minded Chinese have entered. They were, at first, even predominantly of the middle classes which wanted a unified China, an autonomous China, a China free of foreign exploitation, a China whose tariffs could be used for Chinese industrial protection, whose tariff receipts would enhance the profits of Chinese rather than foreign banks. For this element in the party the socio-economic program meant nothing. They did not at first even understand it. But the Left Kuomintang did understand it, seeing clearly that the full Kuomintang program could win throughout the country only if it had a wide base of general popular support. In Hankow the significance of the Left program (up to that time, in fact, the real Kuomintang program, the Sun Yat-sen program) began to make itself apparent. Trade unions were officially encouraged and tremendous strides were made in their organization and expansion. The peasants were organized and the troubles of the country-folk were explained to them in terms of landlord exploitation (which in the southern and central provinces is fact) and upon faulty financing which puts the peasant annually into the hands of usurers—the local moneyed gentry.

Strikes and disturbances, some characterized by ludicrous demands and violent tactics, inevitably followed. All this, in foreign eyes, was "bolshevism" and "communism," the result of Russian influence. Any detached assay of the conditions and wages, to improve which these strikes were called, will result in admission that there was justification for them, even if not for the excessive demands or the often violent tactics. Equally far-fetched demands, equally absurd tactics, and as violent, characterized the early years of the trade-union movement in the West. They are the inevitable concomitants of the first apprehension of power which comes to groups of men seeking to alleviate insufferable working conditions.

Many even of the officials of the Wuhan (Wuchang and Hankow and Hanyang, the three cities at the junction of the Yangtze and Han rivers) Government became worried at this general condemnation. They did not see its essentially foreign source. They had no long-termed view of Kuomintang political policy, nor were they able to see that the disturbing phases of the economic policy must inevitably come to an end when the workers, coming up against hard economic facts, would be forced to modify their program and tactics. (The facts of the whole strike period in Wuhan show that the actual results, for the workers, were not great, even though sufficient to show the trade-union movement in China that it can win something.) All that these leaders could see was that there was much criticism. Their friends, their relatives in business, and the landowning gentry began to give warnings. It frightened these timid souls, among whom might be mentioned most of the men who came down from Wuhan in September to take their places in the "reconstructed" Nanking Government.

The break first came in April, 1927, when Chiang Kai-shek smashed through the traces of party discipline and proclaimed his own government at Nanking. That was clear proof of the pressure of the foreigners' cry of "Communist! Communist!" For that cry was at its strongest in Shanghai. Here was the largest group of Chinese business men in constant contact with the foreign point of view, most amenable to its daily iterated expression.

Up to that time, in Wuhan at least, the Left leaders controlled the official viewpoint and policy. But there had been subterranean whispers and criticism and head-shaking. The revolt of Chiang Kai-shek was all that the "moderate" (as they are improperly called) elements in Wuhan needed. There began a general shift to the Right, reaching its officially sanctioned climax in the tentative mandate of the Political Council of the Kuomintang on July 14 that there must be a "purging of the party." That meant a campaign against the so-called "Communists" and the Leftists generally. Only Mrs. Sun Yat-sen and Eugene Chen took a stand in opposition to the mandate. Because of their opposition the mandate was not made official by the Central Executive Committee, but it was a sufficient cue to Generals Tang Sheng-chi and Ho Chien, the chief military commanders at Wuhan. They at once proceeded to act as if given official sanction by the highest authority. Indeed, they had, for the mandate did express intention. They closed the labor unions and quartered troops in their offices. They hunted trade-union leaders and executed "Communists." Tang Sheng-chi had done this wholesale in Hunan in May and June without any mandate from the government. His own will had been sufficient.

Mrs. Sun's statement, given out for publication July 17, made clear the schism that had come about. She pilloried in burning terms the leaders who had "betrayed the policies of Sun Yat-sen" and had given way before the wills of unprincipled militarists. She especially made the whole question one between the leaders and their consciences, saying the crisis was a test of individuals as well as of opinions and principles. She made it clear that there was now no longer any difference between the personal government of Chiang Kai-shek at Nanking and the government at Wuhan. Both had alike turned their backs on the very classes upon which the whole Nationalist movement must be based. Both factions, she made plain, had definitely betrayed Sun Yat-sen's policies and she would have no further connection with either. She left Wuhan for Shanghai. She is now touring the world in the interest of the Left Kuomintang.

When, on August 8, the details of the "Communist" revolt of Generals Ho Lung and Yeh Ting at Nanchang became known in Wuhan, all the Left members of the Central Executive Committee—except Mrs. Sun and Eugene Chen—were expelled.

II

The cornerstone of Left Kuomintang policy is this: that there can be no controlling the feudal-minded militarists (who abound quite as numerously, it had developed,

F. P. A. hereby receives The Inner Sanctum's private Pulitzer Prize for the perfect simile, the perfect review and the perfect tribute, all contained in the following single paragraph on ARTHUR SCHNITZLER's new novel Daybreak:

> We could no more quit reading Daybreak before we had finished it, than say "Well, this is my last hand," when we were a terrific loser.

The columnists are all coming out for Daybreak. Says ELMER DAVIS in The New York Herald Tribune:

> SCHNITZLER being a classic, publishers can afford to issue his short books at a reduced price. Read Daybreak and you are likely to emit a lusty roar at the next overstuffed novel that comes your way.

Early prowlers in The Inner Sanctum yesterday might have found the sales manager and the editorial director huddled in earnest conclave. The pith of it all is contained in these solemn resolutions:

> a—That SCHNITZLER'S new novel Daybreak was getting under way even faster than Fraulein Else, Beatrice, None But the Brave, or Rhapsody.
> b—That it was best to be absolutely frank with the reading public and feature Daybreak as a novel of cards and women—which it is.
> c—That if the re-orders keep swirling in, giving the house a sixth best-seller, and upsetting all our expensive five-out-of-ten-best-sellers advertising, we will just have to grin and bear it philosophically.

Trader Horn forges far ahead in our own sweepstakes this week. Any members of the American Skeptics Society who challenged our recent announcement that this book was earning $4,000 a week in royalties are hereby informed, not without a little gloating, that on the first two days of this week alone orders for more than 3,100 copies were counted by our embattled adding machines.

To-night the monastic brethren of the sanctum forsake the lamp and the library to prowl about million-footed Manhattan. It is not to be simply a plunge into night life but our first chance to behold the flaunting and many-hued "twenty-four sheets" posted up and down the isle proclaiming the glories of The Story of Philosophy and Trader Horn.

Modesty is a shabby and paradoxical virtue if one calls too much attention to it, but The Inner Sanctum cannot resist the temptation to tell this one: Three months ago when we wrote copy for our outdoor advertising campaign, we calculated that by the third week of November Trader Horn would be in its 75th thousand and The Story of Philosophy in its 200th thousand. To-day Trader Horn is in its 92nd thousand and when our next printing order comes through (any minute now) The Story of Philosophy will be entering (we can scarcely believe it ourselves) its third hundred thousand.

among the Nationalist commanders as among the Northerners) until there is a broad base for the pyramid whose apex shall be a civilian government under the Kuomintang. Since peasants constitute from 85 to 90 per cent of the country's population, and the workers constitute the major portion of the population in the cities, the Kuomintang pyramid must be based on the peasantry and workers. The support of these can be won only by giving them something. Popular support for a political party can be won, in China as in America or Britain, only by answering the question: In what manner will it help us? The Kuomintang reply to this question was: Better wages and shorter hours for the workers; and for the peasants lower rents and no exploitation from the landed gentry, and a government-controlled system for financing the farmer without usury. To these specific replies were added the more general ones of an end to militarist exploitation and a period to the special privileges of foreigners in China.

The masses of China are a force, a vast political force, which only the Left Kuomintang leaders realize, or have succeeded in using. And they had won the masses, not by the terrorism of bayonets but by the persuasion of an economic program. This program contemplates widespread trade-union organization in all trades and crafts, and a great and general improvement in the now admittedly bad conditions obtaining in all the large-scale industries in China. It contemplates a revolutionary reorganization of the land system and, perhaps, a cutting-up of the larger holdings in some of the central and southern provinces. It contemplates a great reduction in rentals for peasant holdings and a new system for financing the peasant, a system which will end the usurious control of the farmer now exerted by the village gentry, who are not only the bankers for the peasants but their granaries and middle-men as well. It may be feared, in some quarters, that a definite attempt will be made to seize the land outright. This happened in Hunan Province in April and May, but on a very small scale, out of all proportion to the amount of publicity given it in the British press in China. But this will not be the policy of the Left Kuomintang. That policy recognizes ownership of land, but it will plan for an effective curb on the practical slavery of the working peasants which the present landlordism and gentry-banker system involve.

All of this, enlightened Chinese leaders point out, will do nothing finally to affect adversely the position of foreign business in China. It will, beyond question, increase the cost of living in China. That is something which more level-headed and far-seeing foreign business men already recognize as an inevitability. And they welcome it—those who are looking at the Chinese field in terms of decades rather than months—for an increase in the cost of living will naturally mean a greater circulation of money.

III

What are the [illegible] elements? The masses, whose [illegible] demonstrated, must be won for any finally victorious [illegible] movement, are quiescent and cowed. Their organs—the labor unions, the peasant organizations—are "reorganized," which is a euphemism for emasculated. They [illegible] are dead or in hiding. The "reorganized" unions are headed by non-workers or non-peasants. They [illegible] official or "fascist" unions and organizations. The [illegible] Actually, in both country and city, the nuclei of the old unions still remain and, in underground fashion, function.

The driving force of the Left elements is lost to the new government. The men who head it are, for the most part, elderly men who are as archaic in their ideas and methods as are the men of Peking. They are slightly progressive mandarins, little more.

Foreign influence in China, then, has been instrumental in bringing about the return to power of such leaders.

IV

I have not touched upon the effect the more active intervention of both the British and the Japanese had in bringing about the shift to the Right. Japan's armed intervention in Shantung had a marked effect (some believe deciding) on the Northern campaign beyond the Yangtze. This had its repercussion in Wuhan by making some of the leaders there believe in the need for reconciliation with Chiang Kai-shek and his Nanking group. The British intervention in Shanghai also had its effect on purely Chinese politics. I have here dealt with what are more nearly psychological factors instrumental in bringing about the breakdown of Leftist power. The other phases, the physical effect of the presence of foreign troops, make another story.

Walter Lippmann, Connoisseur of Public Life

By BENJAMIN STOLBERG

MR. LIPPMANN'S publishers do not have to scream that his "Men of Destiny" [1] is the book since Plutarch's "Lives." They merely indicate that Mr. Lippmann is a man of consequence. He is a connoisseur of public life. He appreciates that social politics is the behavior of a culture, and he has civilized himself accordingly. His learning is not too heavy, it is well distributed and limber. His intellectualism is not the usual desperate effort but authentic. He is a natural journalist: a shrewd detective of private motives in public life.

All of which makes Mr. Lippmann a man of consequence; of which he is quite sensible. He is not so much a professional journalist as he is a man of considerable importance. There is something in his temper which tends to make him, as the years go by, more prominent than significant. For fourteen years he has been writing books in social theory, each one a contribution of more or less distinction. But what one remembers of "A Preface to Politics," "Drift and Mastery," "The Stakes of Diplomacy," "Public Opinion," "The Phantom Public" is no more substantive than these hazy titles. He is persuasive in the reading, but he blurs in retrospect. One comes to feel that he is more sophisticated and astute than wise, more competent than sound. Possibly he unwittingly resents this inversion in the scale of values. His urbanity protests a little: it is a trifle pompous. A certain condescension, a touch of civilized conceit defends his observations.

The essays collected in "Men of Destiny" are no doubt intended merely as a passing show. The few papers on current issues are appropriately fugitive. Yet I think that this is Mr. Lippmann's most revealing book. For some of these "Men of Destiny" point the reason why Mr. Lippmann never quite satisfies. Mr. Lippmann is afraid. He is afraid to venture beyond sophistication to its conclusions. He is afraid to leave the noblesse oblige of the open mind. He is mortally afraid of landing on the soap-box, not because the soap-box is a dangerous place but because it is no place for a connoisseur. And when the truth has to descend to platitude and insist that the difference between the old and the new Tammany is very large but largely unimportant, Mr. Lippmann yawns: "Tammany is . . . no worse . . . than other political machines." Or when the truth has to rant a bit and say plainly that the friendship between Wilson and House was a friendship of convenience between a psychopathic egoist and a glorified political fixer—disgustingly clear in "The Intimate Papers of Colonel House"—Mr. Lippmann writes twenty pages on Wilson and House to show that the truth is not quite so simple. Indeed, the whole book seems to indicate that the Wilsonian nausea left in Mr. Lippmann an anti-democratic complex rather than a revulsion against the Wilsoniad itself.

With those "Men of Destiny" in whose destiny the Open Mind never had a stake Mr. Lippmann is free and easy. With them his acuteness is unhampered. He shows clearly that Bryan never changed from his know-nothing radicalism in 1896 to his know-nothing fundamentalism in 1925. To Bryan democracy was a show of hands within sight. He banked on the least common denominator of mankind, its most common ignorance. He died after gorging himself with the heavy food of a know-nothing diet, symbolic of his democratic dogma. He was a martyr to his sterling ignorance. And Mr. Lippmann wrote his best obituary.

In the essay on The Kellogg Doctrine its doctrinaire emerges as a simple and bewildered man. Mr. Kellogg always looks on the verge of tears. As one of the leaders of the American bar he honestly believes that the United States Supreme Court, if it had the jurisdiction, would undoubtedly declare the Mexican constitution of 1917 unconstitutional. And Nicaragua acts as though this were 1776. He is merely trying to protect the Calles regime from illegal excesses against Doheny and the Nicaraguans from failing in their duty by the Seligmans and Browns. What's wrong with that? Mr. Lippmann explains to Mr. Kellogg. This essay is really a primer in the evolution of the Monroe Doctrine for the Kellogg mind.

In looking into The Greatness of Mr. Mellon Mr. Lippmann is less patient. He takes Mr. Mellon's admirers at their word that their hero is comparable to Alexander Hamilton. He compares the two, which really is a dirty trick on Mr. Mellon. Both live in the eighteenth century. Both believe in plutocracy. And there the awful difference begins. "The difference is that Hamilton believed in plutocracy as a means to an end; Mr. Mellon believes in plutocracy as an end in itself." Hamilton wanted to build a nation by eighteenth-century methods. Mr. Mellon wants rich men to grow richer by the same methods. He is not bound by time. By 1985 he proposes to collect $22,000,000,000 from Europe. In the meantime he means to tax the poor more heavily than the rich, lest the rich lose their initiative in working the poor. Mr. Mellon "is a high protectionist by birth." He has achieved an enormous fortune. And he had greatness thrust upon him. He reminds Mr. Lippmann of Alexander Hamilton as much as Jack Dempsey reminds him of "Julius Cæsar who for a time was champion of the world."

With Messrs. McAdoo and Borah Mr. Lippmann is more affable and cautious. Hope springs eternal in the liberal breast, and both gentlemen have raised it now and then. To Mr. McAdoo, it seems to me, Mr. Lippmann is a bit too kind. Mr. McAdoo's worldliness, political sagacity, boldness, and high administrative gifts are shiftier than they appear in Mr. Lippmann's sketch. Mr. McAdoo's virtues are so dexterous that it is hard to see them.

Senator Borah's virtues, on the other hand, are so independent that it is hard to use them. The Senator is so innately and immediately independent that he is absolutely undependable. He is untrammeled even by the logic of his own convictions. The Constitution enjoins liberty, while consistent views encroach upon it. And so the Senator deems it unconstitutional to have such views. His Russian policy is typical. Most people are for Russian recognition, if they are, because it is good for revolution or for business. Mr. Borah is for Russian recognition because he does not care a hang for Russia. Mr. Lippmann points out that the Senator can afford such independence as a good-in-itself —what Joseph Pulitzer once called such indegoddampendence—because being famous for his independence he sheds luster on the obscure State which keeps him in it. On the whole Mr. Lippmann thinks he is a good investment. "You will find him very useful tomorrow." Who knows but what the law of averages may throw his views your way?

[1] The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

But the most significant essays in this book, because they seem to me to contribute most toward the understanding of Mr. Lippmann, are those on Mr. Mencken, Governor Smith, President Coolidge, and Sinclair Lewis.

Mr. Lippmann looks at Mr. Mencken through his "Notes on Democracy." He finds that they are "only a collection of trite and somewhat confused ideas." Then why is Mr. Mencken so tremendously effective? Because "his appeal is not from mind to mind but from viscera to viscera. . . . You have to judge him totally, roughly, approximately, without definition, as you would a barrage of artillery, for the general destruction rather than the individual shots." Mr. Lippmann illustrates:

> The most important books are often of this kind. Rousseau's "Social Contract" and Tom Paine's "Rights of Man" were far inferior as works of the mind to the best thoughts of the eighteenth century, but they exerted an incalculably great influence because they altered men's prejudices. Mr. Mencken's book is of the same sort. [Italics mine.] The democratic phase which began in the eighteenth century has about run its course. There is now taking place a radical change of attitude . . . toward the whole conception of popular government. In the United States Mr. Mencken is the most powerful voice announcing this change.

In short, Mr. Mencken is the leader of a social revolution.

Mr. Mencken, of course, is nothing of the kind. The "Notes on Democracy" are written in the swift and simple swing of a world-shaking brochure, but they are essentially a burlesque translation of Mr. Mencken's personal prejudices in favor of the Rabelaisian life into the form of a social manifesto. His revolution is for the highest possible personal civilization. The counter-revolution is democracy. Hence all democrats, without distinction, are swine and lice. The effect is a huge practical joke on the last century and a half in that highly civilized preposterous vein which is Mr. Mencken's genius. In effect, he traces the Congressional remarks of Messrs. Blease, Upshaw, and Blanton to Rousseau, Locke, and Jefferson. John Stuart Mill fought for the freedom of the Flatbush flapper. Adam Smith speaks to us through Roger Babson. Karl Marx is at the bottom of the graft in the building trades. And Luther's ghost, I take it, pens the daily piffle of the Reverend Cadman.

All this, of course, is funnier than true. Democracy is not where the blah begins, for the blah began way back in the Neanderthal. There is nothing specifically democratic about social stupidity, which always parades under the prevailing dogmas. Else the prophets could not have been so clairvoyant about our business men and bishops, Voltaire could not have had so much more fun even than Mr. Mencken with every one of our contemporary mountebanks, and Chekhov could not have understood Sinclair Lewis's characters so infinitely better than Mr. Lewis.

In justice to Mr. Lippmann be it said that his perspicacity plays havoc with his revolutionary interpretation of "the holy terror from Baltimore." In one sentence Mr. Mencken is a new Tom Paine whose common sense rebels against our social order. In the next sentence he is a sophisticated Stephen Leacock whose uncommon nonsense enlivens social theory. The essay is divided against itself because Mr. Lippmann is divided against himself. For at bottom Mr. Mencken's joke on democracy is Mr. Lippmann's dilemma with it. The burden of all his books on the public mind since the war and of his two essays in this volume on The Causes of Political Indifference Today and Second-Best Statesmen is that democracy functions in fact as absurdly as Mr. Mencken writes of it in fun. Mr. Lippmann is obsessed by the liberal fixation that democracy is a "method" which "functions" to the degree in which everybody "participates" in it; which is like saying that the telephone company cannot function unless every operator is educated in the physics of sound and electricity. The democratic method does not differ from the social mechanism of any other social order, as Mr. Lippmann brilliantly shows in The Phantom Public: it is a fight between the "ins" and "outs" along the eternal right-center-left front; a handful leads, a few more follow, and the rest don't care. The significant thing about democracy is not its method but its underlying purpose. And its contemporary purpose is that the sweat of John Doe's brow is John Doe's business. As a purpose it is quite as simple as the soap-boxer proclaims. The methods for achieving this simple purpose in our highly complex order range from schemes for "adult education" to a blind faith in a proletarian dictatorship. One may choose all the way from boosting the democratic ticket to getting oneself jailed in Leavenworth.

The more tiresome liberal mind is content with watching the democratic "experiment" as we are all being "educated" to "function" in it, thus raising opportunism from a means to some ends into an end-in-itself. But Mr. Lippmann is never tiresome. He tries to escape the pragmatic predicament by raising opportunism not merely into an end-in-itself but by blandly calling it a revolution. And he sees in Mr. Mencken "the most powerful voice announcing" our "radical change of attitude" toward democracy because Mr. Mencken's revolution against near-beer and for Mai-Bock is Mr. Lippmann's revolution against the insipid Mr. Coolidge and for the colorful "Al" Smith. Mr. Lippmann is not content with the perfectly intelligent belief that Governor Smith is by all odds the most intelligent aspirant for the Presidency in either of the two old parties. Some conscionable maladjustment in him insists on glorifying this perfectly sensible belief into a revolutionary faith. Smith is not simply a surprisingly good man for Tammany, but "A Man of Destiny" whose "fate" it is "to deepen" a "conflict [which] is the inevitable consequence of our history." We begin to smell in Tammany a new Jacobin Club, and in Smith a new Marat of the sidewalks of New York.

Governor Smith, says Mr. Lippmann, represents the democratic urban civilization, the new immigrants who began to come about 1850. "For seventy-five years, in spite of their vast influence in local politics, they have produced nobody who could fairly be considered for the Presidency. Now from their midst has come such a man. . . . And yet he is unavailable. By the unspoken and unwritten law he cannot be nominated by any national party (as of December, 1925)." Obviously he is a revolutionary martyr. And he is a martyr not because he is Wet and Catholic. He is unavailable because the older America of town and country fears "that strange and dangerous things will come out of Babylon."

This older America likes Mr. Coolidge, whose face is his fortune. Mr. Coolidge is cool, thrifty, close-mouthed. He is canny in his sense of honor and parsimonious with his honesty. He administers the most powerful office in the world as though he were the boss of an aldermanic district. Most Americans, Mr. Lippmann observes, are spending furiously, are bent on pleasure, and administer a clerkship as though it were a great profession. Mr. Coolidge provides "this generation, which is not virtuous in that simple, dry, shrewd sense, with an immense opportunity for vicarious virtue." He is our offering to the ancient homilies.

To function as a totem of the seventies Mr. Coolidge works very hard. To do next to nothing in Cæsar's job takes enormous industry and uncanny skill. It's not a cinch to get America to yawn over the oil scandal, to revive the spirit of Jay Gould in the days of Owen Young. It takes genius to inspire the headline: "Coolidge Wins Coal Victory; Denies He Interfered."

In short, Mr. Lippmann points out through the personalities of "Cal" and "Al" the difference between the older indigenous America of town and farm and the urban, mercurial, industrial, "new immigrant" America. And this difference, he indicates, is a social revolution. There was 1776, there was the Civil War, and now we have "to face the conflict" with the new Tammany.

I think that the brilliance of these two essays consists entirely in the high persuasiveness of their half-truths. Mr. Lippmann's interpretation of Governor Smith undoubtedly explains the Governor's difficulties as a Presidential candidate. His interpretation of President Coolidge undoubtedly explains why it was possible to popularize him into a combination of the best features of Washington and Lincoln, while in fact he combines the most characteristic defects of Buchanan and Arthur; only at the right time. Mr. Lippmann is quite right when he says that there is an ever-widening cultural gap between the industrial centers and the country districts. But neither Smith nor Coolidge represents the fundamental factors of this estrangement. Mr. Lippmann cannot explain the difference between Smith and Coolidge because, except in color scheme, there is none. Governor Smith represents the "new immigrants" merely in their adaptation to the old Tammany Hall under new conditions. He does not represent the urban worker excepting in so far as the reactionary trade unions misrepresent his interests in the urban Democratic machine. Governor Smith is undoubtedly above Tammany. His troubles with it indicate it. He is undoubtedly the best man in his party. But Governor Smith will win or lose the Democratic nomination on the Democratic platform, which is a facsimile of the Republican counterfeit of social issues. And President Coolidge is not President of the United States because his rent is $32.50 a month, but because he represents Big Business.

Mr. Lippmann's suavity deserts him when he gets to Sinclair Lewis. Mr. Lewis's characters are not people but "stereotypes," whom he kicks and abuses with sadistic joy. His realism is a grotesque verisimilitude, dogmatic, vulgar, and unfair. His wit is mere malice which pursues poor foolish Babbitt into the privacy of his bathroom just to sneer at his pathetic pleasure at a fancy towel rack; which hounds poor Carol Kennicott, whose only fault is that she is weak and restless and dull and ashamed of her environment, of which she is an authentic part, a little soul made less by a culture which gives her nothing to do since that's all she can do. "There is no truth" in the portrait of Elmer Gantry, writes Mr. Lippmann. Mr. Lewis simply stole a parson's picture from the Rogues' Gallery.

When Mr. Lippmann is annoyed he is magnificently formidable. He cruelly shows that Mr. Lewis hates Babbitt because he is one himself. Lewis sees Babbitt with the half-crazed introspective clarity of a bitter consciousness of kind, as an anti-Semitic Jew sees his fellow-Jews. The extraordinary objectivity of his types is achieved because his predominant passion is hatred of his kind. His "laughter is not comic, it is protective." He wants to be as civilized as Mr. Mencken, but he is merely "immature," raw, and adolescent.

All of which is largely true. And all of which makes Mr. Lewis so important. He is Babbitt disgusted with himself, Babbitt ashamed of Rotary. Babbitt wondered for a few weak moments whether he had not better quit. Lewis at least tried to "find salvation by escaping" Main Street and Zenith City. "He has just arrived in the big city." He failed, for he made a "success" as an exhibitionist of "the provincial civilization of America. . . . He takes it with him wherever he goes." None the less, he "has imposed his conception of America on a very considerable part of the reading and writing public." The fact is, Mr. Lewis is a rebel. He is the only "Man of Destiny" in Mr. Lippmann's whole collection.

Mr. Lewis is at least a little man of destiny because he undoubtedly has helped to break the path for more civilized critics who will stop picking on Babbitt; for, after all, Babbitt is merely the poor ape of a plutocratic order which robs him of his human dignity. They will stop hounding Carol Kennicott in her cheap unhappiness, the more tragic for its cheapness, and show her that the difference between her moon-calf liberalism and the liberalism to which she aspires is a step not worth taking. They will even have pity on the hairy Esau of an Elmer Gantry, and be more interested in the modernist Jacobs of the church who after all are cheating him of his birthright in exploiting human ignorance. Conceivably, they may even show that Mr. Lewis's types are but the moron victims crowding at the right wing of a culture at whose enlightened left wing Mr. Lippmann sits as a connoisseur and critical apologist.

We all have to live in the culture of which we are a part and to accept a good deal of the world in which we eat. Nor can there be a moral obligation to feel a sense of social justice. That Mr. Lippmann has become an apologist for the status quo is, after all, his personal affair. What is rather annoying about his views is that air of looking forward with which he posits them, insisting that the National Child Labor Amendment is even more dangerous to democracy than to the National Manufacturers' Association; telling the world that "Al" Smith is the leader of a social revolution; solemnly warning Mexico that Mr. Morrow is not merely a most intelligent man, which is quite true and quite sufficient to make him an excellent ambassador under the circumstances, but that he represents the most progressive spirit in America, which is bunk; and suggesting a life sentence for Sacco and Vanzetti, apparently on the theory that a living tomb is a liberal compromise with murder.

Sophists aim to win while philosophers want to know the truth, said Socrates. Mr. Lippmann is a successful man whose observations current events constantly refute. He takes the democratic dogma of the eighteenth century and brilliantly finds it wanting under plutocratic corruption and hypocrisy; while the news columns of the paper whose editorials are in his charge report every day the world war which is still going on "to make the world safe for democracy" with a vengeance—in Russia, China, the British Empire, on the continent of Europe, and even in the subways of New York.

On Contemporary American Fiction

By CLIFTON P. FADIMAN

THE following remarks are intended not as an analysis of contemporary American fiction but merely as a tentative presentation of a general feeling which has grown up and is growing up among a goodly number of young writers and critics. That feeling is one of a rather puzzled dissatisfaction with the old-line American novelists, a sad inability to secure from them the intellectual nourishment which every younger generation has a right to expect from its elders. Whatever else it may be, to these younger people the standard American novel is not as exciting or vital as the book-review sections and the popular critics assure them it is. Whether their state of mind is entirely justifiable or not is difficult to determine; but of one thing I am confident: this attitude is motivated by no cheap cynicism, by no snobbery, but by a sincere desire to discover the best in contemporary literature and to cleave to and love that best.

I offer, in a very gingerly manner, a few observations which may serve to explain their rather inarticulate and moody dissatisfaction. The first of them is concerned with what appears to me a fundamental weakness in our popular criticism. About fifteen years ago, directly following one of the most sterile and devitalized periods in American literature, there suddenly appeared a succession of interesting writers of fiction. Dreiser was accepted; then came Anderson, Hergesheimer, Willa Cather, Cabell, Lewis. The critics, comparing these sincere and relatively daring novelists with the faded pettiness of the previous generation, went wild with delight. They were too grateful for the phenomenon to be able to apply any absolute standards, to view these sudden apparitions against anything like a background of eternity. Mr. Carl Van Doren, ordinarily the sanest of observers, wrote a laudatory book which still dominates the tone of literary judgment. In this bird's-eye view of the modern American novel, the author's honest enthusiasm carried him so far as to make him expend on Booth Tarkington a perspicacity and penetration of which his subject was almost humorously unworthy. The laudation to be found in this book, which must now be considered essentially as a pleasurable reaction rather than as a cold examination, persists to this day. The general feeling is that the Mid Western novelists represent a definite renaissance of the art of fiction in America. Yet one forgets that this renaissance acquires a large portion of its glamor merely from its happening to follow upon a fortuitously inferior literary epoch.

But this enthusiasm, unfortunate though it was, does not constitute the fundamental weakness in our popular criticism. The chief fault lies in confusing a sociological importance with an artistic one. What I mean is this. The novels of Dreiser and Lewis and to a lesser degree those of Hergesheimer, Anderson, and Cabell are the result less of a genuine aesthetic urge than of a series of important and disillusioning discoveries about the American social fabric. The American realistic novel is simply the symbol of the development of a national awareness, an awareness of money, of sex, of dulness, of corruption, of Puritanism, and of the role these things play in our life. These discoveries were sudden and, so it seemed, startling; and that sudden and startling quality reflected itself in the form and texture of the novels. It reflected itself in naivete, in incoherence, in youthful vagueness, in obstreperousness, in a belligerent liberalism, in a patriotic provincialism. These novels that embodied a valuable, if naive, criticism of modern American society were not novels in an inevitable sense. They did not possess that severe formal unity and beauty to be found in the Russians and the better Frenchmen. Many of them should have been tracts, others should have been poems, almost all of Anderson's work should have been an autobiography, or better still a diary; a great many should never have been written down at all but remained interesting conversation.

For a novel is not necessarily a great or even a good novel because it exposes the so-called national soul. Its aesthetic significance is proportional to the depth at which its soul-exploration begins; and at that depth purely national or provincial discoveries become irrelevant. To use the stock illustration, a comparison of "Madame Bovary" with "Main Street." In these two cases the actual working materials of the authors are similar, the basic conception is the same; the rebellion of a second-rate woman against a fifth-rate emotional and social conformity. Now, when we Americans read "Madame Bovary" we undergo an aesthetic experience, a feeling that we are confronted with a great wisdom and a great poetry. But when Frenchmen read "Main Street" it is because they wish to find out about the Street. The novel becomes a useful, satiric itinerary. Similarly, for a cultivated continental, the outpourings of Mr. Anderson are stimulating because they are the naive expression of a naive American soul; it does not occur to them, as it does to our professional enthusiasts, to speak of Anderson and Dostoevski in the same breath. The attitude of the continental appears to me a civilized one; the attitude of the editors of the Saturday Review, to name a representative example, is simply an eager patriotism. The boy admires the circus; but the adult cannot, without a slight feeling of shame, applaud it,

But it will be urged that the realistic discovery of the national scene was a noble and praiseworthy thing in itself; that without the realistic viewpoint with which the older novelists have provided us it would be impossible to advance further. Though I refuse to admit that there is any valuable realism in Mr. Anderson's lyric cry, I am willing to accept the conception which views these American novelists as a necessary bridge to something better. All I ask is that this secondary quality be kept in mind and that we should cease to treat them as if they were first-rate artists. All I plead for is some consistent and vehement destructive criticism and honest evaluation—a rather healthy order, for it would involve the immediate destruction of almost all our literary reviews and magazines.

In a country such as England or France, where the literary tradition is homogeneous and unbroken and the elementary discoveries about the national character were made long ago, good British novelists do not have to spend their time berating their middle-class public for its stupidity or the aristocracy for its snobbishness; nor do the Frenchmen have to write exposures of Gallic sensuality. All these things are taken for granted; or else it becomes the function of the essayist, the critic, or the political observer to deal with them. But over here we have to clear away so much rubbish before a novelist can really deal with essential novelistic material. We have to educate an audience with a frontier mentality. I presume it is necessary to Mr. Anderson to discover for himself that respectable American business men get restless when they reach forty; for Mr. Lewis to discover that most American preachers are hypocrites or fools; for Mr. Bromfield to discover that the dominating influence of women is occasionally a bad thing for the nation; for Mr. Dell to discover that it is difficult for a sensitive young man to live in an industrialized community. Very good; all very true and useful; but let us not get excited about the artistic value of works which embody only these sincere obviousnesses.

The real trouble with such discoveries is that it does not require any great wisdom or intelligence to make them. One need not be much more than a cut above Babbitt to realize what sort of man he is; and Mr. Anderson has apparently shown that to record the vagaries of adolescence and the primary conflicts of naive souls one need not oneself be anything but adolescent and naive. The result is that our so-called best novelists are a pleasantly unsophisticated lot. Miss Rebecca West, speaking of Sinclair Lewis's latest work, made a very pugnant (and un-American) observation. In the novel there is portrayed, as a sort of counterweight to Elmer Gantry, a liberal clergyman—sincere, thoughtful, troubled by the inconsistencies and absurdities of the dogmas he preaches. What Miss West objected to was the assumption on Mr. Lewis's part that this clergyman, instead of being an equally fit subject for satire, was really a rather fine and admirable character, the hero to Gantry's villain—all of which shows in Mr. Lewis, of course, nothing but the same sort of thoughtful innocence that is exemplified every day in the pulpits of liberal Unitarian churches.

Our most sophisticated novelist is commonly held to be Mr. Cabell. Compared with a life-size artist like Gide or Thomas Mann he is almost tenderly unsophisticated. At most he has a single idea: all his legends but play naughty little variations on the theme of illusion. He is praised for his rebellion against the drab materialism of American life; but he is a one-dimensional rebel. His cynicism is so terribly easy. On the Continent intelligent men had begun to smile at Anatole France five years before his death; and even before that he had been essentially the pet of the bourgoisie. But here Cabell is still accepted as a great ironist, though he goes on repeating his petit maître cynicisms year after year without much variation to indicate intellectual or emotional growth.

This naivete would not be so disheartening if it were not accompanied by a related phenomenon: an artistic provincialism which is unparalleled in the rest of the world. Our established novelists are, in many cases, simply behind the times. They follow the Wellsian or the Galsworthian formula when the more alert young English novelists have themselves abandoned it, when their art might so easily be enriched by an attentive study of the best contemporary French and German writers. But how little attention is paid to such work! How many of our novelists are consciously and excitedly aware that the last two years have witnessed the American publication of two great European masterpieces, masterpieces from which one can learn, which contain formal advances, which pose aesthetic problems of an interesting knottiness, which stimulate the mind and raise it above any narrow preoccupation with a too purely American scene? Schiller's conception of the naive artist must be abandoned; one cannot create worthily by merely examining one's own moods, as does Mr. Anderson; or by examining one's own home town, as does Mr. Lewis; or by reading the works of Anatole France, as does Mr. Cabell. The novelist must be an extremely intelligent man, one of a world confraternity of intelligent men, sophisticated in the best sense, eager to tackle aesthetic problems because they are difficult, willing to learn from his contemporaries, stern in his rejection of what is obvious or transitory or provincial, certain that his material is essentially novel material, not newspaper stuff, not personal moods, not cigarette-smoke irony.

That we have at least the beginning of such an attitude is evident in the work of Hemingway, Wescott, Elizabeth Roberts, Aiken—and it is noticeable that each of these, in his or her own way, is revolting against the novelistic old guard. But this other side of American fiction deserves a separate and distinct treatment which is impossible here.

Plastic and Temporal in Art

By JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

IN so far as Wyndham Lewis can be thought of as part of any movement, it is with T. S. Eliot and the other intellectualists that his thought allies him; but nothing could, on the other hand, be more unlike the costiveness of their minds than is the fluency of his. Ostensibly prophets of a new faith engaged in announcing the glad tidings of a salvation by abstract thought, a certain despairing lassitude has unreasonably enough fallen upon them and it is with the greatest difficulty that they succeed in squeezing from their minds two paragraphs of prose or one quatrain of verse per year. With him, on the contrary, the pen can never keep pace with the brain and one treatise is not half done before another is projected. Originally a painter, he has been led on from subject to subject and, plunging with enormous gusto into the midst of the abstrusest problems, he has emerged each time from a review of countless volumes with a great deal to say about everything. Within less than two years he has published three long, erudite, and passionate books, but he has the air of a man who is just warming up to his subject, and the latest ends, characteristically enough, with the statement that it is merely a prolegomenon intended to clear the ground for his own thesis by a criticism of prevailing theories.

Like all of Mr. Lewis's books "Time and Western Man"[1] includes almost too much for a single treatise and its method is highly discursive. Book One, "The Revolutionary Simpleton," offers perhaps the most interesting criticism which has ever been made of such leaders in contemporary "revolutionary" literature as Ezra Pound, James Joyce, and Gertrude Stein, along with incidental comment upon the world of what Mr. Lewis calls "High Bohemia" in which various artistic fads become fashionable; but Book Two, "An Analysis of the Philosophy of Time," brings him to the theoretical consideration of certain habits of thought which he regards as the ultimate cause of the failure of modern literature and which are the chief subjects of his book.

Bergson, demoded though he is, Mr. Lewis considers to be the father of the contemporary time cult, and he traces through Russell, Einstein, Whitehead, and Alexander the growth of an orthodoxy within the limits of which all the leaders of contemporary metaphysics are comprehended by virtue of a common agreement that time is the ultimate reality, or, much more properly, that it supplies the aspect under which all phenomena may be most profitably regarded. This "time-mind," generating as it does a veneration in the philosopher for mere flux as such and producing in even the popularizer a tendency to regard nothing important except as part of a history or an evolution, Mr. Lewis attacks as fundamentally antithetical to the processes of art and hence as inimical to the development of any satisfactory human society. It reaches, he says, its ultimate absurdity in the misty lucubrations of Spengler, who seems to maintain that the Western World is dying because it alone has risen to a realization that nothing has any meaning except as history; and it transforms all those who have any aesthetic sensibility into what he scornfully calls "time-trotters"—people, that is to say, whose minds rush back and forth through the centuries "doing" the culture of this period and that much as the globe-trotter "does" the medieval cathedrals one summer and the civilization of India the next.

"Plastic" is the adjective which Mr. Lewis chooses to describe that aspect of things upon which he prefers to concentrate his attention. It is a painter's word, and one may suspect that it is employed by him in such a way as to include not merely those relationships in space which are the elementary concerns of the painter but also those which a metaphysician would call "logical" and which a mystic would describe as those perceived when a thing is seen sub specie aeternitatis. It serves, however, as well as any other to stand for all that is missed when we fall into the habit of assuming that we have plucked the heart out of a thing when we have traced its origin, its development, and its death as an evolution occurring in time; and we reach the crux of the matter in a passage cited by Mr. Lewis in high disapproval from Alexander's "Space, Time, and Deity." "It is, in fact," says Alexander, "the cardinal defect of universals as conceived by Plato or the Pythagoreans that they were changeless, immovable, and eternal. For not even the mind of Plato could be free from the habits of his age, one of whose tendencies was to seek the highest ideal of perfection in gravity of action and statuesque repose rather than in restless motion. . . . It is claiming no great credit that for us universals should have from the beginning the form of motion, should be not merely spatial but spatio-temporal."

Upon this patronage of Plato and his fellow-ancients Mr. Lewis empties the vials of his scorn. The thing to be noted is, he points out, the contrast implied in the fact that while the essential aspect of anything was, for the classical age, that static perfection toward which it was tending, it has become for us, living in a time-world, rather the history of the thing's evolution or even, at times, merely the nature of its origin. And against the assumption that this change of attitude represents a gain, that man can live better or more profitably as part of a flux which has no meaning outside itself, Mr. Lewis protests with all vigor. Though we may be children of time we want to be children of eternity, and though I am not sure Mr. Lewis would accept this formulation of the dilemma it will serve nevertheless to illuminate the direction of his striving. "What I am concerned with here, first of all, is," he says, "not whether the great time-philosophy that overshadows all contemporary thought is viable as a system of abstract truth, but if in its application it helps or destroys our human arts. With that is involved, of course, the very fundamental question of whether we should set out to transcend our human condition (as formerly Nietzsche and then Bergson claimed that we should); or whether we should transplant into human terms the whole of our datum. My standpoint is that we are creatures of a certain kind, with no indication that a radical change is imminent. . . . I prefer the chaste wisdom of the Chinese or the Greek to the hot tawny brand of superlative fanaticism coming from the parched deserts of the Ancient East, with its ineradicable abstractness. I am for the physical world."

The argument of "Time and Western Man," carrying though it does an immense burden of detailed criticism directed against the chief exponents of the time philosophy, is conducted with great acuteness and illuminated with flashes of maliciously humorous characterization like that in which Bertrand Russell, "whose mind is that of an excited and rather sentimental amateur," is described as a man possessed of an entertainer's instinct which leads him always to take the "entertaining" or "exciting" side in a debate. Perhaps the discourse would be somewhat clarified from a metaphysical standpoint if Mr. Lewis would state more clearly than he does whether, in his championship of the "plastic" against the "temporal" view of reality, he attacks the latter as a falsely assumed "truth of reference" or merely as a conception functioning less fruitfully than the plastic view when each is considered merely as an als ob. But since he is chiefly concerned with art or with life-considered-as-an-art, and since in the realm of art the distinction between a "truth of reference" and a fruitful als ob inevitably disappears, this defect is not of great importance. Indeed the disappearance of this distinction is exactly the thing which differentiates art from life, and though the present book is only a prolegomenon it is easy to see that Mr. Lewis's line of thought must eventuate in a plea for the absolute and formal virtues of a "classical" literature, painting, or sculpture.

May it not indeed be said that the entire contemporary renaissance of interest in "form" is the result of a longing for something outside of time which is closed and complete in itself—for something with a pattern in which each part is so joined to every other part that it returns upon itself instead of either leading on to something else or trailing off until it is lost in the dark boundless chaos? Romantic art had as one of its ideals a suggestive incompleteness, a deliberate imperfection intended to provoke rather than to satisfy and to suggest boundlessness rather than boundaries. The stories which it told are not stories with a beginning and an end but episodes, lifted almost at random, from an endless chronicle to which the imagination is led back again at the inconclusive conclusion and in which its thoughts and emotions as well as its events are left dangling. But the human mind wearies at length of expansion and inconclusion. It turns to art for the completeness and the perfection which it does not find in nature, and it discovers even in rigidity a certain peace. It asks of art a pattern, something which can be regarded as a whole in itself, and it does not object to the absence of that inclusion of opposites aimed at by the romantics if it can receive in exchange a sense of equilibrium existing within the limits which the work of art, detaching itself from the stream of life, sets up. And it is just this which a classic art supplies. It leads the imagination not into life and time but out of both into a world so frozen as to seem to be seen sub specie aeternitatis because it exists, each part locked together with each other part, within the confines of a frame and hence is as complete and changeless for us as life itself has been fancied to be in the mind of that God for whom all moments are one.

A Hero of the Jews

By NORMAN HAPGOOD

IN the long history of the Jews the supreme hero is Moses. Talk to the most cultivated and skeptical Jew of your acquaintance and if he is race-conscious he will thrill to that name. Moses led the Jews out of bondage and just failed to lead them into the promised land. Perhaps he would have succeeded had there not been an alarmist report from the majority of the committee sent ahead to report on the prospects and difficulties, only Caleb bringing a minority report that was optimistic. So the glory of leading the entry was reserved for Joshua.

It is not to either of these chieftains that Theodore Herzl is to be compared—the prophet of Zionism in modern days. What his biographer * claims for him is that "in the long page of Jewish history he stands with Ezra and Simon the Maccabee—the two peaceful restorers of the Jewish state." It is a proud enough claim.

A complete, authoritative, and readable story of the prophet of modern Zionism comes at an opportune time, since one of the results of the war that can be put down as favorable is the Balfour resolution and the commitment of the British Empire to carry out, on its political side, the Zionist dream.

It was with the political side—in the deep, human sense—that Herzl mainly concerned himself, for he played chess with the rulers of the world in behalf of an escape for a people that during his career went through direst agony. Mr. de Haas, his dear friend, associate, and spokesman, says that "among the Jews no other since the destruction of Jerusalem sought to achieve so great a result and accomplished so much toward his end." The idea of a spiritual center, a home for an age-long culture, which appeals to many, including Christian Zionists like myself, was not what came first with Herzl.

Nor had he sympathy with the financial Jews, like the Rothschilds, who looked upon him as too Jewish and wished to forget the past and put as little stress as might be on the racial line. This class in its culture was assimilating, becoming in thought and feeling German, English, or, a little later, American. Herzl believed that the Jewish question must be solved not by drift but by action. He made no claim that the Jews were better than other people, and no concession that they were worse. The theological "mission of Israel" was nothing to him. It was "the drum-beat that drowned out Dreyfus's plea of innocence" that shocked Herzl back to his origins. He had no Ghetto tradition to make him timid. He stood up audaciously and "took the sting out of the term Jew." We know the difference in America between the Jew who regrets the word and the one who takes it to his soul.

Max Nordau one day at breakfast said to Herzl: "Were I a believer, and did I ordinarily use mystical phrases, I should say your appearance in these critical days of Jewish history is the work of Providence." In the crisis of 1895 and 1896 hope was at its lowest ebb. So harried were the Jews in Russia, Poland, and Rumania that migration was forced. Countries further west were anti-Semitic openly although less violently. The gates of America were beginning to close. At first Herzl sought only a Jewish state, anywhere, as an escape from horrors; later he became convinced that no place but Palestine would do. Palestine, as his imagination pictured it forth for the days to come, was a large area from Kantara to Beirut, from Jaffa to Hamann, with historic landmarks as jewels in a world evolved by modern machinery and science; a Nile canalized to make fruitful the Sinai desert; the Litani River joined to the Kishon so that both could water the plain of Esdraelon; the Jordan raised to irrigate the dry southland; tall chimneys and chemical works; industrial agriculture; the whole Near East a thriving center, with Palestine and its modern harbor forming a littoral. To his mind the Ghetto was a thing created artificially by the slow process of hostile law, and the normal direction was as pictured by his dream. He needed to do many things; his two greatest triumphs were his burning message to the suffering masses and his negotiations as an equal with Turkey, Russia, Britain, Italy, and Austria.

He who was to lead the despairing and also to make use of potentates had need of an imperial nature. At the Congress of Uganda, in which Herzl presented, coming from Joseph Chamberlain, the first offer of the British government of land for colonization in East Africa, the site to be determined, there were 295 votes for Herzl, 177 against acceptance. The 177, who were for Zion or nothing, withdrew in protest to a smaller hall where they debated, wept, and gesticulated. At ten o'clock, after four hours, they were on the verge of hysteria. Men were beginning to sit on the floor and in the orthodox traditional manner to mourn for a Zion that was dead.

When word of this hysteria reached Herzl at his hotel he rushed to the building and found that the dissenters had locked themselves in. He shouted his name, pounded until the door opened, strode dramatically through the delegates, and said:

> I found a world that had placed us in a false position. We Jews were condemned, despised, an untolerated minority. I was born in that environment; so were my children. I have imposed my personality on the world in order to change that environment for myself, my children, and all those who will go with me. I have not changed and I shall not change. I see a way to victory. It is a roundabout way to Zion, but it will lead there, because I am determined. I ask no man who cannot in good conscience follow me to go with me. I started alone and I can start again single-handed.

At two in the morning the opposition yielded, without terms or conditions.

A great story means some happening which is full of action and meaning, a hero who shines with power and character, and somebody who can tell about it all. Here we have all the elements. It is a tale filled with grandeur. Mr. de Haas stood on the right hand of the hero, and he has told the moving story as it should be told. He it was who closed the leader's eyes. Then he slipped into the garden and wept.

Second Advent

By JOHN GOULD FLETCHER

At the bottom of a gulf of walls whose windows fire no life,
Where the sun falls but once a year, where strife

Of wheels goes on day after night, I saw again,
In the close darkness cowering, three ancient men.

One bore a broken biscuit-tin and one a bandbox and
The third had a dirty birdcage clasped closely in his hand.

They had halted for a moment; soon they were again to go
Stumbling on felt-wrapped feet across the unshaken snow.

One said, "It was not in [illegible] that he was."
"Nor in New York neither," muttered the second, frowning under his brows.

"It was not in Park Lane that they laid him," said the third;
"But it was in Paris that they took from me my shining golden bird."

Said the second, pointing to his bandbox, "This [illegible] once held
Incense for him but the gas of [illegible] dispelled

It out upon the landscape." Said the first,
"Myrrh was within my metal ere it burst."

"But not on seas of flaming oil nor in jerry-built mudwalled lands Shall the Son of Man rise in glory to take [illegible] Man's hands."

At the bottom of a gulf of walls whose windows were thick with dust,
I left them muttering lonely; they were sharing their last crust;

Soon to rise up and totter to felt-wrapped feet again,
And wearily wander onwards through the wan night upon the plain.

First Glance

CARL SANDBURG'S "The American Songbag" (Harcourt, Brace: $7.50) is a collection of tunes and words if you like, or if you like it is something more. I choose to agree with Mr. Sandburg, who insists that it is a contribution to American history. It is so, I think, in an entirely serious sense. "It will give," says Mr. Sandburg, speaking of the ideal book to which his is an approach, "the feel and atmosphere, the layout and lingo, of regions, of breeds of men, of customs and slogans, in a manner and an air not given in regular history [which is] to be read and not sung. And besides, such a history would require that the student sing his way through most of the chapters." Well, why not sing the history of America? Americans have always sung, and they have sung differently in different generations—though I suspect that the generations have been more alike in this respect than first appears, and that in the conservatism of song we have one of the best aids toward an understanding of the fundamental American character, if there is any such thing. Any person knows ten times more songs than he ever realizes until such a book as this, or such a man as Mr. Sandburg met in the flesh and set talking, unlocks the treasure. Then he is likely to discover that his life is not at all the strictly, thinly contemporaneous thing he ordinarily assumes it to be. He finds national and racial memories lurking in the deeper portions of his mind, lying in wait down there to betray his reason and give him the feeling of being not thirty or forty but a hundred years old. This must be a good thing.

Mr. Sandburg went over the country and collected these songs for the same reason that he wrote his biography of Lincoln: because he wanted desperately to get at the heart of a people, and because he did not feel that contemporary American poetry—even his own poetry, perhaps—was getting at it for him. There is significance in his quoting from Amiel a complaint that modern poetry "lacks feeling, seriousness, sincerity, and pathos." Surely it was in search of these qualities that he went to our folk poetry and our folk music, spending years in the North, in the South, in the East, in the West, talking to people high and low, sitting up all night with singers he had stumbled upon and did not want to lose, transcribing the tunes, jotting down the words. And now in the end he gives us several hundred songs, many of them never printed before and all of them introduced with characteristic, highly colored words bespeaking their editor's ceaseless enthusiasm. The Negro, the pioneer, the Irish immigrant, the Southern mountaineer, the Great Lakes bargeman, the jailbird, the hobo, the section hand, the lumberjack, the soldier, the sentimentalist, the college student yelling his "darn fool ditties"—these and more than these are here, singing in many cases songs we once had heard but never expected to see in a book.

Sigmund Spaeth, successful with "Read 'Em and Weep" last season, comes out with a sequel called "Weep Some More, My Lady" (Doubleday, Page: $4) in which he collects further valuable specimens of the old-fashioned popular song. He admits in his preface that he "is less inclined to ridicule" than he was when he began the research. Hence the greater usefulness of his annotations now. His two books should stand with Mr. Sandburg's on the shelves of anyone who pretends to be interested in the people of the United States.

Actor-Preacher

Henry Ward Beecher: An American Portrait. By Paxton Hibben. George H. Doran Company. $5.

MR. PAXTON HIBBEN'S brilliant study of Beecher is the picture of a powerfully emotional actor who got into the pulpit of a church by mistake. The mistake was one of environment. In old Lyman Beecher's household everybody, including the small children, agonized over soul salvation, wept and prayed, and thought of God as one might think of a rather cranky and cruel police magistrate. Hell-fire was as real to all of them as the red-hot coals in the grate.

And so from this chrysalis of childhood a preacher instead of an actor emerged. Imagine Edwin Booth entangled in such topics as Blood of the Lamb, sanctification by grace, and the more austere portions of the Puritan credo—and you have Henry Ward Beecher. But he was not all Edwin Booth, for Booth—like a true tragedian—was always lofty and tragic. Not so with Beecher. At times his mirth was unseemly; an analysis reveals a substratum of the humorous qualities of DeWolf Hopper, and more than a trace of Billy Sunday and Elmer Gantry.

Mr. Hibben has shown the pathetic strain that ran through Beecher's enormous success. He was always trying unconsciously to break the intangible bonds that held him to his strait-laced career. In building Plymouth Church he discarded the pulpit entirely and erected a stage to take its place; a stage that ran like a tongue down through the auditorium so that he might be seen from all sides. And probably it was his subconscious itch for the forbidden footlights that made this born play-actor stand on his own stage and flame out against the theater. "It is notorious," he declared, "that the theater is the door to all the sinks of iniquity. . . . Half the victims of the gallows and the penitentiary will tell you that these schools for morals were to them the gate of debauchery."

Consecrated to moral purity as he was, he could not keep his mind away from girls. He called a female Bible class his "bevy of girls." In this pious garland of beauty there was one he called his "handsomest" girl; another was his "dearest" girl; and another was his "girl with the sweetest disposition." Such a man is bound to get bogged up to the neck in girl-trouble eventually—and that is what happened to Henry Ward Beecher.

The reverberating scandal in which Beecher was involved with Mrs. Tilton and her husband is set down by Mr. Hibben with consummate literary skill. His understanding of personality and motives is clear; his judgment is penetrating; his facts are convincingly presented, and he does not allow himself to become heavy-handed. Yet there is to my mind one flaw in this clarity of judgment. I do not think that Mr. Hibben has a real perception of Tilton's character. He makes Tilton out as a sort of saintly cuckold, when it was common knowledge that Tilton had neglected his wife for inamoratas of his own.

The fact that Beecher managed to extricate himself, in a measure, from this brazen Beecher-Tilton triangle is an evidence of his personal force and popularity. He seems clearly to have been guilty of adultery, yet the jury disagreed. John Bigelow said: "The amount of Beecher's innocence must be uncommonly great if one may judge by the time and trouble it takes to prove it." Bigelow voiced the cynical opinion of his well-informed contemporaries. Notwithstanding this, when Beecher went back to the crowded and enthusiastic Plymouth congregation he was given an ovation.

He always found a seat in the bandwagon of any popular movement if he could catch it in time, but his native shrewdness kept him from entering the vehicle until it was well on its way—and followed by cheering crowds. In the early Abolition days he was opposed to any agitation against slavery and thought William Lloyd Garrison a bad and dangerous man. But before it was all over he was in the front of the Abolition movement, with the spotlight falling on his powerful, sensual face.

He came very near missing the Lincoln bandwagon. When the Illinois railsplitter was a candidate for President, Beecher said that Lincoln was an "unshapely man," born low, without education or refinement, and wholly incapable of being the head of a nation. Later, in the disastrous first year of the war, he went around with an I-told-you-so air and declared that Lincoln had not a spark of genius or an element of leadership. Then the Northern armies began to win; and when Congress adopted the Thirteenth Amendment to the Constitution Beecher had caught up with the procession. A little breathless, it must be said, but he was there, nevertheless. Lincoln appeared at a window of the White House to receive the applause of the populace on the adoption of the amendment, and Beecher stood by his side, bowing and smiling. No doubt the common herd thought Beecher had assisted largely in the great work.

I have gained the impression from Mr. Hibben's book that the foundation of Beecher's success was laid by admiring women. This does not mean that he lacked capacity. He was an orator of immense power, a man of magnetism and emotion, the equal—perhaps—of Patrick Henry in the art of influencing men and women by spoken words.

His difficulty, and his tragedy, seems to be that he spent his life trying to be moral and a Christian, when in fact he was by nature simply an amorous, shrewd, convincing male go-getter.

Mr. Hibben has written a great biography, and one of lasting value. It is not merely interesting; it is profound. But its historical scholarship does not lie like a leaden weight on the book, for Hibben's style is graceful and delicate, sometimes almost gay. He is so saturated with Beecher knowledge that he writes without effort. In reading it one feels that Paxton Hibben understands Beecher better than anybody else has ever understood him, and that his book is a permanent contribution to American history.

W. E. WOODWARD

A Distinguished Editor

Life, Journalism, and Politics. By J. A. Spender. Frederick A. Stokes. Two volumes. $10.

THESE two volumes are written in an easier vein than was the grave treatise upon "Public Life" which Mr. Spender gave us a couple of years ago. The autobiographical chapters show a most engaging personality, with various interests and enthusiasms and a capacity for securing the friendship and confidence of all sorts of people that proved of immeasurable value for the life of journalism into which Mr. Spender naturally flowed after leaving Oxford. He came, as he tells us, of a writing family, and the impulse to write was coupled, as is not always the case, with a marked ability for clear and forcible expression. His great work lay in the editorship for many years of the evening paper the Westminster Gazette, which held a unique position of influence in the formation of liberal opinion and policy during the later nineteenth and the early twentieth centuries.

Indeed, for many readers the chief interest of this book lies in the revelation of the close relations between the higher journalism and practical statecraft. The Westminster stood for "heavy politics" addressed to "the serious reader," and though this attitude precluded both profits and a large circulation, it "paid" in the higher sense of that term. For Mr. Spender's candid account of his personal relations with the political chiefs, and with the great diplomatists and administrators, shows not merely that he was privy to all the important moves of interior politics but that his judgment counted heavily in their counsels. This, however, was due not chiefly to the power of the press, always recognized by modern politicians, but to the wisdom, discretion, and acute judgment of the editor's personality. There are probably only two other journalists of the age who have played so influential a part. How seldom it is possible to keep journalism on so high a level we realize when we learn that, during the thirty years of its life as an evening journal the Westminster lost about half a million pounds. What could be expected when it added to its serious politics columns for the competitive translation of English poetry into Latin and Greek!

When we turn to Mr. Spender's political positions and principles, we are caught at once by his frank acceptance of the epithet "smoother" applied to him in criticism by the full-blooded radicals of his time. He honestly believed that the Liberal Party, and the continuation of its historic function of gradual reforms, was of such paramount importance that every effort must be made to preserve its unity, and this at a time when imperialism threatened to disrupt the party on an issue of the first magnitude. Thus he gave a discriminate support to the Boer War, though he was critical of the aggressive policy it expressed, because the "insolent ultimatum" of Kruger left us no option. He was largely instrumental in healing the break, so that after the Liberal victory in 1905 the two sections of his party sat amicably together in Campbell-Bannerman's Government. But new difficulties arose, partly of policy but mainly of temperament, and writing of "the men of 1906" Mr. Spender observes that "the clash between him [Lloyd George] and Asquith seems to have been inevitable from the beginning." It was the difference between a bold opportunist plunger and a "wait-and-see" man, and through the next twenty years it was destined to weaken, divide, and even disrupt the Liberal party.

A good deal of the second volume is naturally concerned with the World War, and Spender tells some interesting stories of great soldiers, sailors, and statesmen. At a banquet given by the King at Buckingham Palace on the occasion of President Wilson's visit in 1918, "Wilson spoke for about half an hour without looking at a note, and never dropped a word or hesitated for a moment between one sentence and another. The King, talking afterwards to his guests, commented on the extraordinary accomplishment of this performance. 'But then,' he added modestly, 'I am no orator, which is perhaps a good thing for a constitutional ruler. My cousin, the German Emperor, was a great orator.'"

In a chapter on War Guilt he makes the interesting premise: "The truth is that in the world in which we were brought up the crime was not to make war but to make it unsuccessfully, and so it had been from the beginning of time." Brushing aside, not as irrelevant but as of secondary importance in determining British participation, the invasion of Belgium and other incidents and atrocities, Mr. Spender states, in language strictly accurate, the real attitude of English leaders of the older parties "that, if Germany had been incontestably in the right and her conduct in the war irreproachable, the reasons compelling this country to take sides against her would have been just as strong, and its position just as perilous if it had failed to do so, as on the contrary assumption. Whatever the issue on which she fought, a victorious Germany, in possession of Belgium and the Channel ports and commanding all the fleets of Europe, must have been a deadly menace to the British Empire, and according to the accepted principles of power-politics she would have been entitled to assert her supremacy over it in any way she chose."

Can any statement of "power-politics" be more damning than this? But true as this diagnosis is, it does not go deep enough into the roots of "power-politics." In foreign affairs Mr. Spender never seems to have discovered the determinant part played by economic interests, especially in that imperialism which breeds little and great wars. The Boer War was not a struggle between a benighted Krugerism and an enlightened Rhodes-and-Milnerism. It was first and chiefly a conflict carefully matured by business men bent on mining gains. So, too, deeper analysis will disclose the World War as caused by lusts and ambitions more economic than political. Mr. Spender does not grasp the large element of truth in the doctrine of the economic determination of history. His statecraft condemns the very existence of a Labor Party, as if it introduced some irrelevant and tainting influence into pure politics. Though personally sympathetic with many causes of "social reforms," he does not appear to appreciate the inherent injustices of our economic system in its bearing on the income, work, and life of the laboring classes, or the large part which the state must necessarily be called upon to play in redressing these grievances. This obliquity of vision he shares with the other leaders of the party of whose principles and policy he is so able an exponent.

Thoreau

Henry Thoreau: the Cosmic Yankee. By J. Brooks Atkinson. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

Walden. Illustrated with Wood Cuts by E. F. Daglish. Houghton Mifflin Company. $8.

The Moon. By Henry D. Thoreau. Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.

The Heart of Thoreau's Journals. Edited by Odell Shepard. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

THE most important question about these books is not what we think about them but what Thoreau himself would have thought of them. As to that one can only speculate, of course; but, like all speculation about Thoreau, it is quite fascinating. He would have enjoyed "The Cosmic Yankee" chiefly, perhaps, for what it does not say about him; one doubts whether he would have recognized his homely features in more than a score or so of its pages. And yet Mr. Atkinson has written as well on Thoreau as almost anyone could write. The trouble is that the peculiar aged-in-the-wood flavor remains, despite all the efforts of the critics, in his pages and must be enjoyed there and there alone—who, for example, wants to read about Pepys? This "Walden" and this first edition of "The Moon," I am positive, would have stirred Thoreau's Yankee choler—if the value of a man is not in his skin that you should touch him, how about the value of a book? What an ironical commentary these two over-elaborate, excessively expensive "collectors' items" are upon the reception granted the works that were actually published while Thoreau lived! Nauseated at the sight of these costly "items," I turn to that passage in the "Journal" where Thoreau recounts how he toted upstairs on his back the 700-odd copies of "A Week," which, published at his own expense, had sold only some 200 copies in two years; then, sitting down and contemplating this huge total of his "works," he wrote perhaps the noblest passage that ever came from his pen: "Nevertheless, in spite of this result, sitting beside the inert mass of my works, I take up my pen tonight to record what thought or experience I may have had, with as much satisfaction as ever."

One can well afford, then, to overlook the first three volumes; but, blase and sophisticated moderns, if you would read a book, buy "The Heart of Thoreau's Journals." For in it, carefully culled by the loving and yet critical hand of Mr. Shepard, are to be found the choicest fruits of Thoreau; and they have a tang and a tartness that make the finest plums of our contemporary devotees of the pungent phrase and the peppery epigram seem flat and insipid. It is sometimes said that the surest test of a book is whether, having finished it, one wishes to read it again; but an even better test is whether the reader involuntarily pauses, leaps up, and darts around to find someone to whom certain passages must be read immediately. Since criticism is inevitably a personal matter, I confess that, on reading this epitome of Thoreau, I frequently halted and, there being nobody handy to read to, bounded from my chair and stalked about the room literally yelling certain lines aloud—for, like Thoreau, I feared "only lest my expression might not be extravagant enough."

For he must be read and reread, and then read again. There is little new to be said about him—indeed, there never was—and if one makes the attempt one is likely to discover that Thoreau himself has already said it and in a far better way. No writer ever knew his own strength and weakness better—dozens of passages might be cited to illustrate the point. For more than anything else—"a mystic, a transcendentalist, and a natural philosopher to boot"—he was primarily a writer and he knew it. "My work is writing. . . . I know that no subject is too trivial for me . . . the theme is nothing, the life is everything. All that interests the reader is the depth and intensity of the life excited." And no writer ever wrote more wisely about the art of writing. "Nothing goes by luck in composition. . . . Every sentence is the result of a long probation." From hundreds of passages—"kinked and knotted up into something hard and significant"—which I have marked I give these few. "My Aunt Maria asked me to read the life of Dr. Chalmers, which, however, I did not promise to do. Yesterday, Sunday, she was heard through the partition shouting to my Aunt Jane, who is deaf: 'Think of it! He stood half an hour today to hear the frogs croak, and he wouldn't read the life of Chalmers.'" "How earthly old people become—moldy as the grave! Their wisdom smacks of the earth. There is no foretaste of immortality in it. They remind me of earthworms and mole crickets." "I doubt if Emerson could trundle a wheelbarrow through the streets, because it would be out of character." "One never knows his neighbors till he has carried a subscription paper among them." "Most were not aware of the size of the great elm till it was cut down." "A truly good book is something as wildly natural and primitive, mysterious and marvelous, ambrosial and fertile as a fungus or a lichen." This is such a book.

R. F. Dibble

By Their Fruits

My Eighty Years. By Charles F. Dole. E. P. Duttor and Company. $5.

HERE is a survivor of what has been discovered to be the most ignorant, the most insincere, the most vapid, the most ridiculous, the most altogether useless period in human history—the Victorian Age. Mr. Dole flourished through "the dreadful decade," the seventies, "the mauve decade" running from the eighties into the "gay nineties," and the whole inane period of "our times" now being so absurdly memorialized by Mark Sullivan. Born and reared in a Puritan family of the strictest type, he never underwent the liberating experience of "self-expression." Married in 1873, with no preliminary and precautionary "companionate" relationship, he has lived with one woman for fifty-four years, with not a single "affair" to vary and enliven the drab monotony of such an existence. Never claiming or even imagining a "right to happiness," he has plodded along through all these eighty years in the simple pursuit of duty. "I can scarcely remember a time," he writes, "when righteousness of conduct—that is, an ideal of duty, obligation, faithfulness, responsibility to do my share in whatever had to be done—was not in my mind." He does not smoke or drink; he has been for half a century an ardent reformer, and is still a professional preacher of religion; he has broken none of the Ten Commandments, reveres the Golden Rule, worships God as the universal Good-Will, and believes in service as the rule of love. What a life!

Yes—what a life! How many of our smug sophisticates will be able to match it, in terms even of their own standards of joyful living, when they come to tell the tale of their eighty years? And how many in that eighth decade will have reaped a harvest of which will begin to match that gathered and stored away by this good man?

Mr. Dole's book is a simple, guileless, genial confession of his [illegible] and town, study at Harvard College and Andover Seminary, a brief period of teaching and "drifting," a three years' pastorate in Portland, Maine, a forty years' pastorate in Jamaica Plain, Massachusetts, marriage, children, happy vacation months in Maine, foreign travel, books, public service, and now the quiet but still busy years of retirement. In and around this unexciting thread of narrative is woven the mellow philosophy and pure religion of the author, who is revealed, in spite of his own instinctive and ingratiating humility, as one of the wisest as well as the best of men. Here is a hard-headed Yankee, independent, even "sot," in his opinions, going his own free way in politics, religion, and social experience. Here on the other hand is a mystic who discovers the presence of a divine Good-Will in the world and feels himself bound in conscience to exemplify this good-will in his own conduct. The result is that rarest of combinations—a bold, free-thinking, rigorously conscientious nonconformist who is at the same time tolerant, sympathetic, tenderhearted, companionable, and forever kind. Mr. Dole has seldom been able or willing to get along with institutions or organized partisan groups. In politics, "beginning as a party man, . . . [he has] been fairly compelled to be an Independent." In religion he has had little reverence even for so liberal a church as the Unitarian. But he has always been able to get along with men. No force or compulsion or hatred here; only the sweet persuasions of intelligence and sympathetic understanding! War is impossible, "unholy," to Mr. Dole, primarily because it is an infraction of the law of love one for another. All his life he has practiced "the spirit of the Golden Rule," and thus has stirred easily in other hearts the love within his own.

It is not difficult to imagine what Mr. Dole thinks of this mechanistic, imperialistic, vulgar, self-assertive world. Not even such a spectacle, however, can disturb his serenity, dim his faith, or embitter his good humor. And why should it? For this man has discovered the magic of good-will, can wait, as God waits, for other and weaker men to make the same discovery. Charles F. Dole is a saint. He will feel at home and enjoy congenial company when he gets to heaven.

The Case of Floyd Dell and Others

An Unmarried Father. By Floyd Dell. George H. Doran Company. $2.

FLOYD DELL presents the curious spectacle of a novelist who understands his characters altogether too well for their health as fictional beings, and incidentally for his own health as an artist. Add to this misfortune a natural fluency of expression, a hand dexterous at plot-steering, and a mind shrewdly informed on all aspects of what the literary critics call life and the scientists divide into biology, psychology, and sociology—and it is apparent at once how handicapped Mr. Dell is as an artist, however useful these things may be to him in other respects. For it seems to me that it is an essential convention of art to pretend that life is mysterious and unintelligible—meaningful, but never clear. The artist is a Peeping Tom who feeds his fancy with fleeting glimpses of life caught through the aperture of a narrow vision. He must not permit himself to know too much. If he is ignorant—so much the better. If he is unfortunate enough to have become infected with knowledge, he must hide it as best he can. At all costs he must remain superficial. He must have faith in the appearance of things, without asking for explanations. Therein lies his salvation. For the surfaces of life, the phenomena of things are eternal—the explanation varies from age to age.

It is this intensive superficiality that one misses in the novels of Floyd Dell. He is far too sensible to be taken in by life. He will not be awed into accepting the apparent finality of things. Life is not a mystery to him, and he will not pretend it. He knows all about his fictional children—what ails them, what they want, what they ought to do to be happy; and even though he try to hide it from them they feel it before long, become self-conscious, and resolve to behave like sensible people worthy of their intelligent progenitor instead of drifting about like irresponsible artistic creations.

This, of course, does not prevent "An Unmarried Father" from being an original and absorbing book. Amusing, too, though here again Mr. Dell is too sensible to be provoked into laughing outright at his hero's plight and exploiting the inherent comedy of the situation he has conjured up. And if it is a problem novel, never was a problem so delightfully presented. It is a book that the Elizabeth Ann League would do well to circulate in conjunction with "The President's Daughter." Mr. Dell takes the pathetic plight of the Unmarried Mother, inverts the situation by a cleverly arranged chain of plausible events, and you have an Unmarried Father. Here for the first time is a painting entitled Bachelor and Child, done in the reverent tradition of the Madonna and Child. It is the unscrupulous woman-in-the-case (alias man-in-the-case) who, confronted with the result of her folly, deserts it for the sake of her career; whereas the hapless bachelor is hard put to it to remember that he is a male and keep from yielding to his natural instincts and becoming a wet-nurse. The spectacle of the deserted bachelor adrift in the world, with the child in his arms, is good farce; but Mr. Dell's mien throughout is so serious and earnest that one is not quite sure whether it is good form to laugh. And whereas the happy ending of the tale, when the parents are unexpectedly reunited, might bring some other novelist under suspicion, in Mr. Dell's case one merely feels that he is a conscientious psychological surgeon who will not let his patients undergo any more pain than his fictional operation warrants.

Somewhere in his novels every novelist has a character who is his intellectual deputy on the scene. Dr. Martha Zerneke, the sympathetic but business-like obstetrician in whose hospital the unnatural mother is confined, is Mr. Dell's character-at-large. One has a feeling that he sees life through her eyes and handles it through her deft, aseptic fingers. His vision is of a sane, sanitary, well-lighted world, swept by reason and knowledge, in which there are no dark corners where ignorance might breed disease—a world in which sex and the other secretions and excretions of life, far from being tabooed, are so intellectually sterilized that they can be handled freely, without distaste, like specimens in a laboratory. Such a world is not without a certain beauty—to an artist who can keep from understanding it, and see amber-colored tubes instead of diabetic symptoms.

ALTER BRODY

The Father of Footnotes

The Greville Diary. Including Passages Hitherto Withheld from Publication. Edited by Philip Whitwell Wilson. Doubleday, Page and Company. Two volumes. $10.

WHEN Charles Greville came of age he had no visible means of support. But his social standing was of the best and a ducal grandfather generously provided him with an income at the public expense. Two offices were found for him, one the Secretaryship of Jamaica, a complete sinecure. The other was the Clerkship of the Privy Council, a position to which were attached some slight duties. It was a bad piece of jobbery but the ways of Providence are inscrutable, and we of a later generation have reason to be thankful that the taxpayers most unjustly provided Greville with the leisure to write his incomparable diary.

Nobody could have been better placed to observe the political and social events of the age. His family connections and his official position brought him into contact with everyone that mattered. Recognized as a man of talent and wide information, he wielded considerable influence behind the scenes. Prime Ministers consulted him and intrusted him with delicate negotiations with newspapers; great ladies confided in him. Into his journal went everything he saw and heard—political and diplomatic secrets, court gossip, society scandal, notes on men and manners at home and abroad.

In his later years, contemplating the many volumes he was leaving to posterity, Greville censored many entries "that I may not needlessly do mischief." But Henry Reeve, his colleague and literary executor, considered it necessary to suppress a great deal more. Even then the diary caused a great sensation when it was published in 1874. The Queen was extremely vexed. She wrote indignantly of "the dreadful indiscretion and DISGRACEFULLY bad taste of Mr. Reeve" in publishing this "scurrillous journal without eliminating what is very offensive and most disloyal towards the sovereigns he served."

This new edition of the diary is the result of the recent discovery of the pages suppressed by Reeve. Mr. P. W. Wilson in his task as editor was evidently faced with a dilemma. He wanted to produce a readable volume, unburdened by footnotes, without omitting any interesting material. A complete reprint of the diary as it stood would have been an enormous work chiefly valuable to students. One day's entry often covers half-a-dozen unrelated subjects, and the only order is thus a chronological one. Moreover Greville often heard only part of a story. Further details would be forthcoming months or perhaps years later. Mr. Wilson has therefore rearranged the diary in chapters according to subjects, joining the Greville jottings together with brief explanatory sentences of his own. The outcome of this very arduous piece of editing is on the whole eminently satisfactory, except where, in his attempts to be popular, Philip Whitwell Wilson the historian is overshadowed by P. W. Wilson the journalist. Some of his interpolations, for instance, are rather cheaply topical. His comment: "The Cato Street Conspiracy was what has since come to be called direct action" is wholly unnecessary and historically inaccurate.

Mr. Wilson only occasionally calls attention to entries previously suppressed, but one can make fairly accurate guesses at the passages on which Reeve's blue pencil fell. The young Queen is described as "an obstinate girl who takes fancies into her head and loves to have her own way." Lytton Strachey has emphasized Victoria's obstinacy but he also pictured her as completely under the sway of her husband in the latter part of her life. Greville, quoting Baron Stockmar, tells another story: "The Prince was completely cowed and the Queen is so excitable that the Prince lived in terror of bringing on the hereditary malady and dreaded saying or doing anything that might have a tendency to produce this effect."

There is much more in the diary of an equally unflattering nature about England's great and good Queen, but it was her uncles for whom Greville reserved his most stinging criticisms. Summing up on George IV, he writes: "There have been good and wise kings but not many of them. Take them one with another they are of inferior character, and this I believe to be one of the worst of the kind. The littleness of his character prevents his displaying the dangerous faults that belongs to great minds, but with vices and weaknesses of the lowest and most contemptible order it would be difficult to find a disposition more abundantly furnished."

Greville had no more illusions about his own class than he had about royalty. He was too near a witness of their crimes, follies, and stupidities, accounts of which fill many pages of his journal. Yet he remained the complete patrician and his attitude toward "the lesser breeds" is amusingly demonstrated by his patronizing description of the American Minister in London in 1829. "Maclane is a sensible man with very good American manners, which are not refined." (My italics.)

His comments on the increasing demands of the working-classes are equally typical. Occasionally eloquent over their sufferings, he was more often aghast at their pretensions. "Universal suffrage," he wrote contemptuously of the Chartist program in 1849, "is to pick out the men fit to frame new constitutions and when the delegates thus chosen have been brought together—no matter how ignorant, how stupid, how in every way unfit they may be—they expect to be allowed . . . to break up at their caprice and pleasure all the ancient foundations, and tear down the landmarks of society; and this havoc, and ruin, and madness are dignified with the fine name of constitutional reform."

It seems unnecessary to continue quoting one of the most quoted books in the world. His diary is an indispensable sourcebook. At the same time the layman who picks up this attractive new edition and opens it at random can always be certain of rich entertainment.

KEITH HUTCHISON

"Our Times"

Our Times. By Mark Sullivan. Vol. I: The Turn of the Century. Vol. II: America Finding Itself. Charles Scribner's Sons. $5 each.

THE appraisal of Mark Sullivan's "Our Times" turns upon the author's success in making contemporary history interesting. The first volume showed at once that the whole work is not intended to fill the role of formally written history, even for its period. History professionally written would not employ a method and a manner of statement so plastic; it would give more formality to its narrative and would comprehend a wider range of source materials. Moreover, it would be likely to select and assess a more restricted area of events for record and comment. But the first volume was written in a form so refreshingly personal and original that the reader looked forward to a modern American diary covering the first quarter of the twentieth century, always with an eye single to matters of public interest and importance. Well removed from academic organization and perspective, the book is a highly readable report of matured journalistic observation, practicing well what Macaulay preached when he maintained that history should portray, among other things, religious sects, changes in literary taste, manners, dress, repasts, public amusements, and similar social phenomena.

The new volume brings the record down to 1905, and everywhere in the twenty-eight chapters the author is led forward by his interest in finding the American mind. Were he writing a philosophical treatise he would be able, no doubt, to use the same materials to discover how the American mind is made. Twelve chapters are wisely employed to describe the influences that gave its patriotic bent to the American temper during the earlier century and entered positively into the making of the nation's leadership as late as the turn of that century. These influences were the subjects taught in the common schools. Foremost of all, perhaps, was the McGuffey series of readers, which Mr. Sullivan discovered, by means of a wide investigation, to be still cherished with affection by many survivors of the rural school era. The games of the schoolyards, the community singing and dancing, and the elocutionary instruction of the time helped to create a nation-wide social solidarity. The influence of the common schools was everywhere democratic. Mr. Sullivan thinks that its critics have not always been fair.

Typical of the criticism of the nineteenth-century common school was the conviction of Henry Adams that the education of the "American boy of 1854 stood nearer the year 1 than the year 1900," and that for the later period "he had no education at all." Mr. Sullivan points out that Adams could appraise the needs of the twentieth century after it arrived. His teachers could not do this. We may not expect teachers to be prophets or demand that they educate pupils for conditions not yet in sight. Probably many of the present generation, with a different vision of the school, would contend for a different view of the teacher's obligation. Historically, the school system has been more conservative than industry and certain of the professions, though less so than the religious establishment. During much of the last century it was content to follow traditional instruction, even in the midst of obviously changing conditions. Professional teachers may reasonably be expected to introduce their pupils to the major contemporary tendencies by providing a range of knowledge sufficiently wide to make adjustment easier to opportunities both present and ahead. Mr. Sullivan, however, would indorse Henry Adams's main conclusion; as a historian, he limits his purpose to a survey of education as it was actually given.

The larger part of this volume contains a vivid résumé of those years of the 1890's which witnessed the growing irritation of the public mind over the labor question and the rapid stimulation of big business. An account of Markham's poem, "The Man with the Hoe," and of its inspiration by Millet's painting, furnishes an attractive introduction to this mood of the times. The poem was symptomatic, perhaps, of industrial labor's insurgency as well as of the appearance of Bryan and Roosevelt as the more prominent champions of social and political reform. The poem became the incentive of numerous editorials and university lectures on the ominous capitalistic development of the day. It was called the "cry of the Zeitgeist," as timely as Hood's "The Song of the Shirt." Politicians divided into two antagonistic groups over the outstanding economic question before the public—whether business should follow its spirit of enterprise upon the comfortable theory of laissez faire, as the "barons" of the day presumed, or submit to some form of government regulation. The problem was complex. It involved the Standard Oil Company, railroad mergers, sugar refineries, the packers, pure food, and coal strikes. A new economic vocabulary came into vogue. The Senate was the storm center of the controversy precipitated by President Roosevelt as leader of a new program for democracy.

The suggestion of government interference in capitalized industry was not novel. The author gives the highly interesting bit of information that in 1842, when the country had but 2,000 miles of railroad, Governor Seward of New York advised the legislature to consider supervision of the roads of the State respecting "accommodations afforded the public, the fares received, the profits realized," and urged continuance of the charter policy which stipulated the right of the State to take over the railroads when deemed necessary. From 1887 the Interstate Commerce Commission existed, but with less power than later on. The story of Roosevelt's policies, the genesis of the trust and its expansion upon the Dodd model, Carnegie's disdain of cooperation, and the President's final success in the Northern Securities case and the coal strike are reminders of perplexing problems peculiar to the turn of the century which Mr. Sullivan surveys so admirably.

The volumes of "Our Times" will be read by many men with pleasure, and then placed among their most highly valued books of reference.

The Primitive State

The Origin of the State. By R. H. Lowie. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $1.50.

IT would be insolent in one who is not an anthropologist to praise Professor Lowie's book. Hence, therefore, I will only say that his expressed hope that it will be useful to students in related fields receives an ample fulfilment in the case at least of one reader. I have found it extraordinarily suggestive, and, for the most part, it carries conviction to a soul as ignorant of the evidence as I. What Professor Lowie's fellow-anthropologists will have to say of his selection from the vast field of evidence I do not know; but if what he gives is a fair and random selection, the importance of his thesis is beyond all question.

It is, briefly, that the state is universal even though its form is not unilinear. There has always been a coercive organ exercising control over the inhabitants of a contiguous territorial area. That organ is superior to associations within the area, and it is the instrument by which the unification of the community is achieved. In a word, the answer to the question of the origin of the state is that it is born of sovereignty.

From that conclusion many consequences follow. It does much to fortify the Marxian theory of the state for which, in a special form, Dr. Franz Oppenheimer has so stoutly contended. It does much, also, to explain the hostility of Leviathan to voluntary associations. These are the natural enemies of the enforced unity it is seeking to impose; and we can then understand why the idea of freedom of association is so late in historical development. Professor Lowie makes the point that in early society associational development will not issue into a national state. Nor will it, we may add, in later. Its necessity and value in the modern time is that it prevents the over-exclusiveness of the unity for which the national state stands; and it permits the growth of organs of protest against the perversion of the state-purpose by its instruments. I could wish, indeed, that Professor Lowie had given us his reflections upon a theme which seems implicit in his essay.

The state, as I understand him (my ignorance may well have led me astray), is the outcome of a need to protect the territorial community against the excess of the individual or the group. The group, today, is necessary for the protection of the individual against the excess of the state. What, in primitive society, is the root of that excess? Is it the effort, as Dr. Oppenheimer thinks, of a class to exploit another for its benefit? Certainly, today, no analysis of the state is realistic which does not make this a major theme. The purpose of all groups and classes is the capture of the state for a purpose which coincides with an interest each seeks to promote. Baptists seek to capture the legislatures of the Middle West lest Darwinism lead the young to damnation. Wall Street seeks to capture (or to maintain as its prisoner) the Presidency lest its dominion be threatened. The K.K.K. seeks to hold the political citadel against such unholy forces as the Jews, the Catholics, and the Negroes. The struggle for power is clearly central in the political problem. Each seeks to obtain that, so to say, ultimate right to proclaim martial law which gives it victory over its enemies. In the modern state it holds the army and navy to that end. I cannot find in Professor Lowie's fascinating illustrations the primitive analogy to these instruments. But he convinces me (and I hope greatly will convince other students) that the light his science can cast on the problems we confront is profound and that the sooner we seek to grasp the central results of anthropological research, the better for their understanding.

HAROLD J. LASKI

Liberalism and Literature

Cities and Men. By Ludwig Lewisohn. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

LIBERALISM is the fine art of falling between two stools. It is the yearning to have one's cake and eat it too. The liberal, seated in the center, between the reactionary on the right and the radical on the left, wastes his breath in futile protest against the authoritarianism of the first and the anarchy of the second. He does not believe in God, but he is no atheist. He thinks the French Revolution a significant event for the promotion of what he calls progress, but he deplores the Reign of Terror. He hates Napoleon, but he regrets his defeat by the Coalition. He is skeptical of revealed religion, but he is credulous of the dogmas of nineteenth-century science. Most liberals spend their lives wondering if now is not the moment to throw off all liberal pretense and go over to the extreme left.

In art and letters the liberal tends to seek refuge in the camp of romanticism. That is as it should be. Romanticism rejects tradition, and tradition, one of the props of reaction, is anathema to the liberal. Romanticism exalts the individual and denies the claims of authority, and the liberal is not only anti-authoritarian but egocentric. Romanticism despises reason and deifies instinct, and the liberal, who knows himself too muddle-headed to rely upon his reason, is happy to make instinct his ultimate authority.

Mr. Lewisohn is a liberal, but a particularly shrewd one. Desiring to deal telling blows at reaction and tradition, and being well aware of the weakness of the romantic's position, he builds himself a new platform from which to send his shot. This invention he calls the "autobiographical tradition" (it is hard to escape the word tradition), and into his ranks he shanghaies a body of poets and thinkers whose shades must protest vehemently at fighting under his flag. In the camp of "the autobiographical instinct, the Judeo-Christian, Protestant, Romantic and saving speech and protest of the free man" he has the effrontery to place Dante, Lucian, Augustine, Montaigne, and Goethe, beside such egolaters as Rousseau, Hazlitt, Shelley, and Whitman. They belong under his banner, we are told, because their works were "one long confession," they alone "looked in their hearts and wrote." When I say "they alone," I mean merely that Racine, Bossuet, Santayana, and La Bruyère (whom Mr. Lewisohn rejects) are presumed either to have no hearts or not to have looked into them. The distinction is a little bewildering (as are all liberal distinctions). Granted that Shelley and Montaigne both looked into their hearts, is there not a prodigious difference between the first, who mistook his heart for the universe, and the second, who observed man and the universe in the light of his reason and his heart? Can the wild-eyed, neurotic, blubbering Rousseau be placed in the same category with the serenely skeptical Goethe? Has not Goethe really more in common with that magnificent psychologist, La Bruyère, than with the undisciplined torrent called Whitman? Bossuet, who unhappily revered authority, wrote: "Dire Je crois, c'est plutot en nous un effort pour produire un si grand acte qu'une certitude absolue de l'avoir produit." Is this to look into one's heart, or not?

But the muddle of liberalism is an unending swamp. "What," asks Mr. Lewisohn, "is it to be classical but to have ease of form and to repeat the moral and intellectual patterns by which the state has found it easy to keep men in subjection in both peace and war?" And elsewhere he says: "Christendom means the great tradition of patriotism and war and victory." Which is a point of view. But how are we to reconcile it with the statement that romanticism—an anti-classical and anti-Christian phenomenon—"has been his [man's] undoing—romanticism that discovered the epics, the myths, the songs of the various nationalities, that, in fact, discovered those various nationalities, next identified them with race, next with certain territories, next with power and dominance. . . . The Continent is sodden with romanticism, with a false and virulent historical-mindedness." After this, one would not be surprised to hear Mr. Lewisohn extolling the Christian internationalism of the Middle Ages and pleading for a return to the temporal power of the Papacy.

In any man not a liberal it would be amazing to find a writer so fundamentally wrong in his ultimate concepts and so agreeable and penetratingly right in his estimate of individual instances. Mr. Lewisohn writes with unobtrusive scholarship and a certain charming suavity on a variety of subjects. His sympathies range over most of Europe. He keeps his temper cheerfully and humorously when such Tories as Saintsbury and Santayana are his subject. He communicates to us feelingly and informingly the sense of great and grave poetry in his essays on Rilke and Dehmel. The little chapter on Baudelaire is particularly intelligent, and the survey of Cocteau's verse (the first I have seen in English) is sensitive and just. His Unknown Poet is an act of Christian kindness of the sort we always intend to perform and never find time for. On Vienna, and on Catullus in Verona, he is fluid and graceful and tender. His restatement of the Heine case, his evaluation of Georg Brandes, and his introduction of Martin Buber will be read with the greatest interest. Mr. Lewisohn seems to me at his best in the realm of pure literature, and there he is all that we desire him to be.

Sudermann

Der tolle Professor. Ein Roman aus der Bismarckzeit. Von Hermann Sudermann. Stuttgart und Berlin: J. G. Cotta'sche Buchhandlung Nachfolger.[1]

Hermann Sudermann. Sein Werk und sein Wesen. Von Kurt Busse. Stuttgart und Berlin: J. G. Cotta'sche Buchhandlung Nachfolger.

"DER tolle Professor," Hermann Sudermann's most recent and most sustained effort in the field of fiction since "Es War" and "Das hohe Lied," is essentially a political novel. In this chronicle of the tragic career of the Mad Professor of Königsberg Sudermann manifestly seeks to epitomize the decline of German liberalism during the Bismarckian era. In mood, individual characterization, and motivation the novel rests on the solid foundation of Sudermann's experience as a student in the university of Königsberg in 1875. Although veiled in a charitable anonymity not a few of its sharply etched portraits of university dignitaries, including that of the Mad Professor, are drawn from life and with sardonic veracity. In the face of a petulant school of criticism which persists after more than a generation in quavering a batrachian chorus against Sudermann and all his works, we venture to record here that the animating idea of "Der tolle Professor" has been conceived with sincerity and authority and that its dominant theme has been executed in the main with that vibrancy and verve of diction which distinguish a not inconsiderable portion of Sudermann's writings.

"Der tolle Professor" is an ambitious attempt to depict the confusion and despair which may engulf an individual of bold and independent habit of thought who finds himself at odds with the popular will during a period of social and political transition. Dr. Sieburth's deplorably indiscreet mode of life and his equivocal position on burning questions of the day contrive to bring about his ostracism from the circles of respectable academic society. And at this fateful moment in his career the Iron Chancellor becomes his special Nemesis. The popular triumph of Bismarck's imperial policies disturbs Sieburth profoundly. In his solitude he falls prey to a dangerous mood of indecision and self-analysis. His original skeptical attitude merges into a fatal relaxation of the will and an all-encompassing pessimism. He is caught in the grip of a cruel preoccupation with the problem of the multiplicity of the phases of truth. In the end his recognition of the instability of reason, of morality, and of the social order becomes an insidious mental disease which devours the very fiber of his mind and culminates in his self-destruction.

Kurt Busse's "Hermann Sudermann, Sein Werk und sein Wesen" is a refreshingly spirited and timely piece of literary criticism. The book is an unabashed "vindication" of Sudermann, but its argument is unusually convincing. In the creator of such dissimilar things as "Frau Sorge" and "Sodoms Ende," "Das hohe Lied" and "Litauische Geschichten" Busse professes to discern not a purveyor of prurient sensationalism but a conscientious artist and a sincere interpreter of modern life. Busse attacks the problem of a revaluation of Sudermann from the ethnological and geographical point of view. For him Sudermann is irrevocably the East Prussian, wilful and intellectually tough-fibered, sensual but self-controlled, intelligently practical and realistic rather than imaginative and poetic, the son of sturdy pioneering peasants and the child of wind-swept plains and marshes. The salient qualities of his personality are the factors which determine his literary style and his position in German letters. Busse is justified in terming Sudermann a continuator of the traditions of Spielhagen, Freytag, and Gottfried Keller rather than an exponent of the [illegible]

One Side of Heine

That Man Heine. A Biography. By Lewis Browne. The Macmillan Company. $3.

ONE is tempted to believe that Mr. Browne chose this ugly title with a certain deliberation, as if to fit the mouth of a man who might say with justifiable and deprecatory emphasis: "Oh! that fellow, Heine!" Every crime of which the great lyricist and satirist was ever accused is accepted here as proved against him. He lusted, he lied, he bragged, he abused his friends, and he lacked bravery. That last charge in particular sticks in the craw of those who have sorrowed with the poet during his eight years on his "mattress grave," who have delighted in the wit he kept alert and the pen he kept so busy then and the tenderness with which he cared for the two women who, according to Mr. Browne, most plagued him during his life—the mother who would have made a millionaire of him in his youth and the wife who squandered every cent he earned before his death. Mr. Browne, in truth, does not love his Heine. But it is only fair to admit that he appreciates in full measure every side of his work and every phase of his development. Also he is letter-perfect on his theme—a matter for which students should be thankful—even though one may quarrel over the particular letters he chooses to reproduce.

To call this a complete biography of Heine, however, is to take for granted something not acknowledged by others plying Mr. Browne's biographic trade. Surely a life-history, to be complete, should be completely rounded off, and this is one-sided. We see Heine as a sensitive soul socially suffering from Judenschmerz in a country that forced every Jew to become Christian if he wished to enter an honorable profession by way of a university. We see a Hellene or Pagan fighting a Nazarene or Jew within himself—a still more devastating conflict for a genius. We see a mystic fighting realities; a tortured creature torturing others in his turn; a freedom-lover taking arms against German Junkerdom; an unsuccessful lover bewailing his evil fate.

Mr. Browne is capable of saying:

> Had he been possessed of a healthy mind, he would not have felt the need to flee at every crisis to his fantasy world. He would have been able to meet the harshest exigencies without a tremor and would have at least tried to vanquish them in reality.

Is the world richer for poets who refuse to flee to their fantasy worlds? One rather thinks of this as the counsel given to highly strung soldiers, driven by national necessities to shouldering a gun.

There is no relief in this book for those to whom the picture of continuous mental and moral struggle is harassing. We do not see the audacious young student who, knapsack on back, strode away from boring Göttingen, "famous for its sausages and university," to write his inimitable "Harzreise." We do not see the borrower from banker Uncle Solomon who, given four hundred pounds purely for "window-dressing" purposes with London bankers, promptly cashed the check to pay old friends and then had the impudence to inform the same uncle that he must pay something for the honor of bearing the borrower's name! A horror to his enemies, devastating as vitriol to those who offended, Heine yet had friends; but Mr. Browne shows them only as people to whom the poet went in his need to beg. Heine, of course, lacked the aristocratic dash of Shelley, but yet he had a dash all his own, and we miss it in this biography.

Mr. Browne takes for granted much gossip about Heine's relations with women. Was it necessary for anyone as good-looking, as talented, and as distinguished to pick prostitutes indiscriminately off the streets? Was it possible, granted he did so, that he could contract from such contact a spinal disease so disastrous to his frame and so innocuous to his brain? As Michael Monahan points out in his much more sympathetic book, Daudet and Maupassant suffered from the same nervous trouble, but in their cases it was ascribed to the sensitive organization that accompanies outstanding genius—which Heine had.

No, Mr. Browne's picture of Heine is by no means complete. We get, so to speak, only one side of his face. Still, Mr. Browne's book is important for Heine lovers. That anyone should go so deeply into Heine lore is something to be grateful for. Heine has been neglected despite his status in German literature, perhaps for the very reason that Mr. Browne has so completely shown. His was a complex character, racially, politically, even poetically. Much of what the biographer ascribes to Judenschmerz in Heine's youth was probably simply Weltschmerz, that disease from which even Gentiles suffer. He, too, had to pass through his "Sturm und Drang" period, as even Schiller, the pious, had. Mr. Browne has painted the despised Heine, the hated Heine (hating even himself), the Heine who deserved often to be ostracized, the Heine of the caustic tongue and acid pen. The trouble is that the book is as easy reading as the lightest fiction, with the result that those who do not know and love the poet for his poetry and the satirist for his wit may get a wrong impression—and never read more than Lewis Browne.

NORAH MEADE

The Primitive Thinker

Primitive Man as Philosopher. By Paul Radin. D. Appleton and Company. $3.

DR. RADIN presents an arresting and radical thesis. We have learned that the cave-dwellers of southern France in remote prehistoric times were skilled artists, that the skull capacity of the Cro-Magnons was as ample as our own; we are now presented with the evidence that lo! the poor Indian was, and remains, a philosopher.

The false view of primitive man is due to the different centering of his interests and consequent pursuits or ceremonies and to the prejudices of the ethnologists committed to finding the mentality of primitive people inferior to their own. Primitive life stresses the world of sensation and action, from which the academic mind has freed itself in behalf of a logic suited to its pursuits. It is prone to regard as superstitious any procedures diverging from its own standards. When a poisoned arrow is discharged along a deer-trail to bring good hunting, that "magical" rite is but part of the total action; the selection of the proper trail at the proper season being quite as essential a part of the practical ceremony. Rationalists like Voltaire may explain in sophisticated satire that incantations together with a sufficient amount of arsenic will kill your neighbor's sheep. The primitive man is content with the result and hesitates to omit what he may regard as the superstitious part of the total procedure.

According to Dr. Radin our whole picture of the primitive mind is askew. The error started with Tylor and his doctrine of "animism"; Levy-Bruhl's correction of a pre-logical mentality and the doctrine of "psychic participation" to explain the relation of doer and (ceremonial) deed was still wide of the truth. The primitive man, like the peasant, is practical-minded, and will not ask rain from a cloudless sky during the dry season. The magical content, when it is introduced, is so much added stimulation toward his goal, and it is nothing more. We fail to appreciate how adequately sensations, emotions, and intuitions may function in determining choice of conduct including the ceremonial, and may be not pre-logical or illogical but on a par with our cherished forms of analysis. Primitive man is as good a thinker as the rest of us; he has his own way of applying his mental powers.

Primitive man lives deeply in the present; he lives as an individual, though accepting the social structure of his tribe. Like the Oriental weaver of rugs, he follows his tribal pattern but with an individual touch of design. He may depart, withdraw, protest, or venture at his own risk; and the chief risk he runs is that of ridicule. He may exercise undisputed the right to be foolish. He accepts with the same directness the validity of his subjective life.

In defending and extending this thesis, Dr. Radin makes an added point. "Among primitive peoples there exists the same distribution of temperament and ability as among us." As among us, only the few intellectuals do much thinking, and the amazing autobiography of the Winnebago "Crashing Thunder" which Dr. Radin has presented is the record of one such most exceptional "primitive" man. But this very desire for glory or career is a common primitive trait preparing the way for self-expression and a hero's part.

Turning next to myth, proverbs, parables, poems, reflections, there appears an authentic literature to corroborate the philosophic trend. But personalities, virtues, systems, cosmogonies, religious precepts as theistic as our own, skepticisms and critiques here play a part quite familiar to the mental fauna and flora of what we regard as more cultivated regions of culture. The social relations, the family ties, the consideration for women, the tenderness toward children which prohibits their physical punishment, the sense of equity and fidelity, the respect for the experienced, the calm imperturbability in disaster—these suggest a tribally regulated world, conducive to wholesome adjustment and content. In disaffected mood over the glaring shortcomings of our own social conditions, one may well reflect: "Almost thou persuadest me to be a Winnebago!"

The documentation of Dr. Radin is formidable enough to upset the complacency of the orthodox version of primitive man. It is a rose-colored picture of an enthusiastic defender of the cause of the aborigines, perhaps over-colored by the impressiveness of exceptional examples. Men in the mass have rarely been inspiring; great periods occur when they yield to great leaders. But the evolutionary view of mind in the making may still be maintained, when due allowance is made for Dr. Radin's drastic corrections of our preconceptions.

JOSEPH JASTROW

Renaissance and Reformation

The Social and Political Ideas of Some Great Thinkers of the Renaissance and the Reformation. Edited by F. J. C. Hearnshaw. Brentano's. $3.

THIS series of popular lectures delivered at King's College, University of London, is introduced by the principal, Ernest Barker. On the whole the lectures, with the possible exception of that on Thomas More, stand the transformation into literary essays quite well, but if those which deal with Nicholas of Cusa, Luther, and Calvin are "popular" lectures, London audiences are of tougher intellectual fiber than ours. Perhaps it is natural that the two Englishmen, Sir John Fortescue and Sir Thomas More, fare best. At any rate those two lectures combine fresh interpretation with genuine interest for the inexpert, and to their select company should be added a particularly charming, original, and convincing lecture on Erasmus. The editor is responsible for the introductory lecture on Renaissance and Reformation and for another on Machiavelli. He reveals a mastery of popularization, but as much cannot be said of his interpretations. The introductory lecture referred to contains a number of swift generalizations whose brilliance is dimmed by their inevitable inaccuracy, and, while the lecture on Machiavelli is markedly ingenious and performs a real service in its emphasis on its subject's interest in the art of war, it becomes involved in an explanation of Machiavelli's political theory which will not easily hold water. Those who read it will at least be driven to reread "The Prince," but not many of them will agree to the argument that "Machiavelli's sympathies were wholly republican; one of the finer traits in his cynical and repellent character is his faith in the people—"a faith," remarks the author, "not very easy to reconcile with his pessimistic estimate of individual human nature." It would be still more difficult to reconcile it with the pervasive tone of "The Prince." Arguing from the democratic enthusiasm of the "Discourses on Livy" makes necessary a number of not very convincing solutions of paradox.

The lecturers are the Editor, E. F. Jacob, Miss A. E. Levett, A. W. Reed, J. A. K. Thomson, J. W. Allen, and the Reverend W. R. Matthews. Disregarding variation in literary charm, the lectures of greatest historical interest would appear to be those on Nicholas of Cusa, Sir John Fortescue, Erasmus, and Luther.

The Chronicles of Clovis. By "Saki" (H. H. Munro). The Viking Press. $1.50.

The first two volumes of a projected edition. "Saki" was the sort of literary phenomenon that is produced only by the very highest reaches of a typically English journalism. A trenchant and rather over-pitiless wit, a dandiacal elegance of phrase, a brilliant knowledge of the more useless elements of the British upper middle classes—these gifts he brought to a series of novels and stories whose dry, satiric flavor still stimulates the palates of a faithful "Saki" cult.

The Bullfighters. By Henry de Montherlant. Translated from the French by Edwin Gile Rich. The Dial Press. $2.50.

The most astonishing volume of this Gallic Chesterton. Montherlant, himself a bullfighter of considerable renown and the inveterate enemy of the French "cérébralistes," here devotes himself to a fictional evocation of the most sanguinary of passions. It is not hard to see why Montherlant's subtle primitivism should have pricked the jaded emotions of the Parisians: his pictures of the bull ring, his unhesitating self-identification with the souls of strong animals, his powerful apotheosis of physical struggle will hold any reader who is willing to forget that Montherlant's themes are slight, his characters laughably romantic, and himself just a bit of a histrion.

Moor Fires. By E. H. Young. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

The calm is there; but much of the delight is gone. The humor is less continuous, the plot more obtrusive, and one misses the central dynamic quality provided by the unforgettable hero of the earlier book. Mrs. Young remains, nevertheless, the inevitable novelist for intelligent middle-aged parents who are not too "literary" and like to stay at home evenings with what used to be called "a good book."

On the Steppes. By James N. Rosenberg. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

Mr. Rosenberg had enough material for a fair-sized article and he has written a book of more than 200 pages. His facts are substantially true although somewhat sugared. Jewish colonization in Russia is a success. It is accompanied, however, by a good deal of suffering that is entirely unnecessary and could easily be avoided if our rich American Jews would only consent to delve somewhat deeper into their pockets. The Joint Distribution Committee is doing very good work in Russia, but it is not doing enough. The Soviet Government is doing most of the work and the J.D.C. is getting most of the credit. Mr. Rosenberg's work will not have been in vain, however, if it should convince the J.D.C., of which Mr. Rosenberg himself is vice-president, to devote larger funds toward the colonization of the so-called declassed Jew in Russia.

Why Rome Fell. By Edward Lucas White. Harper and Brothers. $3.50.

Edward Lucas White, the well-known author of "El Supremo" and "Andivius Hedulio," is the last of a long line of courageous men to attempt an explanation of why Rome fell. Mr. White has read most of the literary sources and has pulled out many an argumentative plum that less imaginative scholars have missed. He can also write with a vigor and pungency that only H. G. Wells among historians—if he be one—would undertake to match. The demonstration of how the great Wall of China effected the Roman Empire we should welcome in an examination paper if only because of its ingenuity. The indictment of Christianity as the chief culprit would certainly satisfy Nietzsche, though scholars will doubtless ask for confirmative doc ments. It is a misfortune that one who can write so entertainingly should not have known something of the inscriptions and papyri that every serious student of Roman society has at his command. But who wants facts in a history? The readers who know enough about Rome to comprehend where Mr. White abandons the available data for romancing will know how much to accept, and the rest would do well to enjoy the book as a sequel to "Andivius Hedulio."

The Playgoer's Handbook to the English Renaissance Drama. By Agnes Mure Mackenzie. The Macmillan Company.

A brief critical discussion of the chief Elizabethan and Jacobean playwrights intended for the layman interested chiefly in the plays from the standpoint of a present-day playgoer. The comments are sensible and the author's point of view may be illustrated by his general estimate of the literature with which he is dealing: "A great part of Elizabethan drama, like a great part of any other age's drama, is rubbish. A good deal more of it is rather dead. Yet there remains a body of fine imaginative work, at the best of it white-hot with fiery energy, deep-reaching and far-reaching, with a strong, noble beauty and profound humanity."

The Architect in History. By Martin S. Briggs. Oxford University Press.

The medieval architect has been much praised for his selfless anonymity. The author of the present volume summarizes the good reasons for believing that this architect was merely a victim of the same habits which lead people today to ask the name of the author of a book or a symphony but to accept a building as something which merely occurred; and he has attempted to remedy the ignorance of even educated persons by throwing as much light as possible upon the personality, training, methods, and professional status of the architect from ancient times through the nineteenth century. His book is both solid and entertaining.

Italian Primitives at Yale University. Comments and Revisions. By Richard Offner. Yale University Press.

The author is professor in the history of fine arts at New York University and a very capable exponent of technical criticism in the manner of Berenson.

Shakespeare and Demi-Science. By Felix E. Schelling. The University of Pennsylvania Press. $2.50.

This volume comprises a dozen essays dealing with Shakespeare or with Elizabethan and Caroline literature. When Professor Schelling is a scholar—as he is on nine pages out of ten—he is very, very good, but when he is facetious—as he will be on the tenth page—he is awful.

Selected Papers of Bertrand Russell. Selected and with a Special Introduction by Bertrand Russell. The Modern Library. Ninety-five cents.

In his introduction Mr. Russell offers an autobiographical account of how he passed from an interest in logistic and mathematical problems, culminating in the "Principia Mathematica," 1910, to an almost exclusive preoccupation with social and political philosophy—and practice! But in the order of the excerpted writings, the reader is made to pass from the most sentimental expression of Mr. Russell's earliest Weltschmerz (e.g. "The Free Man's Worship," 1902) through the various stages of his idealistic reconstruction of the social and economic order (e.g. "Why Men Fight," "Proposed Roads to Freedom," "Education and the Good Life") to reach finally, after a trip to China, concluding sections concerned with epistemology, symbolic logic, and pure mathematics ("Our Knowledge of the External World," "The Analysis of Mind," and the "Introduction to Mathematical Philosophy"). Does this order mean that Mr. Russell wishes his readers to proceed, unlike himself, from the social scene to the horizon of pure theory? Or does he hope, perhaps, that by conducting the reader in this manner he may enjoy vicariously a regression to the serene contemplation in the days before the war cut his academic umbilicus. There is a philosophic paradox also in the fact that in 1914 Mr. Russell lectured on our knowledge of the external world, and yet it was at that date he began to find it impossible to shut the world out of his thoughts when he entered his study. However, two new books come from his pen this year, and we shall see.

Korngold's "Violanta"

IN these days of cerebral outpourings, when music has to a certain degree become the handmaid of an over-neurotic age, it is quite refreshing to find a young composer of opera who boldly chooses melodrama as his libretto and attempts to gild its creaking hinges with the glamor of his muse. For a diluted variety of melodrama the librettist of "Violanta" has undoubtedly provided, and only an occasional vein of fantasy saves this headlong Venetian play from falling into the realm of the tawdry and commonplace.

To a youth of seventeen such a libretto no doubt offered a sufficiently ardent challenge; unfortunately, however, Korngold was not a musical entity when he wrote "Violanta," and consequently he falls violently on to the horns of a dilemma. The play demands the same sort of stark realism of treatment that Puccini employs with signal success in "Tosca." Such a process, however, Korngold adopts in too unconvincing a fashion, and consequently we have tragedy that struts rather than sweeps. Moreover, this over-sophisticated youth cannot allow himself to become frankly melodious; inwardly he is continually longing for lyricism, outwardly he is inhibiting his own desires. As a result we have music that is weak-kneed and badly patterned, at times even falling into the deadly category of the nondescript. And all this because, psychologically speaking, the composer evidently does not know himself. He has something that is thoroughly his own to express, and cannot find it. And so we have a style of dramatic recitative that is essentially based on Puccini and the modern Italians, and an orchestration that takes its full-blooded cue from the best Wagner-Straussian traditions, with an explosive bit of Korngold thrown into the bargain.

In spite of these obvious deficiencies, "Violanta" has merit of a sort. It is superbly picturesque as a bit of Venetian tapestry, and not all its blatant theatricality can mar a certain largesse of emotional outline and mood. The opera is exceedingly well mounted, thanks to Mr. Urban's skill, and the cast was more than adequate. Madame Jeritza made a stately if sinister Violanta, and her glorious voice added fire and endless color to a part that might have easily become artificial and monotoned. Dramatically she found it somewhat difficult not to fall into some of the exaggerations of manner that the libretto and Korngold's score almost demand—only a superhuman artist could avoid such pitfalls.

When all is said and done it is to be questioned perhaps whether the addition of "Violanta" to the Metropolitan repertoire will be of permanent value. It may be remarkable as the product of a boy of seventeen, but can it take its rightful place beside many notable contemporary works unknown as yet to our public? Might it not interest our opera management to produce such a master work as Gabriel Faure's "Penelope," not to mention many examples of the modern Russian school that have not seen the light on this side of the water?

LAWRENCE ADLER

Drama

The Genius of Reinhardt

MAX REINHARDT and his company, brought to this country by Gilbert Miller, began their season of repertory at the Century Theater with a performance of "A Midsummer Night's Dream." This is essentially the same production as that with which Reinhardt startled Berlin in 1905 and with which he established himself as the most-discussed of all theatrical directors. Twenty-two years is a long time as theatrical stage history goes; one grows rapidly accustomed to revolutionary methods, and the general conception of the present production is no longer one by any means wholly unfamiliar. It remains nevertheless as beautiful and impressive an example as one could hope to find of what may be accomplished when one thinks of the theater in terms of spectacle.

Reinhardt is a man of enormous energy, a born entrepreneur, who loves to undertake large and complicated enterprises. One year he opens the colossal Grosses Schauspielhaus in Berlin; then he rushes off to Vienna to restore the ballroom of the Imperial Palace as a theater, buys an archepiscopal palace, stages "Everyman" in front of the Salzburg cathedral, and, sandwiching the American production of "The Miracle" in between, he initiates the annual festival of Salzburg with Hofmannsthal's "The Great World Theater." Whatever calls for a nice coordination of large, apparently unmanageable machineries fascinates him, and much of his temperament is reflected in his methods of production since in his hands a theater becomes, not an intimate group like that of the Moscow Art Company, but a vast, circus-like organization with an army of diverse technicians and a regiment of supers at the head of which he stands, like a general in supreme command, bringing all his various forces to bear upon a single enterprise.

Others may boast of their economy in the use of means and of their power to work through suggestion; he rejoices rather in the complexity of his means and his effort is not to suggest but physically to realize. He makes lavish use of whatever devices money can buy or ingenuity devise—of gorgeous costumes, impressive pageants, and, most particularly, of that modern instrument of magic, the electric light. He seems to wish to ask of the audience as little and to give them as much as possible; and it is the essence of his method rather to stun the senses than to appeal to the imagination. Thus though "A Midsummer Night's Dream" was written for a theater mechanically so simple that it could make an adequate appeal to the ear alone and though much can be said in favor of producing it in a manner as nearly as possible to that which its author intended, Reinhardt is content with nothing less than a complete realization of every all-but-impossible suggestion of the text. The enchanted wood must actually be filled with incredibly magic lights and shadows; fairies, appearing from nowhere, must dance with an agility hitherto existing only in Shakespeare's imagination; and, in short, the whole poem must be translated into visual terms. In Reinhardt's hands the play, ceasing to be merely a play, becomes an elaborate, highly synthetic spectacle—a thing of swelling music, shifting lights, gorgeous pageantry, the delirious ballets taking place upon an immense stage which seems boundless because its boundaries are hidden in gradually deepening shadow and which, as it is played upon by different lights coming from all directions, seems constantly dissolving and reforming itself as the occasion demands.

It is unfortunately true that many of the means which Reinhardt uses have been cheapened by their uses in vulgar spectacles and revues, that there are even moments when certain towering head-dresses and certain torch-lighted processions carry an unfortunate suggestion of Mr. Ziegfeld's "Follies" or Mr. Shubert's "Winter Garden," but in general this is not true for the simple reason that Reinhardt manages to make his production a harmonious whole in the presentation of which the most spectacular means actually perform their function instead of obtruding themselves as mere "stunts" upon the spectator. It is in this ability to synthesize devices which have, after all, become property of those who produce spectacles that one finds one of the chief evidences of his genius; it is in his development of a style of acting actually suitable to his methods of production that one finds another. The tendency of so vast a stage and such impressive surroundings is not merely to dwarf the size of the actor but to rob him of his vitality as well. However vivacious he would appear in an ordinary theater he would be lost in this one, and no ordinary movement would get him over such great distances without making him appear to crawl like an ant upon a table top. Reinhardt's actors have, however, heroic voices and the agility of acrobats. They so fit into the perspective that one is scarcely aware of the fact, but in actuality they bound across the vast stage and thus they people it with life.

Shakespeare would be amazed to see his own play. I am not at all sure that he would not be delighted with it since the simplicity of the Elizabethan theater was not in the least designed but merely faux de mieux and Reinhardt's production is an amazingly delightful thing no matter what one's ultimate opinion may be of the aesthetic principles upon which it is founded.

CONGRESS IS IN SESSION and begins work by grappling with the cases of Senators Vare and Smith who were denied their seats and oaths at the opening of the Senate. With all respect for those who maintain that an American State should be allowed to send to the Senate anybody it sees fit, providing he is duly elected, we earnestly hope these men will not be seated. We are aware that this will create a precedent which may be abused—the precedent already exists, for the House of Representatives once refused to seat Victor Berger because it deemed him unpatriotic. But the offense of Smith and Vare in buying their elections (in primary or election) makes them as unfit for the Senate as was Senator Newberry, forced to resign because of the expenditure of moneys small, indeed, beside those contributed to the Smith and Vare campaigns by their political and big-business backers. Something must be done to stop the rising tide of corruption, and this is a first step. We are glad that the Progressive leaders will leave no stone unturned to bring this about. As for the rest, the Democrats who could have organized the Senate with the aid of the Progressives refused to do so. But the Progressives started well by their strategy in the cases of Vare and Smith and it is obvious that their holding of the balance of power will inure to the benefit of the people throughout this session of Congress.

GOVERNOR SMITH has at last spoken out on the prohibition issue, to the following extent: He correctly and properly maintained the right of citizens "to organize to oppose any law and any part of the Constitution with which they are not in sympathy"; he denied that he had ever preached nullification or that he favored it; he held that "enforcement of the law and obedience to the law were the very corner-stone of governmental structure," and he declared that the State needs no more laws to enforce prohibition. The last statement was in answer to the criticisms of him for having signed the State enforcement law. He also declared that he was one of the two governors who, returned from Mr. Coolidge's conference on prohibition enforcement, called the State-enforcement officers together and warned them to enforce the law. That is doubtless true, but he must confess that his warning accomplished nothing and that he has, so far as we are aware, punished nobody for official derelictions. As for his remark that prohibition enforcement is not a State question but one for every local community to deal with, that is nonsense. "Passing the buck" to villages and towns means that there will be no enforcement whatever.

BOSTON IS RECOVERING. A Boston jury sensibly acquitted nine of the "Death Watch" who marched in front of the State House on that fateful August day when Governor Fuller let Sacco and Vanzetti die. Some of them were accused of "sauntering and loitering," others of obstructing traffic; but the simple fact that they walked briskly single-file along an eight-foot sidewalk impressed a jury released from the hysteria that stirred the police in August. Only the police superintendent, Crowley, maintained the passionate excitement of those days. Testifying in the trial of Powers Hapgood, charged with "inciting to riot," Mr. Crowley naively gave his own case away. In his attempt to make it look as if a riot had threatened, he recalled that, after the police had hauled Hapgood and Cosimo Carvotta from their soap-box, someone in the crowd shouted "Kill them." Did he attempt to arrest the man guilty of this incitement to lynching? asked Hapgood's attorney, Arthur Garfield Hays. Crowley had not thought of that. The Boston police, his evidence showed, was less interested in preserving order than in punishing Sacco-Vanzetti sympathizers. The jury refused to convict Hapgood except upon a technical charge of speaking without a permit. Some day Boston will recover its balance so far as to hold Memorial Day meetings for Sacco and Vanzetti on Boston Common, and it may yet happen that a successor to Alvan Fuller will be the chief orator.

RUSSELL TREMAINE IS HOME AGAIN! By an order completely reversing the inferior court, Judge Edward E. Hardin returned to his parents the twelve-year-old boy who for two years has been kept in a detention home or boarded out as a prelude to adoption because his parents would not permit him to join in the flag salute at school. In an editorial in The Nation for November 30 the facts about the Tremaines, members of a non-resistant religious society, were set forth. It was pointed out that, at the risk of a slight loss of face, the State of Washington would do well to return Russell to his parents without more ado, as the most sensible and merciful procedure possible. Partly as a result of the admirable publicity campaign waged by Robert Whitaker of Los Angeles, who first brought the case to The Nation's notice, the State of Washington has done just this. Russell is to be sent back home; he is to be under the recognizance of the Juvenile Court judge of the district in which he lives, who will see that he goes to school. But he need not go to public school; he can attend a school where he will not be required to salute the flag if his parents do not wish him to do so. The Tremaines probably will not insist on the letter of their demand—that Russell be allowed to attend public school and at the same time be permitted to abstain from the flag salute. After all, the Government, with endless delay, has done the decent thing in this particular case; and it will take time to wipe out of the public schools the absurdity of an enforced ritual of patriotic devotion.

OPPONENTS OF BIGOTRY and violence in Alabama have not lost their fight merely because the attempt to prosecute floggers has failed for the moment in Crenshaw County. Attorney General McCall has shown courage and true patriotism in his course. Originally an officer in the Ku Klux Klan, he resigned from that organization and began an earnest effort to convict perpetrators of the numerous floggings attributed to members. Indictments were returned against thirty-four persons at Luverne, but after the acquittal of three in succession Mr. McCall dropped further prosecutions, charging that State law-enforcement officers had shown "a frenzied desire to assist the defense instead of assisting prosecution officials." He disclosed a letter said to have been written by the Grand Dragon of the Klan in Alabama to the Cyclops of the Luverne Klavern in regard to an effort to bring the Attorney General "to his senses." But one county is not all of Alabama. In spite of the attitude of Governor Graves, a Klan officer, there is a commendable movement in the State against the especially cowardly form of thuggery manifested in these floggings, an opposition assisted by influential newspapers like the Birmingham News and Age-Herald and the Montgomery Advertiser. We are more hopeful because of this awakening than discouraged because of a temporary set-back in one county.

THE DETERMINED EFFORT of certain groups to disgust aliens in the United States with all its institutions by subjecting them to various irritations, humiliations, and injustices is likely to [illegible] session of Congress, and should be watched by all who believe in a more generous Americanism. Some ten or a dozen objectionable bills which were proposed at previous sessions either have or will be reintroduced this winter. The McClintic and the Sosnowski bills both propose compulsory naturalization, while the Holaday measure, which passed the House in 1926, provides for the deportation not merely of a person convicted of a crime involving "moral turpitude" but of any one serving sentences totaling eighteen months. Such a measure, obviously, could be used against trade-unionists arrested in strikes. The Aswell bill is even worse. It not only proposes compulsory registration of aliens but contains a clause empowering the President to require all aliens to report at such times and places as he shall fix. By this means it would be possible to clear a strike area of all alien strikers. Whether one believes in more restriction or greater freedom of immigration, he ought to support the National Council for Protection of Foreign-Born Workers in its opposition to legislation which turns such aliens as are with us against our government and ideals.

WAGES ARE "HIGHER than anywhere else in the world or than at any other time in world history," and the American worker is more prosperous than ever before—according to Secretary Hoover's report for the fiscal year of 1927. Mr. Hoover divides the total amount paid in wages by the average number of wage-earners. Performing this very simple operation for the year 1925, the Secretary finds that the average annual wage for that year was $1,280. Never before, he concludes, has the American worker enjoyed such golden prosperity. A different view of the worker's status in America is presented by Professor Irving Fisher, who declares in the New York Times that although the national income for 1926, estimated at ninety billions of dollars, surpassed all previous records, figures of distribution indicate that

> More than 93,000,000 people out of 117,000,000 living in the United States in 1926 had about $500 of income apiece. These ninety-odd million people comprise the combined "poorest" and "lower middle" classes—they are 65 per cent and 15 per cent, respectively, of the whole population. . . . The "poorest" class alone, comprising 76,000,000 people (65 per cent of the total) receive about 38.6 per cent of the national income, or $34,740,000,000, less than $460 per person. . . . For the standard family of five out of this group of 76,000,000 "poorest" people there would be $2,300 income during 1926.

This income is $132 below the budget of $2,432 prepared by the federal Bureau of Labor Statistics, which represents a "minimum of health and decency below which a family cannot go without danger to physical and moral deterioration." And this is our most prosperous year! It makes President Calvin Coolidge's warning that the "test which now confronts the nation is prosperity" rather more than humorous.

A SERIES OF ARTICLES in the New York World promises to show that a League of Nations committee report on the white-slave traffic has been doctored so that it will not hurt the feelings of the nations concerned—and, apparently, not interfere with business! The committee appointed by the League to investigate the traffic in women and children has drawn up a report on findings covering a period of two years. Part of the report rests on data collected in response to official request from the various governments; the more interesting and significant part is the result of some very neat sleuthing by the committee and the volunteer workers it was able to employ. Under the pretense of being themselves engaged in the white-slave trade, investigators were able to gain many interesting facts never before made public—facts which, if they are known to governments, are hid carefully under a bushel. These data were included in Part Two of the committee's report—and Part Two, the World alleges, has been suppressed by the League. If this is true, and if the League cannot think of a better explanation for the suppression, the world will be forced to conclude that the League is seeking to protect an illicit and obscene trade or—more charitably—that it is afraid to antagonize powerful interests which protect such a trade. The latter is probably nearer the truth, but it is not much more creditable.

IT WAS THE NEW YORK TIMES which in 1919 and 1920 reported the fall of Petrograd—which never fell—six different times and its burning twice, while the number of times it reported the Soviet regime collapsing has never been calculated. The Times, we understood, had become sensitive; it went to the extreme length of sending Walter Duranty into Russia, with the result that its Russian news was for some time the best in the world. Then, on November 30, 1927, the old, familiar habit-patterns reasserted themselves. A double-column spread in the feature position on page one, fully equipped with a map, gave Navarre Atkinson's account—from Bucharest, Rumania—of the latest debacle. "Five Thousand Killed in Ukraine in a Revolt Suppressed after Three Months Fighting," read the headline. Place-names and dates—all the details were there. A few days later, on an inside page, the Times printed Mr. Duranty's report from Moscow. The German and Polish consulates in the Ukraine, he said, had not heard of any revolts; the daily trains from Odessa—scene of one of Mr. Atkinson's uprisings—brought no such news; the representatives of the Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, whose colonies spread like a network through the very counties which Mr. Atkinson washed in blood, offered the daily reports of loan banks to indicate that there had been no disturbance whatever—save in the mind of the Bucharest correspondent and the foreign news editor of the New York Times.

THE JOKE OF THE YEAR has been played on the sober, serious-minded city of Winnipeg, Manitoba. Some time ago, as these pages duly noted, a competition for designing a cenotaph held in Winnipeg was won by Emanuel Hahn, a young sculptor who had lived most of his life in Canada but who—sh! horrors!—had been born in Germany! As most Winnipegers could see with half an eye, this dreadful fact rendered Mr. Hahn's design unfit for a memorial to British dead who had fought against Germany in the Great War. It was a delicate situation but the more stalwart patriots of Winnipeg did not hesitate, and they won over the protests of the weaker-minded. Mr. Hahn received the prize money, since he had been adjudged the winner of the competition, but his design was declared unsuitable and another competition was held, limited to natural-born citizens of Canada. Designs were submitted; the judges sat, and gave their judgment. A woman won the prize this time, a woman born in Canada, but a woman rash enough to be the wife of a naturalized citizen who had been born in Germany—indeed, none other than the wife of Emanuel Hahn! Winnipeg thus finds itself in a pretty pickle. It is forced either to keep on endowing the Hahn family with prize money, while refusing their designs, or to accept a design from the hands of one who has so far forgotten her Canadian heritage as to have married a Hun. We shall not be unkind enough to say that this is a lesson to overzealous patriots who show themselves lacking in ordinary horse-sense. But really, isn't it?

A Marvel of Chemistry

FRANCIS P. GARVAN, president of the Chemical Foundation, is the genius who as Alien Property Custodian decided to filch some 4,500 chemical patents from their rightful owners, in violation of every precept of decent government and American tradition, and to turn them over to American chemical industrialists. This was called "Americanization." By a "broad" construction of the powers of President Wilson, who was imposed upon by Palmer, Garvan, and the chemical industry, the Supreme Court sustained this egregious confiscation. What the Europeans had spent years of research and millions of dollars in developing, for which patent protection had been lawfully obtained, certain American chemical industrialists acquired by a simple process of theft, employing government officials and the shoddy cloak of "patriotism" to perpetrate the act. Then, in order to prevent the true inventors and discoverers of these products of science from again seeking to sell their inventions and discoveries in the United States, the chemical industrialists persuaded Congress, after the war, to impose an embargo against the foreign products. Salvarsan, the American patent for which is worth millions, cannot be introduced into the United States from Germany, because an embargo protects the American manufacturer, operating with a filched patent. The duped American public must accept an inferior product.

The European owners, desiring to save something from the wreckage and to win back the rewards of their brains and research, have decided to pool their interests and endeavor to reacquire what they had previously built up. The American market is still largely closed to them by artificial tariff barriers.

Now let us note how Mr. Garvan, the public official and industrial agent who "Americanized" 4,500 Austrian and German patents, greets the resurrection of the European competition in foreign markets, now promised to the milk-fed and patented American chemical industrialists:

> Is there an American whose soul is so dead as not to thrill at such a threat and menace as this combine makes against the safety and independence of our national defense, our national health, and our national industrial progress? The extent of the danger is easy to comprehend. . . . Don't make the mistake of thinking this is a dye fight, or a nitrate fight, or a rayon fight, or a fight for Asiatic or South American markets. No, it is a fight to reassert European . . . supremacy in chemistry and chemical progress, and that means German military supremacy and German industrial supremacy, and German supremacy in drugs and potential necessities. . . . Enlightened American industry, enlightened American opinion, and enlightened American legislation will not allow our betrayal.

Well, our soul only thrills with disgust that bunk and piffle of this kind can be perpetrated on the country, and that those who acquired 4,500 patents by second-story methods have the effrontery to produce such nonsense.

Had the patents really been deemed important in the national interest, they could have been acquired honestly by eminent domain and compensation. But the chemical industry seems to prefer a cheaper, if less honorable, method of acquiring vast benefits for itself, imposing the ignominy on the United States and cajoling the American consumer into the belief that his burdens in higher costs are borne for the benefit of the nation.

Russia Leads the World

THE way to disarm is to disarm. This was Mr. Litvinov's bold challenge to the governments of the world assembled in the Disarmament Conference at Geneva. He dared them to wipe out armies and navies and air forces; to destroy all weapons, fortresses, military supplies, and all means of chemical warfare; to end forever all military training, and military ministries and general staffs; to prohibit military propaganda and military education. In other words, he proposed a clean sweep of the whole damnable, murderous business of teaching and preparing human beings to kill each other. He dared the nations to prove that they were really sincere when they called upon each other to disarm, and not merely bent upon the hocus-pocus of striking off one class of ships here or reducing an army by 15 or 20 per cent there. He dared them to abide by the commandment: "Thou shalt not kill," and to prove themselves Christians. To the Allies his demand was that they prove the sincerity of their pretentions that the last conflict was "the war to end war." [The full text of his proposal appears in this week's International Relations Section.]

Thus he took the ultimate position, and he has encountered exactly the fate which inevitably comes to a radical who desires to go to the root of things, to cut to the bone. He has been ridiculed, abused, denounced, and cartooned as bringing a Trojan horse to Geneva. The half-hearted sponsors of peace, the compromisers of the daily press who admit that war is hellish and then but a dozen buts so that there shall be no far-reaching reform, the embattled militarists and their followers who find themselves facing the possibility that they may lose their jobs, the defenders of war as an end and a glory in itself—all have joined to deride this preposterous suggestion. Litvinov, they say, is obviously insincere; does not the Soviet regime exist only because it uses military force against its enemies? He is again insincere in thus challenging the nations because he knows that what he suggests is a counsel of perfection, an impractical, visionary proposal which no one would or could accept—he would be the first to have his withers wrung if it were accepted. It was a skilful dialectician's trick to put the other nations in the wrong. It was a superbly clever piece of propaganda to put Russia into the forefront at Geneva and it was at the same moment an incredibly stupid act, because it immediately united against her once more all the nations around the Council. It was an idle gesture and, having made it, Litvinov might now be expected to get down to business and join in the task of lopping off a battleship here and a regiment there.

Thus run the comments—and so they would run if in any other field of action the Russians or anyone else should produce a plan which really meant something, which really struck seriously at vested interests. That this is what the armies and navies have become was stated clearly by Lord Robert Cecil—we quoted him last week as saying that "every month we delay, the old vested interests, material and moral, strengthen their hold." Of course they do. Each month the great economic interests encourage the upbuilding of armaments and carry on the trade rivalries that lead directly to war. They are the great propagandists against disarmament; they fan the flames of nationalism even while they organize international trusts and consortiums; they demand large standing armies in order to maintain the social and economic status quo; they want to be armed against any domestic uprising. They want armies to protect themselves—as if arms would help against the Russian economic doctrines. If Russia disarmed by herself, a large part of our press would still be picturing the Soviets as planning some night to murder our women and children in their beds. Why not? The press is largely in the hands of the masters of capital whom Woodrow Wilson termed the "masters of America." Why should it not have greeted Litvinov's proposals precisely as it did?

Exactly the same would its reaction have been if Jesus Christ himself had appeared at Geneva to read this radical peace proposal to the conference. He, too, would have been portrayed as a designing long-haired Jew, or at best as a wild-eyed fanatic, dangerous to the world because he preached the impossible. Do not all who demand the ideal make far more difficult the paths of the "practical" statesmen who, with their feet on the ground, seek to approach each goal by one "rational" step after another, not, as the cant runs, "going too far and too fast for public opinion"? Well, for ourselves, we care little for these critical comments, and we care at this hour very little for the motives of M. Litvinov. It may all have been a clever trick. It was a clever maneuver, but we deem it a very great service to humanity. It is always dangerous to let loose a new idea in the world, and there are millions of people, many of them bearing upon their bodies the scars of the last conflict, who will never forget that one great government has made this proposal of complete and absolute abolition of the obscene institution of war. They will continue to ask themselves why this ideal is not attainable. They will find no other answers to their question but the stubbornness of those vested interests, the army and navy and the munition-makers, and the other profiteers by war, and the masses of compromisers and casuists who year in and year out throw cold water upon any proposal which would advance the interests of the masses of mankind.

Litvinov has shot one of those arrows into the air that fall no man knows where. The Disarmament Conference can never meet again without having the ultimate goal plainly in view. They may trim and compromise and shilly-shally all they please, but whether they like it or not the final objective will be there before them and they cannot gainsay it. It is, of course, too much to hope that in this Christian America there will be an articulate body of opinion to support so radical a demand. From all sides we hear that the whispering campaign against the Russians gains ground day by day. In women's clubs, meetings of the Daughters of the American Revolution, and elsewhere there is, we learn, an almost sadistic dwelling upon the horrors of Bolshevik rule. Before us lies a screed from a citizen of Washington, D. C., declaring that England, France, and Germany have all been won over by the Soviets to a secret agreement to destroy the United States! To such as these the Litvinov move will be but the voice of Jacob.

For ourselves we welcome with all our hearts the Russian proposals. It is our deliberate judgment that if persisted in they will give to the Soviets the moral leadership of the world.

Mr. Lamont's Duty

MR. THOMAS W. LAMONT, of J. P. Morgan and Company, accompanied by Martin Egan of the same firm, and Jeremiah Smith, Jr., sailed for Japan in September. Business, they told the New York Times, had nothing to do with the trip, there were no loans involved, and social activities were to take up all of their time in Japan. But before they were on shipboard rumors began to fly. While they were engaged in social activities the rumors soared and roared around the China Sea. Mr. Lamont was insisting upon America's equal right with Japan to finance new railroads in Manchuria; Mr. Lamont was negotiating loans to finance Japanese expansion in Manchuria; Mr. Lamont was to help develop Japanese hydro-electric power; Mr. Lamont was supporting a Japanese plan to crush Russian influence in Northern Manchuria—there was hardly any Far Eastern program with which some rumor-monger did not identify Mr. Lamont.

Upon his return to America the newspapers carried reports that Mr. Lamont had visited the State Department to inquire whether it had any objections to his lending $40,000,000 to the South Manchurian Railway; and it was indicated that the State Department had none. It would object to any proposal to assist the Japanese in closing the Manchurian markets, but so long as the open door was maintained it washed its hands of Mr. Lamont's private business. The State Department was in a difficult position. Its policy of visaing loans gets it into ever deeper water. It could not veto Mr. Lamont's loan proposals without seeming to commit an openly unfriendly act against Japan; yet it cannot wash its hands as clean of the loan as it wishes. Willy-nilly, its failure to veto must seem to mean approval of the proposed loan, and it thereby commits the United States in perilous fashion.

Manchuria is the battlefield of a silent diplomatic war in Asia, and gloomy prophets predict that it may soon be the field of open international war. Mr. Lamont may think that his actions as an individual, or as partner in a banking firm, or as trustee for investors, do not commit his country; unfortunately, an international banker is sometimes more significant as an emissary than the appointed ambassador. All China is united in protest against the loan proposal; and it holds the United States Government responsible. Issue of the loan, the Nanking Government says, would be an unfriendly act; and Yang Yu-ting, chief of Chang Tso-lin's staff, second most important man in the Northern Government, says that "the Chinese people will consider it a provocative act and will hold the American Government and people responsible."

This may seem much ado about a commercial loan. But the South Manchurian Railway is more than a commercial institution. It dominates Manchuria, and the Japanese Government owns 50 per cent of its stock. It owns the Fushan collieries, whence Japan draws six million tons of coal each year—nearly half of China's total production. It owns the Anshan iron works, of which Japan has high hopes. It maintains an elaborate system of schools and hospitals, and the Japanese Government polices the railway zone with its soldiers. In recent years it has financed and managed some extensions of railway lines for the Chinese, and conducted others on its own initiative. Some of these are commercial; others are largely strategic—intended to facilitate cutting the Trans-Siberian railway in case of war with Russia. This railway's president, who is the highest Japanese governmental official in Manchuria, has just said that Japan > has in Manchuria her first line of defense. She does not want war, in fact she is eager to preserve peace; but strategic reasons form one benefit which she derives from her presence in Manchuria.

Japanese statesmen have lately been loud in proclaiming Japan's "special position" in Manchuria—a phrase unpleasantly reminiscent of the talk of her diplomats in the years preceding the annexation of Korea. Recently she has been objecting to the construction of Chinese railway lines parallel to the South Manchurian, on the ground of an alleged secret protocol to the 1905 treaty, the text of which has never been published and the authenticity of which is denied by the Chinese.

To lend money to such an organization, in the present inflammable state of the Far East, is almost an act of war. It is an insult to China and a provocation to Russia. No matter what the size of the loan, whether it be used for refunding operations, for repair of old lines or construction of new ones, its psychological effect will be immediate and sure. Whatever the State Department and Mr. Lamont may say, such a loan will be regarded in Japan, China, and Russia as notice to the world that the United States supports the new "positive policy" of Japan in Manchuria and that we are abandoning our long support of the principle of the territorial integrity of China.

In this matter Mr. Lamont cannot act as a private individual. Mr. Coolidge has declared that

> Our government has certain rights over and certain duties toward our own citizens and their property wherever they may be located. The person and property of a citizen are a part of the general domain of the nation, even when abroad.

He and the Administration, by their active support of foreign investors, have bound Mr. Lamont's hands. He cannot act without committing the United States. In these circumstances, he has a patriotic duty to perform. He and his firm owe it to their country to drop the South Manchurian loan.

Down With the Critics!

IT appears that this year the dramatic critics of Paris have been more cantankerous than usual. They have shown a remarkable unanimity in damning everything that comes upon the boards, and the theatrical managers, more interested in profits than in art, are talking rebellion. Why, they ask, should they entertain such ungrateful guests or give free tickets to men who do nothing except endeavor to persuade others to stay from the theaters? First-nighters, they say, should be abolished, but with characteristic French humor they suggest that the critics shall come to the fiftieth performance of every play that continues to exist long enough to have one. Thus the duties of the reviewer will be lightened and, of course, the public will already have decided for itself whether it likes the performance or not without the benefit of advice from the professional and theoretically jaded critic.

Now the opinion which the business man of the theater holds concerning the value of dramatic criticism is neither very fixed nor wholly dispassionate. One year he may almost succeed in persuading the public that all play reviewers are fools or worse, but next year when Smith of the Morning Scandal says (as he is pretty certain to say) that somebody or other is the American Duse, then the manager cannot resist the temptation to nullify all he has previously said by proudly flaunting the "authoritative" opinion of Mr. Smith in the face of the public. Mr. Nathan, if memory serves, was once and for a time barred, i.e., refused free tickets, from certain theaters but though Mr. Nathan is notoriously the most rough-spoken of all American critics there is not a manager in New York who would not treasure and exploit any phrase of his which happened to be laudatory even if it had to be extracted from a column of vituperation and slightly misquoted to boot. Whatever managers say, they always act as though criticism were important, and they will not persuade the public that critical disparagement is nonsense as long as they treat critical praise as significant.

The truth of the matter is, of course, that half the theaters in New York would have to close down if the newspapers and magazines stopped talking about plays. The commercial theater exists largely by virtue of the fact that it is a recognized social institution and, like baseball, it is a recognized institution because the newspapers assume that it is. The most important thing that the manager gets in money value in return for his free tickets is general publicity for the theater as an institution and he could not possibly get along without it. In half the individual cases the critics may do his play more harm than good. In half the others he might have been just as successful if the individual play in question had never been mentioned by the press. But if plays in general were not talked about or written about, people would not go to the theater one-half as much as they do. The critics take plays seriously, the newspapers and magazines give the critics space in which to express their opinions, and the general public is not allowed to forget that the theater exists. Popular opinion to the contrary, damnation is not "good advertisement" for the play that the critics damn; but in the long run such damnation is good advertisement for the theater as a whole.

"Strut, Miss Lizzie!"

THE international event of the moment is not, we regret to say, the Russian proposal to disarm instead of talking about it. Editorial writers may be stirred about such matters; diplomats may consider them solemnly or otherwise over their cigars. But the people—the people in Oshkosh and Hoboken, in Sauk Center, in San Francisco and New York, the people in China and Japan and London and Paris are agog over the new Ford car!

Never was publicity story so adroitly managed. A dozen times during the past few months alleged details about the new car slipped out and were duly featured on the front pages of the newspapers. Each time solemn denials came from Edsel Ford, from the Ford plant in Detroit, from the great man himself. Yet the stories persisted: the car was to have a standard gear-shift and four-wheel brakes; it was to look just like the old one, only funnier; it was to be equipped with every sort of modern trick and contrivance; it was to double its price. It was rumored that behind a ten-foot fence in Detroit managers of the Ford plant were tearing around at sixty-five miles an hour; a fortnight ago pirated pictures of the new car were printed in the New York papers, pictures obtained by stealth by the enterprising editor of the Weekly Argus of Bridgeton, Michigan. And Edsel merely shook his head or his finger and refused to be quoted.

Yet it is doubtful if any amount of publicity, managed by ever so masterful a hand, could have produced the enormous interest that the plain people feel in the new car. Fifteen million of them have bought Fords. They have driven the old bus downhill past Packards and uphill behind everything else; they have driven in rain and snow and over the thawing roads of March; they have mended a door with a piece of string, they have cursed at side-curtains that never came near to fitting, they have thrust a nail in to hold something that an honest bolt would have held better; they have loaded the old Ford high with farm produce, mattresses, baby carriages, 300-pound hogs, and with whatever handicap they have managed to get from where they started to where they wanted to go. It has been pointed out that men called the Ford car "she." Only when a tool with which man is served comes very near his heart does he deal with it so familiarly. The sailing ship, proud under its white canvas, was "she", the old horse plodding through mud or sun; "she's a nice blade," says the woodsman of his favorite ax; and a pet cat or dog, whatever its sex, may be "she."

Out of this affection born of common use it is not strange that all America should be breathless to hear the real details at last, or that 375,000 advance orders for the new car should have been placed. But when we read in the China Weekly Review (Shanghai) that the new Ford will not be ready in October as previously announced or when we hear that buses are running up to London to places where the cars are on exhibition (admission 1/6) we realize that the whole world is cocking a respectful ear in the direction of Miss Lizzie Ford, U. S. A. And for all our rough familiarity with Lizzie, for all the jokes that have been cracked at her expense, and all the abuse she has suffered from the owners of "real cars," there is something colossal in the spectacle of a little man in Detroit, Michigan, who out of his own head, whatever else may be lacking in that same head, drew an idea which has won the hearts of millions. Henry Ford did not invent the automobile; but he made it a success as no other man in the world has done. Incidentally he has made money by the hundred million; but only incidentally. The money can mean little to him—there is too much of it and his ideas of how to spend it are too elementary. But he has his fun all the same. And because of it, we have ours.

During the last quarter of a century machines have been carried to the farthest village in the country. Telephones, the telegraph, mechanical devices for the home and the barn. Yet what man thinks tenderly of his cream separator? And who looks on a telephone except with impatience and contumely? Henry Ford went with the machine wave that washed from one end of the country to the other and spread across two oceans, east and west. He alone won the hearts of his customers; and his product, even radically altered, is welcomed eagerly and affectionately—even though it means standing in a long line in the pouring rain to get the first sight of it, as last week it did—instead of with the suspicion and distrust that greets most new-fangled mechanical devices.

It Seems To Heywood Broun

THERE was the tragedy of Tilden, and later many wept for Dempsey when he tried to come back and faltered in mid-journey. But my tears are reserved for Capablanca. I could endure the fact that Alexander Alekhine is now chess champion of all the world. It was the reasons given by the old master for his downfall which wrung my withers. "We are not," he said in writing for the New York Times, "as strong as we were a few years ago, although we know more and play with greater confidence. . . . It is evident to us that in the future if we wish to succeed in any such enterprise we shall have to enter the arena fully prepared both physically and mentally and lead the kind of life that will keep us in the best condition, since we possess no longer . . . the great resisting power that formerly carried us through on so many occasions."

Pity is a kind of recognition; the defeat of this old man I could take calmly enough as long as I had the image of a palsied one who reached for the queen and in myopia seized a bishop. It was a later biographical note which set his tribulations at my doorstep: "José Raul Capablanca," I read, "was born in Havana, November 19, 1888—." Come! come! a few murrains and perhaps perdition! The man is my senior by precisely eighteen days. Straightway I leaped from bed and sought to touch my toes one hundred times. José Raul Capablanca has said it. We are not the men we used to be.

But all this is a tragedy so distinctly personal that I should scarcely mention it but for attendant implications. At thirty-nine the taller Alps, chess, and the Channel must be abandoned. As the flesh fades a gem-like joy of purest spirit rises. At least so I have been told by sages who were ancient. But no! A skinny hand waves me away and mockingly an icy voice says, "Check." I quote again from Capablanca: "Of late we have lost a great deal of the love for the game because we consider it as coming to an end exceedingly fast. . . . The artistic part of chess—the combination—has been practically killed by the enormous strides made in the technical knowledge of the openings, generally leading the game into types of position similar to one another, where the lines of play to assure equality are somewhat similar."

In other words it is folly to be wise. Perfection is a path which leads to stalemate. And I had planned to spend my declining years in doling out bright dimes from an invested wealth of knowledge! But now it seems that every well-considered step brings the wayfarer that much nearer to the rainbow's end where lies futility. Schopenhauer was right. And so is Dorothy Parker. This concept of wisdom as a withering ailment leads on directly to the ultimate in blasphemy. One pictures the Lord on high as looking down upon the loftiest of human aspirations and saying, "Oh, that old gambit," before he sends an angel to decline it. However, in all this there is food for fundamentalists. Once it seemed to me that there was petty tyranny in the law which made forbidden all fruit upon the Tree of Knowledge. Now I see more clearly the logic of the cosmic plan. Shakespeare wrote "Hamlet" because he was not the perfect playwright. "Is this pretty good stuff or am I crazy?" he said to himself as he set down "The rest is silence." Not being sure, he could feel the moving finger on his spine when audiences clapped hands together. Fortunately for him he was not Bobby Jones who knows where every mashie shot will fall immediately he hits it. I doubt if he—or Bernard Shaw either—has much fun. Possibly some subtle philosopher might find that Waterloo was the greatest moment of ecstasy in all the campaigns of Napoleon. When he saw the battle go against him he must have had a poignant realization that up to that time he had been pretty good.

There is nothing fantastic in the prediction of impotence among the masters through an excess of wisdom, as the final standing in the recent contest proves. Thirty-four times Capablanca and Alekhine joined issue and twenty-five times the score was 0-0. All Argentine stood agog as one or the other fought with his back against the goal posts but each rush of the aggressor was stopped without a gain. "Hold 'em, Alekhine!" Indeed, even the games which Capablanca lost depended upon some slip which could be traced to his advancing years. In the beginning of the match he won, but then he was a younger man. From the chess master's table one fetches nothing save at the rare moments when he crumbles. But we don't have to be masters. By dint of will we can avoid it. Even Capablanca can remember back to the time when chess was way up town. "We purposely abstained from investigations and publications," he explains, "because we feared it would shorten the life of the game." As things stand, he believes, "The game evidently needs to be modified for contests among great masters." After all these centuries man has caught up with chess and conquered it. The new rule which I advocate is that whenever the king comes into any kind of danger the player may remove the piece and put it in his vest pocket. This would introduce strategy beyond anything now known and victory could be obtained only by the man ablest to sneak up upon his adversary unawares.

However, out of the whole tragic business I have learned my lesson and herewith I make the firm resolve never to be too good at any art or pastime. Possibly Calvin Coolidge is acting on the same theory in quitting the Presidency now for whittling. And when I find it is dangerous for me to go on longer with the task of creating literature I can return to painting in comparative safety.

There is a story of a gallant chess player who suffered not at all from Capablanca's complex. The captain of a ship, he went through all the cabins to find a passenger who would accept his challenge. At last there came a small man who timidly accepted. The board was set, the crew and all stood round to watch the struggle. Deeply the captain burrowed into his chair and filled a huge pipe to sustain him. The little man thrust out a pawn two paces while the captain gazed at the move in horror. One deep puff he drew and then he swept the pieces to the floor, crying out "That beats me."

Covering Washington

The Nation's Bi-Weekly Washington Letter

By THE UNOFFICIAL SPOKESMAN

Washington, D. C., December 5

IT is doubtful that the present session of Congress will be hymned in history for the legislation enacted or the statesmanship revealed. Nevertheless, it is full of rosy promise for the fat boys who acquire their Cadillacs by acquainting Congress with the will of the people. The unctuous gentlemen who do their work in hotel suites and around the House and Senate office buildings, and are known variously as legislative agents, lobbyists, and fixers, may well smile and lick their lips when they contemplate the calendar. There are huge power grants to be sought, inheritance taxes to be repealed, annoying investigations to be blocked. There are Vare and Smith to be shoved over, and other succulent objectives to be gained, if possible.

Two years ago it became the will of the people—that is, of the people who had just inherited large fortunes—that the estate tax should be retroactively reduced. Accordingly, the distinguished services of former Republican House Floor Leader Frank Mondell, of Wyoming, and former Senator Augustus Owsley Stanley, of Kentucky, were obtained. As ex-members, they had the free run of the House and Senate chambers, which was no disadvantage. In consequence of these and other labors, some $80,000,000 in taxes was handed back to that class of taxpayers which could, above all other classes, afford to pay them.

* * * * *

JUST when organized business seemed ready to complete the apotheosis of Coolidge and Mellon, a strange hush falls upon the Te Deums led by the United States Chamber of Commerce. It is a hush of bewilderment and chagrin, mingled with a feeling that Calvin and Andrew are betraying the simple faith reposed in them by the men who draw down the big dividends. They are more than shocked; they are scandalized.

The cause of the break between the chamber on the one hand and Messrs. Coolidge and Mellon on the other, is easily stated. Mr. Coolidge wants the tax reduction limited to about $225,000,000, so there will be no difficulty in balancing the budget even though the Congressional pork barrel should bulge fatter than usual on the eve of election. The great minds of the Chamber are determined upon a cut of $400,000,000, even at the risk of a deficit.

Among the perplexed and patriotic great minds, the suspicion is said to be gaining credence that the insidious influence of Bolshevist propaganda emanating from Moscow has succeeded at last in corrupting Coolidge and Mellon. It is a horrible thought, but how else can they explain this inexplicable refusal of Calvin to sign on the dotted line?

* * * * *

MR. COOLIDGE will win if he wants to and if the regular Republicans in Congress can be induced to stand firm against the beseeching and threatening of the bankers and merchants back home. Certainly the Progressives who hold the balance of power in the Senate will give no aid to the efforts of business, already overloaded with profits beyond all dreams of prosperity, to escape carrying its just share of the remainder of the $26,000,000,000 war debt that weighs down the shoulders of the American people.

In the end, of course, the joke will be on the Democrats, who apparently are quite willing to play the game of the United States Chamber of Commerce. And when it comes time to pass the hat for the 1928 campaign, the great majority of the chamber members will drop their contributions into the Republican derby with a couple of merry ha-ha's at the dull-witted Democratic leaders who thought to gain their support.

* * * * *

AMONG the lesser camp-followers who have arrived for the session are some familiar faces. There is, for example, the face of the celebrated Blair Coan, who was sent to Montana three years ago by the secretary of the Republican National Committee to "get" Senators Walsh and Wheeler in reprisal for their activity in investigating the official acts of Albert B. Fall and Harry M. Daugherty, and who actually did succeed in having Senator Wheeler indicted. Despite the exposure of this frame-up Coan is still at liberty and now blossoms out as a newspaper correspondent. Setting up quarters in the Wardman Park Hotel, he has circularized newspaper editors as follows:

"The real news of what is happening, as you know, seldom is told in news dispatches, but it is WHAT IS BACK OF THE NEWS that is interesting." This lascivious and inviting background he offers to supply in "daily, weekly, or semi-weekly" news letters at the astonishing rate of one dollar a week. This bargain offer has given rise to some speculation. It has been argued by real newspaper correspondents that no man could make a living on such a schedule, and hence that the ineffable Coan must have other sources of revenue in view, perhaps in connection with his news service. Perhaps that is why rumor connected him with the Vare camp. Squeamish the Vare gang is not, but apparently it has some sense of dignity left, because prompt and emphatic denials were issued that Coan had been, or would be, retained to further "Boss" Vare's cause in the Senate. Similar reports have connected him with the power trust, but thus far evidence is lacking.

It will be interesting to scan the Coan news letters to see what causes are supported and what measures advocated. The first letter has already been published and contains such gems of wisdom as the following: "For four years Russia has had complete control of Mexico. There are those who will go as far as to say that the laws confiscating property were drafted at Moscow, but be this as it may surely everyone knows that the law prohibiting religious worship is copied from the Soviet code." Or this: "Madam Kollontai, arch sorceress of the sordid social order which holds Russia in the palm of its dirty hands, was the ambassador from the Soviet Republic to Mexico. . . . She it was who persuaded President Calles of Mexico to squander all the finances in the Mexican treasury. . . ."

PURGED of his sins by breakfasting at the White House with the President, Bill Lorimer, once the Blond Boss of Illinois, is planning now to return to the Senate seat from which he was expelled in 1912. The evidence presented on that historic occasion showed that his election had been purchased by the bribery of members of the Illinois Legislature with a juicy jackpot raised by certain big corporations which expected to profit by it. The Senate put the boot to Mr. Lorimer by a vote of more than two to one, and for a decade he stood as the personification of all that was putrid and corrupt in politics.

Times have changed, and we are now in the era of the New Morality ushered in with the inauguration of Warren Harding, Calvin Coolidge, and the Ohio Gang. The other day Lorimer came back to the capital as a cheer leader in Big Bill Thompson's noisy flood-control ballyhoo. The hospitable White House, always ready to welcome distinguished party men from the Middle West, lost no time in extending Lorimer an invitation to have sausage and buckwheats with the President. Lorimer went, and with him went Big Bill and Illinois's Governor, Len Small, who recently paid back half a million which he had unlawfully taken from the State Treasury. What a quartet that must have been around the breakfast table—Blond Bill, Big Bill, Len Small, and Calvin!

Thus anointed and sweetened with Vermont maple syrup, Lorimer went back to Chicago full of determination to come back to the Senate. Perhaps he will be available for the seat which will be made vacant by the Senate's refusal to seat Frank Smith. And why not? Lorimer bought only a legislature; Smith and Insull corrupted the electorate of the whole State. Under the circumstances, Blond Bill could easily qualify as the reform candidate.

Executions: The New Sport

By EDWARD STEVENSON

THE other night New Jersey executed four men. Four! Even Massachusetts's pride must be wounded when it reads of Jersey's astonishing program. These men died for the murder of one man—not four—last July. They were Italians, so it may be supposed they felt no pain. As one complacent white-collar man remarked: "They ought to send all the wops to hell. They'll keep Sacco and Vanzetti company."

Theoretically these men died to expiate a horrible crime: actually they died to provide amusement for a gang of excitement seekers who now attend executions with all the gusto of undergraduates at a major football game. In fact, executions have become games. Invitations are given to those who desire them; and if we may believe the stories there are many who desire them. Executions are attended by the same class of persons who attend a burlesque show supposed to be particularly obscene. They are blood cousins to those who crowd courtrooms during sensational divorce cases; they are related—and not distantly—to those who toss ticker tape and scrap-paper upon the heads of visiting celebrities. Those who cannot attend the executions witness them vicariously through the pages of the tabloid press. The New York Daily News gave a headline of an inch and three-eights to the execution of four men. To effect a reform? To cause a wave of revulsion against legalized murder? One has only to read the inside of the paper to discover its purpose, the purpose of a newspaper which believes justice is not done unless there is an execution as an epilogue to a murder. "What Has Happened to Justice?" it cries each Sunday, citing cases in which murdered persons have gone unavenged. Sometimes it changes its cry to "When Justice Triumphed," licking its chops as it relates the expiation of murder by murder.

Yet in this Jersey affair the News has performed a public service which even the uncynical might believe unintentional. It has shown legalized murder in all its barbaric rottenness. For that we can thank it.

Mr. Lowell Limpus, "member of the News staff who witnesses executions," makes the usual shocked reference to "the morbid curiosity of the witnesses." Then he takes a deep breath and plunges into morbidness. Mr. Limpus says: "Every one of the quartet swore he was innocent, from Big Joe, who greeted the packed-in audience with 'Gentlemen, I am going to my death as innocent as God Almighty' to Capozzi, whose last words to the public were: 'I die with a smile—and I am an innocent man.'"

Mr. Limpus continues:

> The death-chamber was jammed like a rush-hour subway train. . . . A crowd of 150 invited witnesses had shoved and almost fought to enter the small room, until it was split in half, and some seventy-five forced to wait outside in the prison yard. They grumbled as they were informed they must miss half the "show." It [the crowd] shoved forward against the ropes that held it away from the squat unpainted chair.

After proclaiming his innocence and declaring he was framed, Big Joe was executed. Mr. Limpus says:

> The gray-haired executioner, Robert Elliott, who performed a similar service for Sacco and Vanzetti, spun the wheel on the control board, just behind the chair. It was in plain sight of the spectators. There came a sizzling sound.
> The curious pressed forward again, commenting audibly. . . . Men cursed each other because they could not see the clay in the chair . . . [Details] . . . Big Joe was carried out and the crowd argued and struggled for better positions.

The next man died pleading his innocence, accusing the Newark detective chief, Brex, of framing him. After the two were executed there was an intermission while the old audience was put out and the new audience admitted. Mr. Limpus goes on:

> The curious resisted desperately. They hadn't seen all the show yet. . . . Men fairly ran to be near the grisly chair. They joked and greeted friends. The odor of whiskey floated in the air, to mingle with the scent of scorched flesh.

Lynchings are terrible enough; but they are usually more or less surreptitious; they are carried out in anger and prejudice. The lynchers usually have a personal interest in the lynching; they may even think that by doing away with a Negro who has run amuck they are making the world that much safer for virgins. The witnesses at legal executions have no such motives or excuses. Their attendance is motivated solely by a desire to be in at the kill, to watch poor wretches writhe in their death agony, to experience a new emotion.

We shudder at the brutality of the Spanish bull-fights; we make spectacles of the slaying of human beings. We weep when we think of cannibals: cannibals kill humans for food; we do it for amusement.

The Bosch Magneto Case Comes to Court

By PERCY MUSGRAVE

AT last the famous Bosch Magneto Company case has arrived in a courtroom. Before Arthur Black, the son of ex-Governor Black of New York, as referee, the suit brought by the Government against the Bosch company for more than five million dollars is being heard in Boston. For five and a half years it has lain dormant, although some nationally important figures are involved and although, aside from the large sum at stake, the inquiry may at last lead to an official uncovering of some of the methods of two Alien Property Custodians in handling German property. Nearly twenty defendants will appear before Mr. Black, among them being A. Mitchell Palmer, the former Alien Property Custodian and later Attorney General of the United States; Francis P. Garvan of Chemical Foundation fame, successor of Palmer as Alien Property Custodian; Martin E. Kern of Allentown, Pennsylvania, and other places, the purchaser of the Bosch Magneto property; his friend, Arthur T. Murray, now president of the new American Bosch Magneto Corporation; Hornblower and Weeks and the Chase Securities Corporation, both of which acted as underwriters to a syndicate which purchased the assets of the old Bosch Magneto Company; Joseph F. Guffey, an important Democratic politician in Pennsylvania, a warm friend of Palmer, and former director of the Bureau of Sales of the Alien Property Custodian, who was indicted in the Southern District of New York for embezzlement of more than $400,000 (his case has not yet been brought to trial), and various other persons. A bill of complaint alleging a conspiracy to defraud the Government of the amount named was filed in Boston in September, 1926. The bill had been drafted and presented to Attorney General Sargent for approval and signature some time in the early part of August of that year, but the Attorney General delayed having it filed until a few days before the time limit had expired. As a result of this interesting negligence a United States judge in Boston ruled that several of the defendants had not been served within the time set by the statute of limitations.

The Nation's readers will recall that the Bosch Magneto Company was sold to Martin E. Kern, whose past history is extremely varied and interesting, through his agent and associate, H. D. Griffiths of New York. A. Mitchell Palmer's friendship with Kern began when the former was counsel of the Bethlehem Motors Corporation—he has also been indicted for having sworn falsely that he was a citizen, in order to obtain a passport—of which Kern and Arthur T. Murray were officials. Kern claims that he induced Palmer to seize the Bosch Magneto Company as enemy-alien-owned and to put Murray in as manager of the company for the Government. It is charged that the directors' fees were at once raised from $20 to $100 a meeting in addition to their expenses, that there was a great writing down of assets, and a similarly great increase in expenses. The sale of the property was first scheduled for November 27, 1918, but it had to be put off until December 7 because of a sudden doubt as to whether the more than one hundred patents belonging to the company had been legally seized by Palmer. This was finally remedied by an executive order issued by President Wilson permitting the Alien Property Custodian to seize the patents as the property of Robert Bosch, an enemy alien under the terms of the Trading with the Enemy Act. There were only two bidders at the sale, one being Harry Fisk, acting for the John Willys interests, who bid up to $4,100,000. To Howard D. Griffiths as agent for Kern the property was knocked down on a bid of $4,150,000. The Government claims that the real worth of the company was $9,685,564.07.

But Kern and Murray did not wait for this actual sale to lay their plans. With George A. MacDonald, a Springfield, Massachusetts, banker and later a director of the new company, they made an arrangement with Hornblower and Weeks under which this firm (of which John W. Weeks, the late Secretary of War, was originally a member) agreed, in case Kern got the company, to underwrite a new concern, the American Bosch Magneto Corporation, with a capital stock of 60,000 shares of a nominal value, and 7 per cent serial gold notes to the value of $1,800,000. Of the capital stock 45,000 shares was to be sold to the syndicate at $60 per share and in turn offered to the public at $65. The notes were to be sold to the syndicate at 98 and offered to the public at 100. Both the notes and capital stock were oversubscribed. The remaining 15,000 shares were to be distributed as a bonus in the following proportions:

Hornblower and Weeks	3,500 shares
Chase Securities Corporation	3,500 "
Martin E. Kern	2,667 "
Arthur T. Murray	2,667 "
George A. MacDonald	2,666 "
	15,000 "

To MacDonald were originally allotted 3,100 shares, for which he paid $5 per share. Why this was done is not clear, but in the final distribution the number of shares was substantially in the ratio shown above. Kern placed his shares in the name of his mother, Mary Kern, while Murray had his issued in the name of his father, Thomas S. Murray. A million dollars was thus made by the insiders through this bonus stock, without anyone's putting up a cent. It is certain that Kern and Murray did not sell their bonus stock at $65 per share. A short while afterward the stock jumped to 130 and then these men are alleged to have "cleaned up."

The next figure of importance upon the stage of this extraordinary play is J. Harry Covington, who resigned as a Supreme Court judge of the District of Columbia shortly before the sale of the Bosch Magneto Company. Also a warm friend of Palmer's, he received a fee of $1,000 for legal work in connection with the Bosch company for the vendor, namely the Government, and also acted as counsel for Kern, in the purchase of the company, for which Kern gave him a fee of $25,000. The legal fees paid by the Government in this case were more than $80,000. This neat sum was for Americanizing the concern, but in addition large salaries were paid to the temporary government officers of the company.

Next there appears on the boards Joseph F. Guffey, Democratic National Committeeman from Pennsylvania, quite as eager as Mitchell Palmer and Woodrow Wilson to save the world for democracy. His plum, as Director of Sales, was handling more than $150,000,000, the proceeds of sales of enemy-owned property. Instead of treating these funds in a fiduciary capacity, he mixed them up in one bank after another in which they earned interest running from 2¼ per cent to 3 per cent, aggregating in all $406,000. By a curious lapse of memory, when he remitted the principal of these funds to the Alien Property Custodian he seems to have neglected to send the accrued interest. For this lapse a United States grand jury, as already stated, had the unkindness to indict him for embezzlement. In the Harding Administration when Colonel Thomas Miller, who has himself been convicted of conspiracy as Alien Property Custodian, was in that office Guffey was forced to pay over this interest to the Treasury. Being bankrupt at the time, he is said to have borrowed the money from friends. Curiously enough, Mr. Guffey has never been brought to trial, and there are attempts being made even now to have the indictment dismissed. It is a great pity that the case is not pressed as it might throw some light on the loaning to him or to his private companies of several millions of dollars by the very banks in which he deposited the receipts from alien property sales.

If it is gratifying that the case against the manipulators of the Bosch Magneto Company is at last under way, it is time that the Government woke up to the necessity of pushing the Guffey case as well. The blackest page in the war scandals remains the Alien Property Custodian office. The statute of limitations has unfortunately intervened in some cases, and the hesitancy of the Harding Administration to go after Wilson officials has protected others—both Republicans and Democrats had their hands in Uncle Sam's pocket during this period. Hence this Boston case is of importance second only to the oil scandals.

Anxiety in Solitude

By HELENE MULLINS

This evening I await an elegant young gentleman
Who has known me a number of years, and sometimes reads my verse.
He has avowed to me, not once, but again and again,
That he thinks me an honest poet, and is sure there are many worse.

I have this day finished a lyric he has not seen before.
I am, with it, like a queen with a gem that has cost a fabulous sum,
Yet sitting here and awaiting his knock upon the door,
I am ill at ease, I twist my hands, I pray he forget to come.

I begin to fear the evening will be rather droll;
Somewhat between regret and a furtive dismay,
He will carefully keep his emotions under control,
While squeezing me into a niche where he hopes I will stay.

He will long to regard me with tenderness. Yet think!
What can he feel for me, excepting compassion,
Whose poetry is charming, but whose fingers are stained with ink,
And whose gown is not very bright and not of the latest fashion?

The King Is Dead

By MARGARET MARSHALL

I ENTERED the Empire Room at the Waldorf-Astoria to attend the private showing of the new Ford. Near the center of the room a group of people circled, looking down at something—like mourners viewing a corpse. Somewhere an orchestra was playing bad, sad music. Or perhaps it was the velvet hangings and the cut-glass chandeliers and the noiseless young men in tuxedos and stiff white fronts who hovered about and murmured softly in one's ear: "It has a miniature Lincoln transmission"; "They're going to make 12,000 a day"; "100,000 orders already from Greater New York"; "No parts of the old Ford are interchangeable with the new."

Then I noticed that the spectators were all dressed up in fur-trimmed evening wraps and raccoon coats and high-heeled pumps—so I knew it wasn't a funeral. The circling crowd was looking down at the new chassis from Detroit, so I looked too. I passed on to the new sedan, and the new coupe, and the new sport model, all arrayed in the refined new colors—gun metal, blue, dawn gray, Niagara blue, Arabian sand. Standard gear-shift, four-wheel brakes, foot throttle, gasoline gauge on the dash, speedometer—only a vestige of the old crank that required profane strength to spin—merely a hole, covered by a round shiny plate.

"Now we'll see how I look in a Ford," said a stringy dowager in evening dress.

At one end of the room the anatomy of Model A was laid out on a blue velvet tripod trimmed with gold braid. It was all very refined and quiet and a bit plushy.

Model T was one of the unpleasant facts of life. The family bought and confronted me with it one spring when I came home from school to spend the summer on the ranch. My brother, in overalls, backed it out of the shed and paraded in it up and down in front of the ranch-house. For a background there were the log barns and a wheat-field and then gray sagebrush in the distance, sweltering dry in the sun. The sound of hens cackling and a dog's bark and that funny Ford horn are bound together in my memory.

I hated Model T. I said I wouldn't ride in the ugly thing, sitting high and tinny on its four wheels. But I was young then. Soon I found—like several million others—that it "would go anywhere." It would, and did. It chased antelopes in African deserts—and farmers herded cows with it. Ditches, ruts, mountain roads, mudholes, high centers did not matter. "It took you anywhere and brought you back." And for a while that was enough for most people—so most people bought a Ford. Then they wanted to be "smart." They were not so much interested in going anywhere as they were in being seen going somewhere. Model T was sturdy, strong, brave. But it certainly was not smart.

Mr. Ford was wise. He knew Model T was done for. He had a problem, but it was rather simple. He merely made a car to order—price and all—to suit the predominant desires of present-day America.

Model A is here, irrevocably. "No parts of the new Ford are interchangeable with the old."

Of course not.

The king is dead.

An art book for every American as well as every lover of the graphic arts. The fruit of nearly three years' devoted collaboration, it exceeds the hopes of even those who have worked most faithfully toward its production. Here, for the first time, are reproduced all the one hundred ninety-five lithographs of Bellows, from "A Stag at Sharkey's," known to thousands who never bought a picture or entered an art gallery, to "The Last Count," from the one copy in existence. Here, for the collector of Bellows lithographs, is an authoritative and definitive index, soundly, beautifully made. Here, for the rest of us who cannot afford to be collectors, are superb reproductions of all the lithographs that we have coveted. Here is, incidentally, the first edition of a brilliant piece of critical-biographical writing by the author of The Mauve Decade. And here, for any who have overlooked the most vigorous of modern American realists, is a revelation which will seem almost too exciting to be real.

Is Germany Extravagant?

By FREDERICK KUH

Berlin, November 25

WHEN an American correspondent picked up a Communist daily in Berlin last October, saw a vague reference to a new, critical memorandum which Parker Gilbert, the Reparations Agent, was addressing to the German Government, and tersely cabled this item to the New York Times, he was blissfully innocent of revealing a secret which was to open a new chapter in German history. The Times editor at home, who buried this news dispatch on Page 8, was no less guileless. It remained for the German press to realize, also tardily, that something important had happened and that it behooved them to find out what.

Actually, the German Government and people were being confronted with an ultimatum, giving them the choice between keeping their standard of living down, existing within their modest means, and enjoying a fair chance of lightening the heavy hand of foreign creditors or else borrowing and spending indiscriminately at the risk of perpetuating their subserviency.

For a long time Mr. Gilbert had been hinting, then flatly asserting to Dr. Heinrich Koehler, the German Minister of Finance, that German financial policy was unsound. His first objections, imparted to the Berlin Government in September, 1926, and directed against the loans which the several states of Germany were obtaining abroad, were not divulged to the public. In fact, as far as paying any attention to Mr. Gilbert's words goes, the Government might have been as little aware of them as the public.

This spring the Reparations Agent protested at the Government's postponement of the measures which were to put in order the confused relations between the Reich and its component states. This protest, too, fell on the deaf ear of German officialdom. Secret economic diplomacy proving unavailing, Mr. Gilbert used the report he published on June 10 as a trumpet to sound a public warning against the prodigious foreign borrowing and spendthrift policy of the German states. Although the tone of this report would have jarred an ordinary minister out of his cabinet seat, Finance Minister Koehler received it with bored but well-bred silence. For months Mr. Gilbert continued his soliloquies in the presence of the German Government, and nothing was done. Suddenly the Prussian state loan, now ready to be thrown on the American market, was blocked. If the German Government had not heeded Mr. Gilbert's criticism, the American bankers had. Then Dr. Heinrich Koehler, Minister of Finance, stopped, looked, and listened. Since Dr. Koehler's concern, even then, threatened to subside, Mr. Gilbert suggested that he might keep it alive by presenting a written note, embodying his criticisms. The upshot was the delivery of the Gilbert memorandum, courteously humiliating, and the German reply, conceding the justice of some or Mr. Gilbert's arguments, refuting a couple of them, and evading most of them.

All the points at issue, numerous and often technical, cannot be chronicled and examined here. But the cardinal points are clear:

First, Mr. Gilbert points to the increase of expenditures in the German budget, amounting to 7,444 million marks in 1925, 8,543 million in 1926, and 9,130 million in 1927—a rise of nearly 1,700 million in two years, of which only 607 million went for reparations payments. The German Government argues that more than half the budget outlays were devoted to paying off war debts at home and abroad. This is true. But it would be difficult to name the government of a single nation, which was engaged in the war, in whose budget the payment of internal and foreign debts does not play a predominant role.

Second, the Reparations Agent deplores the financial arrangements, or lack of them, between the federal administration and state governments. Fixing of the responsibility between them for tax-collecting and public expenditures, he says, is becoming continually less clear. Dr. Koehler, without attempting to refute Mr. Gilbert's criticism, answers that a clear-cut, lasting settlement of financial functions between the Reich and the federal states is impossible as long as the German agricultural situation remains poor (despite a 20 per cent increase in this year's harvest over 1926, the value of the crops is said to be 20 to 30 per cent below the pre-war level), and while German industry is not thoroughly adapted to post-war production and marketing conditions. The German reply also suggests that undue interference by the federal Government in the finances of the states would be unconstitutional. This is an admission that the particularist interests of the states are allowed to conflict with the interests of the country as a whole.

Third, the Gilbert note points out that the Government's salaries-reform bill for the civil service was stated last July to entail approximately 10 per cent increases, while it is now officially announced that the increases will range from 18 to 25 per cent. However necessary and desirable these "raises" for state employees may be, the Government parties are aware that the next German general elections are but a few months distant and that several hundred thousand civil-service workers might be persuaded to vote for those parties which raise their salaries. Mr. Gilbert estimates the cost of these salary increases at 1,200 to 1,500 million marks, while the Government, in its response, places the amount at about 1,250 millions. Despite Dr. Koehler's assurances to the contrary, Mr. Gilbert insists that the money for the increased salaries can be derived only from higher taxes.

Finally, Mr. Gilbert takes exception to new expenditures for the proposed educational-reform law (which envisages a reorganization of the school system on the basis of religious instruction) and to the plan to compensate German citizens for losses and damages suffered through the war. Mr. Gilbert again emphasizes that he will not approve the marketing of the preferred shares of the German state railways to obtain revenues for these or any other outlays. Dr. Koehler replies that the financing of the school reform will not be felt for several years; but Mr. Gilbert evidently believes that coming years cannot be ignored, even by a Finance Minister.

Now it is odd that the Reparations Agent, the brunt of whose attack is leveled against the German budget, should insist that he cannot interfere with that budget. When I talked to Mr. Gilbert a few days after the publication of his memorandum, he desired me to understand that he exercises no veto over the German budget or its separate items. "I do not enjoy the prerogatives granted to the foreign finance controllers of Austria and Hungary, who could block budgetary expenditures if they deemed it necessary," he said.

Mr. Gilbert is a modest man. If it is literally true that he possesses no legal right to dictate the German budget, it is significant that he did not remind me, as he had reminded the German Government and people, that he wields a far greater power in his ability to influence the sources of credit for Germany. Germany has many potent creditors and Mr. Gilbert is their agent. Neither bankers nor their agents are accustomed to let legal etiquette dictate their behavior toward a debtor. The world's bankers and especially Wall Street, where Germany has borrowed hundreds of millions of dollars in the last three years, are quick to react to a word from the Reparations Agent. Mr. Gilbert requires no formal veto power over the German budget as long as he wields an informal veto over foreign credits for Germany.

Moreover, it is reasonable to suppose that Mr. Gilbert would not insist on vital changes in German financial policy unless he were confident that he could enforce his demands.

Even the German Government admitted the justification of many of his criticisms. Mr. Gilbert denounced the loans floated abroad by German states and municipalities as "unproductive." He is treading firm ground here. The president of the Reichsbank, Dr. Hjalmar Schacht, has declared that the cost of swimming pools, parks, athletic stadiums, and theaters, erected by German cities in recent years, almost equals the total amount of money which the German cities borrowed abroad. It is fair to say that these loans have been diverted from channels more vital to a country engaged in rebuilding a war-shattered economic system and paying off 6,700 million marks of internal and foreign debts contracted since the war, besides reparations. Germany answers that many of these municipal and state loans went to construct electrical, gas, and water plants, port facilities, and agricultural improvements. Many Germans wondered whether the Reparations Agent had assumed that because such public utilities are privately owned in America the money invested in them became "unproductive" in Germany, where the utilities are municipally owned.

The German Government, while promising a new regime of economy in general terms, failed to describe how and when these economies are to be enforced. Mr. Gilbert's curiosity is left unsatisfied as to how the Government will obtain the vast sums needed to reimburse German claimants for their war-time losses. Nor is the source of credits revealed, from which Germany's extraordinary budget shall be covered. Whence is the money coming to meet increased reparations payments, 1,250 million marks of salary increases annually, the costs of carrying out the school reform? Although Mr. Gilbert suggested that these sums might be obtained by a far-reaching administrative reform, cutting down the expenses of federal, state, and communal government and reducing the subsidies which the Reich grants to the states and cities, there are no signs that this wholesale slashing of the cost of government is to be attempted.

"Germany will scarcely be able effectively to protest against the unfair pressure of reparations payments," wrote the Frankfurter Zeitung, "while critics at home and abroad can point to the waste of huge sums in government administration."

Germany's reply to the Gilbert memorandum was a disappointment. Its logic is occasionally amusing. Referring to the improvement of German economic conditions, the German document says, "The amount of goods produced grew more rapidly than prices rose." This reminded the German economist, Gustav Stolper, of the familiar riddle: "A ship is 117 meters long. How old is the captain?"

There is nothing in the German declaration which will embarrass Mr. Gilbert in reviving his entire criticism in the annual report which he will issue early in December. The German reply included the summary of an irrelevant speech delivered by the Finance Minister before the Reichstag budget committee. The German analysis of the Reich's budget, which experts regarded as less competent than the analysis Mr. Gilbert had made in his June report, contained no reference to the increase of 250 million marks for German military expenditures within three years. On the other hand, one critic pointed out that Mr. Gilbert made no mention of the several hundred million dollars' worth of German pre-war property, still held in sequestration by the United States. In connection with Mr. Gilbert's objection to indiscriminate German borrowing abroad, it was suggested that some of this borrowing would have been unnecessary if the sequestered property had been released.

One cannot suppress a suspicion that the underlying motive of the Gilbert memorandum is not to be found in his detailed, technical criticism, and that, in a candid, unguarded moment he might have said:

"The Dawes Plan will enter into full swing after September 30, 1928, when the 'normal' 2,500 million marks annuities will be exacted from Germany for the first time. There is reason to doubt whether the transfer of immense sums of currency from Germany to her former enemies will be accomplished without endangering the stability of German currency. Germany is bound to do her utmost to facilitate the transfer of reparations. But German financial policy is unsound and, when difficulties in the execution of the Dawes Plan arise, I may be constrained to place the responsibility upon Germany and to recall the warnings which I issued as long ago as 1926 and 1927."

In the Driftway

BEFORE the season for summer reminiscences closes the Drifter wants to tell what a nice city is Portland, Maine. Most vacationists use it merely as a lodging house for the night while whizzing through by automobile or as a place to change trains in. The Drifter arrived there last summer with some such program in his own mind, but liked the town so well that what was to have been a visit of hours stretched into days. What he liked best was the friendly and interested way in which he was treated by everyone from whom he sought information. It is a positive pleasure to be a stranger in Portland asking the way about. Everyone seems pleased and able to give you directions, and—oddly enough—they generally turn out to be right. There is no officious boosterism in evidence.

AT the official information bureau the Drifter came upon the folder of a camp which he must surely visit some day. "We have no bathrooms, tennis courts, or golf course," read the announcement. "The camp cannot be reached by automobiles or motor boats."

* * * * *

PORTLAND has some sedate and beautiful old houses, some ancient and sky-scraping elms in its streets, and a delightful lack of conventional "sights." Chief among the latter is the old Longfellow home. As a rule the Drifter does not visit such places—they bore him. But the Longfellow house proved a pleasant exception. It has been made as little of a museum and kept as much of a home as possible. The furniture is disposed about the rooms much as it must have been, and the visitor can wander about at will. It is true that an attendant tracked after the Drifter, pretty close at his heels, but there was doubtless something about his looks which suggested he might walk off with a four-poster bed or a wood-burning stove. He felt suspicious of himself. Anyhow he enjoyed the visit and he came away with an enhanced respect for him who in Portland is spoken of simply as "The Poet." There is an atmosphere in the home of the finest and fullest old New England gentility—and, say what you will, this was something pretty fine.

MEMORANDA on the walls of orders for groceries indicate that they lived well in the Longfellow household and were not such teetotalers as some people nowadays might like to believe. There seem to have been more bottles of brandy ordered than could possibly have been used for strictly medicinal purposes. And speaking of medicine there wasn't much money in it in those days. A faded bill recovered from Longfellow's parents shows that Dr. Shirley Erving in 1807 received $5 for assisting the stork to bring young Henry into the world. No wonder they had large families in those days.

WHEN the Drifter was in Portland there were only two daily newspapers issued, one in the morning, the other in the evening—and both under the same ownership. In the last few weeks a new daily has made its appearance, the Portland Evening News, under the editorship of the Drifter's old friend and former fellow-worker on The Nation, Ernest Gruening. Portland is on the way to becoming a finer city than ever. THE DRIFTER

Symphony in the South

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A mob-proof jail and park streets were until recently all that Macon, Georgia, could flaunt; it could hardly brag (though it did) of the accident of Sidney Lanier being born here and eventually finding himself at Baltimore. But when a group of its provincial inhabitants perform Beethoven's symphonies of a Sunday afternoon to a crowd of three thousand, the event deserves notice. What was it Mencken said in his better days—"As scarce as an oboe-player in the South"?

Macon has an eighty-piece symphony orchestra. To be sure, there is a clamorous need for a harpist, a bassoon player, and an exponent of the Cor anglais, but these things will come. Yet—how long can a local symphony orchestra last if set down among the cotton-fields and peach orchards of Georgia?

Macon is perhaps not typical. The presence of a liberal newspaper, which is bombarding the local buyers and moneylenders with propaganda on the trade-getting magic of a weekly free concert, is something which the average Southern city would lack. Last summer the Birdsey Flour Mills responded with a sum large enough to support the ensemble through the hotter part of the year. Now, however, both the weather and the ears of local merchants are apparently turning cold. To meet this exhaustion of revenue the orchestra sponsored a benefit performance of "H. M. S. Pinafore," succeeding, by a hurricane of publicity, in getting fairly good audiences, but the net results will pay for only one-and-a-half concerts; and the presentation of half a concert would be an awkward affair.

What can a small Southern—or Northern—city do with a resident symphony orchestra?

What Is a Bar Association?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In January I was the flattered recipient of a letter from a State director of the American Bar Association's membership committee. It began: "It is a pleasure to join most heartily in the inclosed invitation presented to you by the president of the American Bar Association." The director could not know how compelling his mere invitation was, so he proceeded to reason why. "Membership in the association," he continued, "is really indispensable to every lawyer who has at heart the maintenance of the ancient standards of honor and dignity of the profession and the promotion of the administration of justice." The State director in closing his gracious letter expressed the hope that I could find it agreeable to sign at once the inclosed card of application and give him "the satisfaction and pleasure of proposing you for membership." This hope found echo in the accompanying invitation from the president, Charles S. Whitman, who said in part: "I extend to you a most cordial invitation to join this large group of your brothers at the bar, and to give us the advantage of your experience and ability, working with us to maintain the high traditions of our profession."

Needless to say, I applied. But why have I not been advised of the disposition of my application? My correspondent must have proposed me, as he attached no condition to his promise to do so except that I return the card of application. The membership committee, composed in part of Moorfield Storey, Frank B. Kellogg, Elihu Root, Hampton L. Carson, John W. Davis, and Charles E. Hughes, would certainly not deny me the indispensable privilege of membership.

During the months that I have waited I have wondered wherein have I failed to measure up. Graduation from the law school of the University of Pennsylvania and practice as an attorney for four years in West Virginia under a license from the Supreme Court of that State would probably entitle one to be considered a lawyer. My conduct as a practicing attorney has never, to my knowlege, been questioned. There has—but wait! At the foot of the application-card was this question—"Are you white, Indian, Mongolian, or Negro?"

But what has my being a Negro got to do with it?

Pound for President?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: "Norris for President" or anyone else? The American intelligentsia have as yet no effect on running the country, but that is no reason against a man's saying what he wants. In forty years' time no one will accept Mr. R. S. Baker's blah about Wilson. The one-and-one-half cent postage stamp will not be adorned by the effigy now printed upon it; starched fronts that inquire not whether justice is done, but whether formalities are complied with, will not be honored, even in public schools.

For next President I want no man who is not lucidly and clearly and with no trace or shadow of ambiguity against the following abuses: (1) Bureaucratic encroachment on the individual, as the asinine Eighteenth Amendment, passport and visa stupidities, arbitrary injustice from customs officials; (2) Article 211 of the Penal Code, and all such muddle-headedness in any laws whatsoever; (3) the thieving copyright law.

No man who has not sense enough to understand that these things are unnecessary evils, is fit to sit in the White House, however low the prestige of that dwelling may have been driven by recent incumbents. And no man who has not guts enough to take effective action against these evils is fit for that job or any other job in the government.

Why Harlan Dismissed Walt Whitman

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The recent republication of "The Good Gray Poet," W. D. O'Connor's vindictive assault upon James Harlan, because of his removal of Walt Whitman from a clerkship in the Interior Department, calls for at least a brief restatement of the facts in the case.

Senator Harlan was President Lincoln's last appointee to a seat in his Cabinet. When President Johnson urged Harlan to accept the Secretaryship of the Interior, the Senator reluctantly consented with a clear understanding that all supernumeraries were to be dropped from the departmental pay roll.

In my "Life of James Harlan," published by the Iowa State Historical Society in 1913, I briefly state the facts in the case. I quote:

> Among the many clerks and supernumeraries who received their dismissal from the Interior Department during the general clearing-out process instituted by Secretary Harlan was the famous poet, Walt Whitman, and probably no other similar dismissal brought down upon Harlan such a storm of censure. Whitman had earned the gratitude of the government by his devoted services to sick and wounded soldiers in the Washington hospitals, and had been given a clerkship in the Indian Bureau in recognition of those services. He "had been a favorite with the chief clerk in the bureau, and had been given a good deal of latitude," and "whenever the duties were not pressing, he was at work upon his manuscripts." That his work was not commensurate with his salary or with the services of those who were carrying the actual burden of clerical labor in the Indian Bureau is admitted by most of his biographers.
> As has been noted, Secretary Harlan early determined on a policy of economy, including the dismissal of every clerk not deemed necessary to the efficiency of the department. The rule was rigidly enforced and as many as eighty removals on a single day were reported. On June 30 occurred the dismissal of Walt Whitman, along with several others who had been holding their offices simply as rewards for past services.
> A number of Whitman's friends, chief among whom was W. D. O'Connor, a brilliant writer, resented the poet's dismissal and took up cudgels in his behalf. O'Connor charged Harlan with having gone to Whitman's desk at night and taken therefrom the manuscript of "Leaves of Grass," on which the poet was working at the time. Furthermore, O'Connor alleged that Harlan had read sufficiently far in the manuscript to convince himself that it did not meet his idea of decency, that he had then returned the manuscript to the desk, and immediately thereafter dismissed Whitman from the service.
> Secretary Harlan removed Whitman on Commissioner Dole's report recommending that he, with others, be dismissed, and for a reason virtually conceded by the more candid friends of the poet to be a valid one, namely, that his services were not essential to the successful operation of the Indian Bureau. The fact that an indiscreet friend unduly pressed Whitman's claims for reinstatement chiefly on the ground of his service in the hospitals and his literary achievements, and that Secretary Harlan saw no reason why the author of "Leaves of Grass" should be longer pensioned in a department devoted solely to business, is the only discoverable foundation for the O'Connor charges.

To Teachers

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: This is an appeal to all teachers who are Nation readers and not members of the Teachers' Union.

It is true that teachers have grown suspicious and tired of the so-called betterment organizations and their out-of-town conventions. But the union has already proved itself a real service to us. Whether the issue relate to salaries, pensions, professional rights, or educational ideals, the union comes actively to the fore. Unionism is an inevitable development in any democratically run institution.

Who Are the Poor?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It has been brought to my attention that under date of June 29, 1927, you published an editorial giving certain statistics concerning this society. There was an error in these figures that I should like to correct. Of the 3,891 families under our care last year the largest single nationality group consisted of 1,133 native-born white families, or 29 per cent of the whole group. This means that the foreign-born still make up the majority of the families that came to our attention. It is true that of the foreign-born only 5 per cent had been here less than five years (showing it to be a fallacy that the very recent immigrant is our chief problem) but the foreign-born as a group have always been our chief concern—and still are.

Before Winter

By LYNN RIGGS

Winter again is sealing with a seal
His white imperious edict. It will behoove
Men, who are careless of their minds that move
Through rain and sun, to garner as they feel.
Flower and maple may not end their song
At its bright crest, nor any risen thing
Escape the woe of stream and blackbird's wing
Alike congealed and held as by a thong.

You too, who most of all that summers quicken
Sprawled in the sun, obey the grim design
Imposed on brow and lip. Now, lest I sicken
For its remembered beauty, I make haste
To cheat the winter and the general waste
And set, like this, upon your mouth a sign.

First Glance

"SCHOLAR, poet, historian, archaeologist, art critic, mountaineer, explorer, gardener, naturalist, distinguished servant of the State, Gertrude was all of these, and was recognized by experts as an expert in them all." So writes Lady Bell of her stepdaughter, the late Gertrude Bell of Arabia, whose "Letters" she has edited for a respectful and curious world (Boni and Liveright; two volumes: $10). The Uncrowned Queen of Arabia who was the subject of so much rumor and report during and after the war, and who remains perhaps the principal competitor with Colonel T. E. Lawrence for the distinction of having had the most amazing career of all those persons devoted throughout the war to service in outlying places, becomes very knowable indeed in these large volumes. We see her from six to forty-six as a girl in England, as an eager student at Oxford, as a learner of many languages including Persian and Arabic, as a traveler to Persia and an excavator in Asia Minor, as a climber of the most formidable of Alpine peaks, and as almost every other thing save, let me say in passing, a woman in love. We see her at forty-six drawn into the war, which took her eventually to Bagdad where because of her languages and because of her genius she was made Oriental Secretary, assisted brilliantly in the creation of the Kingdom of Iraq and the settlement of the crown upon Feisal, and died at fifty-seven from too much labor for the Museum of Antiquities. We see her always as a brisk, courageous, enthusiastic, affectionate woman whose character is no less astounding than her story—whose character, in fact, is her story.

Gertrude Bell of England and Arabia—for she remained an Englishwoman even in the midst of her efforts for Feisal and in spite of her passion for Persian, Babylonian, and Arabian antiquities—was very decidedly possessed of a mind, but she is most interesting for the activity of her life. Hers was the sort of activity that we have learned to expect every few years from some member of her race—endless activity, passionately directed but inspired I suspect by a touch of desperation. At twenty-one she wrote: "I love talking to people when they really will talk sensibly and about things which one wants to discuss. I am rather inclined to think, however, that it is a dangerous amusement, for one 's so ready to make oneself believe that the things one says and the theories one makes are really guiding principles of one's life, whereas as a matter of fact they are not at all. One suddenly finds that one had formulated some view from which it is very difficult to back out, not because of one's interlocutor but because the mere fact of fitting it with words engraves it upon one's mind. Then one is reduced to the disagreeable necessity of trying even involuntarily to make the facts of one's real life fit into it, thereby involving oneself in a mist of half-truths and half-falsehoods which cling about one's mind do what one will to shake them off." Making due allowance for those fifteen "ones," there is a fine paragraph. But it is not the expression of a contemplative or even of a practical soul. It is the mark rather of one who will go many times around the world in search of the whole truths of experience—and never, of course, quite find them. Such a one was Gertrude Bell; and I doubt whether a more perfect example has recently come on record.

A Good Word for California

Lands of the Sun. By Mary Austin. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

IN New York and in other great cities one meets people who live as though they recognized no kinship with forms of life outside the human family; as though creation really started on the sixth day and all the rest were irrelevant and unnecessary. Such people scurry in and out of restaurants and theaters, bob up and down in office-building elevators—they are as active as cockroaches in a drain. "This is the life!" they seem to proclaim—indeed they will so proclaim if you ask them.

A kind of life I suppose it is—a life in time but scarcely in space. Such people have about as much spatial poise and content as the tick of a watch. For them the concert of nature is played on two strings—themselves and the barren asphalt they walk on. Surely there is an appalling egoism about such lives, and also, I think, a progressive insanity. This urban robot I am describing hasn't even sense enough to say, when he meets you, "It's a fine day," or "It looks like rain," observations of some color and pertinence as compared to his empty "Hello" or "How's the boy?" Alas, he is so tragically full of himself he hasn't even room enough for the weather.

Whom the gods would destroy they first make insensitive. Not to the meek, exactly, but rather to the sensitive, belongs the earth and the fulness thereof. They win their inheritance simply by being aware of it.

Mary Austin is one of these inheritors. Both for herself and for her readers she has widened the dimensions of life and increased its content by the record of what she has seen and felt in the beautiful places of her native West. "The Lands of the Sun," like "The Land of Little Rain," is a book not merely to be read but to be owned and referred to.

Such books, it seems to me, represent the necessary groundwork of a culture—the spiritual possession of the soil. Not enough of this work has been done—for the West especially. John Muir, Robinson Jeffers, Mary Austin, and perhaps George Sterling—on the work of these four California might base a culture, and probably won't if present portents hold.

Mrs. Austin came to California in 1888, before, as she remarks in her preface, "It was preempted and overrun by the most impotent—culturally and spiritually impotent—society that has ever gotten itself together in any quarter of the United States." Her interest is primarily in the landscape; where the human adventure enters it is California's earlier epic which impresses her: "men contriving against the gods for the possession of the earth;" this rather than the contemporary enigma of sun-kissed fatuousness.

In California every prospect pleases; but in this continuous beauty there is a certain troubling redundance and excess. Curiously enough Mrs. Austin's style seems to have caught a little of this infection. Frequently I found myself urging her not to make a literary conquest of this country but to let the mountains, the valleys, the trees and flowers and birds speak with their own clear voices. Nature invariably rejects the too-possessive suitor; a tree or a flower is its own symbol, its own significance. Thoreau and Muir both knew this; so does Mrs. Austin, I suspect. It is merely that occasionally she is betrayed by the impulse to make nature provide the visual pattern for her own subjective desire and need. For the rest, one cannot acknowledge too gratefully the richness and precision of her observation, the devotion with which she has compiled her historical and botanical data, and the genuine emotion which lifts and colors her picture of this land which, for all its human faults and natural faultlessness, one remembers always with wonder and enthusiasm.

JAMES RORTY

The Quality of Grace

The Bridge of San Luis Rey. By Thornton Wilder. A. and C. Boni. $2.50.

THERE exists a certain minor prose quality which, in its purest form, seems to have eluded the most eminent of our present-day fiction writers: I mean grace. Grace, unlike other literary virtues, such as sincerity or strength, is a thing learned. Perhaps it is always the product of a continuous tradition, of a devotion to the masters. In America the absence of a homogeneous fictional tradition may partially account for the fact that our most widely advertised stylists are deficient in this very quality of grace. The elements of grace are almost moral: purity and modesty and quiet. Mr. Cabell, Miss Wylie, and all those other practitioners whom good sense (or snobbishness) has caused to revolt against the school-boy vulgarity of our standard literary idiom, have none the less failed to capture these elements. That is because pure grace is incompatible with mannerism or whimsicality; it is the serene steering of a middle course between the Odyssean rocks of artificiality and ruggedness. In our own time it is almost unexampled. Possibly our pioneer prejudices have laid too much emphasis on what is called a masculine style. Perhaps we have no one to learn from in our own tradition. Then there is another deterrent: the realistic ukase which bids our writers transform themselves into dictaphones for the recording of "sinewy native American speech." Finally there is the fear that so delicate a note as pure grace may be lost amid the blatant and monotonous trumpetings of our contemporary American prose.

Mr. Wilder's very beautiful book, then, possesses an extrinsic as well as an intrinsic value. Intrinsically it is a remarkably confident evocation of the secret springs of half a dozen men, women, and children. But in addition it proves to us that an American, if he be willing to exercise rigorous selection, understatement, and a measured observance of the prose styles of the masters, can create a novel instinct with a pure grace.

To achieve this unique limpidity of style and feeling Mr. Wilder has taken careful thought and made many careful avoidances. The first thing he does is to obviate the possibility of there arising in the reader's mind any vulgar or hackneyed associations. This is effected by a removal of the scene of his novel to an eighteenth-century Peru just barely touched with a gentle unreality. No land of the imagination, this Lima of 1714, for that trick would be too obvious; merely a modest device for arousing in us that sense of purification which is lent by historical remoteness. Then, as grace is not associated with large effects or the complication implicit in a numerous dramatis personae, he reduces his characters to a scant seven or eight—the five who perish when the bridge of San Luis Rey falls, the Perichole whose passions and perversities link delicately the fortunes of those five, and two or three more static personalities to balance the dynamic action of the protagonists. But this mere numerical simplicity is not enough, for grace is achieved through a certain unity, even monotony. It is not generally effected by the depiction of too many emotions. Consequently Mr. Wilder simplifies his feeling-pattern. Though his characters are projected completely and organically, they are for the most part motivated by the single passion of love. There is no schematism here, for this passion expresses itself in almost every conceivable form (except romantic affection) from the almost religious idolatry of little Pepita to the inverse effects of love frustration in the Perichole.

A locale free from impure associations, a parsimonious list of characters, a simplified and coherent emotional material—there is still another device employed by Mr. Wilder to convey a sense of purity. There is a moment in which the love-careers of his five characters reach a psychic turning-point; at that moment they fall from the bridge. Accident? Divine intention? The ruminative and Jesuitical Brother Juniper thinks the latter, but Mr. Wilder does not say. His art knows that to indicate the metaphysical implication underlying his tale is to deepen the sense of mystery. To stress it is to destroy the quality of grace he has so surely built up. He assembles materials so apt for the purpose that he might very well be tempted to furbish up his story and present it as a profound philosophical novel, thus gaining the plaudits of the columnists. But his pen is tipped with the pure gold of an exquisite tact—another word for grace. Just as the simple reticences of his individual sentences offer exactly the correct amount of stimulation to the reader's sensibility, so is his basic conception clothed with a beautiful restraint, lending to his work that gracious and stately modesty we meet with in the old fables of La Fontaine.

Mr. Wilder is not yet an important novelist; but it may be that he decreases the significance of his work by a self-imposed series of limitations. His projects are not ambitious; he refuses to set a complicated or turbulent human scene. Yet there are a sureness, an ease, and an emotional power in this book that indicate more inclusive and far-ranging abilities. There are few young Americans writing today whose development will be watched by the discerning critic with greater hope and confidence.

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN

Tragic Biography

The Life and Death of Sacco and Vanzetti. By Eugene Lyons. International Publishers. $1.50.

FELIX FRANKFURTER'S analysis of the evidence in the Sacco-Vanzetti case was until August 22 the one competent book dealing with the trial. The rest were pamphlets, written in a mingled atmosphere of threat and supplication, telling the story, it is true, but written—for the story was unfinished, and it is unfinished still—with an eye to the diverse elements of money, social force, and legal device to be recruited for the battle.

August 22 having passed, there are those who see no need for a retelling of the story. The New York Times spent five pages the day after the legal murder in relating and summarizing all the circumstances. August 22 having passed, there are those who know that, however gallant and thorough was Mr. Frankfurter's book upon the subject, another was needed, as careful in its relation of the legal drama but so setting that drama in the society of our times that the case should be clear for what it was, a minor episode in a world-wide conflict and a symbol to the nations of the narrowness and injustice that can prevail in what to the workers of the world was once the land of the free.

No one could have been better fitted than Eugene Lyons to retell the story. As a young newspaperman he was sent to Italy early in the case to examine witnesses for the defense and to meet the Sacco and Vanzetti families in Torremaggiore and Villa Falletto. With an artist's selection and compression he has indeed described the lives and deaths of the two men, their childhoods, their reasons for migration to the legendary America of food and freedom, the work they were able to do in the New England of today.

I find in this book, depicting two very simple and heroic human characters, something that no novel of the fall can offer me; and when it becomes necessary to tell of their slow dying against a background of international agitation and protest Mr. Lyons manages, somehow, to analyze the conflicts between liberal and radical opinion among the sympathizers in a style that is not exposition but is free and running narrative. Mr. Lyons never believed that the case was "a New England conspiracy." He does not write about it in that way. In one slim volume he has written another "American Tragedy," one which is now part of history and from which lessons can be drawn for history in the making. The book has already, fresh from the English presses, been translated into German, Spanish, Russian, and Italian. It has been seized upon for translation because it tells the story of immigrant adventure in the New World as Latin America, Italy, Russia, and Dawes-plan Germany recognizes that world. Gauguin's Letters to His Wife

La Vie sentimentale de Paul Gauguin. Par Jean Dorsenne. Paris: L'Artisan du Livre.

THERE are those admirers of Gauguin who in their naive enthusiasm would have us believe that the man woke one morning and found himself in the throes of an incurable passion to paint. Whereupon he betook himself to that mysterious island in the Pacific where, under perennially blue skies and freed from the vile necessity of having to provide for wife and children, he gave himself up entirely to his genius and his art. They would have us believe that inspiration came upon him suddenly, and that he followed the gospel exhortation with respect to home and kin in all its strict literalness. Nothing can be further from the truth.

In the first place, there is no doubt that from 1873, two years after Gauguin entered the employ of Bertin, brokers at Paris, to 1883, when he resigned, he served a serious apprenticeship as a painter, utilizing every spare moment in the study and perfection of his art. So that when at thirty-five he finally decided to devote himself entirely to painting he was thoroughly convinced of his capabilities and had no doubts about his future success. Indeed, one of the most remarkable things in the artist's life is that through all those harrowing years of want and distress that followed he never lost sight of the real value of his work, never doubted his genius. The desire to paint, then, did not come upon him suddenly; it grew up with him over a period of ten years in the noisy, stuffy atmosphere of the Bourse.

Secondly, contrary to the notion that Gauguin upon quitting Bertin never so much as gave a thought to his family, which would make of him either a man possessed of unusual powers of detachment or a downright scoundrel who abandoned wife and children for a Tahitian strumpet and "un batard café au lait," the intimate letters of Gauguin to his wife now show clearly with what profound and touching concern he followed the fate of his family from the time he was compelled to leave them at Copenhagen to the time of his death. The truth is that the hope of sometime rejoining his family and regaining his wife's esteem was the one thing, next to his art, to help him support all the mental and physical suffering that was his. He touches on it again and again in his letters.

It is the latter phase of this myth which romantic admirers are pleased to spin about the artist—his utter indifference to family ties—that the author undertakes to explode. The story of his development as an artist, which was, to be sure, a gradual process, he leaves out of consideration, touching here and there upon some aspect of it only in so far as it throws a strong light on his family life. For instance, he reserves a chapter on the notebook which Gauguin especially prepared for his daughter Aline but which, alas! the poor girl did not live long enough to see. (A beautiful limited edition of the original "cahier" has just been printed in Paris.) The book consists for the most part of excerpts from the painter's letters to his wife, but these are ordered and arranged with such fine psychological sympathy that one gets something like a complete picture of the truly human side of the artist in that long struggle against poverty and disease.

He takes her into his confidence about his art. He has no doubt about his future or his genius. "I am a great artist," he writes from Tahiti, "you are right. . . . It's because I know it that I have endured so much suffering in order to realize my end; if not, I would have considered myself a brigand—that which I am anyway for many people." Thus Gauguin continues to unburden himself to his wife until the last crushing blow reaches him—the news of the death of his favorite child, Aline. The bitterness it precipitates is too much for husband and wife to bear. His last letter was so hard and inhuman that she never replied. With this tragic rupture is severed the last tie that held Gauguin to Europe. MICHAEL FRAENKEL

A History of the Life and Death, Virtues and Exploits of General George Washington. By Mason Weems. An American Bookshelf. Macy-Masius. $2.50.

So here is the ever-living Parson Weems again. This time handsomely printed on smooth clear paper, and bound in a cloth cover spangled with golden stars on a blue background. There is an unquenchable vitality in his mess of legends and myths, and their appearance in this latest edition is another proof—if another were needed—of the sickly fragility of truth as compared with the obstinate perseverance of romantic falsehood. But, of course, no one takes Parson Weems seriously nowadays. This edition comes out, doubtless, as merely the reprint of a curious book which many people will want to add to their libraries. In it you will find the hatchet-and-cherry-tree story and other myths of the immortal George. Amusing and interesting, the book is; but, nevertheless, it is a rather depressing object to authors. Why? Because its literary history shows the futility of effort, truth, and research. Parson Weems was not even a passable writer. He was a preacher and a peddler, but his book still lives. On the other hand, Joel Barlow, who lived at the same time as Weems, was a writer of education and culture. He spent his life in writing; he tried to set down the truth as he saw it; he was a man of imagination and feeling—but who has ever heard of Barlow today, outside of a few professors of literature?

LITERARY BLASPHEMIES

The most modern and most brilliant of the younger critics sweeps the academic dust from Shakespeare, Milton, Whitman, Hardy, and others.

$3. HARPER & BROTHERS

from THE INNER SANCTUM of
SIMON and SCHUSTER
Publishers . 37 West 57th Street . New York

Now that the new Ford is out we can all get back to reading again, and usher in the American Renaissance on a gear-shift basis.

To forget its editorial labors, The Inner Sanctum finally took its plunge into New York night life and actually went to a show—which one, is our secret—only to discover most of the audience reading SIDNEY S. LENZ on Auction Bridge in the theatre programs—and MERRYLE S. RUKEYSER, another Inner Sanctum author, on how to invest their bridge winnings, according to the sage counsel given in his new book Financial Advice to A Young Man.

If you are tired of the "inside" shop-talk about best-sellers in the word business, we're afraid you'll have to be excused from this week's lesson . . . But, thus far, it has been our experience that the reading public can't get nearly enough of it.

For a change, we shall refrain from quoting our old beacon-light, the BAKER AND TAYLOR list. Once a month the book-sellers themselves prepare a list of their own by sending in their confidential and impartial reports to Publishers' Weekly. In the list just announced 107 booksellers in 94 cities, representing every nook of the Republic, list the following as the ten best-sellers in the field of general literature.

1. Trader Horn..... 541%
2. "W.
3. N
4. M
5. What Can A Man Believe..... 249%
6. The Story of Philosophy.....
7.
8.
9.
10.

As a matter of hysterical record, The Inner Sanctum also points out that the top title on the fiction list, Jalna, has a score of 102%.

Trader Horn, however, is not the best-seller in such cities as

Burlington, Vermont; Sioux Falls, South Dakota; Sheboygan, Wisconsin; Knoxville, Tennessee; Salt Lake City, Utah

WILL DURANT'S new mental autobiography, by the way, is making so much money for the booksellers that the Hearst Dispatch refers to it as Transaction.

omists and sociologists, on such topics as the farmer's standard of living, types of agricultural production affecting expenditure and culture, and the economic aspect of rural education. The articles range in type from statistical analysis to agrarian oratory, but very few are without at least suggestive value, and a number contribute significant data to current agricultural discussion. The format of the book, regrettably, is below the standard which one expects in the work of a university press.

Adam and Eve. By John Erskine. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.50.

Mr. Erskine continues his witty crusade against the American realistic novel. His latest effort indicates an observable sharpening of his conversational technique, but his stoical exclusion of eccentric characters such as the gatekeeper in "Helen," plus the almost complete avoidance of action in favor of dialogue, produce an occasional sense of devitalization. Mr. Erskine has lost none of his satiric edge and irritating reasonableness, but it is probable that the potentialities of his unique method of presentation are approaching exhaustion. It may be that a swift change to a modern background and the abandonment of a slightly schematized legendary material would lend new impetus to his art.

The Vanguard. By Arnold Bennett. George H. Doran Company. $2

Mr. Bennett trots out his usual impossible millionaire from the Five Towns to serve as the protagonist in a tosh-tosh piece of hammock fiction. Mr. Bennett is the man who once wrote a book called "The Old Wives' Tale."

NOTE. Wyndham Lewis's "Time and Western Man," reviewed by Mr. Krutch in the Holiday Book Number of The Nation, will be published here by Harcourt, Brace and Company in February.

Drama

Papa Shaw

FOR more than one reason I am loath to admit that "The Doctor's Dilemma" (Guild Theater) affords a pleasant but not an exciting evening. In the first place I approve heartily of the Guild's habit of producing each year one of its author's plays which most of us have had few opportunities to see upon the stage; and in the second place I am far from lacking in piety toward Papa Shaw, for I do not expect ever to forget the day when, as a freshman in college, with a hearty and tough-minded contempt for the Thomas Carlyle and the Matthew Arnold of English 1, I stumbled upon "Man and Superman." Since our study of literature began with the Victorians and proceeded from them slowly backward in the general direction of "Beowulf," it is not likely that I should ever have heard of Shaw from my mentors, and if Providence had not taken a hand I should probably have completed my education by painfully construing "Hwaet we gardena in geare-dagum—" and speculating as to the letters which are missing from the scorched edge of MS Cotton Vitellius A. 15.

But the hand of God led me to Shaw. When I came to the end of Act One in "Man and Superman" I closed the book for a moment to give thanks, but I did not pause again until I had read all the plays which its dazzling author had then written. It was not I think that Shaw was changing my ideas—one does not take so eagerly to a writer who is performing that painful process—but rather that he was confirming them. I was amazed to discover that any one allowed to get into print could say such mischievously pertinent things, and I longed to go forth and beat most of the people whom I knew over the head with his collected works. Since that day I have grown more tolerant of other generations, and though Carlyle still merely irritates me I can now even understand what Matthew Arnold is talking about. But there were many things that had to be got settled before I could take time to understand the thoughts of others, and Shaw said them for me. It was only from that day forward that I could take literature seriously or believe that an author was being candid with his reader.

Obviously, then, I am not lacking in piety toward the author of "The Doctor's Dilemma"; but neither my own piety nor the skill of the Guild company, long practiced in interpreting Shaw, can make it a very good play. Alfred Lunt plays the painter right up to the hilt; Lynn Fontanne as his wife gets all there is to be got out of a rather flimsy part; and Ernest Travers seems, as he always does, Shaw's middle-class Englishman come to life; but they cannot make the play either very rapid or very shocking. The satire on the doctor is reminiscent of every satirist who ever lived, and as to the thesis—that a talented rogue is more worth saving than an amiable mediocrity—one accepts it too really to become very much aroused. This painter would have to be very unpleasant indeed to constitute a real problem, and the difficulty is simply that Shaw is too much of a gentleman ever to make any of his scoundrels very convincing. The trick which he employed in "The Devil's Disciple" when he made his hero turn out to be a disciple of God after all is not really a trick but something which answers the needs of something fundamentally tender-minded in Shaw himself—to the same something which made him refuse to admit that Don Juan was a sensualist, which made him suddenly transform Mrs. George into a misunderstood woman, and which leads him to whitewash every villain. What, after all, is so appalling about the hero of "The Doctor's Dilemma"? He has not been brought up according to the gentleman's code, and being poor he borrows money whenever he gets a chance; but that is about all. When the time comes for his villainy to roar he roars you as gently as any sucking dove. He doesn't even frighten the ladies, and therefore there is no real dilemma. Perhaps English audiences felt in 1906 that a man might conceivably deserve the death penalty for not playing cricket according to the Eton rules, but a generation which has learned to stomach the hero of "The Moon and Sixpence" finds no cause for making a great pother about a man as fundamentally decent as Shaw's painter. It is willing to forgive genius a great deal more than he is guilty of, and when it considers how pure all the people in Shaw's plays are it is almost ready—this would be the most unkindest cut of all—to accuse him of respectably shrinking from what used to be called "the facts of life." If he should ever write a play about Sodom and Gomorrah he would probably tell us—as the old lady told the Sunday-school scholars—that the sin of the citizens of the cities of the plain was playing cards and sitting up late at night.

None of the other recent dramatic events call for much comment. "The Racket" (Ambassador Theater) is a good melodrama, somewhat confused by its references to Chicago politics; and in "The Marquise" (Biltmore Theater) Billie Burke, piping her childish treble, flutters her way through the three acts of Noel Coward's unsuccessful attempt to be delicately naughty. "Take the Air" (Waldorf Theater) is a tawdry, tasteless musical comedy in which Trini loses most of her flavor in the effort to conform to the American taste. I can, however, recommend the new edition of "Artists and Models" (Winter Garden). This has become a standardized product, but one is always sure of getting one's money's worth in expert dancing, lavish ensembles, and slightly off-color jokes. The new edition is even rather better than usual.

Correction: In a previous issue an unfortunate interchange of names was made. Constance Collier, not Margaret Anglin, is appearing in "John," and Miss Anglin is appearing in the "Electra" of Sophocles. JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Peace Out of Russia

THE Soviet Disarmament Proposals were offered on behalf of the USSR by M. Litvinov to the League of Nations Preparatory Disarmament Commission at Geneva on November 30. The text of the proposals and M. Litvinov's resolution, which we print by courtesy of the New York Herald Tribune, follow:

The Government of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics, having been unable to participate in three sessions of the Preparatory Commission for a disarmament conference, has intrusted its delegation to the fourth session of the Preparatory Commission with the task of making a declaration covering all questions connected with the problem of disarmament.

The Soviet Government adheres to the opinion it has always held, that under the capitalist system no grounds exist for counting upon the removal of the causes which give rise to armed conflicts. Militarism and big navies are essentially natural consequences of the capitalist system. By the very fact of their increase they intensify existing differences, giving a vast impetus to all potential quarrels and inevitably convert these into armed conflicts.

The peoples of all countries, however, enfeebled and impoverished by the imperialistic World War, are imbued with a determination to struggle against new imperialist wars and to guarantee peace between nations. This is precisely what makes it possible for the Soviet to accept the invitation of the League, the latter having expressed itself in favor of disarmament. In so doing the Soviet Government demonstrates before the whole world its will to peace between nations and makes clear to all the real aspirations and true desires of the capitalist states in regard to disarmament.

Despite the fact that the World War was called a "war to end war," the whole history of post-war international relations has been one of unintermittent and systematic increase of armed forces in the capitalist states and of a vast increase in the general burden of militarism. So far none of the solemn promises of the League has been even partially fulfilled, while in all of its activities in this regard the League has systematically evaded setting the question in a practical light.

All of the work done by the Preparatory Commission in this regard has been purely of a decorative nature. Indeed, the League only approached the question of general disarmament in 1924. It decided to call a conference on general disarmament on May 1, 1925, but to the present not only has the matter of disarmament not advanced a single step, but no date for a conference has even been fixed.

Likewise, the League has been fruitlessly engaged upon the question of the limitation of war budgets since 1920. Reluctance to put into practice the policy of disarmament, both on the part of the League and individual imperialist states, was manifested both in the methods adopted and the alternation of the questions of disarmament and general guaranties, while simultaneous attempts are made to sum up in detail all the factors determining the armed power of the various countries concerned.

Such a setting of the question, evoking endless and fruitless arguments on so-called military potentials, affords opportunity for an indefinite postponement of the fundamental and decisive question of the actual dimensions of disarmament. There can be no doubt that by setting the question thus at the coming disarmament conference not only will it be impossible to achieve a curtailment of existing armaments, but the states belonging to the League may even receive legal sanction for increasing armaments.

The Soviet has systematically endeavored to get the question of disarmament definitely and practically formulated. Its endeavors have, however, always encountered determined resistance from other states. The Soviet Government, the only one to show in deeds its will to peace and disarmament, was not admitted to the Washington Conference of 1921 and 1922, devoted to questions of the curtailment of marine armaments. The proposal for general disarmament made by the Soviet delegation at the Genoa Conference was rejected by the conference.

Despite this opposition, the Soviet never has relaxed its determined endeavors in regard to disarmament. In December, 1922, a conference was called at Moscow by the Soviet of representatives of the border states for a joint discussion of the problem of the proportional curtailment of armaments. The Soviet agreed to a considerable diminution of armaments, despite the fact that this would not affect many of the Great Powers, always ready, whether under obligation of treaties or not, to come to the assistance of the other countries represented at the Moscow conference should these be involved in conflicts with the Soviet.

A definite and thorough scheme for a diminution of armaments was proposed at that conference by the Soviet. This was, however, rejected. Despite the skeptical attitude of the Soviet toward the labors of the League, it accepted the invitation of December 12, 1925, to attend the coming disarmament conference and only the Soviet-Swiss conflict evoked by the assassination of Vorowsky and the subsequent acquittal of the assassin by a Swiss court has prevented the Soviet from attending the previous sessions of the Preparatory Commission.

In now sending a delegation to the fourth session of the Preparatory Commission the Government has authorized it to present a scheme for general and complete disarmament. The Soviet delegation is authorized by its Government to propose the complete abolition of all land, marine, and air forces.

The Soviet Government suggests the following measures for the realization of this proposal:

A. The dissolution of all land, sea, and air forces and the non-admittance of their existence in any concealed form whatsoever;

B. The destruction of all weapons, military supplies, means of chemical warfare, and all other forms of armament and means of destruction in possession of troops or military or general stores;

C. The scrapping of all warships and military air vessels;

D. The discontinuance of calling citizens for military training, either in armies or public bodies;

E. Legislation for the abolition of military service, either compulsory, voluntary, or recruited;

F. Legislation prohibiting the calling up of trained reserves;

G. The destruction of fortresses and naval and air bases;

H. The scrapping of military plants, factories, and war industry plants in the general industrial world;

I. The discontinuance of assigning funds for military purposes, both state budgets and those of public bodies;

[No "J" is indicated];

K. The abolition of military, naval, and air ministries, the dissolution of general staffs and all kinds of military administrations, departments, and institutions;

L. The legislative prohibition of military propaganda, the military training of populations, and military education both by state and public bodies;

M. The legislative prohibition of patenting of all kinds of armaments and means of destruction with a view to the removal of the incentive to the invention of the same;

N. Legislation making the infringement of any of the above stipulations a grave crime against the state;

O. The withdrawal or corresponding alteration of all legislative acts, both of a national and an international scope, infringing the above stipulations.

The Soviet delegation is empowered to propose the fulfilment of the above program of complete disarmament as soon as the respective convention comes into force in order that all necessary measures for the destruction of military stores may be completed in a year's time. The Soviet Government considers that the above scheme for the execution of complete disarmament is the simplest and the best conducive to peace.

In the case of capitalist states rejecting the immediate abolition of standing armies the Soviet, in its desire to facilitate the achievement of a practical agreement, proposes a program of complete disarmament to be carried out simultaneously by all the contracting states by gradual stages during a period of four years, the first stage to be accomplished in the course of the coming year.

Under this proposal national funds freed from war budgets are to be employed in each state at its own discretion, but exclusively for productive and cultural purposes. While insisting upon the views just stated, the delegation is nevertheless ready to participate in any and every discussion of the question of the limitation of armaments whenever practical measures really leading to disarmament are proposed.

The delegation declares that the Soviet Government fully subscribes to the convention on the prohibition of the application to military purposes of chemical and bacteriological substances and processes and expresses its readiness to sign the convention immediately.

While insisting on an early date being fixed for ratification by all states, it considers that, in order to insure the practicability of the convention, it is necessary to raise the question of the establishment of control by the workers in those chemical industries capable of being rapidly converted to war purposes in states which have a highly developed chemical industry.

M. Litvinov then offered the following resolution:

WHEREAS, The existence of armaments and their tendency to growth by their very nature inevitably lead to armed conflicts between nations, diverting workers and peasants from peaceful and productive labor and bringing in their train countless disasters, and

WHEREAS, Armed force is a weapon in the hands of the Great Powers for the oppression of peoples of small and colonial countries, and

WHEREAS, Complete abolition of armaments is at present the only real means of guaranteeing security and affording a guaranty against the outbreak of war, this fourth session of the Preparatory Commission for Disarmament resolves:

1. To proceed immediately to the working out in detail of a draft convention for complete general disarmament on the principles proposed by the Soviet Union delegation, and

2. Proposes the convocation not later than March, 1928, of a Disarmament Conference for the discussion and confirmation of the terms provided in Clause 1.

A BILLION DOLLARS for the navy—that is Economy Calvin's opening demand of the new Congress. Four new battleships, at $60,000,000; 26 cruisers of the 10,000-ton type, at $15,000,000 each; 3 airplane carriers, 5 fleet submarines, and 18 destroyer leaders—this is the Administration's five-year program. It is larger than the 1916 naval program—the largest in United States history. A billion dollars is a round figure; higher prices are likely to make the cost still greater. And this in the year of peace 1927, six years after the Washington Disarmament Conference, two years after Mr. Coolidge's Omaha speech declaring that "it is our purpose in our intercourse with foreign Powers to rely not upon the strength of our fleets and our armies," one year after we sent our representatives to Geneva to persuade Europe to disarm. Certainly nothing could be wilder, stupider, better calculated to persuade the world that the United States is headed for a rampage, and to stimulate the atmosphere of fear and suspicion that makes for war. We do not believe the American people have any desire for such a program of militaristic expansion, and we call upon them—individuals, women's clubs and men's clubs, churches, civic organizations—to overwhelm their representatives in Washington with an avalanche of protest.

BRAVE MEN AND WOMEN are the 128,770 British subjects who have signed Arthur Ponsonby's "peace letter," declaring that

> We, the undersigned, convinced that disputes between nations are capable of settlement either by diplomatic negotiations or some other form of international arbitrage, hereby solemnly declare that we will refuse to support or render war service to any government which resorts to arms.

Doubtless the signers will be denounced as traitors for resolving that they will act on Benjamin Franklin's discovery that "there never was a good war or a bad peace." But they are ambassadors of the future; and a future perhaps not so remote as we tend to believe. It may not be many decades before war will seem to all as silly a fashion of settling international disputes as the medieval system of testing a witness's honesty by asking him to walk through fire. Then the conscientious objectors will be as respected and forgotten as the early Christian martyrs are today.

DWIGHT MORROW'S HAM-AND-EGG DIPLOMACY must be startling to some of the brethren in official circles, but it seems to work. This product of J. P. Morgan and Company began his post-graduate course in international relations by warning the American expatriates in Mexico City that they were guests of Mexico; he continued by traveling with the President of Mexico and sharing with him the most widely advertised ham-and-egg breakfast in history. His next adventure in friendship was to invite the inimitable Will Rogers to fool his way south of the border; and now he has persuaded Lindbergh to undertake a good-will flight across the arid mountains where Pershing once sought Villa—a new kind of Mexican expedition for a colonel of the United States army. Mr. Morrow seems to be in a fair way to make the United States popular in Mexico and Mexico popular in the United States—a work of genius after a decade of blundering. If he concludes by persuading American firms to accept Mexican laws, and Mexican officials to trust American business men, he may start a movement to reform the State Department by turning it over to the bankers. Unfortunately, we fear, Dwight Morrows are as rare in Wall Street as in the diplomatic service.

GOVERNOR FULLER of Massachusetts has just returned from a little trip to Europe and Paris where, he said, he found no evidence of dissatisfaction with American justice over the execution of Sacco and Vanzetti. Whether or not this was due to the fact that Mr. Fuller traveled under the name of Peter Bond we do not say, but the fact stamps him as a coward of a kind new in our political life. If he escaped from the Sacco and Vanzetti case while he was abroad, it met him almost at the dock on his return in the form of the annual report of the Massachusetts Judicial Council, filed for the Governor's inspection. In the report the council recommends no less soul-shaking a change than a revision of the Massachusetts appeal system to make it correspond with the methods of appeals in New York State. Thus, if the recommendations are followed the Massachusetts Supreme Court will in due time have the power of reviewing in full the acts of a trial judge, including decisions on motions for a new trial on the ground of insufficient or newly discovered evidence. Thus, in short, a repetition of the Sacco-Vanzetti tragedy need never happen. This, of course, is locking the stable door after the horse has been stolen. Massachusetts justice can never catch up with Sacco and Vanzetti; but those well-wishers of the world, now dead, would be the first to welcome any change that might be of benefit to the people of Massachusetts.

OKLAHOMA IS INDULGING in another of her periodic civil wars. Her temperamental governor, H. S. Johnston [see Mr. Blake's Oklahoma Goes Rosicrucian in The Nation for September 14], refused to call the legislature into special session in order that it might impeach him, and a majority of the legislature decided that it had an inherent right to convene, and met. Its deliberations were, as was expected, displeasing to the Governor, and he called out the National Guard to keep it out of the State Capitol. Inevitably this little war is obscuring the issues which began the conflict—Governor Johnston's personal government through his transcendental, star-reading secretary, and the curious legal tangle of the Owens case. O. O. Owens, a member of the legislature, criticized the Supreme Court of the State in an oil case in which he was the defendant. The judges brought personal damage suits against him and he was sentenced to serve a year in jail—although under Oklahoma law contempt is a misdemeanor carrying a maximum penalty of thirty days. Owens applied to the Criminal Court of Appeals for a writ of habeas corpus, and it issued one, but the Supreme Court hastily got out a writ of prohibition against the Criminal Court and cited one of its judges for contempt. The sheriff, served with conflicting papers from the two courts, refused to release Owens. The Governor sided with the State Supreme Court, but the federal Circuit Court of Appeals took jurisdiction and upheld the Criminal Court. The next act of this curious Supreme Court was to declare in an obiter dictum that the legislature was without inherent or implied power to convene upon its own motion. All of which leads one to conclude that the gloomy gentlemen who have pronounced funeral orations over "the last frontier" should buy tickets for Oklahoma City.

ONE OF THE MOMENTOUS DECISIONS of 1927 is the unanimous verdict of a special court of three federal judges in the St. Louis and O'Fallon Railroad case, upholding in effect the Interstate Commerce Commission's valuation of the railroad on the basis of 1914 prices. Although this particular case involves only $226,880, it has been called "the biggest lawsuit in history" because it is regarded as a test to determine whether the final valuation of the nation's railroads will be what the railroads want it to be—about $33,000,000,000—or the $23,000,000,000 set by the Interstate Commerce Commission—and accordingly what amount of excess earnings (one half of earnings above 6 per cent) the Government may recapture. The suit arises because of the ambiguous phrasing of the Railway Valuation Act of 1913. This instructed the commission to find the value of the railroads but did not define "value" or designate any means of determining it. Subsequently the commission put a constructive interpretation upon this instruction and based its calculation on a prudent-investment theory embodying the level of 1914 prices as a yardstick. The railroads have contended that their valuation should be based upon the cost of reproduction today which would give them approximately $10,000,000,000 above the commission's figure and enable them to collect at least $500,000,000 additional annual revenue. While the controlling opinion, written by Circuit Judge Kimbrough Stone, does not discuss the methods of valuation, District Judge C. B. Faris, in a concurring opinion, approved the valuation methods of the commission, stating that "it reached the valuation found by it in the only possible way in a situation as difficult as that." The case will be appealed to the Supreme Court, but the unanimous verdict of the lower court is impressive.

POLAND AND LITHUANIA, in the persons of their premiers, Pilsudski and Waldemaras, jointly declared before the Council of the League of Nations that they both wanted peace, and the declaration was hailed with a curious outburst of applause as a great moral victory for the League of Nations. The trouble is that they both also want Vilna; and Vilna, as Miss Spence's record, printed in our International Relations Section this week, shows, is the cause of all the talk of war. It is because Poland has Vilna, Lithuania's capital, that the technical state of war has persisted these seven years, and Pilsudski's histrionic triumph in demanding of Waldemaras whether he wanted peace or war does not change the Polish administration of the city or the Lithuanian desire for it. Little Lithuania of course cannot fight against overgrown Poland; the threat of open war has come from Poland's ambition to annex even more than Vilna, just as the technical state of war has persisted because of the Polish grab in 1920. It is a crime to legalize such outright acts of theft; and a double crime to conceal the continuing wrong done to Lithuania by loudly shouting "Peace!" The Vilna question will not be settled until it is settled right.

THE NEW YORK TIMES did a handsome thing when it printed on its first page a dispatch, headed Revolt in Ukraine Was Exaggerated, correcting the sensational but false story to which we referred last week. The Times correspondent in Rumania, Navarre Atkinson, still thinks that he and the Rumanians know more of what is happening in the Ukraine than do Associated Press and other correspondents who have the advantage of being in the Ukraine, but he modifies his early vaporings, and the Times honorably gives his retraction a prominent position.

UNCLE SAM IS ONE of the world's great publishers, and among his best humorous periodicals is the weekly, Reports, issued by the United States Board of Tax Appeals. Its news is belated, but pungent. We learn how Mr. Albert M. Briggs, the patriotic father of the American Protective League, pleaded with the Government—in vain—to deduct from his taxable income the money he spent organizing "captains" and "inspectors" and "chiefs" and other titled snoopers who worked out their war-time fervor in harassing Hungarian steel-workers and German-born watch-makers. We learn, too, of the ingenuity of the munitions-makers who did their bit turning out artillery on cost-plus contracts—Symington, Anderson and Company, for instance, who contracted to turn out 3,000 guns, at a meager profit of $390 per gun. This corporation, founded for the express purpose of fulfilling a single contract—by the terms of which the Government paid for its building and machinery—sought to charge off the "loss" it suffered when the end of the war cut short its opportunity to make the profitable guns. "None of the assets paid into the corporation, for stock or otherwise, cost Symington anything," the unsympathetic tax board pointed out, and it refused to admit that the firm had lost a million dollars which it had never had. The patriots behind the company felt that the artistry of obtaining their contract had a cash "good-will" value—but what has good-will to do with the manufacture of munitions? We recommend the Report to students of the psychology of patriotism, and to readers who want a change from Life and Judge.

THE NOBEL COMMITTEE did well not to give its Peace Prize to any of the temporizing statesmen who explain the impracticability of disarmament at Geneva. They voted it instead to two university professors, veterans of the world-peace movement—Ludwig Quidde of Germany and Ferdinand Buisson of France. Quidde is sixty-nine years old; Buisson eighty-seven. Quidde drew public attention by his "Caligula, a Study in Caesarean Insanity," which sent him to prison for lese majeste soon after the Kaiser mounted the throne; Buisson won his first oratorical success at a peace congress in 1867, where Garibaldi shared the laurels. Throughout the war and since he has been the leading figure in the League for the Rights of Man, which from Dreyfus days has represented in France the spirit of true liberalism—somewhat like the American Civil Liberties Union in the United States. His was one of the first voices raised in France for reconciliation after the war, and Quidde, as historian, editor, member of the Reichstag, and determined democrat, has been in hot water constantly for more than thirty years—during the war he was arrested. Already the Hugenberg press—which expresses in Germany today the intolerant nationalism with which Northcliffe once polluted England—is honoring him with denunciation.

SEVENTY-FIVE YEARS of service with one organization is an amazing record for two generations, but for that long the Charles Loring Braces, father and son, have administered the Children's Aid Society of New York. This organization, founded by the elder Brace in 1853, was based on the then entirely fresh and surprising idea that institutional care was less desirable for the great majority of dependent children than rearing in private homes. He succeeded in placing thousands of children in homes on farms or in villages away from the city streets and safe from the regimentation of the orphan asylum. For many years a controversy between the Children's Aid Society and the advocates of orphan asylums must have made Mr. Brace's life trying. After thirty-seven and a half years of unremitting labor, not lightened by controversy, Mr. Brace turned over the work to his son, then a young engineer fresh from the university. And after the same length of time, that same son has relinquished the secretaryship of the organization to Owen Lovejoy. The Nation can heartily second the words of the society's president, William Church Osborn, who said:

> I cannot overestimate the great work which Mr. Brace has done for the children of New York. His distinguishing characteristic has been his constant recognition of the interest of each child as a separate person. . . . I feel, however, that with the selection of Mr. Lovejoy the devoted spirit of the Children's Aid Society will be continued and its work will expand with the needs of the children of the city.

The Language of the President

HERALDED to the Cyrus K. Curtis newspapers as being "the most vigorous and dynamic message that he has issued to the Capitol in the four years and four months that he has been in the White House," the President's message to Congress appears to us lame and weak, with as little evidence of courageous leadership as usual. It is to the New York Herald Tribune a document rounding out "with exceptional vigor and felicity his political program," expressing "appealingly his political philosophy." If that is the case, then Mr. Coolidge's political philosophy must be to face no issue until compelled to do so, to content himself with stating problems without seeking to solve them by more than temporizing measures. Only when he touches on the question of tax reduction does he hit from the shoulder. Evidently the Chamber of Commerce of the United States has touched him and Secretary Mellon upon the raw. For the first time in his Administration, to our recollection, he assails an organization of business men. Here is his rebuke:

> If special interests, too often selfish, always uninformed of the national needs as a whole, with hired agents using their proposed beneficiaries as engines of propaganda, are permitted to influence the withdrawal of their property from taxation, we shall have a law that is unbalanced and unjust, bad for business, bad for the country, probably resulting in a deficit, with disastrous financial consequences.

This is the solemn truth. What a pity it is that the President cannot see that it applies to other special-interest groups, most strikingly to those manufacturers who rush to the Treasury to obtain special tariff legislation as a sort of government guaranty of their profits.

To the tariff Mr. Coolidge continues his unshakable devotion. Yet, curiously enough, he goes out of his way to prove that 65 per cent of our imports come in free and that, of the remaining 35 per cent, 23 per cent are luxuries and only 12 per cent are goods which can be classified as "manufactures and merchandise." This produces about $560,000,000 in income. Thereupon he makes this cryptic remark—with that "exceptional vigor and felicity" of which the Herald Tribune speaks—"While this amount duty-free would be large enough seriously to depress many lines of business in our own country, it is of small importance when spread over the rest of the world." We confess that this is beyond us; we do not know what the President means.

The President declares against naval competition, yet announces that "we should refrain from no needful program." He declares one moment that "we know now that no agreement can be reached [with other nations] which will be inconsistent with a considerable building program on our part," and the next moment, speaking of treaty limitations, declares that where there are none, "the size of the navy which America is to have will be solely for America to determine"—as if this had not always been the case. Then he declares that if we had come to an agreement with Japan and Great Britain we should still have found ourselves facing "the necessity of continuing our building program." So we are not to compete in armaments, but we are to show to all other nations that we shall do what we please without foreign dictation, and we shall promptly build a large number of ships, which we should have built anyway if the Geneva Conference had been successful. This is, indeed, "exceptional felicity" of statement.

As for the vital question of agriculture, the President suggests the establishment of a government board to lend money from a revolving fund to aid cooperative marketing. Beyond this, he opines that "any sound and workable proposal to help the farmer will have the earnest support of the government." In other words, in place of bread the farmer again gets a stone. As the New York World says, the message "is vague to the point of sheer unintelligibility on practically every contentious issue about which Mr. Coolidge knows that action of some kind is necessary."

The whole document confirms us in our belief that one of the President's great weaknesses is his inability to use the English language properly. There are passages in it which for confusion of thought, lack of clarity, and misuse of words would shame a high-school boy. Were Mr. Coolidge able to use clear and concise English he could surely have made a far better case for himself and his philosophy, such as it is. The clearest example of the injustice the President does himself by his misuse of words remains, of course, his "I do not choose to run for the Presidency." At any time he could have clarified this. It is his own fault if people have believed that he did not mean to withdraw and have credited him with duplicity. The Society for the Prevention of Waste in Industry—if there is one—ought carefully to compute the saving in ink, paper, and brain labor there would have been had Mr. Coolidge used the words in which Charles E. Hughes has just reaffirmed his refusal to run: "I do not wish my name to be used in any contingency. . . . I would neither seek nor accept the nomination."

Governor Smith—Penologist

GREAT fluttering and raucous cries from the nests of the eagles of the daily press—Governor Smith has laid impious hands on the sacred robe of Justice! He has had the temerity to suggest that there might be a better way of determining the penalty to be imposed on a convicted felon than to leave it to the puzzled discretion, the whim, or the caprice of the trial judge. He proposes that the State Crime Commission should take a year to study the question, and he wonders if it would not be better to confine the court to its primary function of trying the question of the guilt or innocence of the accused and to set up a separate tribunal, a board composed of well-paid experts—psychiatrists, physicians, lawyers, etc.—to make a careful study of the convicted offender and, upon the basis of the knowledge gained, to determine what should be done with him. In order that this study may be made with the requisite thoroughness, the Governor suggests the establishment of a clearing-house to which the convict shall in the first instance be committed and where he shall be kept under close observation until all the facts relative to his mental condition and his criminal propensities have been established. Upon this diagnosis the board will then commit him to the type of institution and for such length of time as the public interest shall seem to require.

"Fantastic," "futuristic," "revolutionary" are some of the terms employed by the startled editors to characterize the Governor's bold conception. One editor describes it as a proposal to "turn our criminal administration upside down"; another begs to remind us that "Albany is not the capital of Utopia." These critics were probably unaware that Governor Smith's proposal is in line with the main current of criminological thought ever since Beccaria, 164 years ago, demanded that the judges should be deprived of the arbitrary power of determining the kind and amount of suffering that should be inflicted on the convicted felon. Let us hope that, in the course of the year that Governor Smith has wisely allowed for the study of the question, these leaders of public opinion will have led the public to agree with the Governor's view that his plan provides "a sensible, modern, up-to-date way of treating criminals."

The proposed plan is neither novel nor revolutionary. "It would deprive judges of the power to sentence persons convicted of felonies," exclaims the horrified editor of the Times. This sounds pretty awful until we recall how little is left of this venerated judicial power. Our legislatures are forever curbing it by prescribing and changing maximum and minimum sentences below and beyond which the judges are forbidden to go. Much of the legislative activity of the last two years in this country has gone into the enactment of mandatory penal statutes whose sole object has been to restrict still further the sacred prerogative of the courts in sentencing persons convicted of felony.

It is in connection with the indeterminate sentence (and in some of our States all sentences to State prison are indeterminate) that we have become familiar with the practice of having a non-judicial body—usually the prison board; sometimes, as in New York, a board of parole—invested with the function of determining the actual duration of the sentence. In several of the Western States, notably in California, the court has practically ceased to function as a sentencing agency. The legislature fixes the maximum and the minimum limits of the sentence to be served for a given crime. The jury finds the culprit guilty of that crime, the judge commits the convict to prison, and the prison board, after a study of the prisoner, determines the sentence to be served. This has now been going on for many years, and the skies of California still bend lovingly over her amiable sons and daughters and her temples of justice still stand.

Now, what Governor Smith proposes is, in effect, to provide a thoroughly competent study of every person committed to a State prison before a decision is reached as to the disposition to be made of him. The survey of prison inmates made by the Sing Sing psychiatric clinic in the years 1916-1918 disclosed the appalling fact that, mingled indiscriminately in the prison population of, say, 1,500 men, there were not less than 180 who were definitely insane, 260 irresponsible psychopaths, and more than 400 feeble-minded. The courts had neither the specialized knowledge nor the facilities to ascertain these facts. These wretched creatures were all thrown promiscuously into the same human ant-heap together with some 700 men of normal mental faculties. Is it too much to say that under any decent, not to say humane, system of criminal administration, these unhappy and incongruous elements of the prison population would be weeded out and committed to institutions adapted to their care and treatment? (The splendid hospital erected a few years ago at Sing Sing Prison was built as the first step in the development of such a clearing-house as Governor Smith suggests.) Perhaps before our year of grace is up we shall all give thanks to a just but merciful God for a Governor who refuses to tolerate the chaos in criminal administration which we have so shamefully endured.

The Forgery as to The Nation

ON the cover of this issue of The Nation we print in facsimile a document submitted on November 10 to the editor of this journal by a representative of William R. Hearst. On its face it purports to be a warrant, signed by President Calles, for the payment to the editor of $25,000 from the secret expenditure fund of the Department of Industry, Commerce, and Labor "for subscriptions and propaganda in favor of the Government of Mexico." Mr. Hearst's representative was informed at once that no moneys had ever been paid to The Nation or to its editor by the Government of Mexico, or any citizen of Mexico, for subscriptions or propaganda, except for legitimate advertising so marked, and that he would immediately take legal steps if the Hearst publications printed this document. Later in the day the representative of Mr. Hearst telephoned that "no publication will be made." None the less, on the second of December, the New York American resorted to the cowardly subterfuge of printing the warrant with the name of the editor and that of this journal blocked out. Two other letters were printed in facsimile purporting to show that one other American publication received $25,000, and that $50,000 was paid to an American newspaper syndicate—with the names blotted out in each case—for the same purpose of creating "sentiment in the United States favorable to Mexico." Why did Mr. Hearst delete the names of the two publications and of the newspaper syndicate? If the documents were genuine, he need not have feared to publish them in full. Plainly, Mr. Hearst did not believe in his own evidence.

Mr. Hearst did not stop there. He next charged that he had documents proving that $1,215,000 was paid to four United States Senators to work for the interests of Mexico, and he again showed his contemptible cowardice in deleting the names of the four Senators. This had immediate consequences. On Friday, December 9, the Senate, on motion of Senator Reed of Pennsylvania, voted an inquiry into the charges, to begin December 14, Senator Reed correctly stating that as long as the charges were unsifted "the honor of every member of this body is at stake." Besides Senator Reed, the committee comprises Senators Jones of Washington, Johnson of California, Robinson of Arkansas, and Bruce of Maryland. Already the question has arisen whether the committee can subpoena the Mexican Consul General and fiscal agent in New York or whether that official may claim diplomatic immunity. Mr. Elias, the Mexican Consul General, has declared that he will not stand upon a technicality, but will come forward to cooperate with the committee to sift this matter to the very bottom. And we trust that the Senate will not limit its inquiry to the charges in regard to its own members but will investigate the allegations as to the press and to all other individuals. Honor is as dear to editors as it is to Senators.

To the Citizen Secretary of the Treasury

Translation of the Facsimile Document Appearing on the Cover

We are aware, of course, that the Senators look upon the entire series as impudent but unskilled forgeries and that they joked about them, Senator Borah inquiring where the money was that he should have received as chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. It is pointed out that the Spanish of the documents is faulty, that the Hearst forces changed the date of one dispatch three times in three consecutive editions, and that no officials of any government which disburses secret funds for corrupt purposes are so stupid as to commit anything to paper. Some of the allegations, that Calles was contributing large sums to revolutionists in China and strikers in England to "bolshevize" political and economic movements in those countries, are too absurd to arouse even a smile. Since there is, however, the possibility that the publication of these documents is likely among the unthinking to arouse antagonism to Mexico, their falsity ought to be exposed, and the suggestion that they have been used to filch sums from the Mexican treasury, adjudicated.

The Nation's reputation of sixty-two years' standing, and that of its editor during his thirty-one years of journalism, surely make unnecessary any formal denial of the charge. Everybody knows that its opinions are not for sale and that its ardent support of smaller nations seeking to achieve economic and national independence is always freely forthcoming. The facts are set forth here for purposes of historical record. As insistently as the Senators whom Mr. Hearst has clouded with suspicion, we demand—and in this the American press will join us—that Mr. Hearst print the names and tell the facts—where he got his documents and what members of his staff believed them authentic.

Hoover to the Fore

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Washington, December 11

MR. HOOVER has been elected President of the United States during the last few days by various of the Washington correspondents who write with much prestige upon national affairs. The withdrawal of Mr. Coolidge and Mr. Hughes has so impressed them, and their personal fondness for Mr. Hoover is so great, that they see nothing to the Presidential contest now except the nomination of Hoover nd Smith, with Hoover winning in an easy canter. It is even being said that Hoover can defeat Smith in New York.

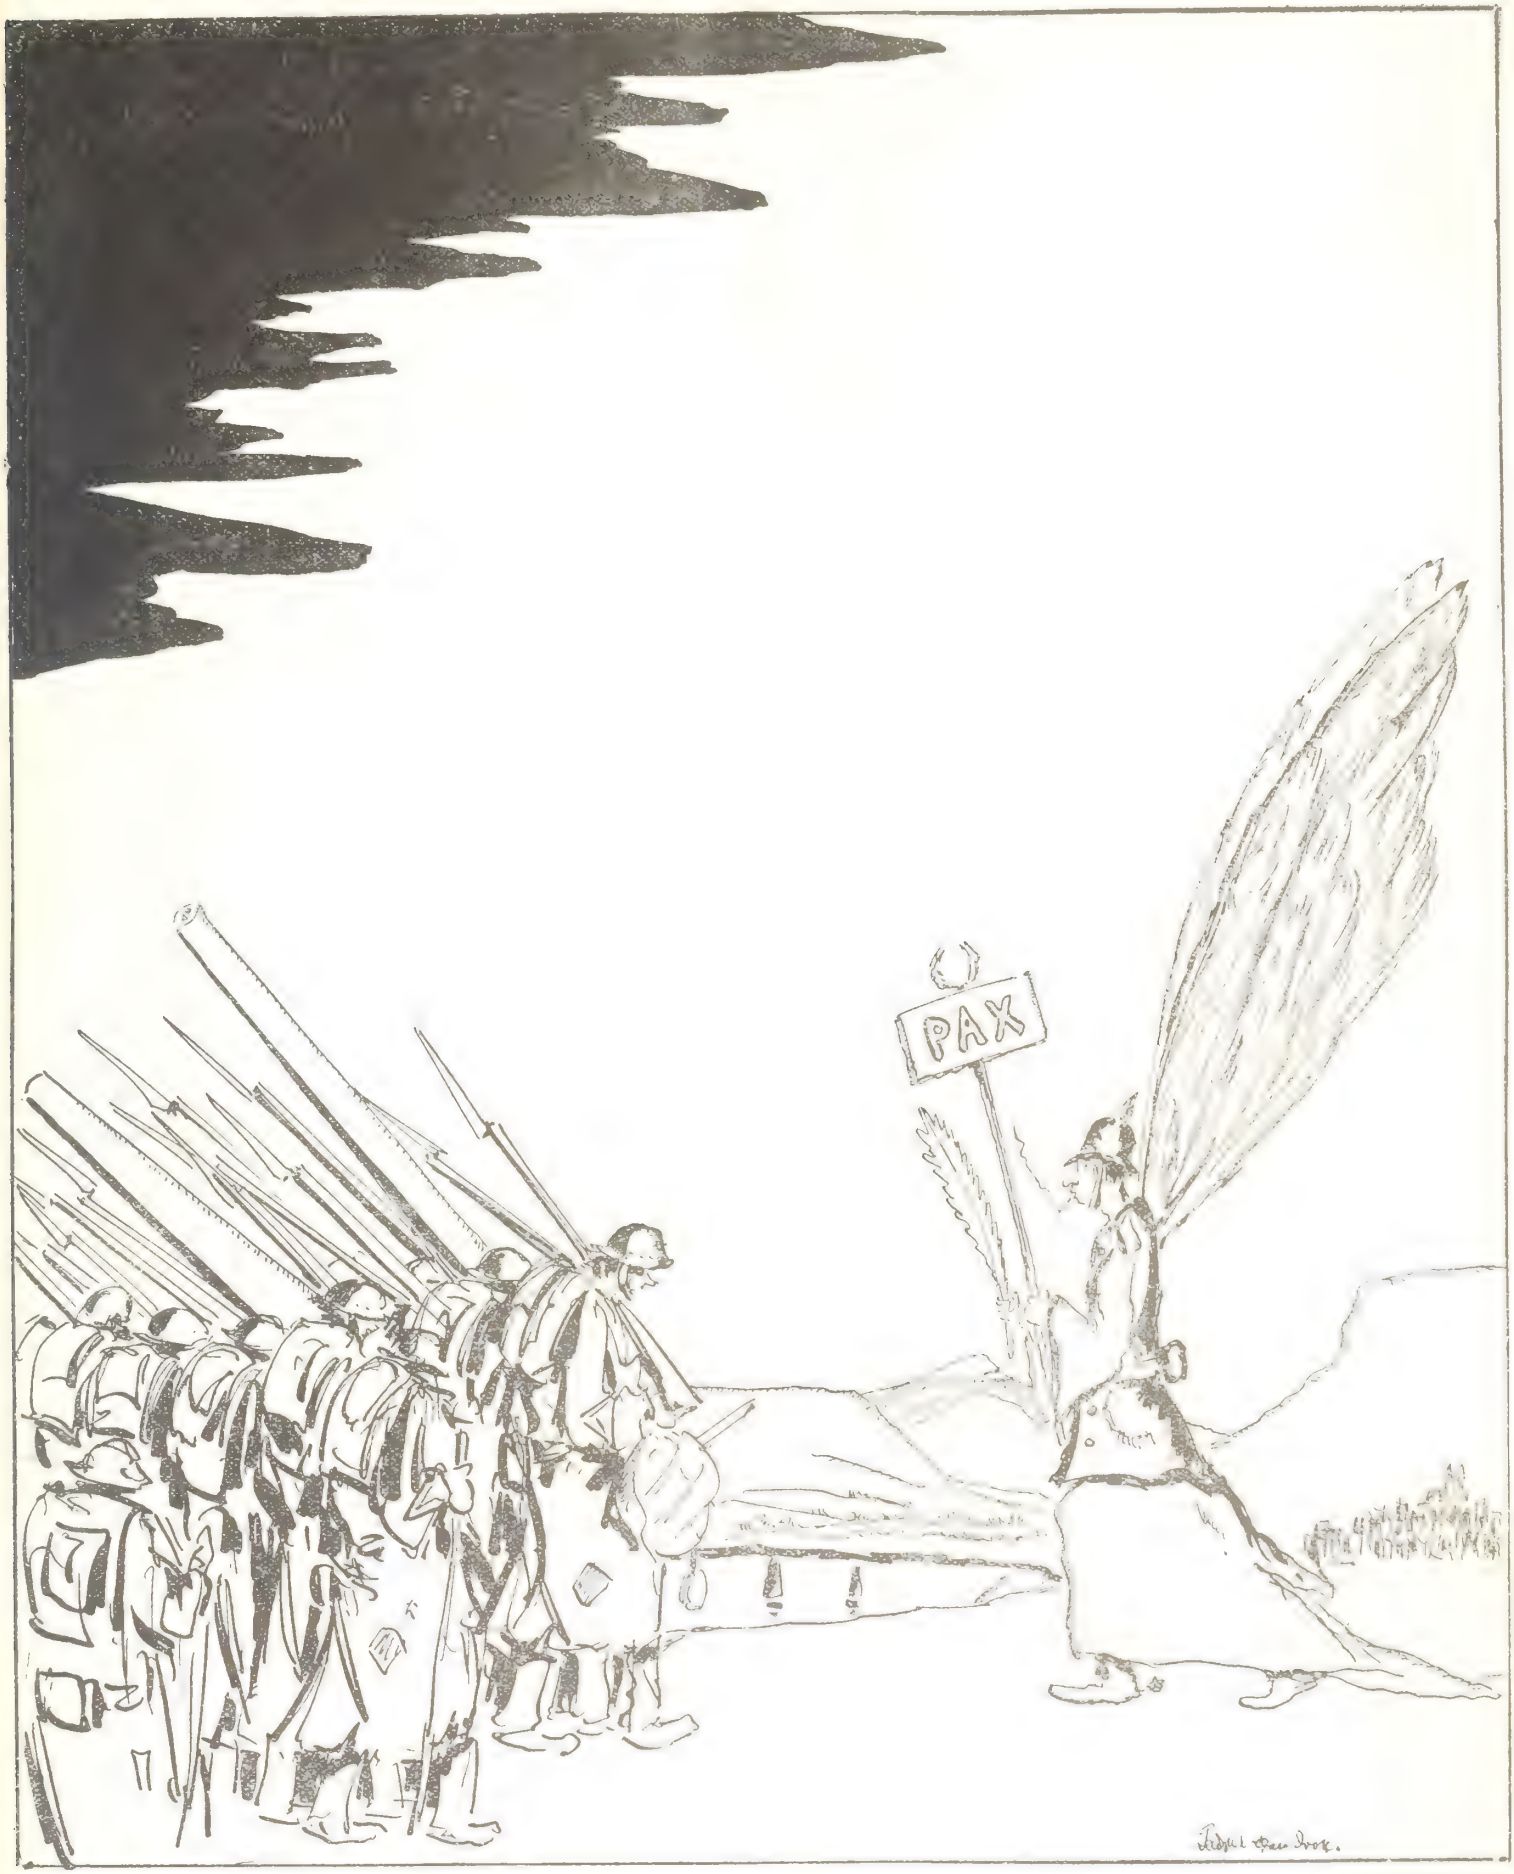
Well, this is a bit astonishing since those who concede Hoover's nomination are veterans in the reporting of politics and as such must know that any candidate who is in the lead at this early date invites the united opposition of the field. It is true that sometimes in a horse race the leader is so far ahead that there is no overtaking him, but it is a long way from December to June, and not even the fact that the National Committeemen for Texas and Maryland have apparently come out for Hoover insures his nomination. A good deal is going to happen in the next six months, and there will be a greater chance for plain speaking and a fight on the floor of the convention than there has been for years. There is Senator Borah, for instance. He is a figure to be reckoned with, and he is going into that convention to make the fight of his life, both in the Resolutions Committee and on the floor of the convention for the purpose of making the party toe the mark on the prohibition issue. That fight will bear considerable relation to the Presidential nomination.

Again, even these veteran correspondents who have decided that Hoover is the man will not deny that the outgoing President is in the position to prevent the nomination of anyone he does not like, and the correspondents generally are saying that it is Secretary Mellon who will name the candidate. It is perfectly clear, too, that the Administration and Mr. Mellon are not sitting up nights cheering for the present Vice-President of the United States, and arranging to have the black Southern delegations voted for him. There is, however, no clear proof that the President and Mr. Mellon have committed themselves to the Hoover candidacy. Should they do so the Hoover cohorts might well throw their hats into the air. It would all be over except the shouting.

But the relationship of the President to Secretary Hoover is one of the puzzles of Washington. It is known that he has constantly sent for him, and it is positively stated that he has unloaded on Mr. Hoover's shoulders many things which a President ordinarily takes charge of himself. This may be the reason why it is reported that various members of the Cabinet have at times gone to the President and protested that Mr. Hoover was butting into their affairs. But while it is true that the President has repeatedly intrusted matters of great moment, like the supervision of the Mississippi Valley flood relief, to Mr. Hoover he has also on several occasions shown what amounts to animosity to his Secretary of Commerce, or at least he has shown marked personal feeling. Three of these instances readily suggest themselves. On July 20 Secretary Hoover appeared at the President's offices at Rapid City, South Dakota, to report to him as to the relief work for flood sufferers. Mr. Coolidge treated him with such marked coldness that it was the subject of dispatches. Last winter when the question came up of a possible successor to Secretary Kellogg, Mr. Coolidge went out of his way, again with considerable show of feeling, to tell the correspondents that one man would never be appointed Secretary of State by him and that man was Herbert Hoover. Again, when Mr. Hoover made an admirable statement that in his opinion loans should not be made to foreign countries for other than economic purposes, thereby slapping at the Department of State and the President for the then recent loan to the Nicaraguan Government for the purpose of buying American arms and ammunition, the President took occasion within a few days to disagree emphatically.

Secretary Hoover may be the nominee, but there will be a hard fight against him. The question of his eligibility under the constitutional clause requiring fourteen years of consecutive residence will be brought up against him, and so will the fact that in 1918 he called upon Americans to vote for Democratic candidates for Congress and to defeat the Republican Party. In 1920 he was for taking us into the League of Nations lock, stock, and barrel, and he upheld the World Court most enthusiastically. A veteran Senator has just said to me that if Hoover can qualify to run on a Republican platform he will have to eat more of his own words than any man in generations who has been a candidate. His friends tell me that Hoover is quite a reformed character, that he is no longer for the League, and that he has seen the light in the matter of the World Court. Cannot a man in public life change his opinions? they ask. Of course he can and does, precisely as Theodore Roosevelt and Woodrow Wilson changed their respective views on woman suffrage, the initiative, the referendum, the recall of judges, William J. Bryan and a cocked hat, and innumerable questions. But the fact that a man can change so readily, that in 1918 he can be a good Democrat opposed to all the Republican policies and in 1920 refused to say whether he was a Democrat or a Republican until he found out which party was more likely to nominate him for the Presidency, certainly stamps him both as a politician and an opportunist. A letter of his written in 1920, expressing his doubt as to what he was at that moment, was shown in facsimile to members of the Republican National Committee at their recent meeting in this city.

If I were a sporting man I should be inclined to bet some money on the proposition that the Republican nominee for the Presidency may be a man who has not yet figured in the news. It can hardly be Longworth for certain reasons, though Longworth is highly popular and comes from the traditional President-making State of Ohio. One thing is true: The professional politicians are not for Hoover. In so far as this is due to the fact that he has stood them off where they should be stood off, he deserves credit for it and it will help him. It is their fear, too, that if Hoover is elected President he will be the President. He will be, there is no doubt about that; he will be as autocratic a one as we have had, and, if elected, what he thinks and plans while in the White House will in considerable degree be known by just one person—Herbert Hoover.



The Angel of Peace in Modern Dress

Presented at Geneva by the Soviet Government on November 30, 1927

It Seems To Heywood Broun

BETWEEN issues of The Nation I celebrated my thirty-ninth birthday quietly. There was no public demonstration of any sort and I myself might have overlooked the occasion but for a letter from a life-insurance agent who jogged my memory and asked whether it would not be wise for me to take a larger policy before it was too late. None of this is set down in petulance, and I should scarcely announce the approach of senility except for the fact that I have fashioned an excellent resolution to be most studiously maintained from now till I turn forty. For an entire year I promise to use no labels in regard to men or measures. "Radical" is out; "conservative" and "liberal." Very likely I will refer to none as "artist" or sneer at things "Victorian." Along with all the rest goes "modern," "progressive," and "glamorous." "Intriguing" and "arresting" I swore off last year. Instead of saying that I'm a "pacifist" it will be enough to stipulate an opposition to all wars. I mean all wars. Those who allow a willingness to fight at Concord or Bull Run let down their guard. There never yet was any conflict which did not seem in its first days quite similar to Armageddon. In quitting "pacifist" I am not frightened off by that old puzzler about my grandmother and the alien grenadier. If that comes up I'll handle it. "Box him, Granny, use your left," would be my counsel while I slipped out in back to call a traffic cop.

The new and momentous decision to eschew definitive words was not arrived at in cold blood. For speaking ill of Soviet terrorism I have been slated by publications which favor Russia thick or thin. My words, they say, illustrate the working of a "liberal" mind. But I don't want to be a liberal even without the quotation marks. It is an adjective much coupled with the New York World and yet I find myself miles away from that paper on the question of disarmament. The leader in that journal says the Russian proposal is propaganda for the cafes. "For Mr. Litvinov to come to Geneva and pretend that Russia is run by non-resistant pacifists is a very poor joke," declares the World. I cannot find any part of his proposal which says that. I see more grim and sorry humor in bleeding and bankrupt nations arming against each other.

Had the World, or any other American newspaper, gone to the trouble of reading the Soviet proposal in full it might have found this sentence: "While insisting upon the views just stated, the delegation is nevertheless ready to participate in any and every discussion of the question of the limitation of armaments whenever practical measures really leading to disarmament are proposed." I take this to mean, "If you don't like our scheme, suggest a better one." To my ear the language is quite as clear as anything coming from Mr. Coolidge.

If anybody says that it will be difficult to effect complete disarmament I agree readily enough. But difficult things are not necessarily impractical. Judging by results, every move made so far by the practical politicians in the matter of reducing armies has been wholly visionary and fantastic. The complete abolition of armaments can hardly be accomplished without extended discussion, but after all the Russians did not name next Tuesday and set the hour at 9 a. m. No camel with a broken back can be restored to health by the removal of one straw. The world needs not a lighter load but none at all. The Soviet delegation set up an ideal, and if there is no hand steady enough to hit it square why can't we aim and come as close as possible?

For the sake of my grandmother, already mentioned, I would prefer to have each nation still retain a federal police force. This can easily be attacked as a quibble. There would have to be discussion as to the equipment of such forces and their number. But quibbles are better than curt refusals. I don't like police and I prefer them to soldiers. Patrolmen very likely would object to being sent to Nicaragua. And in the police there are no major generals.

My own pet scheme is simpler than that of Litvinov. The current Congress could pass a law making it a felony for any officer of the United States army or navy to write for the magazines, speak at public dinners, or give statements to the newspapers. I would not even permit them to tell funny stories. They should go home with the coffee. Few will contend that any good has come from speeches by service men. They are by nature strong and silent. Let these excellent qualities be preserved.

And before leaving the question of publicity I am converted back to the old notion that reticence is becoming to still another profession. Doctors once thought it was infamous ever to mention medicine in the presence of laymen. That has all passed. No longer is the physician content to express himself upon a prescription blank in the brief space allotted beneath the letterhead announcing "Blank's drug-store has the finest soda fountain in the city." The doctor has taken up the pencil, the pen, and the portable. All current lists of books are filled with scale drawings of the esophagus and reviewers are now privileged to read themselves to sleep with chapters on diseases of the liver. And naturally there has leaped up, like Jack long repressed within his box, the medical humorist. He jests at scars who has himself made the incisions; give him gout to play with and you'll find the fellow antic.

But I like their jokes better than their attempts to frighten people. The press of the country is conducting at the present time a drive concerning cancer. In medicine I am wholly regular and have no faith in any form of heretical healing, and yet I think the method of educating the public against a dread disease shows the fundamental and shameful ignorance of doctors in the matter of human psychology. I quote from the New York Times:

> The lash of fear is now being openly used in the anti-cancer campaign being conducted by the New York Committee of the American Society for the Control of Cancer to drive both potential and actual victims of the disease into the examining rooms of physicians and surgeons. According to leaders in the campaign the end justifies the means, as fear of cancer is only ignorance which education will overcome.

In the broad sense of the word everybody now alive is a potential cancer victim. The doctors are saying that in order to save a few many must suffer. Nor is this suffering merely a temporary thing. Fear is a disease and one of the most stubborn. Any fool can frighten a patient and possibly there are a few dozen doctors in the country competent to cure him. I honestly believe this estimate is high. Ten is more like it. The doctors are moving upon the theory that it is necessary to infect the entire nation with phobias in order to handle an ailment which is still a disease of a considerable minority. In this there is no soundness.

And there is room for debate about the propaganda to have each one of us, no matter how he's feeling, go and submit to examination each six months or every year. Without question the doctor may find something insidious, but unfortunately many of these hidden maladies are still beyond the powers of his therapy. Certainly in such cases it is better not to know. Nor can I think of any better way in which to recruit the growing army of the neurotic. The man who feels all right may still be sick, but let him not tamper with his luck is what I say.

My birthday came and went without the aid of any doctor, but I am among other things a little superstitious. If any sudden ill befell me soon, or now, the paragraphs I've written could be used against me by the apostles of medical preparedness. I do not want to run the risk of serving as a horrible example. The advice I gave is excellent but it is too late for me to take it. I did not get examined on my birthday but I went twice last week.

The Passing of Trotzky

By LOUIS FISCHER

Moscow, November 16, 1927

THE passing of Trotzky may become one of the classic ironies of history. On the tenth anniversary of the revolution to which he contributed so much his picture was torn down in the streets of Moscow. A few days later he was expelled from the Communist Party and thus divorced from participation in the conduct of the revolution and of the Soviet Government.

To some, the tragedy of Trotzky testifies to the ingratitude of humanity and the cruelty of fate. It is sad to think of him as down and out, eating out his heart in the conviction that others less able than he are blundering. This is unfortunate, yet events may take a still more unfortunate turn. For any attempt on the part of the Opposition to continue its activities may land it in jail. Those who talk of a Putsch or a military revolt are ignorant of conditions in Russia and harbor a completely false impression of the lengths to which even a distressed, embittered Opposition may go at present. But the Central Committee or Ceca (not Cheka) of the party will give no more democratic freedom to the expelled Opposition than it does to Mensheviks or Social Revolutionaries, and if Trotzky and his followers try to take that freedom they will court arrest or some other form of silencing.

Yet it is safe to prophesy that there will always be an opposition. Trotzky, Zinoviev, Rakovsky, Preobrazhensky, Kamenev, Smilga, Peterson, Bakaev, Evdokimov, Muralov, Radek, and all other spokesmen of the present Opposition may be removed from the political scene. But another faction will rise in its stead. The present policies of the majority of the party will not go unchallenged.

The other day a fairly intelligent Communist said to me: "I detest the Opposition not alone because it stands for certain doctrines abhorrent to me but because of its Left influence on the party." At no time in the last two years had the Opposition the remotest chance of gaining control of the party organization. If it were to remain in the ranks now its chances would be as small. Yet it has been an important factor in stemming the majority's slow movement to the Right. Many of the Opposition planks have been lifted and nailed into the Stalin platform, sometimes in veiled, often in undisguised form. "Right" in this context does not mean reaction. It is perhaps best translated "the road of lesser resistance." It means concessions to the peasantry, moderation at home and abroad, and less active interest in world revolution. Conditions in the Soviet Union demand such policies. This is the strength of the Stalin majority.

The Ceca's second pillar of strength is the growing prosperity of the country. Even admitting the Opposition's contentions regarding the mistakes of the majority, the fact remains that the material welfare of the greatest number has been furthered by the present administration. Such success undermines the position of the Trotzky faction.

Any opposition, moreover, starts under a handicap, for unity is a fetish in the Communist Party. This is a product of the party's disciplined past as well as of the necessity for concerted action at all times. Factionalism is anathema to the Communist, and Trotzky has been defeated as much by the argument that he is attempting to disrupt the party as by criticism of the basic principles he advances. Many adherents of the Opposition, though convinced of the justice of the claims [illegible] when they felt that the tactics employed—the secret printing press, clandestinely distributed petitions, relations with non-partisans, and [illegible] demonstrations—constituted a danger to the "monolithism" of the party.

Another weakness of the Opposition is the personality of Trotzky. Though Lenin stood several cubits above him in political stature, Trotzky undoubtedly is the greatest living figure of the revolution. His magnetism, oratory, culture, brilliance of mind, tongue, and pen, his fire, honesty, and sincerity make him a born leader. But he is no politician. Throughout the entire length of his remarkable career in the Socialist-Communist world he has stood out as an individual. He can never organize his following, though he is capable of mobilizing the Red Army and reorganizing the railroads. He antagonizes by his apparent vanity and capriciousness. (Stalin calls him an actor.) It is his dazzling light but not his warmth which attracts. He is capable of spectacular action but not of subtlety.

Leon Trotzky, moreover, has been guilty of numerous political errors. He was mistaken in regard to the Brest-Litovsk peace where he differed with Lenin. He was wrong in his trade-union controversy with Lenin in 1921. Subsequently he opposed the fiscal reform on the ground that inflation would help industry. But developments have shown that a stable currency can be the rock on which the entire economic system of the country rests. Several years ago he proposed industrial "concentration," which would have involved the closing of some of the largest plants in Russia, the Putilov works in Leningrad, for instance. Yet more recent events have proved that not only are all prerevolutionary units necessary but new factories must be built.

Besides, Trotzky became a Bolshevik only in 1917. Theretofore he fought Lenin almost uninterruptedly. To be sure, he was on the spot at the hour of need, in the 1905 abortive revolution and in the successful effort of ten years ago. Nevertheless, his Menshevism prior to the revolution makes him more vulnerable to the charge of Menshevism today, and the Stalin majority is not slow to exploit this weakness.

Records of the past, Trotzky's personality, Communist worship of unity, the adherence of Zinoviev and Kamenev, the "strike-breakers of 1917" [1]—all these are used against the Opposition and frequently serve to obscure the issues of the present struggle.

What are these issues? The subject is extremely involved, but the core of the dispute is, and always has been, the peasant question. The Opposition maintains that the village is a capitalistic organization, that its dynamics are capitalistic, and, above all, that the kulak or rich mujik is growing wealthier at the expense of the poor and "middle" peasants. In 1925 the party legalized the renting of land and the hiring of agricultural labor. Since then the area rented has doubled. The Opposition maintains that this vitiates the nationalization of land. Renting of land in Soviet Russia means the transfer of land usufruct from the poor peasant who does not possess the equipment or the live stock indispensable to cultivation to the rich peasant who does. The kulak holds more than his proportionate share of cattle, machinery, land. As a result, according to official statistics, 58 per cent of the country's agricultural surplus was in the hands of 6 per cent of the country's peasant households on April 1, 1926. Since then the percentages have increased the advantage of the well-to-do upper crust.

A sharp differentiation of classes, the Opposition says, is taking place in rural districts. The middle peasant, constituting the bulk of the peasantry, is losing ground. Some of its members are rising into the kulak class. Others are sinking into the bedniak or poor class. This was not the intention of the revolution. The kulak is filtering into the cooperatives and capturing control of some soviets. What is especially important, the rich peasants today hoard no less than 800,000,000 poods of grain. Consequently, cereal exports have not increased nor bread prices fallen despite three successive good crops.

The Central Committee does not deny the growth of the kulaks. But it denies that the "middle mujik" is being destroyed by the movements of the upper and lower millstones. On the contrary, the middle class is receiving recruits from the bedniaks who are improving their status, though it is admitted that some poor peasants are dropping into the class of "proletarianized," landless agricultural workers.

The Ceca says there are fewer bedniaks; the Opposition that there are more. Now it will be recalled that the recent jubilee manifesto of the Soviet Government, in addition to proclaiming an impending seven-hour day, exempted 10 per cent of all peasant households from direct taxes, thus raising the number of such households from 25 per cent to 35 per cent of the total in the Union. On the face of it, at least, this step confirms the Opposition's thesis. Indeed, the Opposition claims that the 10 per cent increase is a leaf from its book and points out, with justifiable satisfaction, that in April, 1926, Stalin stigmatized as "anti-peasant" the Opposition's demand that the number of tax-exempt households be raised from 25 to 40 per cent.

Here is the crux of the controversy. If the number of kulaks is really growing, the Opposition is right, and the Government should seek to check the economic and political power of the rich peasantry. This the Stalin Ceca now proposes to do. The Opposition replies that it is late, though not too late, that this is its plank, and finally that the new policy must be expressed in deeds, not words. Furthermore it adds that if the middle peasants are becoming either kulaks or bedniaks the Government cannot base its policy on the bulk of the peasantry, but must expect village support only from the poor and proletarian elements. Therefore it must prevent their exploitation at the hands of the upper crust by imposing heavier taxes on the richer peasants. Such a check would mean more money in the coffers of the Government, hence more money for the industrialization of the country and a speedier equalization of the balance between the city and village. (This is one phase of what Trotzky called the "permanent revolution.")

Besides, if the village is capitalistic, you cannot build socialism in a land that is predominantly peasant and industrially backward. The Opposition accordingly protests against the national self-sufficiency of the Stalinites. It argues that the revolution in Russia cannot be an ultimate success unless the world revolution eventuates. (This is another phase of the "permanent revolution.")

Concretely, the Oppositionists are "super-industrialists," as their enemies call them. The majority, too, favors and furthers industrialization. That is recorded in years of achievement. But the Opposition believes that Stalin approaches industry from the point of view of the requirements of the peasantry rather than as a thing in itself and as the only guaranty of a successful revolution. The Opposition would exploit the village for the sake of the city. The Ceca wishes industry to serve the village.

These, in outline, are the policies of the two groups. In practical every-day politics, the differences express themselves thus: the Ceca proposes to reduce prices on manufactured articles so that the peasants may buy more. The Opposition objects; formerly, it even advocated higher prices. The Ceca countenances the reduction of all taxes in the village. The Opposition suggests heavier taxes on the kulak, no taxes on the bedniak, and complains that the peasant is being taxed less and the worker more. Stalin proclaims the dawn of a seven-hour day. Trotzky replies: this is bluff and a sop to the proletariat which would prefer more rubles to more leisure. The Opposition advocates a forced bread loan in order to compel the rich peasant to give up his surplus grain.

[1] See my article, Lenin versus Trotzky, in The Nation of January 21, 1925.

I never like to deal with the future. Yet there is a temptation to have one peep. The Opposition has been descrying the beginnings of new phenomena in the Soviet Union. If these assume larger proportions, some kind of opposition, within or without the party, legal or illegal, will not be downed, be the fate of the Trotzky faction what it may. It will be a city or proletarian opposition against too pronounced pro-peasant tendencies in the party.

The personal fate of the present Opposition leaders? I do not know. If they "behave" they can remain at liberty in the country, and live in the Kremlin as Radek does, for instance, though he holds no office or job of any kind. They can support themselves—for no government bureau will employ them—by writing on non-political subjects. But will they consent to such passivity when the revolution, in their opinion, is suffering?

Americans We Like

Norris of Nebraska

By FREDERIC BABCOCK

The Eighth in a Series of Personality Portraits

"I AM on the downhill side—sometimes, I think, traveling rapidly. The end cannot be very many years in advance. I think I have, to a great extent, run my race. If I can do some good while I am traveling over the balance of the road I want to do it, because I realize I am going over it for the last time.

"I am not conscious of having a single selfish ambition. Neither money nor office holds any enchanting allurements. . . . I could not always have made this statement truthfully. There have been times in my life—and I presume it is true of most public men—when ambition, and I think an honorable ambition, caused in my heart great concern about such things. But I have lost all that. I have received all the honor I can ever expect. I should like to repay the people by an unprejudiced and unbiased service in their behalf. I have no other ambition."

Those two paragraphs, contained in an intimate and informal letter to a personal friend, reveal, much better than could any outsider, the character of George William Norris, senior Senator from Nebraska and possible candidate for the Presidency in 1928. They tell why the liberals of America have been drawn to him as they have been drawn to few other men in modern times.

It is difficult for me, a self-expatriated Nebraskan, to give an accurate view of George Norris. I admit I am prejudiced. He was my boyhood idol. I have worshiped him ever since the day, at the height of the war fever, when it seemed that the whole country had joined Woodrow Wilson in denouncing him and his associates as "that little group of wilful men," and when he came home, told the truth, confounded his critics, and emerged unscathed.

A homespun man is Norris, a man entirely lacking in political, personal, or intellectual vanity. He is quiet in his manner. His face is open, frank, almost sad, but friendly. Structurally, he is strong, deep-chested, with wide shoulders. That, of course, comes from his breeding. Born of clean American stock in a farming community in Sandusky County, Ohio, he lived as a child among eighty acres of stumps. His father died when George was four years old. The elder son was killed in the Civil War. The mother was left with ten daughters and the one son. The family was in straitened circumstances.

"I have battled, battled, for everything I ever got," Norris once told an interviewer. The slow tragedy of dull poverty and toil was his in his younger years. He knew what it was to fight for a living. His whole life has been a record of modest triumphs. He has fought his way inch by inch. But it is axiomatic that if things had come easier for him he probably would not be where he is now. In his manner, in his processes of mind and his mode of living he is still as simple, as plain, as direct, and as unassuming as when he was on the upward climb. He knows more, of course, than he did then. His mind is more mature and has broadened. His convictions, however, for the most part are based on what he has personally known and seen, rather than on deductions from wide reading. He is not afraid to think and do for himself.

He first appeared on the national scene in 1903 as a member of the House. And he first had the spotlight thrown on him when, in the Sixty-first Congress, he led the fight for the overthrow of Cannon and Cannonism. He has been an insurgent since there has been any notable insurgency in the House. From the start, he declined to become one of those glorified political peons that are lightly worked, carefully clothed, highly paid, and accorded every privilege save that of independent thought and action. He did not rebel against the authority of the Cannon group because of sentiment in his home district. It was the other way around. At that time, as in a number of more recent instances, he has had to educate his constituency to accept his views.

"I saw men on either side of the political fence follow blindly the dictates of their machines," he says. "Even when there was no question of party fealty concerned, they would vote as their bosses ordered, dumbly, stupidly, like a lot of sheep or geese. I believed in the absolute freedom of thought and action, and, cherishing feelings of this sort, it did not take me long to become an objector—an insurgent."

The war came along, and with it hysteria. In the Senate Norris voted against the armed-neutrality legislation demanded by President Wilson, and later braved the condemnation of most of the country by voting, with others of the "wilful" group, against the resolution of war. The storm of denunciation centered on the West; the full force of it swooped down upon La Follette and Norris. The pseudo-patriots and the "stand-by-the-President" boys licked their chops and prepared for the killing.

Norris outmaneuvered them. Before they could get to him he offered to resign. He called upon the Nebraska Governor to ask the legislature to provide for a special election to choose his successor. "If the verdict is against me," he told the Governor, "I shall at once place my resignation in your hands."

While the matter was still being debated he left Washington and came to Lincoln. There was no welcoming committee at the station. As I recall it, he was left almost alone. A raw reporter, I called on him at his room in the old Lindell hotel. He gave me all the time I wanted, answered fully every question I put to him concerning his extraordinary actions at Washington—and he told me plenty. The following day he addressed a joint session of the legislature and that night he hired the city auditorium, introduced himself to the throng—and once more told plenty.

But a peculiar thing took place at that night meeting. The thousands present did not ask him for any explanation of what he had been up to or why he had defied the President. They did not wish any explanation. They showed him when he first appeared on the platform, and all the time he was speaking, and at the close of his address, that they were strong for him, that they would stand by him. Again and again they rose to their feet and cheered.

Norris went back to his duties in the Senate, and the talk of forcing him out of office became less than a whisper. The common people, the people among whom Norris was raised and still moved, had convinced the politicians that it was no use; that they would never stand for his being betrayed. They have been repeating the performance at intervals ever since.

Of that "wilful" Senate group Norris alone remains. La Follette of Wisconsin, Stone of Missouri, Lane of Oregon, and Gronna of North Dakota are dead—hastened to their graves, their friends insist, by the venom heaped upon them during the days of the great insanity. Vardaman of Mississippi has long since retired. Norris, weary of it all, but with no tone of defeat in his voice or words, still holds the fort. He said, in a "ten-years-after" interview:

> We went to war to make an end to militarism, and there is more militarism today than ever before.
> We went to war to make the world safe for democracy, and there is less democracy today than ever before.
>
> We went to war to dethrone autocracy and special privilege, and they thrive everywhere throughout the world today.
> We went to war to win the friendship of the world, and they hate us today.
> We went to war to purify the soul of America, and instead we only drugged it.
>
> We went to war to awaken the American people to the [illegible] of liberty, justice, and fraternity, and [illegible] money.
>
> All this, and more, the war brought us. It is our harvest from what we sowed.
> You ask me if I would vote again today as I voted ten years ago. The answer is I would.

His record since the war is fresh in the minds of American liberals. They remember gratefully, among other things, his fights for the preservation of Muscle Shoals; against the water-power combine; for a constitutional amendment doing away with "lame-duck" congresses; to abolish the electoral college and for the direct election of the President and the Vice-President; for the exploited farmers of the West and the rights of the oppressed throughout the country; for a recognition of the aspirations of the underdogs of other nations; his refusal to bow to the rule of patronage; his amazing attempt to defeat the Vareism of his own political party—all these are at last known to the public.

His third term in the Senate expires in 1931. Then, as he announced some time ago, he will become a candidate for Governor of Nebraska. His standing and prestige there are such that his election is virtually assured. It has been his wish for years to assume some day the leadership in a movement for the reform of State government. He favors a one-house legislature of about twenty-five members, the consolidation and cutting down of State elective offices, the appointment of all employees on a strictly civil-service merit basis, and the nomination and election of the members of the legislature and the officials on a nonpartisan ticket. What a Utopia! But what a man to bring it about!

Meanwhile, the people back home have organized a Norris-for-President Committee. The attitude of Senator Norris himself (he has tried to withdraw from the race, but Nebraska will not hear of it) was expressed in these words to one of his friends:

> I do not intend to take any part in the primary. In fact, I rather feel as though no active part ought to be taken in the campaign, even by my friends. I have been weighed in the balance so often—have been on the firing line so long. If the people do not want the kind of a man I am I want them to get somebody else. I do not want any money spent in my behalf. But if the campaign against me needs attention because it is unfair, I should like to see such matters completely met.

That's Norris of Nebraska!

> Everybody in the State, I believe, knows where I stand on practically every public question, and I think they know me so well that if some proposition arose that never had been thought of or discussed in a campaign most people, if they understood the question itself, would be able to tell where I would stand on it. . . .
> It is a discouraging thing to continue to fight losing fights. Say what you will, a man is so constituted that, once in a while at least, he wants to win, and when a small body of us fight over and over again the same old battle with the same old result, working, as we believe, for the benefit of all the people, and always meeting with defeat, there comes a time when the spirit as well as the flesh weakens. . . .

Upon the death of his great colleague, Robert M. La Follette, Senator Norris said:

> His was the voice of justice and humanity, calling God's common people to battle for righteousness. He blazed the path through the wilderness of suspicion and doubt, leading the way to a higher civilization, a nobler life, a happier day.
> His life was one continuous struggle in behalf of the downtrodden and the oppressed. He met upon the field of governmental combat the advocates of monopoly, of greed, and never once did he compromise or surrender.
> To those who loved him and followed him and believed in him there will always be the happy knowledge and consolation that even his bitterest enemies never once accused him of infidelity to the cause of righteousness as he saw it.
> Defeat meant to him only new determination for the next struggle. He turned a deaf ear to those who even suggested the possibility of compromise for his personal advancement, and in answer to suggestions from the enemy that a different course might bring him power and popularity we can hear him now, with all the strength of his tremendous power and all the vitality of his courageous soul, crying out aloud his refusal.

Those words stand as a tribute to a magnificent man. They apply equally well to the magnificent man who uttered them.

Here, for the first time, are reproduced all the one hundred ninety-five lithographs of Bellows, from "A Stag at Sharkey's," known to thousands who never bought a picture or entered an art gallery, to "The Last Count," from the one copy in existence. Here, for the collector of Bellows lithographs, is an authoritative and definitive index, soundly, beautifully made. Here, for the rest of us who cannot afford to be collectors, are superb reproductions of all the lithographs that we have coveted. Here is, incidentally, the first edition of a brilliant piece of critical-biographical writing by the author of The Mauve Decade. Maine's Water-Power Fight

By EARL SPARLING

Portland, November 28

FOR two years Samuel Insull, the Chicago power and political magnate, has been battling in Maine for what is called the greatest water-power prize in New England. Mr. Insull did not start the quarrel. He only inherited it. But the voters of Maine, of whom there are still a few, are beginning to realize just what that means.

The voters were asked with some ceremony on October 18 last to vote their voting privilege into limbo. The irony of the request did not go unnoticed. About 30 per cent of the voting population reported to the polls, and the proposed abolition of the State's direct-primary system was defeated by a vote of something like two to one.

The attack on the primary system was waged by politicians known to be favorable to the power interests. Mr. Insull personally kept out of the picture, but the attack was applauded by his lieutenants in Maine. From the nation as a whole, not to mention the 70 per cent of Maine voters who remained at home with the cider, the referendum received an enthusiastic inattention. But lack of audience is not always indication of a poor show. Behind Maine's referendum lies one of the most interesting political upheavals since the rise of what Dr. Charles A. Beard refers to as American civilization.

Since 1917 a small group of men in Maine have battled furiously to protect the State's title to its hydro-electric resources. Originally two questions were involved: one, whether power companies should be allowed to ship hydro-electricity out of the State; two, whether the State should retain title to its few remaining lake reservoirs. More recently has arisen the more important question of whether Maine's great wealth of water-power should not be used primarily to give Maine people electricity at the lowest cost possible. The latter question is tending to become paramount since the advent two months ago of the Portland Evening News, a new paper independent of the power interests and edited by Dr. E. H. Gruening. Maine is thus today one of the chief battle-fields in the rapidly developing national war for cheaper electricity.

The Maine power fight actually started in 1909, but it gathered momentum after Mr. Insull began to buy up Maine power properties two years ago. Mr. Insull today controls companies reputed to own two-thirds of the State's total developed water-power. And today the Republican Party in Maine is divided into two opposing camps. The fight for and against the primary has been one of the chief results of this split.

Percival P. Baxter, then a State legislator, got on the Maine statute-books in 1909 a law prohibiting exportation of Maine's hydro-electricity, on the theory that, if kept in the State, the power would attract industries which otherwise might settle elsewhere. The law caused little trouble at first, but when Baxter, after eight years in retirement, returned to the legislature in 1917 and took steps to strengthen the prohibition or exportation, the war was on. Baxter's new proposal was that every power-company charter granted by the State should carry a clause prohibiting each company specifically from exportation.

A State-wide advertising campaign, in which thousands of dollars were spent, was opened the next year by sixteen associated power companies and large power users, the latter being paper companies directly interested in power development. The apparent purpose of the advertising campaign, according to Baxter, was to defeat reelection of himself and his associates and "thus forever end water-power discussion." From that day to this water-power has been inextricably involved in Maine politics.

The fight led Baxter from the lower house to the State Senate and thence to the governor's chair, and as he rose he became more and more determined. As Governor he elaborated his program by proposing in 1923 that a valuable dam site on the Kennebec River be not deeded in perpetuity to the power companies but leased for an annual rental. The legislature had passed a bill deeding the site as usual. Baxter vetoed the bill. The legislature repassed it over his veto. The Governor carried his fight to the people, calling a referendum on the issue. The legislature backed down, repealing the bill before the referendum could be had, which was at least one time that the power of the voters stood directly in the way of the power companies.

Samuel Insull, through his Middle West Utilities Company, a great holding organization, entered Maine just about the time Baxter was retiring from the governorship. Baxter was succeeded at Augusta by Ralph O. Brewster, who as a State Senator had opposed the wishes of the power owners just as consistently. Brewster had been elected only after a bitter campaign and a recount of the votes.

Soon after Governor Brewster took office a petition was presented for a referendum on the abolition of the direct-primary system. The legislature passed it to Brewster who promptly threw it out, alleging that it contained some 4,000 questionable signatures. The petition had been circulated by Fred O'Connell, a Republican leader who was later to work strenuously to elect Arthur R. Gould, a power-company owner, to the United States Senate.

Baxter announced his candidacy for the United States Senate in 1926 and Brewster ran for reelection to the governorship. Things looked bad for the power owners in Maine. Brewster was successful. Baxter was not. Baxter was defeated for the Republican nomination by Arthur R. Gould but even in victory the direct primary proved an embarrassing institution.

Hardly were the congratulations over before Governor Brewster charged officially that from $50,000 to $100,000 had been spent illegally in Gould's behalf. The direct-primary law limits expenditures to $1,500. Brewster's allegation still stands despite a subsequent State hearing which exonerated the Gould organization. It is common talk in Maine that Brewster considered that hearing to have been a farce and that he has a wealth of evidence to present to any United States Senate committee that cares to investigate the matter.

Events came fast in 1927. J. Martin Insull, brother of Samuel, broadcast through the State that the Insull organization stood ready to invest $50,000,000 in Maine should the exportation measure be repealed. The State legislature passed a bill for a referendum on the matter. Brewster used his veto. And to make matters worse, the power companies felt it necessary at last, after four years of discussion, to accept a lease on the Kennebec River dam site instead of the desired deed.

Then came a double attack on the primary law. Representative Robert Hale introduced in the legislature a bill to modify the $1,500-campaign-fund law and allow candidates to spend money for newspaper advertising without limit. O'Connell introduced a new petition for a referendum on abolition of the primary. Hale is a member of a Portland law firm, the head of which is president of the Insull company in Portland. O'Connell was apparently unconnected with the power interests except that he had worked strenuously to elect Gould, his fellow-townsman, to the United States Senate. O'Connell, however, soon took a back seat in the primary attack.

An organization was formed to work toward abolition of the primary. The president of this organization was former Governor William T. Cobb, who had been in charge of the power-company advertising campaign in 1918. One of the vice-presidents was Mrs. Guy P. Gannett, wife of the largest newspaper publisher in Maine. Gannett owns or controls four out of Maine's eleven daily newspapers. His morning and afternoon publications in Portland were without opposition until the arrival of Dr. Gruening and the Portland Evening News. Gannett was formerly a large power owner and sold his common stock in the Central Maine Power Company to Insull in 1925. Whether Gannett still owns any other power-company stock is not known, but he is still a banking partner of Walter A. Wyman, president of the Central Maine Power Company and Insull's chief lieutenant in all New England. Needless to say, Gannett's newspapers worked strenuously for the abolition of the primary.

The primary was saved mainly because of the efforts of Dr. Gruening's Evening News and of Brewster and Baxter. These two men stumped the State to save the primary. And the end is not yet. Both have aspirations for the United States Senate. Both view Mr. Insull with alarm and the feeling is probably mutual.

> They seek [says Baxter] to use our natural resources as a link in the great chain they are forging to control the electric industry from the Atlantic to the Mississippi, from the Canada line to the Ohio River. The methods used by the Insull interests have been disclosed in the United States Senatorial primary in Illinois, in which, according to the newspapers, Mr. Insull admitted having expended upwards of $125,000 to nominate his favorite.

Out of it all Maine people may get cheaper electricity. Undeveloped resources in the State represent about two-thirds of the undeveloped water-power in all New England. Maine people are beginning to wonder why this wealth of water-power has not resulted in lower costs for electricity. They are beginning to wonder why, if the Insull interests are willing to transmit Maine power to Massachusetts with all the expense that involves, they are not able to sell the power far more cheaply in Maine.

With electricity a looming issue in the coming Congress, the upheaval in Maine is one of the most important phenomena in the land. For one member of Congress it is especially important. It has reopened the embarrassing question of just how Senator Arthur R. Gould managed to get there.

In the Driftway

TAMMANY Hall on Fourteenth Street has been sold, and the sachems of the metropolis are to hold their powwows in a new meeting-place the location of which, at this writing, is not known to the Drifter. The old Wigwam which for sixty years has been the center of New York's political life—whose walls keep the secrets of Tweed, Croker, Murphy, and lesser bosses—is to be torn down or made over into a business building.

* * * * *

THE abandonment of Tammany Hall about completes the dismantling of what was once one of the smartest and most important streets in New York. Tammany Hall's near neighbor, the Academy of Music—full of historic associations—was recently sold for business and the old Van Buren house, farther west, has suffered a similar fate. A few stores of substantial reputation still remain on the thoroughfare, but they are lost among dingy buildings housing even dingier business. Garish lights in shop windows call attention to displays of cheap gewgaws inside, but the life fled from the street years ago.

* * * * *

THE Drifter has no space to recall here the history of Tammany Hall or of Fourteenth Street, to write of the dead glories of Koster and Bial's or Tony Pastor's amusement halls, to remind his readers of what Union Square used to be. It is enough to note that the former editorial offices of the Century Company, on the north side of the square, are now lost among the foreign-name signs of the wholesale textile trade, while the old Tiffany building on the west—once the glittering mecca of the wealthiest Christmas shoppers—is the home of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers. When the Drifter first knew Fourteenth Street, more than twenty years ago, it was the southern outpost of the department store trade by day and of the Tenderloin by night. Department stores lined Sixth Avenue from Fourteenth to Twenty-third Street in an almost unbroken phalanx of sober dignity. Crowds jammed the sidewalks all day. At night another crowd paraded Fourteenth Street from Union Square to Third Avenue along a highway bright with lights and filled with strident music from a score of dance halls and saloons.

THE Drifter's own most vivid memory of Tammany Hall is of one Election Day night when he was sent there to cover the news by a New York newspaper for which he was working. The returns were slow and the Wigwam was dull. So the Drifter strolled across the street and was standing on the sidewalk in front of Tom Sharkey's then famous saloon. The crowd was dense and presently a bouncer for Sharkey's place told the Drifter, in scarcely polite tones, to move on. In even less polite tones the Drifter asked the bouncer if he owned the sidewalk. A strong right arm flashed out and a second later the Drifter rose from a heap in the street some ten feet away. He didn't approach that right arm again. Instead he sought a policeman and made a charge of assault. The policeman eyed the Drifter critically, and then: "I don't see no mark on yer face," said the majesty of the law. "I won't arrest nobody fer assault on a night like this without he leaves a mark on the other fella's face."

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Al Smith

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Mr. Villard paints an interesting and attractive picture of a man for whom many will be glad to vote. But he says: "As for the prohibition issue, Governor Smith must tell the public exactly where he will stand if elected, whether . . . he will determinedly uphold the Eighteenth Amendment."

Has not his conduct already answered that question? Has he not advocated the repeal of the New York enforcement law? Had he not more to do with the repeal of these laws than any one else? If, as Governor of New York, he would nullify the United States Constitution, what would he do as President? By what sophistry can a Governor say "I will uphold the constitution of my State but not the Constitution of the United States; I will have repealed the laws of my State which help to uphold the Constitution of the nation, so that I will have no prohibition laws to enforce and my conscience will be clear; if ever I am a candidate for President I will assure the voters that I will enforce the laws, if elected"?

If the whole nation were as thirsty and as lawless as New York, Governor Smith might be elected President, but the West and Middle West do not want a "wet" President.

Columbus, Ohio, December 5 Frank M. Raymond

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Mr. Villard's portrait of Al Smith, while true in most details is misleading in its total effect because of serious omissions and still more because of wrong proportions. Governor Smith is an able and attractive man who knows the business of New York State inside out. If progressivism means anything he is not entitled to progressive leadership. In two paragraphs near the end of his article Mr. Villard makes admissions which prove that fact and for the thoughtful reader quite counteract the panegyrics of the preceding pages. He is an extraordinary national progressive leader who has no national program, no real political philosophy, no fierce indignation at the election frauds of his own political organization, and no hostility toward or from Wall Street.

Moreover there are some important facts that Mr. Villard does not record. Governor Smith was pledged to the hilt to the ratification of the child-labor amendment. So was his party. Yet under pressure of the opinion of leaders of his own church and of the Protestant Democratic South he side-stepped the ratification issue by one of the neatest political maneuvers in recent times. Only recently he delighted the heart of the big bankers by coming out for the abolition of the federal inheritance tax in 1931.

Now look at State affairs. Governor Smith's celebrated housing program has so far been a complete failure for reasons which have little to do with the exclusion of the limited-dividend feature to which Mr. Villard refers. While, especially in his earlier years, he has formally declared for many progressive measures he has fought only for his water-power law and for certain rather routine welfare measures. His water-power program is weak because it does not deal adequately with the distribution of power after it is generated. He has led no real fight on the injunction evil and his recommendations on that issue have been better calculated to catch labor votes than to get results. Mr. Villard quotes the Governor's rather ancient 1920 declaration for municipal operation of public utilities. In spite of that declaration the Governor is pretty generally regarded in investment circles as more friendly to the New York transit companies than Mayor Walker is at present. Some of his closest political friends, for example Lewis Nixon, whom he once made a public service commissioner, and Dr. Berry, the present comptroller of New York City, have opposed municipal operation of subways and the five-cent fares.

Now in spite of these facts one may be enthusiastic for Al Smith, but it will not be because he is a progressive. It is a sad commentary on the lack of faith among the alleged progressives that they are so willing to accept the Governor's record for administrative ability and his somewhat spotted liberalism as sufficient qualifications for a leader. The truth of the matter is that men love or hate Al Smith without much reference to his stand on economic matters because of the interest they feel in the three R's of present-day American politics—rum, race, and religion. On these issues I understand the support for Governor Smith and even feel some sympathy with it. But even if I were a progressive rather than a Socialist I do not believe I should forget my progressivism in my excitement about these three R's. Nor should I inconsistently give Governor Smith credit for all the "reformed" Tammany's dubious virtues while holding him innocent of all responsibility for the unpunished milk scandals, Jimmy Walker's very suspicious bus-franchise awards, the Queensborough sewer graft, the degradation of the city judiciary, and the frauds of the last election, as bad as the worst efforts in Philadelphia and Chicago.

New York, December 6 Norman Thomas

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Mr. Villard's incisive, objective study of Al Smith as a Presidential possibility is by far the ablest I have read.

But those of us who have followed Mr. Smith's public career from its inception as a member of the New York State Legislature in 1903 and have seen him approach and fearlessly solve the questions of social legislation, of tax reform, of administrative and bureaucratic changes, with an open, yea, even an unprepared mind, find in his lack of both training and views on the subject of foreign affairs one of the greatest assets he possesses as a Presidential possibility.

When we view the history of international affairs that led to the Great War and its unhappy sequels, we must reach the determination that what a public man, especially one in the office of President of the United States, needs most of all at the present time, in guiding him in dealing with other nations, is a total lack of predetermined opinion.

The type of training which has heretofore been most characteristic of statesmen, consisting primarily in a knowledge of diplomatic niceties, of international finance, and of hackneyed legal phraseology, Al Smith is better off for not possessing.

Al Smith, in his work on the factory commission and on the commission to inquire into the subject of widows' pensions, on which body I had the honor to serve with him, brought about greater social reforms through legislation than had been known in any State of the Union; in his labors as a delegate to the Constitutional Convention of 1915 he grasped clearly the need for administrative reorganization of the government of our State; in his subsequent work as Governor of the State of New York he has been able to breathe the spirit of humanity into the interpretation of the financial statements of our State government; and he will unquestionably approach international affairs in the same human, progressive, and socially minded spirit that has characterized all his efforts of almost a quarter of a century.

Voltaire once aptly declared that "we care most for those portraits in which we find ourselves." It might be similarly said of Al Smith that we care most for him because in him we find the same lack of cant, of hypocrisy, and of an irrational adherence to the status quo that are characteristic of the plain peoples of the world, combined with that extraordinary common sense that has been the guiding light in all his deliberations.

The United States, which has come to be the strongest World Power, economically, that civilization has ever known, with a distaste for both militarism and imperialism, can well find leadership in its effort to humanize international relations, in the militant and virile, yet unfettered mentality of Al Smith.

Member of Congress, Fourteenth Congressional District, New York

Introduction

By CHARLES A. WAGNER

The hard limbs of the trees
Are rocking in a yellow hammock
Deeper than the summer sky.
Walk with me and talk with me.
You were a grain of space
Searching the rock of a brown continent.
Your limbs are made softer by a syrup of rebellion
Encircling your shining phrases and brittle words.
Walk with me and talk with me.
Tell me who you are and why our hands are warm
And how many times the stars have pulled at your dresses.
Born in fire we die in fire
And in between is fire also.

I am sun, sin, and song
And that is my name and address.
I weigh twenty centuries, and my height
Is a circle that goes up at my head
And returns to my feet through this park pavement.
Long ago I married two eyes and a mouth.
One eye was the sun, the other the moon,
And the mouth I married was the lightning
That slit the heavens into lavender ribbons
And blackened the earth with fear.
Walk with me and talk with me,
It can do no harm, and I can whisper
How beautiful you are.

First Glance

THE best thing said for Blake in this year of his centenary is said by himself in a complete edition of his prose and verse which can be dropped into an overcoat pocket. The Nonesuch Press has condensed its bulky and expensive "Blake," edited with exhaustive care by Geoffrey Keynes, into a single volume of 1,140 thin pages (Random House: $5)—and this by sacrificing none of the material. The variorum apparatus is gone, but all of Blake now known to exist is here. The curious reader has in a compact and graceful book the lyrical poems, the prophetic books, the "Descriptive Catalogue" and other documents relating to Blake's exhibits, the miscellaneous prose, the epigrams and fragments, the letters, and the marginal comments on Lavater, Swedenborg, Bacon, Berkeley, Wordsworth, and Reynolds. Few publications have been more needed or more welcome than this one which Mr. Keynes in his preface calls "a sufficient monument" to Blake as poet and philosopher. There is now a volume in Everyman's Library (Dutton: eighty cents) which contains almost all of Blake that the average reader would want. When this reader wants more he has Mr. Keynes to go to.

The pity is that the average reader has little or no chance to see Blake's texts as in many cases Blake intended them to be seen—as integral portions of engraved designs. His famous method of "illuminated printing" was to etch both text and design in relief on copper and to color the prints of each page by hand. The result was something which it is indeed no esotericism to define as indispensable to a knowledge of Blake. Blake definitely conceived his words as pictures, his pictures as words, and only one who has never seen an example of the illuminated books will deny their importance. Naturally the copies that have survived from Blake's own hand are few and widely scattered among the collectors of the world. But this year of the centenary has seen some attempts at fascimile. Earlier in the season the "Songs of Innocence" and the "Songs of Experience" were reproduced in a limited edition in England. And now come 300 copies to America of "The Marriage of Heaven and Hell, reproduced in facsimile from an original copy of the work in the Fitzwilliam Museum, Cambridge," with a note by Max Plowman (Dutton: $10). It is a book not only to own and display but to read. For the passion of these satanic proverbs ("The road of excess leads to the palace of wisdom;" "Prudence is a rich ugly old maid courted by incapacity;" "He who desires but acts not breeds pestilence") and the terrible annunciation of this poetry—

> Now the sneaking serpent walks
> In mild humility,
> And the just man rages in the wilds
> Where lions roam . . .

have thrice their old effect when come upon in pages illuminated by Blake's hand and by his glory-hunted brain. The only pity, as I have said, is that more than 300 Americans cannot see Mr. Plowman's edition.

MARK VAN DOREN

A Tale for Children

A History of the American Drama. From the Civil War to the Present Day. By Arthur Hobson Quinn. Two volumes. Harper and Brothers. $10.

HAVING published some time ago a one-volume history of our drama from its beginnings to the Civil War, Professor Quinn now completes the story with two volumes more. He is one of the ablest of the small group of scholars who have devoted themselves to the rather barren field of American dramatic literature, he has shown an indefatigable industry in rummaging for the manuscripts of unpublished plays, and by confining himself rather strictly to dramatic literature as distinguished from stage history he has managed to achieve a fairly complete account within reasonable limits. Here, in a word, is somewhat more than most people will care to know about the plays which have delighted audiences from the time of our fathers down to the present day; and the record is one, it must be confessed, which is vastly depressing.

Professor Quinn himself is gifted with that tolerant catholicity of taste which is doubtless necessary to sustain anyone who has made a heroic resolution to devote his life to a critical study of third-rate works of art; and he sees the history of the American drama in terms of a "progress." James A. Hearn marks an advance in realism; Clyde Fitch in delicacy of perception; William Vaughn Moody in depth of feeling. And so, in a sense, they do. But an advance, alas, over what? Over nothing except the incredible artificiality, obtuseness, and superficiality of their predecessors. It is only in comparison with midgets that they can be made to seem gigantic, and though they were great men in our theater they would have been great men nowhere else. The best of them is supremely unimportant when thought of in connection with any first-rate writer, and the sad fact remains that less intelligence, less sensitivity, and less sincerity of purpose have gone to the making of our native drama than have gone into any other American enterprise except the movies. With the exception of a few plays written within the last fifteen years there is not a single one of our dramatic "masterpieces" which does not seem painfully tawdry in comparison with any of a score of American novels or essays written during the nineteenth century, and there never was a time when a considerable proportion of the audience in any first-class theater was not intellectually superior to the fare it was offered—when, that is to say, it did not read books reflecting vastly maturer views of life than any it saw presented upon the stage.

In the Autobiography of a Play, a well-known essay by Bronson Howard, that skilful purveyor to the popular taste of his time described how one of his dramas was constructed. Professor Quinn quotes several pages from it, apparently with approval, and since Howard exposed with masterful clarity the methods of the stage carpenter he may be used here to show why most American drama has been contemptible. In the course of the essay Howard explains just why each event in his play was made to occur as it did, but one quotation will be sufficient to reveal his method.

> A play must be satisfactory, or another "Frou-Frou" factory" to the audience. . . . In England and America the death of a pure woman on the stage is not "satisfactory" except when her purity rises to the dignity of tragedy. The death in an ordinary play of a woman who is not pure, as in the case of "Frou-Frou," is perfectly satisfactory, for the reason that it is inevitable. . . . The wife who has once taken the step from purity to impurity can never reinstate herself in the world of art on this side of the grave," and so an audience feels with complacency, tears on the death of an erring woman. But Lillian had not taken one fatal step which would have compelled an audience to her death. She was still pure, and everyone left the theater wishing she had lived. I yielded therefore to the sound logic, based on sound dramatic principle, of my New York manager Mr. A. M. Palmer, and the play was rejected.

Now of course Howard was right so far as his elementary principle is concerned. Not only every play but every other work of art must be in some sense "satisfactory" to its audience and must be so not merely for the commercial reason that it will have no audience if it is not, but because the power of art to make things—even painful things—"satisfactory" is the power by which it constitutes itself art. But the things which are "satisfactory" to a mature intelligence are not the same as those which are "satisfactory" to a child. Conclusions other than those in which the prince and the princess live happily ever after become acceptable to us. We learn to perceive harmonies where an ordinary world and fully developed ear would find only discord; we learn and experience [illegible] to perceive, for example, the patterns which Jenny Lind could not sing. We become sick of hearing the same few major chords endlessly sentimentalized and we shall [illegible] demand that art reflect the infinite variety of life and thus grow more and more aware of its dissonances, he shall keep pace with our needs by more and more subtle resolutions into the harmony of art. Every great dramatist, like every great artist of any other kind, is consciously or unconsciously aware of this fact, and his effort is not so much to alter [illegible] as it is to make made to fit the already existing emotional patterns as it is to make new patterns by means of which his material can become "satisfactory."

Bronson Howard did not, of course, invent the method he described; he merely formulated the principles underlying the practice of the American dramatist, and thus unwillingly exposed the reason why neither he nor any of his fellows ever wrote a play which any critics of literature can respect. He boasted of his skill in perpetuating emotional cliches—"the wife who has once taken the step from purity to impurity can never reinstate herself in the world of art on this side of the grave"—when even the man in the street was already outgrowing them. According to his professed principles the art of playwriting is not the art of rendering life as we know it "satisfactory" but merely the art of constructing fables according to the principles of child-psychology. All through the nineteenth century the American dramatist was telling nursery tales to a people which was beginning to grow up in spite of its theater, and that is the reason there is no history of the American drama really worth the telling.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Horace Porter

An American Soldier and Diplomat: Horace Porter. By Elsie Porter Meade in Collaboration with Henry Greenleaf Pearson. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $5.

HORACE PORTER was one of the fine group of West Pointers, graduated just before the Civil War, to whom came honors and the playing of great roles while they were in their early twenties. Porter, a member of a distinguished Pennsylvania family, was seized upon for staff duty as soon as he was allowed to leave Watervliet Arsenal where he was on ordnance duty when hostilities began. Trained officers were scarce, and so Porter became chief of ordnance of McClellan's armies in July, 1862, when twenty-five years old. Later he served as aide to General Rosecrans and in 1864 to General Grant himself, whose favorite staff officer and most devoted friend he soon became. At Chickamauga, Porter had displayed the highest personal heroism in trying to rally the disorganized Union troops, which act was witnessed and reported by the Assistant Secretary of War, Charles A. Dana. With Grant he took part in all the terrible battles of the Wilderness in the complete confidence of his chief, and he was one of the fortunate group of officers who were with Grant in the McLean House at Appomattox when Lee surrendered his army to Grant—surely one of the greatest moments in American history. General Porter remained with General Grant as his aide even when he became President, and did not resign from the army until 1872, late enough to have shared some of the glories and some of the scandals of Grant's first Administration. Thereafter he went into business, becoming in 1896 the first American ambassador to France where he served with distinction for eight years, doing useful service for the Administration in favorably influencing the French government during the most needless of wars—our struggle with Spain in 1898.

All of this story is remarkably well told by the joint authors of this volume—especially the Civil War episodes, which are often vividly and movingly portrayed. Mrs. Meade has kept well within bounds her justifiable admiration of her father, and Professor Pearson has added the scholarly touch to be expected of one of his experience in biographical writing. To him, we presume, goes also the credit for the valuable notes and index. Notably well done is the touching picture of General Grant in his last days as seen through the eyes of a young girl, the bowed and broken and bankrupt ex-President, stricken by the fatal malady, yet pushing his pencil over pad after pad to write those admirable memoirs which went so far to rehabilitate the family fortune or at least to pay off debts. In those days General Porter was his old chief's staunchest friend and helped, with General Badeau, in collecting the material for Grant's narrative.

Horace Porter was a handsome man of superb carriage, a public speaker of great ability who concealed under a somewhat austere presence, humor, affability, and shrewd observation. Politically he was wedded to the Republican Party and through his business affiliations to the type of government represented by McKinley and Hanna. On the subject of war and peace he blew hot and cold. A delegate to the Hague Conference in 1899, he raged at the idiocies of the professional diplomats and said: "If some of those fellows at the Hague had been through four years of battles like the Wilderness and Cold Harbor they'd be mighty anxious to stop war at any cost."

Yet he was inconsistent enough himself—and admitted the inconsistency—to be both president of the belligerent militaristic Navy League and a vice-president of the Andrew Carnegie Peace Society. When the World War came on he completely forgot his great leader's "Let us have peace," which he had had chiseled on Grant's tomb (for the completion of which General Porter deserved all the credit), and threw himself into the preparedness campaign, believing in those greatest of delusions that armaments ward off war and that war can cure war.

Nevertheless General Porter was a striking type of his class and period. This biography thoroughly deserves its place with those of the other leaders of the armies of the republic.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Without Benefit of Rotary

The Promised Land. Translated from the Polish of Ladislas Reymont by M. H. Dziewicki. Alfred A. Knopf. Two volumes. $5.

LODZ, the Manchester of Poland, is the setting of Reymont's newly translated novel. The setting is interesting enough. By X-raying the factual outlines of it hidden under heavy layers of paint in Reymont's overcolored work, and by duly discounting the author's naively unconscious racial prepossessions, one can reconstruct for oneself a laissez-faire society beside which its nineteenth-century English original seems like a Home for the Aged. There is no doubt left but that the Lodz of that period was sadly in need of Rotary and the Application of the Golden Rule to Business. But such a reading of the book would be in the nature of research. Purely as fiction the work is tedious when not outright laughable. Imagine Elinor Glyn and Michael Gold in collaboration—the former doing the love scenes, the latter writing up the factories. The former providing such passages as:

> "Oh, how I have dreamed of this moment! For how many months have I longed for you! For how many years have I waited—waited in sorrow! Oh, kiss me—kiss me with all your might and main!—Ah," she cried wildly, "I'd willingly die this very instant!"

The latter providing the emotions of a foreman on beholding the remains of a worker that was crushed to a pulp in the machinery:

> He, seeing the workers idle and crowding around the remains, cried out from the doorway: "Back to the machines. . . . Confound it! So much good stuff spoiled!" The foreman cursed at the sight of the percale goods spotted with gore.

With equally bold strokes does he draw his chief protagonists, the Jews, Poles, and Germans who form the industrial aristocracy of the mill town—particularly the Jews and the Poles. Not that the author is intentionally anti-semitic. But he accepts it as one accepts a law of nature that Jews are unconscionable knaves—mean, cowardly, avaricious, and generally incapable of any other pursuit in life than that of amassing wealth; whereas the Poles are hopelessly honest, noble-minded, generous, and incurable idealists. Daringly and iconoclastically the author tries to break through these axiomatic limitations in an effort to achieve psychological originality for his characters, but his efforts are foredoomed to failure. He makes of his Polish hero, Charles Boroviecki, a ruthless careerist, a close rival to his treacherous Jewish partner in his villainy, letting neither love nor honor stand in his way of achieving a fortune. One who deserts the high-born Polish sweetheart of his youth, embezzles her dowry, and finally marries the daughter of a boorish German mill-owner for her millions. One who, when confronted by the frantic husband of the beautiful Jewess with whom he is carrying on an amour, swears without compunction on the sacred image of the Virgin of Chenstohova that the child she is bearing is not his. But somehow his avarice and his duplicity do not ring true. Because all the time we know he is a Pole, and of course incapable of such things. We suspend judgment; and sure enough, after he has acquired his millions he repents and signifies his intention of building a Home for Workers' Children. On the other hand, the only Jewish character in the novel who succeeds in developing a soul is flatly accused of being Polish by her mercenary Jewish suitor.

"The Promised Land" is an early work and it may be unfair to judge the author of "The Peasants" by it. It seems to me, however, that its weaknesses are not mere immaturities, but Reymont's intrinsic limitations. Neither in this work nor in the work which won him the Nobel Prize is there exhibited any feeling for psychologic contour. He wrote when Poland was politically still a part of Russia, but if he is representative of Polish literature, it would seem that Poland had little to do with Russia artistically. Unlike his fellow-Slavs, whose characters spring full-grown on the first page so that the reader knows them intimately long before he learns to pronounce their names, Reymont lets his people remain for hundreds of pages mere bizarre typographic arrangements. If he has any affinity with a Russian, it is with the painter Verestchagin, with his vast landscapes peopled with dramatic tableaux. On the huge outdoor canvas on which "The Peasants" is painted, individuals merge naturally and inconspicuously into the landscape. "The Peasants" was an epic of the soil in which Fall, Winter, Spring, and Summer were the principal characters; there Reymont's descriptive power showed to advantage. In the urban background of "The Promised Land," where the landscape is psychological, he is at his worst.

Three Poets

The Pale Woman. By Sara Bard Field. William Edwin Rudge. $4.

The Evergreen Tree. By Kathleen Millay. Boni & Liveright. $2.

Happy Ending. By Louise Imogen Guiney. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

THE minor poets in a great phalanx swing valiantly along the highway, each chanting his own justification. Actually the column hardly moves; it is only the few leaders and the laggards who give the illusion of motion. The leaders stand out here as individuals, but the main massed body must be followed as a whole. Its variations merge and almost disappear, as they do in a line of uniformed soldiers who are differentiated by the sunshine on a helmet, the twitching of a muscle, or the dust on a pack. The minor poets have their many variations also: here a man whose song is dulcet, here a man of strident plaints, here one with a thundering basso, there a timid voice with sweet drowned notes in it. We listen; but we listen to the chorus more than to the single voices. The burdens of their music are those eternal verities that never cease to move the human heart: love joined, love sundered, death, fortitude, peace, or the color of a violet, the spell of the moon. But these are themes that have been encompassed by the mighty poets; the lesser writer of verse can clasp only a fragment of the whole. It is not that the great masters have said all that can ever be uttered, but that they have left a fusion of truth and form as a tall measuring rod against which each new poetic utterance must stand.

So that, when one differentiates among the minor poets, it is again the sun on a helmet or flecks of dust that are seen. Sara Bard Field writes fastidiously, has produced a volume of feminine, sensitive, trite verse. There is about her a coiled bitterness that never unwinds and fully shows itself, a fine thinness and yearning. Her words are incisive whether in a poem like Crescendo, an appealing series of lyrics, or in as brief and simple a quatrain as Load:

> She is big with child again
> Though never her body so arrow-slim.
> The dead are not carried in sight of men!
> Heavy grows her heart with him.

"The Evergreen Tree," by Kathleen Millay, is a collection of swift-singing, facile, almost epigrammatic stanzas. Music and sincerity are in these lines, but they are too easily articulate and of too lilting a rhythm to avoid glibness. In contrast, the reprint of "Happy Ending" reveals richly the maturity and mellowness and passion of Miss Guiney's work. Here are the intricacy and glow of old tapestry, concrete images compact with beauty, a variety of form, a vitality of spirit.

[illegible]
In fury to and fro and round and round,
The roused leopards of the lightning ran

Such lines are worth keeping. Out of the featureless ranks of the minor poets Miss Guiney has emerged with a shining loveliness and a fragile strength.

LENORE G. MARSHALL

Fiction in the Flat

A Victim of Circumstances. By George Gissing. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

CHEKHOV and a few other short-story writers have realized that fiction may distort reality when too great stress is placed upon those moments which men have naively believed are most significant. When people make money, or marry, or divorce, or buy a ticket to Europe, nothing—for the purpose of essential characterization—may be happening. On the other hand, a man trying to read a newspaper in the train might offer to the story-teller a moment which if actually revealed would be valuable indeed for fiction; for such a moment might be much richer in tension, stress, drama, than one more active or more spectacular. George Gissing understood this. And this is the outstanding virtue of the present new collection.

It is Gissing's usual defect that he fails to infuse his well-chosen moments with the passion that seems so obviously inherent in them; fails to make them yield their own vivid story. If D. H. Lawrence were using some of the situations in these stories (as he might) the people would really love and fight and evade; would live to an emotional limit either for adjustment or for tragedy.

Four stories recall Mr. Lawrence. In The Schoolmaster's Vision the quiet pedant's flare-up when he sees the beautiful woman would with Lawrence be a conflagration, as one feels the author meant it to be. The final crystallization of hypocritical pedantry Gissing does exceedingly well; he writes best always of frustrated people. In The Honeymoon there would be [illegible] and wife; the momentary surrender to sex, and the recurring antagonisms. There would be Lawrence's "blood rhythm," which is probably a good image for suggesting the rhythm of life. Any such implication is lost in Gissing. In Lou and Liz, these two loyal Londoners (both unlicensed mothers) have abundant vitality; and Gissing has presented them with more than his usual degree of spirit, insight, even humor. Yet there is still something lacking of convincing reality. Lou and Liz remain shadowy. One remembers Lawrence's Tickets Please, and knows how much Gissing misses of his characters' possibilities. And, finally, Fleet Footed Hester is so [illegible] Lawrence's sort of thing than Gissing's. The story tells of Hester's refusal of the man she really desires; of her race in the early morning across London to hold her man at Waterloo Station. The deep motivations (which one feels Gissing hoped to achieve) are lost sight of in the race itself.

Comparisons are often neither pertinent nor fair. They are offered here to sustain the charge that Gissing works in gray, flat, quiet tones. Just how gray and how quiet is clear by comparison with Lawrence. Yet these stories show Gissing as a writer who knew what to choose for fiction even if he lacked the courage or the power to be in his fiction as passionate as his characters give him the chance to be.

ANGUS BURRELL

Books in Brief

Journal of Katherine Mansfield. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

As a record of tragic suffering and frustration this journal makes almost unendurable reading; the sensation of encroaching on the privacy of a too sensitive soul is constant and embarrassing. It is only when one forgets Katherine Mansfield's heartrending fate and her bitter recriminations and concentrates on the many fascinating revelations she makes of the artist's temper and the artist's method that one secures from this book anything more than the simple emotions of sorrow and sympathy.

Patriots off Their Pedestals. By Paul Wilstach. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.75.

This supposedly jolly tome attempts to recount every guffaw, snort, and snore that eight of the best-known revolutionary worthies ever let loose. It is based upon the engaging theory that there "actually was a lot of fun in the dear old boys," who, we are informed, are much more inspiring when shown with wrinkled pants than with wrinkled brows. Each depedestaled "old boy" furnishes the material for a fairly strong concoction—the several chapters might well serve as a substitute for home brews—but the book won't do at all for those who like to take their heroes straight.

Carlyle at His Zenith (1848-1853). By David Alec Wilson. E. P. Dutton and Company. $5.

The fourth volume of Mr. Wilson's biography covers the period of "Latter-Day Pamphlets," "The Life of John Sterling," and the beginnings of "Frederick the Great." Carlyle is at the height of his powers, but feeling premonitions of age. His fame has attracted a multitude of observers friendly and hostile, with the result that we know him more intimately than in the preceding volumes. Especially clear are the heterodoxy of his private religious views, and the essential democracy of the manners and attitudes of this contemner of republicanism. Mr. Wilson is a self-effacing biographer, supplying just sufficient historical background to make intelligible the parodoxes of Carlyle's opinions and actions.

Art

Jacob Epstein

"ART should be straightforward," Epstein said one day. "Even if it is clumsy—that does not matter so much. The worst thing of all is to be slick!"

Most of his models have been women, whom he represents with direct and intimate realism. There is nothing slick about those strongly modeled heads. Andrea, Oriel, Meum, Dolores, Zeda, Miriam, Amina—their names read like some pre-Raphaelite choir of the blessed, though doubtless not many of them would aspire to such pious fellowship. Epstein has transformed them into hard-bitten bronze, whose color and texture vary according to the nature of the portrait. The Mask of Meum, with its subtly curving mouth and eyelids, its slender, decadent purity of line, is in a pale metal, half brassy and half golden. The flowing mold of Andrea—"a model that Ingres would have loved"—shows the brown of old apple-wood, warmly colored as if by centuries. Epstein is interested in these women not as decorative figures, but as expressions in form of mood and character.

Thus he avoids the expected nude, preferring to concentrate upon a head. Even where the figure rises from the waist, as in Zeda or Dolores with ear-rings, the head emerges with an effect of massive climax, weighted like life and charged with personality. The hair falls heavily, or swirls back violently from the face: it is only slightly conventionalized. The eyes are frankly expressive, an unusual thing in sculpture. Due partly to the treatment of muscles and eyelids, partly to their setting, partly to the deeply cut-in iris, the eyes become a focal point in Epstein's bronzes, just as they do in the human face. The skin is a broken surface, vibrating to the light. The curve of a nostril or the twist of a mouth is accentuated, according as it brings out an essential trait. The asymmetry of human features, a fact ignored in Grecian sculpture, is emphasized by Epstein. His favorite plane is the diagonal one, as in the Gothic arch or the flame-like upward leap of an El Greco painting.

Usually he works slowly and deliberately, always with careful reference to anatomy and the balance of masses. Formerly he even measured out dimensions with compasses and ruler, but now he says with a smile: "I trust my eye." He studies his models closely, sometimes over a period of years, making from them repeated experiments in form. Several of his most appealing pieces have been done from members of his own family: Peggy-Jean Laughing and Peggy-Jean Asleep; the Mask of Mrs. Epstein or the Head of Mrs. Epstein, with tiers of veiling dropping like stalactites around the downcast face. With professional models he goes to great pains to secure the ones who interest him and to keep them at hand until he has plumbed their values. A striking instance of that was the Hindu beauty, Amina, and her son, Enver—the kingly little boy of the hooked nose and the Byzantine forehead and eyes. During more than a year Epstein made various portraits of them both, and it was their presence in the studio which gradually suggested the conception for his lovely Madonna and Child.

This group was shown for the first time at the Ferargil Galleries, the only monument among a collection of Titanic heads. It is a piece apt to rouse the churchly to wrath or to bewilderment, combining as it does the Earth Mother with the Virgin. The knees flexed and far apart, the immense breadth of hips and shoulders, the sensual richness of the folded draperies give a sense of something full and primitive, something far removed from any immaculate conception. It is what Epstein calls a "frontal" work, a mask-like monument made to occupy a niche, and the primitive idea is reinforced by a definite relation to primitive forms in art. The base is wide and elaborately stylized, working upward in triangle form, with a growing agitation in the draperies, to the deeply human heads. According to the artist, it was the relation of these two heads that formed the starting-point for the whole complex composition. They are set exactly on a diagonal, a line that is continued in the arm of the Christ-child, outstretched like a narrow branch. It is a composition remarkable for volume and depth, for design and feeling exactly harmonized. Persons who complain of a restlessness pervading much of Epstein's work will find here a satisfying quiet, the sweetness born of strength. This is religious art, in the profoundest and tenderest sense. It conveys an emotion kindred to that in the almost forgotten lines of Hopkins:

> Because the Holy Ghost over the bent world
> Broods with warm breast, and with ah! bright wings.

Childhood and maternity are subjects that interest Epstein greatly. His male heads, in very dark bronze, are successful for their massive form, their variety of surface, their psychological honesty and acuteness. But the feminine heads, apart from any more obvious attraction, correspond, I believe, to the emotional strain in Epstein and to a certain feminine sweetness in his own nature—das ewig Weibliche in the sense that Goethe intended it. For many people the emotional quality of Epstein is too pronounced, just as it seemed a generation ago in Cézanne and Van Gogh. It is an even more daring thing in sculpture than it was in painting, with the example of the Greeks perpetually before us. It is, in largest measure, the "controversial" element in Epstein's work, and it has been present in him from the beginning.

It may be seen in the drawings made by a boy of twenty on Hester Street, to illustrate a volume of Hutchins Hapgood called "The Spirit of the Ghetto." It must have existed in the student working almost without instruction at Julien's in Paris. It persists in the man of forty-five who, without masters or disciples, has evolved through vorticism and abstraction, through distortion and simplification to a sure technique of his own. In one or two of his present-day works, like the Weeping Woman or the slightly overdecorated Eva, the effect of transfixed emotion just escapes being grotesque. And yet, whatever the theorists may say about "self-contained art" or "abstract form" the bronzes by Epstein—usually built a little over life-size—have an intense vitality that by contrast makes living flesh seem faint and dead.

Drama

Poet Laureate

AT least since the days of J. M. Synge and his "Playboy" the rising Irish dramatist has been expected to prove his worth by demonstrating his ability to provoke a riot. The theatergoers of Dublin are a patriotic lot and they like to applaud any ringing rhetorical tribute to the beauty of old Ireland; but as everybody knows patriotism can never be fully expressed except in a fight, and the Irish playwright was really wishes to endear himself to his people will not fail to give occasion for that exhilarating exercise. If one of his first nights is signalled by vigorous [illegible] and a reasonable number of bloody threats we may confidently speak of his "promise," but if the missiles actually fly and a few broken heads are the fruit of the evening then the lucky author is a made man. Italy crowns her poets with laurel, Ireland with brick-bats.

Sean O'Casey, once a member of the Citizens' Army and now the brightest particular star in the dramatic firmament of the North, rose to fame in the usual way. The first two of his plays to attract attention—"The Shadow of a Gunman" and "Juno and the Paycock"—were the occasion of no more than somewhat heated discussion but "The Plow and the Stars" (February, 1926) had a real Irish success. When the third act began twenty women rushed from the pit to the stalls and two of them succeeded in reaching the stage, where a general melee took place. The curtain was lowered, an infuriated group tried to pull it down, and when it was raised again a youth dashed to the stage and got into grips with the actresses who were beginning the scene. Two actors, rushing to the aid of their fellow-thespians, pushed him off, but by this time another had mounted and was only disposed of after he had been hurled to the stalls by a punch in the jaw. Pandemonium, not quieted until the arrival of the police reserves, then broke loose and it was not until a considerable portion of the audience had been got out of the theater that the play was allowed to proceed. Under the circumstances who could doubt that the fanatic interregnum which had lasted since the death of Synge and the desuetude of Yeats and Lady Gregory had come to an end, and that O'Casey was king? From the stage Yeats himself announced to the howling mob: "You have once more rocked the cradle of a reputation. The fame of O'Casey is born tonight. This is apoth[illegible]."

Last season we in America had an opportunity to see "Juno and the Paycock," and this season the Irish Players themselves have brought "The Plow and the Stars" to the Hudson Theater. No riots have occurred, but that is not my chief reason for believing that the genius of this author has been somewhat overestimated. As a critic I am compelled to apply other criteria of excellence, and even if the theater had been completely demolished by his happy compatriots I should not have considered even that enthusiasm wholly convincing. No one can deny that O'Casey has an extraordinary gift for racy dialogue or that he can hit off the foibles of Irish character with malicious wit, but his plays lack form, lack movement, and in the last analysis lack any informing purpose. They bustle with characters, generally amusing enough in themselves, but the series of sketches which go to make up one of his dramas is strung upon the skimpiest thread of melodramatic action, and though each of his plays has its moments neither of the two seen here produces any unified or lasting effect. To this day I do not know just where the author's sympathies lie, and I defy anyone, after six months have passed, to recall the play in any form except that embodied in a jumbled memory of rather confused events. [illegible] a little fighting, and a few tragic deaths; but that is about all that can be said. Even to an outsider it is evident that O'Casey has to a remarkable degree the national gift for telling quarrels with[illegible] right and left to all parties with a fine impartiality. But that gift by itself does not—outside Ireland—constitute a man a great dramatist, and when I see one of his plays I have the uncomfortable feeling of being in on a row which does not really concern me. The real fun must lie in taking a side in order to crack someone who takes the other over the head, but I haven't the slightest idea which side to take.

In "Fallen Angels" (Forty-ninth Street Theater) Noel Coward tells a slight tale of two respectable married women who are put all in a flutter by the threatened reappearance of an ex-lover. It has its moments. Don Marquis's "Out of the Sea" (Eltinge Theater) has also its moments, but it is too determinedly poetic ever to rise to poetry. "The Centuries" (Cherry Lane Theater) and "2 × 2 = 5" (Civic Repertory Theater) are "experimental" dramas. The first, by Em Jo Basshe, is a chaos from which I could extract nothing; the second a fairly amusing but rather pointless satire translated from the Danish. The sets by B. Aronson, who is now holding an exhibit at the Anderson Galleries, are its most interesting feature. Margaret Anglin in repeating the "Electra" of Sophocles at the Gallo Theater continues a great play with a very uneven company. The high moment is high and terrible indeed, but much of the rest is tamer than it should be.

Vilna and the League

By MATILDA SPENCE

AFTER four years of frustrated efforts the small republic of Lithuania has at last succeeded in getting a hearing before the Council of the League of Nations on the subject of her lost capital of Vilna. Apparently there will be many rounds before a final decision can be given.

It will be recalled that ever since the Conference of Ambassadors assigned Vilna to Poland by their decision of March, 1923—a decision bitterly protested by Lithuania—the Kovno Government has consistently refused all diplomatic relations with Poland, has kept the entire Polish-Lithuanian frontier closed, and considers a "state of war" to exist between the two countries.

In the last year or two there have been apparent efforts on the part of the Polish Government to create an impression that the Lithuanian Government was coming to see the folly of its way and that amical relations were imminent. That this point of view is not shared by Lithuanians may readily be concluded from following the Lithuanian press here and abroad. On October 9 of this year, Lithuania's official day of mourning for what she considers her lost capital of Vilna, although seven years have passed since that October 9 upon which General Zeligovski at the head of Polish troops seized that city, greater demonstrations than ever before took place throughout the entire country. All schools and shops were closed, flags were at half-mast, and meetings of protest were held everywhere. In many American cities Lithuanian papers on that day appeared heavily bordered in black.

To understand what Vilna, or Vilnius as the Lithuanians call that city, means to the Lithuanian people, it is necessary to turn back the pages of history to that time in the fourteenth century when, under the leadership of a long line of gifted warrior princes, the grand duchy of Lithuania had become a vast empire extending from the Baltic Sea nearly to the Black Sea with Vilnius as its capital.

In 1386 when the Lithuanian prince, Jagiello, married the young Polish queen, Jadwiga, the hitherto pagan Lithuanians adopted the Christian religion and it was in Vilnius according to their historians that over 30,000 were baptized. Later under Lithuanian rule were laid the foundations for the great cathedral of Vilna which today is one of the architectural treasures of that part of Europe. All that is essentially and uniquely Lithuanian—their arts, their religion, their culture, and the memories of their days of independence and supremacy—are for Lithuanians forever enshrined in the beautiful city of Vilna.

In the 1880's when began that spirit of national or racial awakening, later designated by the phrase "self-determination," it was in Vilna that Lithuanians secretly gathered and by word of mouth, in spite of the then crushing Russian rule, kept alive tales of their grand dukes and the then forbidden Lithuanian language, an entirely non-Slavic tongue closely akin to the ancient Sanskrit of their Aryan forefathers.

Then came the war, and when in 1918 the German military power broke it was in Vilna in February of that year that the Lithuanian National Council proclaimed the Republic of Lithuania and for the first time in over five centuries established an independent Lithuanian state.

The Lithuanian National Government in Vilna after nine months in power was driven out by the Bolshevik forces. The Government retired to Kaunas (Kovno), a fortified city further up the Niemen River. An effort was made to organize a Lithuanian army to drive the Bolshevik forces out, but the Poles reached Vilna first and occupied the city in April, 1919.

In July, 1920, Lithuania concluded a peace treaty with Soviet Russia (Treaty of Moscow) in which the Vilna territory was recognized as an integral part of Lithuania. Poland, however, retained possession of Vilna. In August the tide turned and Poland, then engaged in warfare with the Bolshevik army, was forced to evacuate Vilna, and the Lithuanians on the strength of their treaty with Russia again established their government in their former capital. Later in the same year the Poles, in a new attack against the Bolsheviki, came into territory occupied by the Lithuanian troops, and grave danger of hostilities arose.

It is at this point in the long story of Vilna that the League of Nations first appears. On September 5 the Polish Chargé d'Affaires telegraphed the League asking its intervention to stop bloodshed. Three days later the Lithuanian Chargé d'Affaires in London also asked that the matter be placed before the League. On September 8, 1920, the Polish-Lithuanian dispute was officially placed on the agenda of the Council's meeting.

The League at once appointed a commission of military control to establish a line of demarcation between the Polish and Lithuanian forces. Negotiations to this end began on September 30 and continued until October 7 when an agreement was signed by representatives of both governments (the famous Suwalki Treaty) by which both sides agreed to accept the "Curzon line" as a provisional line of demarcation and to continue it in an easterly direction, leaving Vilna and its surrounding territory to Lithuania.

Two days after Poland's signature of this Suwalki Treaty, when everything seemed propitious for an early settlement, the whole situation was completely altered by the action of the Polish General Zeligovski who at the head of Polish troops seized the city of Vilna and proclaimed a "government of Central Lithuania."

Lithuania immediately protested this violation of the Suwalki Treaty and called upon the League to intervene. The Polish delegate before a meeting of the Council in Brussels in the same month officially repudiated General Zeligovski's act, declaring that he had acted as a rebel without sanction of the Polish Government. These assertions were not accepted either by the Lithuanians or by the League of Nations. Both claimed to have conclusive proof that General Zeligovski acted in connivance with the Polish Government, from which they allege he received supplies of munitions, food, and further contingents of troops. In spite of this no steps of coercion were taken by the Council, which did nothing more than send a strong note of disapproval condemning Zeligovski's illegal act.

This failure of the League to exact respect for its authority from one of its members—Poland—was in the opinion of many close to the situation at the time the cause of all its subsequent inability to solve the dispute.

An attempt made by the Council to hold a plebiscite in the Vilna territory had to be abandoned because of the impossibility of holding an impartial vote in a district under military occupation. Lithuanians assert also that a wholesale importation of Poles was begun and that Lithuanians were forcibly driven out.

Direct negotiations were then opened before a League committee meeting in Brussels under the presidency of Mr. Hymans. After weeks of futile discussions with no satisfactory agreement Mr. Hymans drew up, to be used as a basis of further negotiations, his preliminary draft scheme, the vital part of which was the incorporation of the Vilna district in a proposed Lithuanian federal state. Thus in the second important act of the League in this dispute, as in the first—the Suwalki Treaty—the Vilna territory was definitely recognized as Lithuanian.

The Lithuanian Government immediately agreed to accept this draft scheme provided it be also accepted by the Poles. They, however, predicated their acceptance on a request that the population of Vilna be represented on a footing of equality in all further negotiations. Throughout the remainder of the Council's attempts to solve the dispute, Poland insisted on the granting of a decisive voice to representatives of Vilna. This created the impasse beyond which neither side would go. Lithuanians pointed out that no impartial representation could be obtained from a district under military occupation and demanded the withdrawal of the Zeligovski forces. The Poles with equal persistence refused to withdraw Zeligovski and held out for Vilna representation. No compromise could be reached. In January, 1922, at the Council meeting in Paris, the president announced his decision to withdraw the Commission of Military Control. He advised the establishment of a provisional line between the two neutral zones set up by the commission.

News of this contemplated withdrawal of the military commission came as a blow to Lithuanians who at this time were much concerned by rumors that Poland intended holding elections in the Vilna territory now for almost two years under Polish occupation. They saw in this an effort to legalize the status of General Zeligovski. The Lithuanian delegate speaking before the Council, in anticipation of the imminent withdrawal of the military commission, asked for the appointment of a high commissioner from a neutral country to act as intermediary. He further requested the Council to refer the dispute to the Council of Ambassadors which, as he pointed out, was empowered by the Treaty of Versailles to determine the eastern frontier of Poland and therefore had authority to act in the present impasse between Lithuania and Poland, "taking into account the engagement of that state toward the Lithuanian state and the vital interests of Lithuania." He stated that the Lithuanian Government would willingly intrust the solution of the dispute to the Court of International Relations.

All of these requests were refused. At this time came word from Poland that the Diet of Warsaw had voted to annex Vilna. On February 10, 1923, over the protest of Lithuania acting as a member of the League of Nations, the Council adopted a resolution laying down the so-called provisional line of demarcation by which the city and territory of Vilna remained on the Polish side, thus virtually approving the Zeligovski occupation of Vilna.

This act of the Council was bitterly criticized by Lithuanians, primarily on legal grounds. They officially refused to accept it and asked that the competence of the Council to take such arbitrary action be referred to the Permanent Court of International Justice for an opinion. In vain.

In Paris on March 15 the Council of Ambassadors formally recognized as the Russian-Polish frontier that fixed by the Treaty of Riga—the peace treaty of 1920 between Poland and Soviet Russia. At the same time it recognized as a boundary between Lithuania and Poland that same line of demarcation established by the Council on February 10, 1923, which had been strongly protested by Lithuania—a line by which the city and territory of Vilna were included in Polish frontiers. This decision, which was widely heralded as a diplomatic triumph for Poland, caused the deepest resentment throughout Lithuania. On April 20, 1923, the Government addressed a note to M. Poincaré as president of the Council of Ambassadors refusing to recognize its validity. Two main points were made: first, that the Council of Ambassadors had overstepped the authority given it under the Treaty of Versailles by which its jurisdiction was only absolute in the case of former enemy territory. The Vilna territory had formed a part of the former Russian Empire and by the Treaty of Moscow of 1920 had been formally ceded to Lithuania by Russia. The Council had no right to dispose of such territory without consultation with and ratification by both parties concerned.

Second, it was pointed out that the Council of Ambassadors in making its decision referred to the fact that Lithuania had voluntarily submitted the Vilna dispute to it for settlement but omitted entirely to mention that in the Lithuanian request the Council had been asked to employ those powers given it under Article 87 of the Versailles Treaty to fix the eastern frontier of Poland, "taking into account the engagement of that state toward the Lithuanian state and the vital interests of Lithuania." The decision of the Council completely ignores the existence of the Suwalki Treaty signed under the auspices of the League of Nations.

Four years have elapsed since Lithuania lodged these protests but in that time the Government has never deviated from its course. Today, as it was four years ago, the entire Lithuanian-Polish frontier is closed and under guard; no diplomatic or consular relations exist. Seven years have served to increase rather than diminish the determination of the Lithuanian people never to relinquish their claim to their ancient capital.

NO ONE CAN SAY how long six men in a water-tight compartment of submarine S-4 can withstand the horrors of dark and cold and the desperate fight for air. As we go to press, hundreds of men above them are working as they never worked before, diving into icy water, buffeted by wind and cold, employing every device known to science to help their comrades fast in the grip of the sea. And the sea waits. The sea can always wait; it is secure, strong, without conscience or justice. It is a force that men have wrestled with for thousands of years; if occasionally men seem to win in the unequal struggle, the sea has only to stretch out a finger, to breathe in its sleep—and the victory is turned to defeat. At no time do man and the resources of modern science seem so helpless as in a battle with the sea. If we could speak to the six trapped in the ship, we could say only: "Courage—and wait!" To the workers outside it is idle to say: "Courage—and hurry!" The sea is waiting.

THE "HOLIDAYS" ARE HERE once more. Christmas has come back to a world of coal strikes and million-dollar incomes, of salt pork at ten cents a pound and turkey at sixty, of trips to Cuba in order properly to observe the season by obeisance to Bacchus and of midnight carols over the radio, in which millions of persons are asked to join. Christmas comes to tables laden with every sort of eatable and drinkable and to a bare board on which charity has spread a meager meal; winter stars will shine on Soviet Russia on Christmas night, on a boy king of Rumania, on England struggling with the problems of a dole and a diminished Eastern trade, on a prosperous America—where if there are those who will go hungry they will have the decency to hide the fact in a land of plenty. Mussolini, in Italy, will pay his duty to the Queen of Heaven; missionaries in China will pay theirs, surrounded by hundreds of millions of yellow men and women who have never heard of her. President Coolidge will keep Christmas, and Mr. William Randolph Hearst, and Mr. and Mrs. Blumberg in the Bronx and Mrs. Vere de Vere on Park Avenue and the customers at Mr. Zero's Tub will receive an extra-sized piece of pie and the national bird will be a burnt offering from one end of this country to all the others. Men will worship a baby born in a stable, they will recall an ancient festival far more than two millennia old, they will take advantage of an opportunity to eat more than is good for them, they will hang glass balls on a young evergreen cut from the living forest, and separate children fighting over Christmas toys. In that section of the world described as "Christian" hardly a person but will pay tribute to Christmas with hand or heart or breath. A mad world. Merry Christmas to it!

MUSSOLINI HAS FORBIDDEN officers in uniform to dance the Black Bottom; Mussolini has decreed that there are too many feast days and holidays in Italy and some of them must be abolished; Mussolini has ordered that half of all the music played in public places in Italy must be Italian—including concert halls, movie houses, and dance halls. Mussolini has finally demanded that both officials and private individuals refrain from sending him Christmas [illegible]. It is with the greatest pos[illegible]will, therefore, with singing hearts and happy voices, that we do not wish Mussolini a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year! Nor are we sending our best wishes for the Christmas season to the Amoskeag Manufacturing Company of Manchester, New Hampshire. A [illegible] has been decided on by that organization, to affect everyone in the shop from the highest official to those at the very bottom. For the latter, 10 per cent is a considerable slice lopped off their weekly stipend, and the compensatory reduction of 10 per cent in rent for the company's tenements by no means equalizes matters. However, reductions in wages do occur, particularly among textile workers. At the moment, we do not complain so much of the reduction itself, as of the extraordinary lack of imagination on the part of the officials who considered it necessary. It goes into effect on December 24. December 24 is Christmas Eve.

JUST AS TWO ARE NEEDED to make a quarrel, so two are necessary to effect a peace. At the conference called by Secretary of Labor Davis to consider the coal situation, representatives of the miners were present in full force—and representatives of the operators were largely absent. The principal operators in the Pennsylvania, Ohio, and West Virginia bituminous coal-fields failed to appear at the conference. The conference went on without them and, as might have been predicted, failed to reach any definite decision. Various expedients were suggested, among them the appointment of a "czar" for the industry—a Will Hays of the mines or possibly Old King Cole himself. But nothing really happened. The Secretary, according to the New York Times, "followed the usual methods of mediation, meeting the mine owners present and the officials of the miners' union separately." We submit that no business was ever settled with the participants calling each other names in adjoining rooms. Secretary Davis is quoted as saying that if public opinion should be aroused the Government could "compel action for the national good, however distasteful that action may temporarily be to the parties immediately affected." But the operators knew that public opinion is asleep, that the miners in their tent colonies are cold and hungry, and that this Administration prefers talking to taking action.

HOSPITALS IN COLORADO are demanding payment for miners, victims of the machine-guns of the State militia; meetings are forbidden; peaceful picketing is prohibited. Frank Palmer of the miners' relief committee has been arrested, although no charge has been preferred against him, and a friend telegraphs The Nation that Palmer cannot write in jail the second article on the Colorado strike which we had been expecting from him. A Pittsburgh university professor reports that 7,475 miners near that city are living in barracks—some of them in sight of the boarded-up homes from which the companies evicted them. Colorado has its shivering tent colonies. It is a grim Christmas for the miners. A few friends have sent them Christmas gifts through the Emergency Committee for Miners Relief, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York City, and we cordially commend the committee to the attention of readers who have Christmas spirit and Christmas pennies to spare.

HENRY L. STIMSON has been named to fill Leonard Wood's vacant post as Governor General of the Philippines. Mr. Stimson was a close friend of Governor Wood's; he proved his executive ability as Secretary of War under President Coolidge sent him to settle the mess in Nicaragua. He established a kind of peace, although he did it by maintaining a beaten President in office and buying off the bulk of the Liberal army. The Marine Corps, left in power, still has tough problems to solve. The Filipinos can hardly be treated as cavalierly, nor, indeed, do we believe that Mr. Stimson would wish to do so. He is no featherweight, but a lawyer of high standing who has advocated a program of giving the Filipinos parliamentary responsibility, hoping, apparently, to prepare them for a status similar to that of Canada within the British Empire. If he still holds to that view he will find a light task ahead of him. The Filipinos are not—not yet, at any rate—anti-American, but they resented, as any people would resent, General Wood's attempt to thrust them back into less free-dom than they had attained and enjoyed.

OKLAHOMA'S DOGFIGHT has stopped for the Christmas holidays. That is sensible, but it is doubtful whether the holiday spirit will affect the spirit of the contestants. The House of Representatives, meeting after midnight in a hotel bedroom, has preferred charges against the Governor, and the Senate has convened as a court of impeachment to hear them. The Governor has withdrawn the militia whom he ordered to keep the legislators out of the State House, but he has not yet indicated any intention of replying to the indictment. To the original charges of maladministration has been added in public the allegation which has been whispered from the beginning—improper relations with his competent confidential secretary, Mrs. O. O. Hammonds. Readers of The Nation will recall Aldrich Blake's illuminating discussion of her astrology and politics in our issue of September 14. The legal right of a legislature to call itself into session is a matter for the courts to decide; but the layman would expect a governor who believed that he had done his duty to court rather than oppose investigation of his official acts.

NATIONALIST CHINA has broken off relations with Soviet Russia, while the conservatives of the North continue doing business as usual. The obvious explanation of this ironic fact is that Russian trade is an important part of the business of North China, while the consulates in the South have little trade to attend to and become inevitably centers of propaganda. But there is more than this. The capital of the Nationalist Government—which has recalled Chiang Kai-shek from his voluntary exile in an effort to win new strength—is at Nanking, within gunfire of the Western battleships, and it is within gassing distance of that center of all that is poisonous in China, Shanghai. It cannot exist in that area without the good-will of the British and other foreigners who control the Yangtze, and its expulsion of the Russians is in part an effort to win such good-will. It is also in part an expression of class differences within the Kuomintang, the Nationalist Party. In its youth that party succeeded in combining Chinese capitalists with Chinese labor and peasants. Today the gulf is deep between them, and the alliance of generals and bankers which has won control of the party organization is willing to go to any length to suppress proletarian movements among their fellow-countrymen. Scott Nearing's article, elsewhere in this issue, tells the past of the story. The present chapter is being written in blood at Canton. In suppressing an attempt by labor forces to overthrow the local general thousands were killed, hundreds in cold blood after the battle was over—among them sixty women whose revolutionary crime was that they had bobbed hair.

STUDENTS ON THE LOOSE are never a pleasant sight. When they stop shows or throw chinaware they are a pest; when, as in Rumania, they engage in anti-Semitic and anti-Hungarian riots in which numerous victims are killed and many others badly injured they become a national menace. At a recent Rumanian national congress in Oradia Mare, a frontier town, student delegates from Bucharest killed at least four persons and wounded about forty, and at the same time looted newspaper offices, shops, and the residence of the local rabbi, who was beaten into insensibility. On the way back to the university the student group continued its depredations on property and its attacks on Jews and Hungarians and injured an American citizen.

Local police made little if any effort to stop the raiders, and not until several days later did the Rumanian Government admit that the riots had really been the work of Rumanians. However, when Bucharest newspapers reported that various European and American firms had threatened to withdraw credits from Rumanian industry as a result of the student excesses, the Government decided to act. When the student delegates returned to Bucharest several hundred of them were arrested; a court martial for thirty-three of them has already begun; and delinquent police officials have been replaced. It is impossible to say how effective these punitive measures will be. Students who live in a country where government authority rests in the hands of a tyrannical few will not easily learn tolerance.

PARKER GILBERT'S third report as Agent General of Reparations is an optimistic document. He notes that while there were two million unemployed in Germany last January there are less than half a million today. The cost of living is rising, but an economist may regard that as an indication of a growing internal market. Virtually half the 1927 reparations payments were made in cash, as against two-thirds paid in kind last year. Mr. Gilbert still sees a need for caution and for administrative reform, but he credits the Government with good-will. He insists that reparations are a first charge on Germany, and that commercial loans have a secondary security; and he makes one pregnant remark, suggesting that there will be no final solution "until Germany has been given a definite task to perform on her own responsibility, without foreign supervision and without transfer protection." In other words, he wants the total of reparations finally fixed, and the responsibility for payment left entirely upon Germany's shoulders. He wants to abolish his own job and eliminate all suggestion of coercion. The French take this hint mildly, because they see in another phrase a suggestion that concurrently the whole question of inter-Allied debts should be reopened.

THE FLOOD-STRICKEN STATES of the Lower Mississippi Valley can find little consolation in the statement of President Coolidge that they are expected to bear part of the cost of future flood control. Adequate flood control will cost at least $200,000,000. Should the local communities be asked to pay a third of the total cost, their share would amount to approximately $67,000,000. To demand this vast sum from virtually bankrupt communities—in which the flood losses have been so great that State and local taxes have had to be remitted—is plainly to demand the impossible. On this score the United States Chamber of Commerce has taken issue with the President, advocating that the federal government assume the whole cost of controlling the Mississippi. The additional confusion which President Coolidge creates by connecting flood control with Western land reclamation is plainly due to a complete misunderstanding of the fundamentals of the situation.

A READER IN MINNESOTA, Viggo Justesen, notes our commendation of William B. Munro for his protest against "bawling at the voters," and writes to suggest a law making voting necessary under pain of losing the franchise. He proposes a constitutional amendment like this:

> Every qualified voter in a democracy has the duty of suffrage placed upon him when he accepts the privilege. If he shirks his duty he shall also be denied the privilege. If he fails to avail himself of his opportunity the opportunity shall be taken from him. For his first failure to vote his rights shall be revoked for two years; for the second failure, four years; for the third, eight years, etc.

Our correspondent thinks that with such legislation the electors who do not vote—reaching up to 50 per cent—would do so. Of these non-voters he says:

> Many of them fail to vote now merely because they feel they do not have time to become informed on political matters and consequently they will not cast an uninformed vote. That they will always vote wisely is highly improbable, but they are at least open to conviction. . . . There are enough of them to change the entire government if they saw fit. They could defeat Coolidge, and if shown him as he is, they would.

Australia recently passed a law under which a qualified elector who fails to vote is fined $10. In consequence the vote in 1925 was 90 per cent of the possible total instead of 60 per cent as in the last previous election. But we are unaware of any effect other than a larger number of ballots.

COMPULSORY VOTING, or any similar plan, would change politics in the United States as little, we believe, as "bawling at the voters." Indeed it is merely turning from persuasion to force. Our correspondent says of the 50 per cent of non-voters: "They could defeat Coolidge, and if shown him as he is, they would." But what is there in any kind of compulsory voting that would reveal Coolidge "as he is"? Such a revelation, if profound enough to be important, would also disclose our political system as it is; it would lay bare the deceptions and futilities of both of our major parties. When we plead to "get out the issues" we have in mind such a revelation, such a revaluation, of our political problems and possibilities. It is our contention that no substantial progress is to be expected from either the Republican or the Democratic Party as now constituted. Their platforms are equally evasive of realities and their candidates are alike indifferent to the welfare of the majority of the people. An exceptional candidate here and there cannot alter the general character of his party and tends only to preserve the beliefs of the public in an outworn system. Our two major parties have degenerated into window-dressing for the control of the country by a privileged minority. The average man sees this more clearly than he is sometimes believed to do. But either he thinks himself powerless to effect any change or else he prefers to take a gambler's chance for one of the big prizes instead of working to establish a more just system for all. In either case why go to the polls? Hope lies, not in persuasion or compulsion, but in more understanding, more courage, and more humanity.

HENRY NOEL BRAILSFORD, who is on his way to the United States, is an odd recruit in the army of English lecturers. He despises bunk; he does not soft-soap his own empire; he dares to criticize his own party. His editorship of the New Leader made it a force in international thinking in three continents; and his realistic analysis of post-war Europe has been a force for sanity. The New School for Social Research does itself honor in inviting him to lecture to its students. What Mr. Brailsford has to say of British labor, of the disrepute and future of democracy, of Europe's role in Asia and America's in Europe, will be worth hearing.

"The Sewer System of American Journalism"

MR. HEARST'S character, or lack of it, has long been known of all men who cared to study him. His journals have portrayed it in yellow and black, year in and year out. It is not often, however, that he paints himself as a journalist as clearly as he did when called before the Senate Committee on December 15 to inquire into his charges that $1,240,000 was taken from the Mexican treasury ostensibly to line the pockets of four United States Senators, together with other sums to procure the editor of The Nation, another editor as yet unnamed, and a newspaper syndicate likewise unnamed, for the Mexican cause. On the witness stand, under oath, there ensued the following colloquy:

> Q. Now, Mr. Hearst, when did you get the papers which contained the names of United States Senators? Were they in the first batch? A. They were in the first batch.
> Q. What investigation, if any, did you make to ascertain whether payments actually reached Senators as hinted at in these documents? A. We could not make any investitions without entirely disclosing the documents.
> Q. Well, did you make any? A. No.
> Q. Did you interview any of these Senators to find out their side of the transaction? A. No.
> Q. Did you make any investigation to find out whether the money mentioned in certain telegrams here had actually been transmitted by telegraph to New York? A. I think we tried to make such investigations. . . .
> Q. Have you obtained any evidence which indicates any Senator accepted any payment mentioned in these letters? A. No.
> Q. Have you any reason to believe that any Senator did accept any such money? A. I have no reason to believe it at all. As a matter of fact I do not believe it. I believe they did not. That is my personal opinion.
> Q. Have you any evidence or have you heard of any evidence to show that any of these Senators knew anything about this transaction? A. No.
> Q. How much did you pay in all for these papers, Mr. Hearst? A. I imagine about $15,000 or $16,000.
> Q. That was paid in instalments as the letters came along, was it? A. Yes.

We here have Mr. Hearst confessing that he printed documents falsely assailing the honor of American public men although he did not believe in their truth, admitting that he did not make any investigation whatever, so far as the Senators were concerned, to ascertain what the Senators themselves had to say about these charges. His pretense is that he published them with the names deleted, as he printed that affecting the honor of The Nation and its editor, in order to force a Congressional investigation. He was willing and ready to set afloat thereby a host of rumors which filled the lobbies at Washington and affected far more men than the four Senators named—in order, he says, to clear the honor of our public men! It is too thin. Honor and Mr. Hearst have too long been strangers to make it appear that they are now bedfellows. He printed those documents because he had paid $15,000 or $16,000 and did not want to lose his investment. He was after sensations to increase the circulation of his journals, and he took a chance of escaping libel suits by blotting out the names of the men he was willing to traduce. We do not believe that in the history of American journalism there has been more dastardly conduct in the responsible owner of an American newspaper. He has shown himself, as the New York World points out, unfair, cowardly, without scruple, and beneath contempt.

These adjectives and more besides he would merit if his publication concerned only the honor of the men directly affected. He deserves a still worse branding because the matter profoundly affects two great nations. The whole series of these documents which began with an attempt to show that Mexico had been taking sides against us in the Nicaraguan imbroglio was as if planned to injure the friendly relations between Mexico and the United States. For years past Mr. Hearst's course as to Mexico has been tortuous in the extreme. On May 3, 1916, he wrote over his own name: "Our flag should wave over Mexico as the symbol of the rehabilitation of that unhappy country and its redemption to 'humanity' and civilization. Our right in Mexico is the right of humanity." But on February 7, 1922, this devil a monk would be. He then asked plaintively a question particularly apropos in view of his latest performance: "Every human interest that appeals to a nation calls on us to do justice to Mexico—politics, diplomacy, business, national defense. . . . Why inflict conspiracy and injuries on a government that is trying to be friendly and from whose friendship we can derive only benefit?" Now he prints doctored documents, the dates of one of which he alters and "touches up" between editions, and seeks to spread abroad the belief that Mexico is bent upon corrupting for her own purposes the public men of America. We do not know if he was moved to this because of anger over his failure to have the titles to his Chihuahuan lands confirmed, as is alleged by the head of the Mexican government news agency, or not. He admitted on the witness stand that he feared the libel law if he printed the names of those involved and he sought to break the force of this admission by asserting that he, as a great property-owner in Mexico, had much more to lose by printing these documents. They might, he suggested, lead to hostilities against him in Mexico.

Well, they ought to lead to hostilities against him wherever decent men are assembled, wherever men have some regard for the honor of their country and the integrity of their public men. We have enough admitted sins by American public officials to answer for, heaven knows, without having baseless suspicions set on foot without the slightest attempt at an adequate inquiry. As a matter of fact, wherever we have heard the case discussed there has been only one opinion voiced—that the Senate Committee should sift the entire matter from top to bottom and find out the motives behind it, and that if any law exists against such scandalous journalism that law should be applied to Mr. Hearst himself, not to his tools and hirelings. We believe that there will be universal agreement with Senator Norris's public letter to Mr. Hearst in which he declares that Hearst's record in this case > is sufficient to place your publications in disrepute in the minds of all honest men, and it demonstrates that the Hearst system of newspapers, spreading like a venomous web to all parts of our country, constitutes the sewer system of American journalism.

Selling Jesus

THE Bible, Mr. Bruce Barton has told the world, is the book nobody (except Mr. Bruce Barton) knows, and Jesus is the man nobody (except Mr. Bruce Barton) knows. But his publishers, and the Review of Reviews Corporation, which offers Mr. Barton's books cheap with an eighteen months' subscription to their magazine, intend that everybody shall know what Mr. Bruce Barton knows. They intend to "sell" Jesus—or Mr. Bruce Barton's picture of Jesus.

"The Discovery of Jesus," they head their circular. Mr. Barton, it appears, discovered Jesus. He was dissatisfied with the elder version; he studied the texts; he got the dope. Hence the books—and the advertising copy. We quote:

> Jesus . . . a killjoy? He was the most popular dinner guest in Jerusalem. He was criticized because He enjoyed society too much.
> A failure? He picked up twelve men and forged them into an organization that conquered the world.
> When the business man finished reading [Jesus's own words], he exclaimed "This is a man nobody knows. Some day someone will write a book about Jesus. Every business man will read it and send it to his partners and salesmen, for it will tell the story of the founder of modern business."

Bruce Barton, we learn, was the business man, and finally he wrote the book himself. Perhaps he also wrote the advertising copy for it. We quote again:

> Jesus was a real executive . . . a great advertising man. . . . The parables are the greatest advertisements of all time. The principles of modern salesmanship are all brilliantly exemplified in Jesus's talk and work.

The story, the copy-writer says, is "the most exalted success story of all time." "Barton found that Jesus developed three rules for gaining success in any business." "Only strong, magnetic men build great organizations. He built the greatest organization of all." (The copy-reader should have looked up the history of St. Paul.) "Every employer in the United States," we learn, "ought to send copies of these books to the ten most valuable men in his organization." (Why only ten?) "They would give them a new thrilling conception of modern business."

But it is in the accompanying mimeographed letter that the copy-writer reached his peak. Once more we quote:

> DEAR READER:
> Jesus Christ "the founder of modern busine[illegible]"?
> Jesus a master of efficiency in organization, a born executive?
> Jesus a sociable man, a cheerful, bright companion with a pat story on His lips . . . wording the best advertisements ever written?
> . . . Barton's two books interest and aid the rich and powerful; they help any cub salesman to get orders for shoe polish—and to work on principles that lead him toward riches and power.

Riches and power—and orders for shoe polish. There was once a man who talked differently. "Blessed are the meek," he said. "Why take ye thought for raiment?" "Ye cannot serve God and Mammon." "Go and sell all that thou hast, and give to the poor." "Verily I say unto you that a rich man shall hardly enter into the Kingdom of Heaven." "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the Kingdom of God." And in one terrible passage: "Woe unto ye, scribes and Pharisees. . . ."

Railroading or Stockjobbing?

WITH the country at the threshold of important railroad consolidations and groupings, authorized by the Transportation Act of 1920, it is vital that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall insist that these new opportunities be used in the public interest, as the law provides, and not to stifle competition or pile up profits through speculation in stocks for railway officers and bankers. The Transportation Act does not repeal the Sherman and Clayton anti-trust laws which forbid a railroad to acquire control of a competing line through stock ownership. The newer legislation merely empowers the Interstate Commerce Commission to suspend the provisions of the older acts when it thinks this would be in the public interest. But railroad attorneys and bankers have stepped way beyond this. They have interpreted the Transportation Act as giving one road a right to acquire anything short of a majority ownership in a competitor before applying to the Interstate Commerce Commission, on the ground that otherwise the price might be raised to a prohibitive point.

This looks like a clear violation of the anti-trust statutes even if the purpose be legitimate—which is doubtful. Practical control of most companies can be obtained through holding less than a majority of the stock. It is just as effective usually to hold 49 per cent (or somewhat less) as 51 per cent. It is bad enough if a railroad, having violated the law in advance of its application to the Interstate Commerce Commission, obtains the approval of that body for its acquisitions, but it becomes doubly dangerous if the proposed arrangement is disallowed. A striking example is found in the recent history of the St. Louis Southwestern Railway Company, which operates about 1,000 miles of railroad between St. Louis and Shreveport, Louisiana. The St. Louis Southwestern, popularly known as the Cotton Belt, has been out of the control of its stockholders—and in that of its competitors—for nearly three years, most of this time subsequent to denials by the Interstate Commerce Commission of applications to acquire the road. Five months ago Walter E. Meyer, a minority stockholder in the Cotton Belt, asked the commission to proceed under the Clayton Act to compel the railroad's competitors to divest themselves of its stock, but no action has been taken.

In March, 1925, Edwin Gould, then in control of the St. Louis Southwestern, sold his interest to the Rock Island. That railroad then applied to the Interstate Commerce Commission for permission to do what it had already done—acquire stock control of a competitor. The application was denied the following August as against the public interest. Thereupon the Rock Island sold its holdings to the Kansas City Southern—another competitor of the St. Louis Southwestern. The Kansas City Southern, headed by L. F. Loree, had previously acquired a third of the stock of the Missouri, Kansas and Texas, popularly known as the Katy. Mr. Loree arranged to have the Katy take over the Kansas City Southern's 155,000 shares of Cotton Belt stock and later asked the Interstate Commerce Commission to O. K. his plans. On May 3, last, the application was denied by the commission as against the public interest, the following passage in the decision revealing the intricate financial methods resorted to:

> Between January 27 and February 26, 1926, and after the Kansas City Southern had thus acquired practical control of the Cotton Belt, the latter company purchased 100,000 shares of the common stock of the M. K. & T. Witnesses for the applicants stated that this purchase was in pursuance of a plan for the control of the M. K. & T. by the Kansas City Southern and Cotton Belt jointly, with the object of distributing the financial burden, but that as their counsel advised that there might be some question as to the legality of such control, it was decided that these 100,000 shares should be transferred to the Kansas City Southern. At the annual meeting of the stockholders of the M. K. & T. on April 9, 1926, the number of shares voted was 893,047 or 82.15 per cent of the total. Of these the Kansas City Southern voted as owned or through proxies 557,134 shares, including apparently the 100,000 shares owned by the Cotton Belt, or 51.25 per cent of the outstanding stock and 62.39 per cent of the total shares voted, and, as Loree testified, "the Kansas City Southern took control of the property, electing representatives from the group that had theretofore spoken for it under agreement." He further testified that a majority of the M. K. & T. directors were elected at the instance of the Kansas City Southern.
> The record also shows that the ten directors present at the meeting of the board of the M. K. & T. held on July 21, 1926, at which the resolution authorizing the company to acquire the 155,000 shares of Cotton Belt stock was adopted, held only 200 shares of the preferred and 1,310 shares of the common stock of the M. K. & T., of which 700 shares of common stock were held for account of the Kansas City Southern.

But according to the brief submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission last August by Mr. Meyer, in behalf of himself and other minority stockholders, the situation was even worse than indicated in the commission's statement. Mr. Meyer said:

> The total outstanding capitalization of St. Louis Southwestern consists of 198,936 shares of preferred and 163,561 shares of common stock; both preferred and common have equal voting rights. At the time of the annual election [the day after the commission's adverse decision] Kansas City Southern and Missouri-Kansas-Texas owned 135,000 shares of St. Louis Southwestern preferred and 20,000 shares of St. Louis Southwestern common. Messrs. Kuhn, Loeb & Company and Ladenburg, Thalmann & Company, banking advisers of the Kansas City Southern, owned 40,000 shares of the common. Thus, the roads in control and their banking advisers were the owners of 195,000 shares out of the total of 362,497 shares outstanding capital stock, amounting to over 51 per cent thereof.

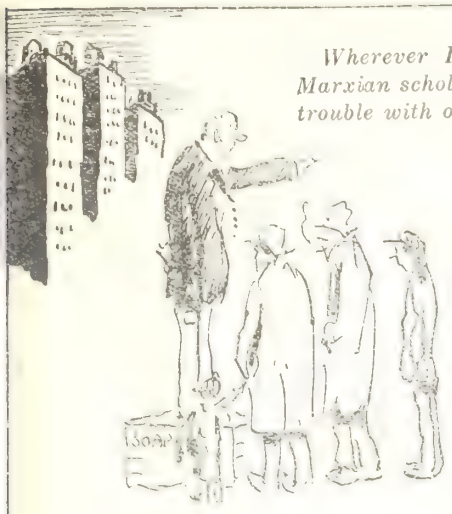
The opportunities for stockjobbing and profits for insiders in transactions like these are obvious. It may be impossible to prevent railroad officers from speculating individually in the possibilities arising through changing control, but they stand to lose if the Interstate Commerce Commission disapproves the plans. On the other hand, if railway officers commit their companies to the purchase of stocks, these men guarantee their speculations at the expense of the shareholders if the purchases result in losses. In its recent report to Congress the Interstate Commerce Commission asks for wider powers in connection with consolidations and stock acquisition among the railroads. It may need more power, but it appears to have sufficient authority already to end such flagrant abuses as those here described. Why not use it?

Women and Artists

ONE thousand of the foremost musicians and music-lovers of New York came together on December 18 to rejoice in the fiftieth anniversary of Marcella Sembrich's first appearance on the stage. Whom did they praise? A great artist, of course; but a greater woman. For here is one who, born in the simplest of Polish peasant homes, has possessed beauty and charm as well as musical genius, but never in her long life was she ever deprived of poise or swollen to conceit by her great fame and success or by the applause of a united musical world. Her charm, her simplicity, her inborn kindliness and unselfishness—these are today as fresh and untainted as her rare artistry itself. Unwilling even now to indulge herself by ease, unable to detach herself from her o'erweening passion for struggling musicianly youth, she teaches in winter at two great musical institutions, and all summer at her Lake George studio, with all the enthusiasm of her art. Throughout the audience were past and present pupils bringing to her a devotion and a love such as comes only to the greatest teachers.

Thirty years on the operatic stage, of which twenty-five were spent at the Metropolitan Opera in New York; ten years upon the concert stage; and now another ten as a teacher—such is the record of Madame Sembrich. She was of the galaxy of artists which opened the Metropolitan in 1883, and pictures of her in no less than twenty-nine operatic roles adorned the program of the dinner in her honor—a record surpassed in length by others, but surely by none in versatility. Mistress of the Italian art of coloratura singing, she turned, as one of the speakers said, from the operatic stage to the deeper art of interpreting the great deathless songs of the European peoples with a success that would alone insure her permanent fame if she had not secured herself a lasting place in musical annals by those exquisite, winsome, and charming appearances in opera which raised to the highest point the standards required by modern audiences in every role she essayed. Now they call her the greatest of teachers, a true mother to her pupils. She still cannot bear to hurt an aspirant for musical honors. Once she sent, without previous consultation, to another teacher a student who bawled so abominably that there seemed no hope whatever for her. "Madame X will tell you what I think," said Madame Sembrich. Madame X guessed when the pupil came, but decided to try what could be done. Two years later when she and Madame X met for the first time thereafter Sembrich's first question was for the girl who had seemed so hopeless.

Next to Madame Sembrich sat another wonderful veteran, Ernestine Schumann-Heink, a true American who has repaid a thousand times in her patriotic devotion what America has done for her. There again the great woman and the great artist united in a sturdy character, united in kindliness. She is retiring now after fifty-one years of public appearance—still pleasing and stimulating at sixty-six. And abroad is living, and teaching at seventy-nine, Lilli Lehmann, in memory still a part of musical New York. What giantesses, what admirable examples of great womanhood on the stage, what fountains of energy and power! What proof that to artistic supereminence may be coupled simplicity, sweetness, modesty, selflessness, the ardent desire to pass on one's art to others, and a deep sense of public responsibility in return for wonderful gifts of nature.



Wherever I go I hear learned Marxian scholars explain that "the trouble with our time is . . . " or ancient fossils telling each other "that the trouble with our time is . . . "

Meanwhile the real "trouble with our time" is simple. Every age had its own rhythm. There was for example the pleasant rhythm of the Greeks; there was the less pleasant but efficient rhythm of the Romans.

The pious Middle Ages had a rhythm all their own.

The ponderous seventeenth century had an awkward rhythm, which was followed by the gay rhythm of the eighteenth century;

but our own time has no rhythm; it borrows a little from all previous ages. Give us a rhythm of our own and we shall all be happy.

Rhythms of the Ages

It Seems To Heywood Broun

YEHUDI MENUHIN, the violinist, is ten years old and concert managers are offering him $5,000 for each concert. My own son is rounding nine and has not earned a penny. Naturally, the twenty-five cents which he gets on Saturday for taking cod-liver oil is not set down as sheer profit since that comes out of my own pocket. Under the circumstances I might be expected to wag my head in the direction of Yehudi and express concern that one so young should be deprived of childhood's heritage. But this I cannot do. It seems to me that infancy is much the hardest stage within the life of man. The years until sixteen are very largely wasted. When I see little ones romping and shouting at their play my emotion is largely tinged with sorrow.

Not for lost youth do I weep; no, not a single bucket. It makes me sad to watch folk fevered by the pursuit of pleasure. If fun came easily to children they would not work so hard in chasing it. Supposedly age brings weariness and loss of all illusions, but I will match a child shut in by rain against the world's severest cynic. "But there isn't anything to do" is not an adult whine.

I had long curls and was well fed and played with friends and neighbors. Looking back it seems to me the games were not enthralling. Most of the diversions of childhood are based upon the existence of some small Stephen who is made to bear the brunt of merriment. He who gets slapped finds tag a dreary pastime. I know a hundred grown-up activities more interesting than being a captive at prisoner's base. Our hide-and-seek was based upon the principle that all except the blind-fold boy retired to some yard and let him snoop about disconsolate till supper. In theory this evens up but I was "it" so often that I abandoned faith in the law of averages and Santa Claus with simultaneity.

Were Yehudi what is called a normal boy he might be in the streets muttering "All my sheep gather in a heap for I spy the woolly, woolly wolf." Or, perhaps, "Red Rover, Red Rover, let Isadore come over." Instead young Menuhin is playing the Beethoven Concerto. I have never played Beethoven but if half the pleasant things I've heard of him are true he offers far more entertainment than one horse cop or shinny.

"He was," one critic wrote about the young maestro, "happy, playing with entire sincerity and enormous enthusiasm." What more could any parents desire for their child? And still another commentator spoke of Yehudi's "languorous passion" and his "white-hot emotion," which gives him quite a start on most of the tots of ten.

And yet he is not spoiled, for when the interviewers came his father said, "Yehudi, go into the next room, please, and read your book." Obediently he trotted off, "Les Miserables" tightly clutched against his middy blouse. At that same age I was reading "Dick the Newsboy," by Horatio Alger. I believe that there is more in Hugo for a young and ambitious musician.

At one year Yehudi heard a symphony. At four he started on the violin and learned each day as much as most can cover in a month. Maybe he missed fantasies about some doggie with his patty-paws and Johnny Skunk and Peter Rabbit. For him there were no bedtime stories about great, big, enormous Mr. Moon. Instead he dozed off to some little thing by Wieniawski. A boy who can do Tartini's Devil's Trill (the G minor sonata) might well be restless if told much about Winnie-the-Pooh and think of Mr. Milne as pretty silly.

For such a precocious child Santa Claus must have been companionate and divorced at an early age. At this point great bearded men may be found bathed in tears and murmuring "Poor little chap." A slow and trusting child, I stuck to Santa Claus past my eleventh birthday and each minute of fundamentalism I now regret. If my life were in my hand to live all over I would choose to be enlightened at the age of two or earlier. Santa Claus is a big bully devised to entertain the cousins, aunts, and uncles. Few children find comfort in the myth. They took me to the store and let me see him. Next to the journey I made to the Chamber of Horrors in the Eden Musee to celebrate my being five I can remember few early contacts more terrifying.

"And how are you, my little man?" said the big yegg in the white whiskers. I said that I was very well and tried to get my hand away while he held on and inquired whether or no I had been a good boy.

And that I answered affirmatively, dreading all the while the lightning. My sled depended on faultless conduct and so naive was I that perfection passed me only by a very little.

Well, I got the sled. It was not quite the model but neither was I. Late years have proved it was infectious with inhibitions. Santa Claus, that perambulating Puritan, had set his mark upon me. Conviction came that desirable things were to be obtained only by complete submission of the will to others. All this happened back in the nineties but the results are not yet washed away. A thousand sleds could be purchased with the money I have given to psychoanalysts to bring back lost self-assertion. At times I take a stand both brave and right but when editors and idiots press me close there comes to some dark kingdom of my mind the sound of sleigh-bells worn by reindeer. The old pattern reaches out like an octopus. I am the slave of Santa Claus. He who must be placated is abroad again and waiting at the chimney top. For full stockings you must yield obedience and I am not designed to stand on empty ones. The old habit of conformity prevails. "Perhaps you're right," I say to the beefeater in authority. Heywood is a good boy once again and will not lack his orange.

I will waste no pity on Yehudi because he did not long believe that presents were carried to him by contented reindeer. What if he never heard the sky-bells on some frosty morning? Give a boy Brahms, Beethoven, and Mozart and Santa Claus is properly reduced to playing second fiddle.

Covering Washington

The Nation's Biweekly Washington Letter

By THE UNOFFICIAL SPOKESMAN

Washington, D. C., December 19

LESS than three years have elapsed since the Old Guard, bloated with pride over the 1924 landslide, voted to banish the Senate Progressives to political Siberia. The ceremony of expulsion was conducted with that unctuous air of superior virtue invariably associated with the names of George Wharton Pepper, William M. Butler, Simeon D. Fess, and other high priests and Pharisees of orthodoxy. Standpat newspapers throughout the land acclaimed the deed in editorials sometimes tinged with regret that the punishment of the radicals had not been made more drastic and painful, if not with firing squads or boiling oil, then at least with tar and feathers. That was the way to exterminate Bolsheviks—kick them out and hammer them over the head if they tried to return. Then the party, purged of their malign influence, could go forward to new triumphs of reaction.

* * * * *

ALAS, what a tragic reversal occurred last week when the Senate undertook to organize itself into a legislative body! Victorious in the elections, the despised radicals were all back in their seats; worse, they were back with reinforcements. On the other hand, several seats were conspicuously vacant among the Old Guard, notably those formerly occupied by Pepper, Butler, Wadsworth, and Lenroot. Deprived of the services of two distinguished Senators-elect, to wit, Vare of Pennsylvania and Smith of Illinois, the Old Guard found itself two shy of even a paper majority, and wholly incapable of doing any business whatever without the help of the spurned Progressives. Under the circumstances there was only one thing to do—frankly acknowledge that the Progressives had regained the balance of power, and give them their rightful places and whatever bonuses in addition that were necessary to obtain their cooperation. The proud and ancient boast that the Old Guard dies but never surrenders was exposed as just another myth.

* * * * *

NINE committee chairmanships are now in Progressive hands, including some of the most important. Borah heads Foreign Relations; Norris has Judiciary; Couzens, Education and Labor; Norbeck, Banking and Currency; Nye, the Public Lands; Frazier, Indian Affairs; Howell, Claims; Johnson, Immigration; and McNary (who at least is Progressive once in three times) has Agriculture. Moreover, on every important committee, excepting Finance and Privileges and Elections, the Progressives can join the Democrats to form a majority, and on Finance Couzens can produce a deadlock by voting with the Democrats. In addition, the Progressives wrung from the suffering Old Guard a pledge to permit a vote on three questions which clamor for attention: farm relief, restriction of labor injunctions, and investigation of our Latin-American policy. Not even in the heyday of the elder La Follette have the Progressives ever been so strongly intrenched to influence legislation.

* * * * *

THE greatest disappointment which Senator Walsh of Massachusetts has suffered in a long time came from the announcement that Chairman William M. Butler will not run against him next year. This means that Walsh will be only fairly certain of keeping his seat, whereas if Butler had chosen to run he would have been absolutely certain. Butler is Walsh's favorite opponent; he wishes he could have him every time. Butler was made to order for Walsh. Butler is slow; Walsh is quick. Butler is stupid; Walsh is keen. Butler is stiff and offish; Walsh is supple and ingratiating. Butler knows what the Union League Club thinks; Walsh knows what the voters think. A meeting between them is like a meeting between a Baptist parson and a piece of fried chicken—the outcome is never in doubt.

* * * * *

BUT if Butler has renounced further honors for himself, there is no sign he has renounced them for his chief. Mr. Coolidge probably is sincere in his efforts to say that he does not mean to run again, but Butler, in his fumbling, obvious way, undoubtedly was trying to set the stage for the "draft" act when he put the screws on the Southern Committeemen and made them vote for Kansas City for the convention. Secretary Hoover being the leading candidate for the nomination, Butler sends the convention to the center of the anti-Hoover belt and to the home of Hoover's bitterest critic. Thus he envisages a convention deadlock out of which the "unanimous demand" for Mr. Coolidge may come. The writer does not believe that Mr. Coolidge can be drafted. Calvin may not be a statesman, but he knows how to look after himself. He knows what would happen to his reputation in four more years. Now, after six years of trivialness, he can at least retire with a magnificent gesture. And with $400,000.

* * * * *

CHAIRMAN BUTLER'S main achievement, in addition to sending the convention to Kansas City, was to stir up the nastiest kind of a feud among the Committeemen. Never was his hopeless ineptitude better demonstrated. The Missouri politicians didn't want the convention, and made it perfectly clear that they were merely echoing halfheartedly the Chamber of Commerce ballyhoo back home. For them it means only endless work and worry. The Westerners really wanted it for San Francisco. They regarded Butler's intervention as unwarranted, improper, and gratuitous, and they departed from Washington with blood in their eyes and mayhem in their hearts. To arouse so much acrimony under circumstances so propitious to harmony required the full exercise of the only talent which Butler possesses—that for doing the worst possible thing in the worst possible way.

* * * * *

ALL those critics who were so indignantly denouncing Senator Wheeler three years ago for his methods in exposing the Department of Justice under Harry M. Daugherty have fallen strangely quiet since the publication of Colonel Charles R. Forbes's narrative in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch and the New York World. Forbes, just out of Leavenworth, where he expiated his part in the Ohio Gang's activities, piled detail on sordid detail to expose what was already known in general terms about the Harding era. He proved that Wheeler was right in contending that only crooks could testify to what went on under Daugherty, because only crooks were in on it. The chief protest recorded thus far against the publication of Forbes's "memoirs" came from the eminent journalist and business man, David Lawrence, who pronounced it "an outrage" to publish such slanders on such slight basis. Mr. Lawrence was not so squeamish a year ago when he sent out a syndicated article under his signature denouncing the correspondence between Senator Borah and President Calles regarding the Mexican oil laws, and declaring it unprecedented in the history of the Government. After sending it out, he took the trouble to ask Senator Borah about it and found out that it was not only precedented but had been quite common for more than a century. Perhaps Mr. Lawrence has grown more fastidious with increasing prosperity.

* * * * *

THE scarcity of able, independent, and courageous men in the Senate is graphically emphasized when Senators Walsh (of Montana) and Norris come down ill at the same time. At once the fight against the power trust languishes, and the bloated power trust lobby begins to have things its own way. Reed (of Missouri) and La Follette are busy with the Vare-Smith inquiry, and Borah has the Latin-American mess on his hands. The sad truth is that there aren't enough good men for the big jobs—not even one for each job.

Sire of the Eagle

By LYNN HAINES

THE world once more is agog over Charles A. Lindbergh: his 35,000-mile flight over the United States, his journey to Mexico through fog and rain make him more than ever his country's hero, the "Ambassador of Good-Will." And though the world saw his father very differently, "like father, like son" was never more perfectly illustrated than in Charles A. Lindbergh, senior and junior. No two could be more thoroughly alike. One chose statesmanship, the other aviation; that was the only difference between them.

It proved a tremendous difference, however. The very qualities of character which bring the world to one's feet in aircraft will place one beneath the feet of the world in statecraft. Lindbergh the younger demonstrates a surpassing courage, whereupon multitudes surge about him to do him honor. Lindbergh the elder was equally courageous and independent, but the masses he had to face were American mobs.

The father was tall and straight, a fine figure of a man. His face was outstandingly strong, alert, frank, and kindly. He was always calm and impersonal. He used no liquor nor tobacco. I never heard even the smallest "cuss word" pass his lips. He cared nothing for social life. If he had been asked to dance he would have made the same answer as does his lionized son: "I never learned how." To work was his greatest joy. If a task were important he liked to do all parts of it. For example, he had stenographers—and did most of his own typewriting. Probably nine-tenths of the many communications I have had from him were his own handiwork.

As everybody knows, Congressmen write their own autobiographies for the Congressional Directory. That contributed by the father of the world's most famous airman was the briefest, I think, ever published. Here it is:

"Charles A. Lindbergh, Republican, of Little Falls."

The world marvels at the modesty of the son. It is not at all inexplicable to me who knew the father's remarkable selflessness. Just once in the long period of our acquaintanceship did Congressman Lindbergh voluntarily refer to a personal matter. He was an attorney—a good one, of the Lincoln type; his honesty was unquestionable. Years before he had handled a Minnesota case for an Eastern millionaire. When this client died it was found that Lindbergh was named administrator of the big estate; and the will provided that no bond should be required for the execution of the trust. That unusual confidence in his integrity pleased him. He told me about it. It was the nearest to boasting that he ever got.

His industry was prodigious. Undoubtedly he was the hardest-working man ever in Congress. It was his daily habit to reach his room in the House Office Building before five o'clock in the morning. Once I asked him how and why he did it.

"I must have three or four hours each day by myself for study and writing. After nine there are always interruptions." That was his answer.

His outstanding characteristic was his courage. I remember one morning when he called me up and said: "Come over to the hospital at ten and visit with me while the doctors fix me up."

"What's the matter?" I asked.

"Oh, a little operation," he replied.

It was not a little operation, and he went through it without an anaesthetic. The ordeal lasted more than an hour and he never gritted his teeth or even gripped my hand, except for a few seconds, when the surgeon's knife pierced the abdominal cavity.

All through that episode we talked about international banking. I had discussed big public problems with him many times, in his office and at my home, but I do not remember an occasion when his mind was given more unreservedly to a serious subject. There was no hint of a distraction. He seemed utterly unmindful of any suffering. He continued with his exposition of a particular point after being taken to his room. Not once did he mention the surgery, except indirectly, when he apologized for having subjected me to an unpleasant experience.

For ten years he was a Congressman from Minnesota, representing the Little Falls district. If, at any time during that decade, this district had attempted secession there would have been no civil war over it. The powers that be, both Republican and Democrat, would eagerly have sacrificed even a larger territorial part of the Union to get rid of Lindbergh. A question naturally arises: Why did they not go out and defeat him? They tried, repeatedly. I once asked an Old Guarder why they did not succeed. His explanation was interesting, and possibly had some significance. "We spent so much money," he said, "trying to lick Lindbergh that the district became too prosperous to care about a change."

He first got in, I suspect, because he was a likable and honest lawyer. His integrity was known to every man and woman in that section of the State. When Lindbergh was admitted to the bar, having graduated in the law class of the University of Michigan at twenty-three (1883), he subscribed most thoroughly and conscientiously to the oath of an attorney. He regarded his profession as an official part of the judicial machinery. As a lawyer he acted accordingly. A guilty client did not interest him. It became a tradition in central-eastern Minnesota that he was concerned only in helping to find the exact justice of every controversy.

In Congress he was a radical of the advanced, uncompromising type. He tackled the biggest and politically most dangerous national issues. Therefore he was hated and misrepresented more bitterly perhaps than any public man of his generation. "Socialist" was among the mildest of the epithets hurled at him. His enemies accused him of being unsocial. They implied that he shunned functions because of a "crudeness" that was embarrassing to him. Nothing could be further from the truth. He was thoroughly a gentleman, both by birth and breeding. He cared nothing for the social life of the capital, preferring to be studiously by himself, but when it seemed a duty, because of his position, to attend some social event he did so. Social life, aside from its unattractiveness, did not at all fit into his Congressional habits. He could not consistently be about his work at five in the morning if the midnight hours were given to sociability.

It would not have mattered to the orthodox politicians how much he made a slave of himself, but the results were troublesome. He was better prepared on serious subjects than any "bolshevist" ever encountered, either before or after bolshevism became a well-recognized bugaboo.

The "money trust" was Lindbergh's chief obsession. Not many Congressmen are friends of the "money trust," but few of them at that time ardently desired to stir it up. "Let sleeping dogs lie," was quite generally the Congressional policy. Lindbergh, however, persisted in keeping the dangerous animal thoroughly awake. Moreover, he wanted to kennel it, and put the key in the people's pocket. He demanded an investigation of the "money trust," and got it, although others took the credit.

Lindbergh introduced his resolution for a Congressional inquiry in July, 1911. At first it was not taken seriously. But those five o'clock study periods quickly began to show their results. He made out so strong a case that it could not be ignored.

The Democrats were then in control of the House. Lindbergh was nominally a Republican, although that party regarded him as an undesirable alien. It was not good politics for those in power to permit any kind of a Republican to sponsor so big a thing as the "money trust" investigation. Other resolutions were presented by Democrats. Henry of Connecticut was the author of one; Pujo of Louisiana of another, the latter's being adopted on February 24, 1912.

From a beginning in which he stood practically alone, Lindbergh saw this inquiry approved by the House with only eight dissenting votes. Among these dissenters were four famous Republican names—Cannon, Dalzell, Gillett, and Tilson. So the Pujo Committee came into being. It was Lindbergh's work. It ought to have been the Lindbergh Committee. Senator Norris, then a Congressman, demanded that Lindbergh be given the credit, but that was not to be. It is doubtful if Lindbergh cared who got the credit so long as an investigation was made.

This "money-trust" fight was continuous until Lindbergh voluntarily left Congress, March 4, 1917. The investigation was no sooner under way than he turned his attention to the Glass-Owen bill, which created the Federal Reserve System. He opposed that measure with a vigor and determination rarely exceeded in public life. However one may regard the now existing system, then created, Lindbergh's first speech in that debate was a marvelous exposition of the history and economics of financial legislation. His research had been amazing. He presented documents of which most Congressmen had never heard. Of course the Glass-Owens bill passed, and is now the law of the land. He did not quit. He kept on studying currency and credit. His vigilance in watching the Federal Reserve System was unceasing. Four years later, shortly before the end of his Congressional career, he arose and said:

> Mr. Speaker and the House of Representatives, I, Charles A. Lindbergh, the undersigned, upon my responsibility as a member of the House of Representatives, do hereby impeach W. P. G. Harding, governor; Paul M. Warburg, vice-governor; and Frederick A. Delano, Adolph C. Miller, and Charles S. Hamlin, members, each individually as a member of the Federal Reserve Board, and also all of them collectively as the five active working members of said board, of high crimes and misdemeanors.

There followed fifteen counts of an indictment, each of which he said: "I stand ready to prove."

He asked the House not to dispose of the solemn proceedings "by a motion to lay on the table. It would not be doing justice to the country if done in that way." He said:

> Either I am right in presenting these articles of impeachment or I am wrong. If I do injustice to the House, if I do injustice to the country in preferring articles of impeachment which ought not to be preferred, then it is the duty of the House to discredit me for doing that thing. I do not, however, expect to be discredited, though undoubtedly powerful influences will be used to prevent favorable action on the articles of impeachment.

The matter was referred to the Judiciary Committee and, of course, no action was taken.

A confidential talk I had with him about this impeachment of the Federal Reserve Board can now be told. As a publicist, I was interested in knowing what was back of it.

"Will the House act on your charges?" I asked.

"No," he answered; "I don't expect any result like that."

"Why, then, did you make the indictment?"

There followed an hour of prophecy—which seemed almost inspired in view of what happened. He pointed out what this federal agency could and would do after the war, especially with respect to agriculture. He predicted the manipulated deflation of 1920, which squeezed from twenty to thirty billions out of the farming industry, leaving it hopelessly crushed and broken.

Lindbergh took part in the revolt against Cannonism. That was just a flurry for most of the insurgents. Characteristically he kept on fighting after the others had quieted down. The House rules were not reformed as a result of that Cannon controversy. So as late as the Sixty-fourth Congress he made a lone effort "to break the power of the bosses." He staged a one-man filibuster, objecting to all "unanimous consent business," seeking thus to force the masters of the House to act on four remedial amendments he had presented. He did not succeed, because it was physically impossible for a single individual to stay on the job every minute for the weeks that were needed to win.

Charles A. Lindbergh did not stand for reelection to the House in 1916. The World War was raging. We had not entered "the hell-storm," as he called it; but he foresaw our participation and the reaction it would bring. That meant bigger, more vital struggles for him. He could return to Congress but the issues would have to be fought out in larger election contests in order that more people might be reached. The governorship of Minnesota or a seat in the Senate was what he must seek—unselfishly, I think. He was anti-war, from start to finish. "Probably I'll go down," he said to me, shortly before the war vote was taken and he was defeated by a narrow margin. He returned to Minnesota, and spoke his convictions wherever he went. He was mobbed more than once, by the war-frenzied. But he was not in the least afraid.

The supremest test of courage comes when one confronts the unknown. Charles A. Lindbergh, Sr., was above all superstition. He faced death, as he did life, with absolute fearlessness. Pioneers are much the same the world over. Lindbergh the elder was as truly a trail-blazer as is his son. The boy, fortunately, tackled something that could be demonstrated at once. The father had ideas which were a generation ahead of the popular capacity for comprehension.

Rumania Free from the Lion's Paw

By G. E. R. GEDYE

Bucharest, December 2

"ABRATIANU," they say in the cafes of Bucharest, "has always a king to do his will" and so, since the father of Jon Bratianu fetched Carol I from Sigmaringen, it has always been. No wonder that foreign observers, seeing the country deprived of both Bratianu and king, foresee disaster for the state. True, there is an industrious financial pedant bearing the name of Bratianu, as there is a child bearing the title of king, but the one is as well fitted as the other to fill the vacant places. For good or ill, a chapter in Rumanian history closes with the death of Jon Bratianu. The efforts of the Liberals, with Vintila Bratianu at their head and M. Duca, the Minister of the Interior, furnishing such driving force as they possess, are directed toward picking up the threads of the story in the new chapter; those of Julius Maniu, the leader of the National Peasant Party, toward making the last chapter the end of a volume.

Jon Bratianu was a great man and a gifted personality. He was no mere figurehead like Pilsudski, no "pocket Mussolini" like General Averescu or like General Pangalos in Greece, but a full-blooded, authentic dictator in his own right. I well remember the superb gesture with which I saw him sweep aside the entirely righteous protests in Parliament of Julius Maniu against his (Bratianu's) arbitrary regulation of the succession. It was at the first sitting of the Chamber after the death of King Ferdinand. Maniu set forth at length the long series of violations of the constitution through which Bratianu had secured the power to exclude Carol, to make little Michael king, and to appoint a Council of Regency obedient to himself. The Opposition leader concluded with a ringing declaration that his party—which everyone knew even then to possess the confidence of the vast majority of Rumanians—refused to recognize the new settlement. Bratianu, who had listened with growing impatience, disdained a reply worthy of the name. In half a dozen crisp sentences he conveyed to the Deputies that what he did was right, that black was white if he said so, and that he desired to hear no more of these futile and querulous protests. Gathering up his papers he turned on his heel and left the Chamber. The President immediately suspended the sitting. Thus ruled Bratianu.

Yet there is much for which the country had to thank him. Throughout the earlier years of the war he bargained cautiously, first with the Allies and then with the Central Powers. Had either side realized how far he had gone with the other, his territory would have been invaded. The Central Powers in particular cast longing eyes on the grain and oil of Rumania, but refrained from taking it by force because Jon Bratianu succeeded in making them believe that he was on the point of selling it to them at his own price. He concluded his bargain with the Allies at last and, at a moment when his country was almost entirely surrounded by their enemies, declared for the Allied cause. His realization that despite all outward appearances the Allied side was going to prove the winner was an instance of the man's sagacity not to be discounted because his country was immediately overrun by the enemy. Caring little what the Allies might desire, he preserved his capital intact by refusing to defend it, and so arranged matters that the greater part of the devastation wrought in the country—the destruction of the oil wells—was done by the Allies who, unless his entire calculations were wrong, would have to pay up promptly. What else stands to his credit? Certainly the nationalization of the land, on which Greater Rumania is founded. The expropriation of the owners of unwieldy latifundia was vitally necessary to preserve the country from sheer anarchy. This fact has to be weighed against all protests of the Hungarian landlords, who still demand that they alone should be exempt from the measure while native-born Rumanian landlords suffer under it. Should the careless drafting of the Treaty of the Trianon really secure them this immunity —and there is much reason to believe that a strict interpretation of the treaty's clauses will do so—the treaty-makers will be responsible for creating another intolerable situation in Europe. The nationalization of the subsoil—which means, of course, of the oil supplies—was another wise measure of Jon Bratianu, and everyone will approve of his action in abolishing the laws limiting the franchise to a few rich landowners and in conferring universal suffrage.

The Liberals propose to erect a statue to him bearing no name, but having these words inscribed on the pedestal: "Greater Rumania, expropriation and redistribution of land, universal suffrage." The hypocrisy of the inscription is exposed by the simultaneous proposal of his brother, Vintila, to the Peasant Party of M. Maniu to hold elections from which the peasants are to emerge with 45 per cent of the seats! The proposed inscription on the statue of Jon Bratianu would be justified if the reverse side bore the words: "Alienation of the liberated Rumanians, employment of expropriated land and mineral wealth for purposes of political corruption, nullification of the franchise by a perfected system of violence and fraud."

There is much to be said in defense of Jon Bratianu's conduct of affairs in the past; there is nothing to be said for the desire of the Liberal Party to perpetuate this bribery and corruption which is slowly but surely destroying Rumania. Julius Maniu has admitted to me that at the end of the war the whole country was behind Bratianu, particularly his own people, the Rumanians of Transylvania, who thanks in part to the clever bargaining of the Rumanian Premier had been released from the merciless oppression of Hungary. Bratianu was a man of the Orient —one cannot, if one wishes to understand Rumania, hear too often that only fifty years ago all that before the war was Rumania was sunk in the degradation of Turkish misrule. This Oriental province Bratianu ruled with the absolutism, corruption, and bribery to which the East is accustomed. His great mistake was that, while posing as the Prime Minister of a Western Power and refusing indignantly to admit even that Rumania was a Balkan state because of the admixture of Latin blood in the veins of her people, he encouraged a system which he should, even in Little Rumania, have tried slowly to abolish, but which in Greater Rumania should not have been tolerated for a day.

But the Liberals were less a party than a consortium of bankers who under the cloak of politics had laid all the Regat (Little Rumania) under tribute to themselves and who proposed to secure still greater spoils in the vast new territories which had been acquired. No effort was made to consolidate the country, to create merely Rumanians out of the orientalized inhabitants of the Regat, the Austrianized people of the Bukowina, the Magyarized Rumanians of Transylvania, and the Bessarabians, who are still unpersuaded that they are not Russians. Thus Julius Maniu, who had devoted the first half of his life to resisting the tyranny of the Magyars and in struggling toward unity with the Rumanians of the Regat speedily found himself compelled to devote the second half to combating the corruption and dishonesty of the Regat with which his country had been united.

There is, of course, no looking back to the past. M. Maniu emphasized to me that the misgovernment of the minorities in Rumania by M. Bratianu could not in any way be compared with the tyranny of the Hungarians when they ruled in Transylvania, and declared that not one Rumanian could be found who considered the Hungarian propaganda for a revision of the Treaty of the Trianon as anything but mischievous.

The liberal press of Bucharest rings with appeals to M. Maniu to be patriotic and to recognize that the country needs a united government. I do not think that the brilliant and clear-sighted Transylvania lawyer is likely to compromise with unrighteousness. Vintila Bratianu's financial policy of the past six years has been a complete failure. The leu is still unstabilized, the cost of living is still rising. Jon Bratianu's diplomacy won him distrust abroad, and foreign capital fights shy of the lesser brother. The Liberals are as discredited as any party could be, and they have lost their powerful head. Behind them stands nothing but the power of the banks. Worst of all, they have no leader. There is no other party in the country. General Averescu will hastily attach himself to the winning side when the issue is decided—if they will have him. There is no Carolist party, though Maniu preserves an open mind on the question of the return of the Prince, and after he has attended to more urgent matters is likely to sanction it if the Prince will accept the strict conditions which he intends to impose.

The country itself is enormously rich and capable of development, requiring only an honest and efficient regime. The apathy of the people is a drawback, but this is often exaggerated. The peasantry in many parts of the country is hard-working, and this does much to counteract the indolence of the city population and of other sections of the peasantry. Despite the display of uniforms on every hand, the Rumanians are not a military people, and a period of external peace is certainly essential. Given that, the tragic death of the greatest Rumanian, Jon Bratianu, may yet prove the salvation of the country which he had created but was conducting slowly to ruin.*

A Challenge to Mr. Rockefeller

By MORRIS L. ERNST

THE NATION has been running a series of articles called Americans We Like in distinction to the equally accessible list of Americans We Detest. If it ever gets around to the more complex group of Americans Who Disappoint—being a cross between the other two—I wish to nominate John D. Rockefeller, Jr. During the past month when opportunity arose he twice failed to earn the Distinguished Service Medal—an award for service outside of the realm of duty. His wealth and his control of industries segregate him from the ordinary run of men. In consequence his duties to society commence at those zones which describe the bounds of other men's obligations.

As a human he must be likable and kindly. I speak from no personal knowledge. Acquaintance with some of his more liberal advisers, the simplicity of his bequests, and his sincere recognition of a social responsibility form the basis of this guess. He gives money with finesse. He cannot give in the sense of making a personal sacrifice, but measured against others who own the earth—George Baker, Morgan, Ford—his benefactions make them appear misers.

And yet what a disappointing score he has made during this past month. As to failure number one, I submit the following: He is reputed to be the leading factor in the American oil business. His resources, financial and spiritual, could be a dominant factor in the business out of which he and his father made that money which, via foundations, is being contributed by American gasoline users to medical patients in Palestine or typhus sufferers in Poland. Sinclair and Doheny have been stamped by the Supreme Court of the United States as corrupt. They tried to cheat the government. I assume that Mr. Rockefeller, Junior, read the scorching words of the highest court. I assume that he knows that the Petroleum Institute is the trade association of the oil industry created for the benefit of the industry but not necessarily organized to work against the best interests of this nation. Doheny and Sinclair came up for reelection as directors and were in fact elected. John D., Jr. remained mute. He was not at the meeting—the representatives of his companies answered the roll instead. In his defense it is said that he doubtless urged the defeat of Sinclair and Doheny at the directors' meetings of the companies in which he owns large interests. That may be enough for an ordinary man; it is not for a man with his vast stockholdings—and vast responsibilities. And even if he cannot speak officially, why not as the churchman and the giver? Must his income outstrip his courage?

The second regret of lost opportunity arises over Colorado. In that State habeas corpus is dead. Civil liberty in wide areas has been destroyed. The merits of the workers' demands are small issues as compared to the lawlessness of mine owners and public officials. I do not share in the common belief that the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company union plan is the sole cause of this unhealthy mess. The experiment known as the Rockefeller plan indicated at least a desire to try to work out the industrial problems of the Rockefeller mines. That I judge it a weak and hasty makeshift is aside from the point. The only important fact is that the present warfare started at or near the Rockefeller mine and spread to the areas where murder and the military still ride. And Mr. Rockefeller makes no statement.

Friends of Mr. Rockefeller explain that the Rockefeller mines are separate from the present areas of un-American distress. This is not a satisfactory alibi. Mr. Rockefeller is the leader in the Colorado mining area. No longer can any member of an industry claim an isolation from trade responsibility. Much less can Rockefeller, the richest, desert his crowd—he must mix and share with them and he can gain distinction by leadership in front rather than silence on the side. The workers march with song and spirit, starting at the Rockefeller gate. Their feet may take them far away but even from a distance they will picket him. He cannot avoid them by silence.

No American has as many opportunities for Distinguished Service Orders as Mr. Rockefeller. No one has disappointed more often. Baker, Morgan, Ford have cut out no wordy hopes for ethical and moral leadership. Their rule is only in the counting house. Mr. Rockefeller, with one eye on the altar, raises hopes of moral courage and spiritual leadership. One sentence of moral indignation from him directed against Sinclair and Doheny or against the impairment of old-fashioned American civil liberty in Colorado would be equal to a lengthy speech by silent Cal.

The White Terror in China

By SCOTT NEARING

[Since Mr. Nearing wrote, cables from China report "several thousand Reds" executed in Canton, and more killed in Hankow and Shanghai.]

Moscow, en route for China, November 25

CHINA is not a pacifist country. Its recent history contains many instances in which thousands of people have paid with their lives for opposition to an established order. The closing months of 1926 and the early months of 1927, however, wrote a new record of Chinese executions.

Drastic as were the suppressions under Yuan Shih-kai, only military tribunals or duly constituted courts could sentence persons to death. During the present year every local military commander seems to have included the right of death sentence among his other prerogatives. Chang Tso-lin has never hesitated to execute those who opposed him. But he usually gave the semblance of a trial. His opponents were arrested, spent some time in jail, inquiries were made into their cases, some opportunity was given for defense, and there was at least a decent interval between their arrest and execution.

Several scores of revolutionists have been arrested and executed by Chang Tso-lin during the last two years. It is difficult to say exactly how many. Arrests have been frequent and among those arrested a considerable portion have paid the death penalty for the slightest of charges, such as "carrying on propaganda subversive of army discipline"; "suspicion of Communist activities"; "propaganda for the Kuomintang."

South China and the valley of the Yangtze furnish the real seat of the White Terror during 1926 and 1927. It was there that the danger to established Chinese institutions and the need for suppression were most obvious.

After the Kuomintang convention of 1924 there was a sharp division in the party between those who were in favor of cooperating with Russia and of admitting Communists into the Kuomintang and those who were opposed to such a policy. Sun Yat-sen was in the former group. The "Western Hills" leaders were in the latter. Chiang Kai-shek was one of their adherents. When the Nationalist armies moved north in the spring and summer of 1926 they carried with them a wave of mass sentiment that expressed itself in strikes and peasant uprisings that seemed to threaten the established order in China.

The strikes of 1926 were directed in the main against Chinese industries. The peasant uprisings of 1926-1927 were, of course, directed entirely against the Chinese gentry. Thus the revolutionary movement which swept north through China after the summer of 1926 constituted a direct threat to the economic and social position of the Chinese industrialists and the Chinese landlords.

Already in January and February the terror had begun. The Chinese Relief Organization has compiled figures showing that between January and March, 1927, 1,174 persons were executed without trial. The courts, not including courts martial, condemned 2,286 persons to death during these three months.

Shanghai fell into the hands of one of Chiang Kai-shek's generals on March 21, 1927. The Nanking incident occurred three days later. The split in the Kuomintang organization which had begun in January, 1924, culminated in the bloody White Terror of April, May, and June, 1927.

It was not the generals who took Shanghai. The armed workers of the city drove out Sun Chuan-fang as the Nationalist army approached. Chiang Kai-shek's first action in Shanghai, however, was forcibly to disarm the workers and to destroy their organization. In the course of these operations a considerable number of workers lost their lives. During the next week the reign of terror began. In the Yangtze Valley and throughout Southern China Communists and members of the left Kuomintang group were arrested and executed by thousands. Some were tried. Many were shot within twenty-four hours of their arrest. The Chinese Relief Organization has compiled these figures covering South China, including the Yangtze Valley:

April, 1927
Condemned to death by court	215	persons
Executed without trial	346	"
Injured	999	"
May, 1927
Condemned to death by court	158	"
Executed without trial	822	"
Injured	134	"
June, 1927
Condemned to death by court	246	"
Executed without trial	1,974	"
Injured	758	"

Among those executed 2.2 per cent were women; 5.8 per cent were merchants; 12.7 per cent were intellectuals; 14 per cent were soldiers; 23.3 per cent were workers, and 39 per cent were peasants. Since June, figures are lacking. The papers do not publish details and official figures are not available, but the reign of terror is still going on. Most of the known Communists have already been hunted down.

How many Communists and members of the left-wing Kuomintang lost their lives between February and October, 1927? It is difficult to say. Conservative estimates place the number well above 5,000. Many of the Chinese revolutionary leaders claim that it has exceeded 20,000. Whatever the number, the Chinese reign of terror has accomplished three purposes:

1. It has destroyed the immediate revolutionary effectiveness of the left-wing movement by depriving it of some of its most competent leadership;

2. It has driven the Communist and left-wing movement from the field of open political activity to the field of underground revolutionary organization;

3. It has convinced the leaders of the Chinese revolution that they have nothing to hope from legal action.

The foreigners of the imperialist Powers played a direct role in the White Terror; in a number of instances they turned over to Chiang Kai-shek members of left-wing organizations who were found in the foreign Concessions. The Chinese bourgeoisie also played a direct role in the White Terror; it was only after he had captured Shanghai and made his alliance with them that Chiang Kai-shek launched his campaign of murder. The Chinese gentry directed the White Terror against the peasantry; they believed that their property holdings were at stake and they stopped at nothing to defend their privileges.

The Chinese White Terror adds another to the long line of instances occurring during the last ten years, in which the members of the privileged class have jailed and murdered indiscriminately whenever they have felt that their position was really threatened.

In the Driftway

IT is disappointing to salt-water cranks like the Drifter to reflect that much dust is likely to lie over the Fishermen's Cup before it is pulled down from the shelf and rubbed up for another competition. The loss of the schooner Columbia last summer eliminates the most important contender for the trophy in the United States and adds to the improbability that the disagreement which broke up the last contest, that in 1923, will be straightened out in the near future. Gasoline is becoming more important than sail to the Down East fishing fleet.

* * * * *

THE loss of the Columbia went almost unnoticed by the public because it is a tale that never has been and never can be told. There was no story for the newspapers and so no obituary in them. The Columbia simply went out and—did not come back. She was last sighted off Sable Island on August 23. The next day a terrific gale snorted and bellowed along the coast, driving scores of vessels to harbor and tumbling others as wreckage on the granite-plated shores that are so beautiful to summer tourists and so grim to distressed seamen. But there was no fear for the Columbia. She did not run ashore and, until some weeks had passed, was believed to be busy catching and stowing away a cargo of fish. Gradually the idea grew that the schooner might have gone down—then that she probably had. Finally, when stories came to Gloucester in early October of the finding by life savers near Sable Island of dory planks bearing the Columbia's name, the schooner was chalked up to the unpaid and unpayable account of the sea.

* * * * *

AN article in the Boston Globe suggests that a jinx hangs over Gloucester's champions in the fishermen's races. It almost seems so. Two of the four have been lost, while a third went aground the day she was launched. The Esperanto, which beat the Nova Scotia schooner Delawana in the first contest for the Fishermen's Cup, in 1920, struck a submerged wreck near Sable Island the following year and was a total loss, although the crew escaped in dories. Now the Columbia has gone down, probably in the same locality. The Henry Ford ran ashore near the mouth of the Essex River the day she was baptized, but got off only to be outsailed by the Bluenose in the races for the international trophy in 1922. In addition, three candidates for the job of upholding Gloucester's reputation in the cup races—although not actual contestants in them—have met disaster. The Mayflower, specially built as a cup defender in 1921, was ruled out on the ground that she was a racing craft rather than a bona fide fisherman, necessitating the sending of the diminutive Elsie to certain defeat by the big schooner Bluenose. The next winter the Puritan was laid down as a cup contender from designs by Burgess. She never got the chance; she, too, was wrecked the following June on Sable Island, "the graveyard of the Atlantic." Incidentally the Columbia, also a Burgess-designed craft, came near losing her chance in the races too. She hardly had left the ways in 1923 when she had a serious collision with a French trawler. Fortunately she was repaired in time for the races to choose Gloucester's contender for the cup. She won these but had a stiff competitor in the Elizabeth Howard, known around Cape Ann as the White Ghost. A few months later the White Ghost, gone astray in a white fog, grounded near Halifax and went to pieces, all her men but one escaping.

* * * * *

THE Fishermen's Cup races of 1923 ended in a tiff which has prevented any competition since. The Bluenose won the first encounter. The second was a failure for lack of wind. In the third the Bluenose crossed the finishing line first but was disqualified for passing a buoy on the wrong side. Another race was ordered, but Captain Walters of the Bluenose sulked in his tent, or wherever a disgruntled skipper retires to sulk. Captain Pine was then invited to sail the Columbia over the course for the cup but, declining any such empty victory, headed back to Gloucester. This and previous disagreements in the competition for the Halifax Herald's cup suggest that, if the contest is to be revived, its character should be changed. Fishermen who spend their lives in a vital fight with the sea have no stomach for the fine rules and the specialized seamanship of a harbor regatta. They need a bit of open water and more than a puff and a half of wind to stir their blood so that they will forget to wrangle. An open ocean race, too, would banish the temptation to build any more peapods like the Mayflower. THE DRIFTER

Save-the-Men Movement

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A movement has begun in this city to prevent men from contaminating girls with the cigarette habit. Two instances of this have been observed.

When I was working last spring for George H. Doran Company, publishers, 244 Madison Avenue, since merged with Doubleday, Page and Company, I noticed that all the men in the office smoked pipes. My boss, Alan Rinehart, occasionally took a whiff at a cigarette after looking about furtively. Upon inquiry I discovered that Mr. Doran forbade the men to smoke cigarettes as the girls were smoking too. Now the girls smoke in the washroom.

Feeling economical I went to the Y. W. C. A. cafeteria on Madison Square for lunch one day recently. There were many more men than women in the room. Several men were smoking cigarettes so I lit a cigarette. Presently the elderly woman cashier came up to me. "Girls are not permitted to smoke here," she said. "But the men are smoking," I remonstrated. "Yes, but they can only smoke at lunch time. Girls don't come here for lunch." Then she added benevolently: "But as this is the first time I've seen you here I guess there's no harm done."

Christmas in Old Age

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: At this Christmas season your readers will be interested to learn of, and perhaps help, one of the most important movements recently undertaken to provide an honorable and self-respecting means of caring for our worn-out toilers.

The problem of old-age dependency in the United States is growing more serious every day. Many employers today refuse to give employment to men and women after the forties. But even at this time of stagnant public sentiment a vigorous and powerful movement in behalf of old-age pension legislation is developing. Six States and the Territory of Alaska have already enacted such laws on their statute-books. Local committees urging this legislation have been organized in many States and a drive for such legislation launched.

Sponsoring and stimulating this movement is the American Association for Old Age Security with offices at 104 Fifth Avenue, New York City. This association was organized about a year ago and is headed by Bishop Francis J. McConnell of the Methodist Episcopal Church and A. Epstein, author of "Facing Old Age." It is made up of representatives of labor, the churches, and various other civic bodies. It aims to promote adequate security for the old people of our community by means of State and federal legislation. In order to carry on this movement most effectively, the association is badly in need of financial help to meet its modest budget for 1928.

I am certain many of your readers are sufficiently interested in this humane cause to place the American Association for Old Age Security on their Christmas gift-list.

Boulder Dam and Arizona Culture

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Swing-Johnson Bill proposes the construction by the federal government of a large dam in the Colorado River at Boulder Canyon. The dam is not to be wholly on Arizona soil, as Mrs. Austin states in The Nation for November 9; on the contrary, it is to be erected on public lands of the United States; half of it within the political boundaries of Arizona and half in Nevada. The power-house will be in Nevada. The reservoir created by this dam will completely solve the major problems of the lower river—it will control the floods, store water, remove silt, and, incidentally, develop power to pay for the project. The essence of the solution of the problem of the lower Colorado is large storage because the river is characterized by great fluctuations of flow. Nowhere else on the lower river can this large storage be obtained so cheaply.

The delegates from the State of Arizona who appeared before the Senate and Congressional committees in opposition to the Boulder Canyon Project urged that the dam be built farther up the river, at Bridge Canyon. This dam would create a reservoir of about one-tenth the capacity of the Boulder Canyon reservoir and would therefore be useless for flood control or storage purposes. It would cost twenty million dollars more than the Boulder Canyon Dam. It was argued by the Arizona delegates that if the Bridge Canyon Dam were built high enough, a diversion could be made to a so-called "high-line canal" to irrigate a large area in Arizona. This "high-line canal" plan would require a tunnel 75 miles long without shafts or adits, and the total length of the canal would be some 520 miles. The cost has been roughly estimated at $300,000,000.

At the Denver conference the "high-line canal" project which, according to Mrs. Austin's article, is to develop a culture in Arizona wholly different from that in California, received very little attention from the delegates from Arizona. At Denver Governor Hunt proposed that Arizona be paid an annual tribute of one mill per kilowatt-hour on all electrical energy developed at Boulder Dam in exchange for Arizona's ratification of the compact. This "hush money," as it has been called by Mayor Bacon of San Diego, would amount to 35 per cent of the total gross revenue which it is estimated that the dam would produce. Although the proposal was not accepted, it received favorable consideration from the delegates of some of the upper States who are influenced by the power interests. Any plan that would embarrass the government project at Boulder Canyon would please the power companies.

Governor Hunt returned to Arizona with trumpets blaring. He announced triumphantly that the upper States had conceded Arizona's right to tax the power at Boulder Dam (the "high-line canal" was conveniently forgotten), and that the tax would result in a saving to Arizona's taxpayers of $10,000 a day—about one-third of Arizona's total tax levy. There is nothing culturally peculiar to Arizona in a Democratic politician using the tax-reduction formula to win advancement; Republican politicians have resorted to the same trick.

But what of the compact which Arizona is ready to ratify for cash? The compact is merely an attempt to substitute an agreement between the States for the stupid litigation which has been a part of every major river development in the West. The Santa Fe conference at which the compact was formulated is not to be compared with the present informal meetings. The Santa Fe conference was called in pursuance of a special act of Congress permitting a compact to be entered into between the States (the Constitution forbids interstate treaties without such special permission), and at this conference all the States were represented. In fact, Arizona's commissioners signed the compact; but its legislature failed to ratify it.

The compact allocates water to two divisions of the Colorado River Basin, 7,500,000 acre-feet to the upper and 8,500,000 acre-feet to the lower. This agreement does not allocate water to the several States—it divides the average flow between the two basins, and the charge that by ratifying the compact Arizona would surrender water to California is baseless.

Mrs. Austin justifies the proposed tax on power for the benefit of Arizona on the ground that this interstate stream is one of Arizona's natural resources. On this theory, the States bordering the Mississippi might collect a tax on navigation. However, the Roosevelt Dam across the Salt River in Arizona, and the Laguna Dam across the Colorado River at Yuma, both of which are government structures, are not regarded as sources of revenue for Arizona's tax coffers. Moreover, it is a little difficult to understand how the Colorado River can in any sense be considered a natural resource of Arizona. The water comes from the mountains in the upper States. Of the water to be impounded in the Boulder Canyon reservoir less than 5 per cent will be contributed by Arizona!

There is a misconception in Mrs. Austin's article as to the function of the Boulder Dam. There is no diversion from the Boulder Canyon Reservoir to California. The proposed diversion for the domestic water supply for Los Angeles, which is no part of the Swing-Johnson Bill, has its intake 200 miles below the Boulder Dam. This diversion may be made under the appropriation laws whether the Boulder Dam is built or not. A similar diversion out of the watershed for a water supply for Denver is planned in the upper basin. The Swing-Johnson Bill proposes the construction of a canal wholly on American soil to supply water to Imperial Valley, but this canal has its intake at the Laguna Dam, 300 miles below the Boulder Dam site. However, no water in addition to Imperial Valley's present perfected water rights will be required for this canal. With respect to this feature of the bill, Mrs. Austin infers that because Californian capital is invested in Mexican lands, California regards the use of water for Mexican lands complacently. In fact, the bitterest animosity exists between the settlers in Imperial Valley and the Los Angeles capitalists who own the Mexican lands. The proposal to build a canal wholly on American soil (known locally as the All-American Canal) is the outgrowth of this antagonism.

There are four valleys contiguous to the river on the Arizona side below the Boulder Dam site—Mojave, Parker, Cibola, and Yuma. Only one of these valleys, Yuma, is at present intensively developed. The construction of the Boulder Dam will permit complete development of all four of these valleys; the plan suggested by the opponents of the Boulder Dam proposes the construction of a flood-control dam at Topcock which will completely submerge the Mojave Valley. The inundation of this fertile Arizona Valley of 30,000 acres is regarded with serenity by the Arizona politicians, probably because it is for the most part Indian Reservation. Indians don't vote!

Further development of areas contiguous to the river in California is limited to extensions to the Palo Verde and Imperial valleys. But such development in no case will require water in excess of the present perfected water rights. The Boulder Dam insures to these valleys a uniform water supply and safety from the menace of floods to the same extent as these benefits accrue to Arizona.

There are no new areas in California susceptible of irrigation from the Colorado River except the Chuckwalla Valley. A valley of about the same area exists in the Parker Project in Arizona. Development of either of these areas is not affected in a single particular by the compact.

Nor is it true that the Boulder Dam subordinates the needs of irrigation to those of power. The power companies have fought the Boulder Canyon project, because generation of electrical energy is incidental to river regulation. And the revenue from the sale of power will pay for the entire project—the Government will get its money back!

Mrs. Austin may be justified in her romantic conception of the future culture of Arizona; but the methods of the political group opposing the construction of the Boulder Dam are so much like those of other politicians who capitalize cheap local prejudices for their own aggrandizement that a Martian strange to our political ways would hardly find any difference between the cultural activities of the politicians of Arizona and those of the mayor who promises to keep the "snoot of the King of England out of Chicago."

Banning, Cal., November 25 PAUL M. ENTENMAN

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have carefully read the criticism of my Colorado River article without finding anything in it to which I feel bound to reply in particular. What I set out to do was not to cover all the ground of that controversy, and, as I explicitly stated in the article, many facts were omitted partly from want of space, and partly because many of these alleged facts are not strictly to be called facts but are assumptions which may be proved erroneous when the courts get down to rulings on many points of law which have not yet been brought to judgment. Another reason for omitting many facts, was that they cancel out with other facts which my critic does not mention. But to show how that works would necessitate my writing another article as long or longer than the first. Moreover, I had no intention of doing more in that first article than covering sketchily the ground traversed at the Denver Conference.

I explicitly stated that I would not take up the questions involved in the Swing-Johnson Bill, as these had not yet come before the Conference, of which I am still a member. Perhaps I shall be willing to say something of that after the matter has been fully canvassed before the representatives of the seven States.

I am glad to have the article arouse discussion. I make no claim to superior judgment in the matter, and would willingly stand corrected on any detail in which my own judgment failed, but I must protest against being brought to book in the business of the Swing-Johnson Bill and the Boulder Creek Dam site until I have fully expressed myself about it. I think you can do no better than to publish whatever seems to you pertinent to the whole people, regardless of whether it contradicts or controverts what I have said or not.

There is much in the spirit and the approach of the present critic which I felt I would rather not say, and yet am satisfied to have said.

A Warning

By EMMA L. HAWKRIDGE

Some day, from beings that are meekly dumb,
Revolt from our autocracy may come
And men in guilty fear of them will cower
When vegetables realize their power.
Reflect—if things with roots could walk about,
Gesticulate with leaves, and hoarsely shout,
"Hey, dandelions, rise in revolution
Against the bourgeoisie of evolution!"
And fly, flap-flopping in our faces, and Entangle with their roots a wrist or hand,
And say, "The way these people multiply
One can't keep valleys green, or hilltops high!"
Determined dandelions! we'd be sorry then
We'd strutted and uprooted things as men.

The Best British Short Stories of 1927. Edited by Edward J. O'Brien. Dodd, Mead and Company. $2.50.

MR. O'BRIEN'S latest collection indicates that the American short story is struggling valiantly to free itself from the conventions on which it was nourished—"plot," melodrama, local color, and sentimentality. Two practitioners, at least, have definitely broken through—Mr. Hemingway and Mr. Anderson. The first-named has created a style so firm, honest, and clarified that it is simply impossible to express by means of it anything spurious, melodramatic, or artificially complicated. Mr. Anderson, on the other hand, achieves an equally genuine effect by an elementary lyrical method. He is an honest man under the influence of a mood—and in this condition he merely puts down what comes into his head. The result is often obscure; yet it is frequently beautiful and never magazinish. Mr. O'Brien reveals one or two other free spirits: Mr. La Farge, Mr. Roark Bradford, whose Child of God is a strangely moving fantasy, and Meridel Le Sueur. The latter's Persephone is possibly as sensitive a piece of short prose as the year has produced.

Here the roll of honor comes to an abrupt close. Almost all of the remaining fifteen tales bear the mark, more or less distinct, of the magazine machine. Five of them, even at this late date, employ the O. Henry snap ending. Two extremely clever stories, Mr. Wister's The Right Honorable the Strawberries and Mr. Burman's Minstrels of the Mist, proceed beautifully and then, at the very end, let one down with the exhibition of a last-minute mawkishness. Yet, on the whole, this anthology is an encouraging phenomenon. In at least half a dozen stories the bonds, though still apparent, are visibly weakening. And there is one other thing. Mr. O'Brien with his customary modesty states in the preface: "My selection does not imply the critical belief that they are great stories. A year which produced one great story would be an exceptional one." It is my critical belief, then, that this has been one of these exceptional years. Mr. Hemingway's The Killers, the star of the collection, is patently a great story.

The anthology entitled "Samples" is lighter and less interesting than Mr. O'Brien's collection. The tales of Hemingway, Anderson, and Galsworthy are obviously superior and deeply felt. Miss Cather's Coming Aphrodite, intrinsically a beautiful idea, is too drawn out. Mr. Dreiser's rambling character sketch fails to satisfy, while the more clearly typical American stories, those by Fannie Hurst and Thyra Samter Winslow, are frankly vulgar.

Should one desire to observe a writer apparently breaking every law of the machine and actually, with a really marvelous ingenuity, availing himself of every one of them, there is Mr. Wilbur Daniel Steele. The basis of Mr. Steele's art is melodrama—but melodrama so subtly stylized and refined, so outwardly unconventional, as to be hardly recognizable. Mr. Steele has been everywhere and has picked up so many bits of color, so much realistic detail that he is capable of conveying almost any effect, be it tragedy, horror, or passion. Yet, when one thinks it over one realizes that this is exactly what he has done: given us the effect and nothing more. Some years ago there was another story writer very much in the public eye—John Russell. Mr. Steele, like the now eclipsed Mr. Russell, is past master of a complicated bag of tricks. Of the actuality, the terrifying closeness of a Katherine Mansfield he is quite incapable.

It is something of a relief to turn from the fervent complexities of his plots to the simple, jagged little life-stories which constitute Zona Gale's slim volume. There are, it is true, two painful throwbacks to the early sentimentality of "Friendship Village," in The Woman and The Two Souls. The other sketches are sharp reductions of tragic careers, purged of every tincture of adventitious local color. Sincere and occasionally moving as they are, one feels nevertheless that they are too compressed, too bare, too manifestly the skeletons of possible novels. Their quality is distinguished but it is not the quality of a short story.

It is upon turning to Mr. O'Brien's English collection that one feels most keenly the divergence from the American machine-made product. The editor intimates that he has purposely excluded from his anthology many stories, otherwise creditable, which appeared to have been written with one eye to American requirements—those, for example, of Somerset Maugham and Arnold Bennett. The result of this exclusion is, on the whole, a happy one. One story, but only one, The Sheep by Mary Somerville, betrays a hint of the saccharine. The others are, for the most part, written with a quiet, light-fingered, satiric touch which is the despair of American writers. None of the purely English tales is very ambitious; the subject matter is never very original. Six out of eighteen deal, in variant ways, with the problem of snobbery and offer an interesting reflection of the process of social restratification now visible in England. There is a certain courtesy and restraint and evenness in these narratives, a complete avoidance of melodrama; but, compensatingly, the tragic note is rarely struck and the delineation of sexual passion is tentative and oblique. In the Irish tales one hears an occasional overtone of mystery and tragedy; the Irish are not a formally polite people. Only two English writers, H. E. Bates and Elizabeth Bowen, catch anything of Katherine Mansfield's immediacy and horizon-opening quality. One misses, also, the magic hand of the greatest of all living artists in the short story—A. E. Coppard. His surrogate, David Garnett, is master of his fantasy but is sadly lacking in the depth and wonder which distinguish every line Mr. Coppard has written.

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN

An Approach to "The Counterfeiters"

Si le Grain ne Meurt. By André Gide. Paris: Editions la Nouvelle Revue Française.

"THE COUNTERFEITERS" appears in English just as we learn that M. Gide has withdrawn the original edition of his memoirs, "Si le Grain ne Meurt," to be reissued later perhaps in a revised form. Whatever light these memoirs throw on the intelligence that created "The Counterfeiters," now is the moment for the illumination. The connection between the two is close, as the Journal of "The Counterfeiters" testifies. M. Gide was working on them concurrently, turning to the memoirs when the difficulties of the novel held him up, turning back to the novel when he was impressed by the fact that intimacy, penetration, psychological probing could in certain respects be pushed further in the novel than in "confessions." This he observes after noting that he had just completed one of the most important chapters in the memoirs, the account of the Algerian interlude in his early manhood, when he and Paul Laurens set forth to "normalize" themselves. It is precisely this part of the memoirs that M. Souday, in his recent study of Gide, calls repugnant, yet almost insignificant. Nobody was asking about M. Gide's private life; why display its least defensible caprices? But if everything he has chosen to say about his private life, as he traces the stages of his self-discovery, reveals the pattern of "The Counterfeiters" as a clear product of the temperament analyzed in the memoirs, how can that be insignificant?

Every artist sees life in his own peculiar way. Why? Those who like this question answered will understand M. Gide's delight as a child in experimenting with the mechanism of his kaleidoscope, rearranging the parts, and discovering that even when the resulting effects were not so beautiful and surprising as the original ones, it was fascinating to comprehend the "why of pleasure." It is fascinating to comprehend the "why" of M. Gide's highly individual viewpoint when we are trying to relate it to all the other viewpoints contributed by the novelists who subtly influence our interpretations of human experience. The reading of many novels calls for an effort of reconstruction similar to that M. Gide asks of us in "The Counterfeiters": "I wish," he says in the Journal, "to have its events related from different angles by the actors on whom the events have some influence; I wish these events, as they tell them, to appear slightly distorted; a certain interest results for the reader from the sole fact that he has to reestablish; the story requires his collaboration." Memoirs like M. Gide's decrease our bewilderment in the face of all the slightly distorted accounts of life that significant novels offer us.

"Si le Grain ne Meurt" is one of the most troubling autobiographies since Rousseau. "To disquiet," to quote the Journal again, "is my role. The public always prefers to be reassured. There are those whose business that is. There are only too many of them." This book is enlightening, but not reassuring. M. Souday would not have called essential parts of it insignificant if he had felt really comfortable about it. It offers the usual interest of any good autobiography: scenes, people, vividly and variously realized. It has also the interest belonging to the memoirs of a writer—that of tracing back to his personal experience episodes, characters, emotions later transmuted into fiction. There is no doubt that M. Gide possesses the gift of cashing in on his own experience. But the deepest interest is in the man himself. When he went to Algeria he left his Bible behind because it had become indispensable to him, and he always felt the secret need to defy his own nature. "I am a being of dialogue; everything in me combats and contradicts itself." His belief in the moral code by which he had lived up to that time had been gradually yielding to a vision of life that was more iridescent. Perhaps God himself had a horror of that uniformity against which Nature protested, but toward which the Christian ideal tended, in aiming to subdue nature. He persuaded himself that each being—or at least each elected one—had a role to play resembling no other; and to submit himself to the common rule was the unforgivable sin by which he lost his precise, irreplaceable significance, his "salt," which could not be restored to him. (Of his Huguenot ancestors, Gide says that each one thought it was said to him personally: "You are the salt of the earth.") Forcing himself into the mold of the puritanism which he had been taught had secured only a profound disorganization of his whole being. Perhaps this discordant dualism could be resolved into harmony. To seek that, he embarked for Algeria in 1893, and there he found his "normal." But it seems as if he did not like to abandon the possibility that the Evil One might be laughing at him from the shadows; as if he were at once urged by the desire to justify his own tendencies, and to get the utmost possible thrill out of transgression. His answer to that would be that there is "no way of looking at the moral and religious question or of behaving in the face of it which at some moment of my life I have not known and made mine." He would like to reconcile all, even the most diverse points of view, excluding nothing and "ready to intrust to Christ the solution of the case between Dionysus and Apollo."

"Memoirs are never more than half sincere, however great the concern for truth. Everything is always more complex than one says it is. . . . Perhaps one approaches nearer the truth in the novel." To approach "The Counterfeiters" by way of the memoirs may be to approach the complex truth of André Gide.

DOROTHY BREWSTER

People of Inconsequence

Some People. By Harold Nicolson. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

MR. NICHOLSON, the biographer of Verlaine, of Tennyson, and of Byron, has been trifling with autobiography. His nine sketches, a composite of imagination and half-truths (as he is careful to say in a prefatory note), are written in a gay, confidential tone with little hints of scholarship, geography, international politics, good form, and other agreeable elements of a career in the Foreign Office. We are left with the impression that no career could be more delightful than this. One grows up in the charge of a Miss Plimsoll (who does not come off very successfully in the first of these sketches); one is sent to a public school, the Kind where Lawrence Eusher of Sherwich and cites Virgil entrancingly; one goes on to Balliol where are to be found aesthetes like Lambert Orne and candidates for the Paris (as if there were any other!) Jockey Club like the imbecile Marquis de Chaumont. Thereafter one is sent here and there about the Continent to learn languages—to Paris, to Hanover, to Florence. . . . And finally one is attached to Constantinople, the Paris Conference, the F. O., Teheran . . . with Rome, Tokio, Washington, and the rest of the world as prospective stations.

Such people as ourselves (Gerry and Tommy and Reggie and Eustace) can learn French only from Jeanne de Hénaut who looked like Theodora of Byzantium superimposed upon the Queen of Spades, and who > believed sincerely that God had granted to her the mission to coach young Englishmen for the diplomatic service, and her flaming faculty of self-deception had invested this mission with a gigantic import. She was an uneducated woman. The foundation of her learning was the encyclopedia of Larousse. . . . And yet with all this she had an amazing sense of the French language . . . knew instinc> tively just the sort of phrasing and idiom which would convey to the examiners the impression that one possessed "toutes les aisances de la langue Française."

This old maid and her mother, in their flat high up in the rue de la Pompe, with its odor of simmering fish, are portrayed with humor and acumen and an absence of sentimentality that is entirely excellent. Professor Malone, another of Mr. Nicholson's subjects—an omniscient, sort of Doctor Dillon expert—has his hide torn away with a tranquil cruelty beautiful to watch. Nor does Miriam Codd, the American behaviorist, fare much better. For one thing, there is her diabolically apt name (far better than Paul Morand's Irene Sidedish, funny though that was); for another, this picture of her:

> She was small and mild and gentle and wrapped in a series of blue silk scarfs that matched her eyes. One felt that for forty-five years she had eaten expensive candy, and drunk a great deal of iced water, and had at least 34,000 baths, and worn very clean and fleecy underclothing.

Nevile Titmarsh X—, known as "Titty" and the butt of the Diplomatic Service, is the subject of an almost perfect fragment, spoiled by a rather meaningless sentimental turn at the end. But it is the late Lord Curzon and his sottish valet, Arketall, who furnish Mr. Nicolson his perfect sitters. This drunken valet was a source of worry to everybody but the Marquis, who was delighted when Arketall confessed that he was both "very ill and very drunk," and even more charmed when the Marchese Garroni mistook the valet for Sir Roger Keyes, "seized both his hands, and assured him in a torrent of Genoese French how great a debt, how unforgettable a debt, Italy owed to the noble and generous British navy." Curzon walking majestically on a railway platform "as if carrying his own howdah," and promising, in gratitude for Nicolson's finding the trousers hidden by the dismissed valet, to give a private performance of "my celebrated imitation of Tennyson reciting 'Tears, Idle Tears'"; Curzon saying: "You are observing the simple squalor of my bedroom. I can assure you, however, that my wife's apartments are of the most unexampled magnificence"—this Curzon is a most sympathetic figure.

Incidentally, here is Mussolini: ". . . a small brown gentleman in a brown suit and very white shirt-cuffs. He carried a brown bowler in his left hand and his right was thrust into his waistcoat. The iris of his eyes was entirely surrounded by white, a phenomenon which I had hitherto observed only in the photographs of distinguished mesmerists."

There are other nuggets in this deftly written and extremely pleasant volume.

LEWIS GALANTIÈRE

Jack London via Moscow

Venture. By Max Eastman. Albert and Charles Boni. $2.50.

JACK LONDON is very popular in Russia. That is a rather roundabout way of getting at Max Eastman's first "venture" in fiction, but I can't think of any other clue. Truly there is nothing like going back to the classics for inspiration. Not the least important achievement of [illegible] the exercises of our literal [illegible] ville has thus come into his own, and Whitman, and Emily Dickinson, and Stephen Crane. In fact, there is the horrible possibility that our appreciation of these pre-Dreiserian anaks may go down as the chief literary contribution of our age. But Jack London is neither [illegible] in his day, to stand rediscovery.

That is why, for all its puffing virility and swell of pneumatic biceps, "Venture" sounds like a hollow [illegible] echo. They are all to be met here again—the familiar London motifs, particularly the pseudo-Nietzscheanism of "The Sea-wolf" and of "The Iron Heel." An American brand of Nietzscheanism not so dissimilar to the muscular Christianity of Bruce Barton. And somehow, though the poet-hero of "Venture" is from a higher rung in the social ladder, one is reminded irresistibly of "Martin Eden." He is certainly cast in the London mold. In the opening paragraph, with his very first breath so to speak, Mr. Eastman hastens to assure us:

> Jo Hancock was healthy. He was the strongest man in his class in college . . . he was sensitive, but like many other sensitive people fond of a fight. His nerves were high-strung, and if you jumped out at him in the dark and said "Boo!" he would spring about four feet automatically, but he would spring at you instead of away from you.

With such a dangerous lack of motor control it is not surprising that Jo should get into mischief. He does. He takes to writing poetry, and lest we should doubt it it is quoted copiously throughout the book. But it stands him in good stead, and when he is bounced from college for some student prank he finds his way to Greenwich Village and sets up as a fashionable "portrait poet." This is one of the most original ideas in the book, and is worth developing—not fictionally but commercially. So is Jo's other inspiration—that of delivering fresh-roasted coffee for breakfast by way of the milkman. In fact, one cannot but help reflecting that Jo would have made a much better captain of industry than his mentor, the class-conscious capitalist Machiavelli, George Forbes, who seems to have no other occupation but spouting Nietzsche. Jo's ideas are less grandiose than Forbes's, but more practical, whereas Forbes would have found it easier to express himself in poetry than in business. It may be necessary for some people to envisage a capitalist conspiracy to capture these United States, as it is for others to conjure up a communist conspiracy, but after all the capitalists are in control. They are sitting pretty, so why should they rhapsodize about it? If George Forbes were more entertaining and original one might do him the honor of a comparison with Shaw's super-capitalist, Andrew Underschaft of "Major Barbara." As it is, one is merely again reminded of Jack London in "The Iron Heel."

But that is stressing unduly the intellectual preoccupations of this novel. "Venture" is no sop for our morbid thin-blooded intelligentsia. It is a he-man's book that should appeal to every red-blooded American, tired unto death of the elaborately spun, soul-tripping subtleties of contemporary fiction. A book full of stirring adventure, plots and counter-plots, society ladies and silk-strikers, love and life. With it its versatile author has added to his poetic laurels, and has proved that it is possible for one and the same person to be a modernist in politics, a classicist in poetry, and a romanticist in fiction.

ALTER BRODY

Art Young Sees Trees

Trees at Night. By Art Young. Boni and Liveright. $3.

"TREES at Night" is a book of drawings in black and white recording a series of fantastic discoveries made by a surprised artist who under cover of darkness has strayed into a world of elementals. The trees of the forest are inhabited by gigantic misshapen beings whose presence is revealed only at nightfall. Grotesque visages, nodding and grimacing, appear in the shifting foliage, and weird animals rear themselves in silhouette against the sky, the desperate and tragic embodiment of human moods. Whether sadly gay, forlorn, or threatening, these creatures parody humanity and like the Canterville Ghost they yearn to be observed. Thus Mr. Young in portraying them has done them a service. And not only a service to them! Those whose zoological researches have been confined to the cloudy pages of the sky on a windy summer's day may now thank Mr. Young and turn to the forest at night for a bestiary less remote and more bizarre.

Few of us, however, will be able to discover for ourselves a forest populace as strange and various in silhouette as Mr. Young's; for only an extraordinarily eager and fertile fancy may evoke such apparitions as these. And, furthermore, without Mr. Young's arcane gift for spirit photography the casual observer would have only a wandering and distracted tale to tell to his incredulous auditors. Mr. Young's evidence, though, is recorded spontaneously and, with but a few lapses, convincingly. The Man in the Moon drops down into an earthly furze bush heavy with potential faggots and lugs it off on his shoulders, a toiling mortal bearing his burden through all eternity. Out of a tangle of dead and jagged roots a devil's orchestra pipes its litanies of unimaginable sins. A winged cupid drifts across the sky in a leafy barge towed by swans and serpents. A bevy of old, gnarled apple trees, their thin sap turned to hard cider, go suddenly mad with ecstasy. In a tumult of boiling clouds wild horses stream out of panic-frenzied tree tops, a passionate revolt of earth-bound spirits. An ivy-wreathed stump stricken with the pathos of vanishing loveliness casts autumn leaves upon the gale and mourns all the summers beyond recall and all the summers yet to be.

These are only a few of the silhouettes to be found in Art Young's enchanted forest. But they furnish a clew to the allegorical significance of trees when in the moonlight their spirits are free to come forth and with appropriate gestures enact in dumb show the tragi-comedy of human life.

God's Messenger

American Policy in Nicaragua. By Henry L. Stimson. Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.25.

HAVING, with the aid of the Guaranty Trust Company and the marines, bought peace in Nicaragua, Henry L. Stimson reported to the American people through the Saturday Evening Post, and his articles have been made into a book. Mr. Stimson pictures himself as a kind of holy ghost, the alter ego of the divine State Department, dispensing justice through its only begotten son Don Adolfo Diaz, aided by the Marine Corps. Yet it is possible that even a Yankee god and the Marine Corps may, in a Latin-American country, make mistakes—mistakes all the more dangerous because of the placid consciousness of divine inspiration with which they are made. Doubtless Mr. Stimson did nothing in Nicaragua without a sense of being God's messenger, but mortal weakness crops out at least in this report to the American people. His book, Mr. Stimson must be aware, is a piece of special pleading, a campaign document, calculated propaganda.

The United States has occupied Nicaragua twice—the first time after American interests had precipitated a revolution and made a series of unwarranted loans to their favored candidates. Mr. Stimson mentions the presence of the marines in 1912, but not the bankers and their loans. Nor does he mention the scandalous terms of the loan granted the puppet Diaz Government last spring, to enable it to buy off the Liberals, although he does include his own letter informing the Liberals that he would arrange a payment of $10 for each gun turned in and send the Marine Corps to collect undelivered arms. His account of the intervention of 1926-27 is a careful selection of the less disgraceful facts.

That intervention began, ostensibly, as a mild effort to "protect American lives and property." Before we got through we had more marines in Nicaragua than there were Americans to be protected; and since Mr. Stimson penned the statement that the oppositionists had been "practically dispersed" the marines have killed six hundred more of them. While the State Department was lying to the American people, stating that we were not intervening, the Marine Corps was establishing neutral zones wherever the Liberal troops were in force, on occasion seizing their arms and dumping them in the river. These facts again Mr. Stimson disingenuously omits. When Mr. Stimson went to Nicaragua, he made his headquarters in Diaz's capital, and his only effort to see President Sacasa was an offer of a safe conduct to the capital of the rival President. Yet he pictures himself as an impartial judge! On one page he pleads that he could not ask Diaz to resign because the Nicaraguan constitution stood in the way; on another page he reveals himself calmly instructing Diaz to replace judges whom his party had removed and to hold new elections where dishonest ones had been held. Because Diaz was a whipped man, able to sit in the Presidential palace only when aided by United States marines—and was therefore willing to request whatever he was requested to request—Mr. Stimson excuses American intervention as "requested by Nicaragua." One would never guess from his narrative that financial interests had anything to do with American interest in Nicaragua; one would barely suspect that some of the gentlemen at Washington regarded Nicaragua quite as Germany regarded Belgium in 1914. He has the impudence to say, after summarizing his own dictation, that the United States has "in no way transgressed upon the sovereignty and independence of Nicaragua." All that this country of Insull and Vare wants, he indicates, is to make sure that Nicaragua has honest elections.

Mr. Stimson, as the fruit of his Nicaraguan adventure, has been appointed Governor General of the Philippines. The Filipinos too have had difficulty in understanding the kinship between God and the American army.

Books in Brief

The Modern Development of City Government in the United Kingdom and the United States. By Ernest S. Griffith. Oxford University Press. Two volumes. $14.

Mr. Griffith's two volumes are a study of comparative municipal government. He traces historically and analytically city government in the United States and in the United Kingdom. Mr. Griffith's main conclusion is that the government of cities should be comparatively free from central control and that local taxation of real property should be based on its capital value rather than on the annual income. On both of these features American cities excel the British. His account of present-day municipal experiments in the United States may be roseate, yet it undoubtedly devastates some preconceptions. He rightly recognizes the blighting effects on English local life of the deep-rooted class distinctions as contrasted with the freer atmosphere in the United States. Education for status which rigid class distinctions imply is abominable, for it assumes the inherent justice of existing inequalities. The author is conversant with governmental structures, but, unlike many of his coworkers, is also able to refer technique to ultimate criteria. However, in his faith in the mysterious potentialities of the "Nordic instinct" he is less than profound. The book is heavily annotated and has a comprehensive bibliography and appendices containing relevant material. It is competent and meritorious.

Samuel Butler and His Family Relations. By Mrs. R. S. Garnett. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.75.

This book is a curiously informal addition to our information about Samuel Butler. Mrs. Garnett, whose mother was a cousin of Butler's mother, started out to rescue Butler's parents and sisters from the terrible life beyond life that he had conferred upon them in "The Way of All Flesh." With the aid of letters, a diary, family reminiscences, and old photographs she has pieced together an authentic picture of what Butler's family looked like to well-disposed outsiders, but in that charmingly domestic picture—as Mrs. Garnett came to realize—there is nothing inconsistent with Butler's version in "The Way of All Flesh," so far as that version may be regarded as history and not fiction. With a certain reluctance she shows how a family of well-meaning, decent, and generally likable bigots can make life a perfect hell for an affectionate, generous, but self-willed child. Mrs. Garnett also establishes that Butler's conduct toward his relatives, however bitter his feelings may have been at times, was unvaryingly kind, thoughtful, and conciliatory.

Samuel Butler. By C. E. M. Joad. Small, Maynard and Company. $1.75.
An Historical and Critical Review of Samuel Butler's Literary Works. By W. G. Bekker. Rotterdam: Nijgh & Van Ditmar's Uitgevers-Maatschappij.
Samuel Butler—Critic and Philosopher. By P. J. De Lange. Zutphen: W. J. Thieme & Cie.

These three studies are evidence that Butler is still sufficiently alive to be worth a fresh examination. Mr. Joad, in a breezy little book, outlines Butler's life and chief ideas and tries to show that Butler has exercised a widespread influence on contemporary thought. Unfortunately, the proofs of that influence do not exist. It is true that the old Victorian iconoclast did cherish certain notions that strongly resemble the more elaborately worked-out ideas of such variegated men as Bergson, Shaw, Eucken, William James, and Bertrand Russell; but it would be impossible to show that any of them, except Shaw, owes anything to him. He was in fact a popularizer rather than an originator of ideas, and even as a popularizer he accomplished little until long after his death. The two Dutch studies (written in English) are doctors' dissertations. For some reason Butler is a favorite subject for academic investigations. Mr. Bekker's volume is invertebrate in structure and pedestrian in tone, but contains some valuable facts and observations. Miss De Lange has produced a colorless but useful analysis of Butler's thought and done all that very well can be done to reduce it to a system.

Those Quarrelsome Bonapartes. R. Gordon Anderson. The Century Company. $2.50.

There is no special reason for this book. Mrs. Barrington in "The Thunderer" has covered the same ground with more vivacity. Napoleon's life story, however, is too tremendous a thing to cover within the narrow grounds of a romance, and Mr. Anderson's light, sentimental, slightly old-fashioned style seems very inadequate. Perhaps this book will make the best reading for boys and girls of high-school age, for it is entertaining enough, and incidentally fairly accurate. Meanwhile, for those who are interested in the real Napoleons the original source. still seem the most romantic.

Yehudi Menuhin

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: It may interest you to know that Yehudi Menuhin [illegible] do not miss any copies. The Nation is of a great help to us to give Yehudi a liberal education. We prefer to teach him [illegible]

A few days ago, while on a hike with his best friend through the Golden Gate Park, prior to his appearance with the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra [illegible] Tchaikovsky Concerto, I overheard their heated debate about Debs. His friend told him that the high-school teacher had called Debs "a downright law-breaker"; to which Yehudi answered that on the contrary Debs was not only a lover of humanity but also a lover of human individuals. . . ."

San Francisco, December 18, 1927. Sigrid Hansen

THIS letter, printed a year ago, gave us our first knowledge of the ten-year-old boy who stood upon the stage of Carnegie Hall in New York on the evening of December 12 and thrilled one of the most representative audiences that ever crowded that historic place. No one who heard but left believing that he had looked upon and listened to genius. Critics were there to pick flaws—of course. They found that his intonation was at times faulty, that occasionally—very rarely—there was a slip which they admitted was immediately compensated for by a wealth of tone, a power, a maturity of feeling and interpretation that left them astounded beyond words. They criticized the length and difficulty of his program; he played five of the most difficult compositions written for the violin with complete confidence and marvelous skill and after four encores he played a fifth with as much vigor and beauty as ever. Beyond that they could only indulge in adjectives of praise and declare that the overworked and misapplied word "genius" applied this time. Indeed, there were many who left declaring their belief in reincarnation. It was impossible, they said, for a mere child not only to have acquired such extraordinary technique but to have played like a virtuoso of thirty years of professional and mental development. Perhaps the letter cited above helps to prove the maturity of this child.

Yet Yehudi Menuhin is no forced hothouse plant, no mere prodigy driven to his tasks by exploiting parents and masters. A nice, normal, rather chubby boy, looking like a boy and not a freak, he faced the audience fired by its presence but calm and unconcerned, and between pieces turned to his teacher so naturally and eagerly as to betray a sweet and trustful nature. He began by playing with breath-taking virtuosity that "Devil's Trill" Sonata of Tartini which was for years and years deemed beyond the power even of first-class violinists because of its extraordinary difficulties. It was a show-piece of Paganini whose mastery was explained by his physical deformity—due to abuse, starvation, neglect, and the torture of endless hours of practicing forced upon him by inhuman parents and teachers. Yehudi played it as calmly and as easily as if those really devilish double trills were a matter of course, so easily that few of the audience could have realized its vast difficulties.

Next he came out to play for twenty minutes, without accompaniment, the Chaconne of Bach. Standing there alone, he attacked this "supreme test of a violinist" with amazing confidence, with a purity and power of tone incredible for one so young whose instrument is only three-quarter size. Endless variations he played with unflagging tempo, with a maturity as if he had known and studied this great master throughout a long life; and he finished unfatigued, with the same cool deliberation which marked the beginning. And that great audience of thousands again cheered and clapped and clapped, having been led by a child into the highest realms of musical art. There followed Mozart's Concerto in D Major, only once before heard in New York, Chausson's "Poëme," and Wieniawski's familiar "Souvenirs of Moscow." The "Poëme" revealed again extraordinary maturity of romance, and deep emotion; it was played in superb and moving tones, and with a finished legato that a Heifetz or a Kreisler could be proud of. The famous harmonics of the Wieniawski, which even great artists have been known to slip up on, went as faultlessly as could be desired.

Here is a marvel, indeed, to prove that talent and genius are not outlawed in this machine age. If his wise parents, who are opposed to all overdoing, carry on as they have begun the burden of their terrific responsibility, there is no question that this little Nation reader will in a brief space of years stand with the violin leaders of today. Indeed, it rests only with his teachers whether he will not lift the art of violin playing one notch higher than it has gone as yet.

A Letter from Madame Zimbalist

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: It may have been Dickens who cast the first stone at child prodigies. The portrait of the infant phenomenon in "Nicholas Nickleby" must have been, at any rate, the author's sardonic reaction to a common exploitation of clever children by equally clever parents. Dickens's infant phenomenon is a caricature, of course; a violent burlesque but one constructed on authentic data. This little girl prodigy is the wonder of her parents and of the smaller provinces of England. Her famous dance with the Savage, billed, if I remember, as the Child and the Savage, was the pièce de résistance of the theatrical entertainment with which Nicholas found employment. However, just as the reader is about to lose himself in wonderment at the talents of the grotesque child he is brought up sharp with the insinuation by the author that the Phenomenon retained her infant stature by having constantly at her disposal an unlimited supply of gin and water.

I wonder what Dickens would have made of little Yehudi Menuhin, the child violinist who set the town by the ears recently with his amazing performance of the Beethoven Concerto; for the genius of this little boy is as obvious as the Infant Phenomenon's was spurious. The Beethoven work is held to be the severest test of the musicianship of a grown-up violinist. That a child of ten should attempt it was startling in itself. But Yehudi did more than tackle a grown-up job; he played the concerto with the poise of one who had always lived in the most rarified altitudes of music. Light-heartedly, Yehudi nimbly scaled steep musical inclines which mature artists tread with pain and labor. It was evident that the little boy had done a lot of practicing, but no amount of finger work could have given him that insight into the mysteries of musical beauty which his playing so clearly evinced.

One is rather apprehensive of what time will do to this extraordinary baby. Experience may add passion to his playing but it will, in return, rob him of the divine unconsciousness, the tender nobility of his art. As he is now, he looks at music as one of Raphael's child angels looks at heaven—with absolute trust. It were a pity for time to destroy that attitude.

Holiday Suggestions

THE week of December 11 was a blank in theatrical history so far as New York is concerned. I seize the opportunity of submitting the following list of current productions which I remember with pleasure and which I recommend to the attention of those bound theaterward. The choice is catholic and the list is printed in alphabetical order. No "hold-overs" from last season are included.

"An Enemy of the People" (Hampden Theater). Walter Hampden's entertaining revival of the Ibsen comedy.

"And So to Bed" (Harris Theater). Mr. Pepys disports himself in appropriate fashion.

"Artists and Models" (Winter Garden). The standardized revue at its best.

"The Baby Cyclone" (Henry Miller's Theater). Wholly conventional but really laughable farce.

"The Command to Love" (Longacre Theater). Suave and amusing comedy in spite of a persistent and successful effort to be naughty.

"A Connecticut Yankee" (Vanderbilt Theater). Mark Twain's romance set to music.

"Coquette" (Maxine Elliott's Theatre). The tragic story of a modern girl who does not fit the traditions of Southern Chivalry.

"Escape" (Booth Theater). Galsworthy's slight but interesting play showing what an escaped convict learned about English society.

"Four Walls" (John Golden Theater). The story of a crook who learned that stone walls do not a prison make. Highly melodramatic but interesting.

"Funny Face" (Alwin Theater). Gershwin musical comedy made more lively by the dancing of the two Astaires.

"The Good Hope" (Fourteenth Street Theater). Eva Le Gallienne's beautiful revival of a naturalistic study of Dutch fisherfolk.

Max Reinhardt's Company (Century Theater). Various productions by the most famous of all stage directors.

"The Mikado" (Royale Theater). An almost perfect production of the Gilbert and Sullivan opera.

"Porgy" (Republic Theater). The Theater Guild's production of a play taken from Dubose Heyward's novel of life among the Negroes of Charleston. Remarkable for its fine and exciting stage effects.

"The Shannons" (Martin Beck Theater). An hilarious piece of hokum written by James Gleason for the purpose of exploiting the personalities of himself and Lucile Webster.

"Taming of the Shrew" (Garrick Theater). A "modern dress" production of Shakespeare which is one of the most amusing things now on Broadway. With Basil Sydney and Mary Ellis.

"The Trial of Mary Dugan" (National Theater). Preposterous but novel and exciting melodrama all taking place in a courtroom.

Parties and Politics in Rumania

By AURELIU JON POPESCU

BEFORE the war Rumania divided her political life between two parties—the Conservative and the Liberal. The Conservative Party represented the latifundiary landlords and the Liberals the upper and lower middle classes and the economic and financial institutions which they created. It has been asserted that liberalism in Rumania has had no political reality. I do not share this opinion. Through the dissemination of liberal ideas the Liberal Party was the master builder of the Rumanian civilization of the second half of the nineteenth century, continuing its progressive activity down to 1914.

Then came the World War and the Russian Revolution and under their pressure two long-due and promised reforms were precipitated in Rumania, a political and an economic one: universal manhood suffrage and the agrarian laws. The latter resulted not only in a nominal transfer of land to the peasants but also in a redistribution of wealth at the expense of the landlords, who received for their land only one-twentieth of its real value. The price of the expropriated land was fixed according to the price obtaining in 1919 and previously, bonds being given to the landlords, and when after 1919 the Rumanian currency (as well as the bonds in terms of money) fell in value, as a result of the post-war inflation general in Europe, no government dared to tamper with the settlement already made. To have altered it would have been extremely dangerous in view of the close proximity of Soviet Russia. Both reforms were carried out in Rumania without bloodshed or revolution.

But these reforms as well as the union with the new provinces have upset the pre-war political balance. The large estates still remaining (about 15 per cent of the total area of the country) have lost their former political privileges on account of the universal franchise and have been reduced to simple properties equal with the other forms of property on which the Rumanian Liberal Party has always been and is still based. The Conservative Party has consequently disappeared while the conservative groups have more and more been drawn into the Liberal Party, which, in its turn, under the simultaneous attack of peasant radicalism and socialism, has become a conservative force. On the other hand the peasant element, propertied and awakened to political life through universal suffrage, has been pushed toward a political organization of its own interests. Hence the appearance of the Peasant Party.

Because it has taken the place and grown from the roots of the old Conservative Party, from the agrarian estates, many people have assumed that the interests of the large estates would coincide with those of the small estates and have drawn the unjustified conclusion that the Peasant Party is a conservative party. In reality this party is on the left wing of Rumanian politics vacated by the passing of the Liberal Party to the right. In fact the program of the Peasant Party is little more than a series of liberal claims, some of which have long since been carried into effect in England (the chief source of inspiration of this party), others of which have arisen out of economic and social conditions in Rumania. The leaders of the Peasant Party have not embraced radical doctrines fanatically but have adapted them to the needs of the country.

Politically and economically the Peasant Party may be considered a liberal party. It stands for individual ownership of land but strongly favors the development of peasant property through cooperatives for the marketing and buying of agricultural produce and implements (80 per cent of the Rumanian population are peasants). It further stands for local government and administrative responsibility (both for public officials and ministers) thus departing from the traditional droit administratif which has occasioned so much abuse. In the matter of tariff policy it is strongly opposed to protection for industries having no natural economic basis of development; the only protection that it supports is that given to infant industries having such a basis. As for the "Liberal" Party's program—the name is now a misnomer—it is scarcely different from the usual conservative platform, representing the interests of big business and finance.

In Rumania today there is normally no room for more than two large governing parties crystallizing opposite interests—on the one hand a conservative party (whatever its name) supporting the interests of the large industries, financial and commercial groups with powerful tendencies toward trusts, monopolies, and high tariffs, and on the other a left party representing the interests of the thousands of small peasant holdings, with tendencies toward cooperation and the protection of the producer. It is these two currents that will shape the modern life of Rumania.

The political changes which have occurred in Rumania since the war are in agreement with the spirit of post-war Europe. In Western Europe, liberalism, the pre-war agency of political reform, is being replaced by the evolutionary Socialist parties which continue the political reforms and begin seriously to press a series of social reforms. In Eastern Europe, especially in Rumania, Czecho-Slovakia, and Jugoslavia, the peasant parties continue the work of the old liberal parties. What has been liberalism in the past is conservatism today. What is liberalism today will be conservatism in future decades. And so each party is fated to play this double part of progress and conservation: demolishing or transforming old institutions in order to change them into new ones which it will defend later on against the attacks of the new parties that will inevitably appear.

The two opposed political creeds have developed their strongholds in the Old Kingdom. The contribution of the new provinces in the political sphere has been in personnel rather than in political ideology. Bessarabia, radical as a result of the Russian upheaval, has almost totally turned toward the Peasant Party. In Transylvania the National Party is the direct descendant of the old regional party which conducted the fight against Austro-Hungarian tyranny. In 1926 this party fused with the Peasant Party, forming the present National Peasant Party, the leadership going to Mr. Julius Maniu, head of the former National Party. Several factors have militated against a quicker amalgamation of these groups: first, the lack of homogeneity in the National Party, whose Transylvanian wing represented a moderate liberalism but whose Old Kingdom wing was conservative and could not collaborate effectively with the political personnel of the Peasant Party; second, the lack of effective leadership; third, the bitter opposition of the Liberal Party to the fusion of the opposition groups. The Liberal Party leaders realized the need of a second party but desired that it should be weak and subordinated and standing on the right with no roots in the masses of the people. Consequently the Liberals encouraged the formation of an ultra-conservative party (Averescu's People's Party), nursing it in the dark under the warm and protective wing of the palace camarilla, and at the same time they fought to a finish the Peasant Party, naively hoping for its destruction.

The People's Party was organized by General Averescu in 1918—on the basis of his then great popularity—as a reformist party with an opportunist program. It was founded at about the time that the old Conservative Party fell to pieces. Having entirely spent his popularity in his first term of office from 1920 to 1922, Averescu turned toward the Liberal Party and since then has assisted it in ruling Rumania on conservative and industrial lines. He has not attempted any agrarian policy, although he promised to do so, and has reaped the rewards of servility. He has been brought into power by the Liberal Party and has been turned out of power without even the elements of political decorum which might have been observed in deference to the General's old age and success as a war leader.

To understand how it has been possible for the Liberal Party to rule Rumania uninterruptedly from 1918, whether nominally in power or not, the following facts should be kept in mind: According to the Rumanian constitution the Crown has the power to nominate and recall its ministers. As the late King has been closely associated with the Liberal Party and especially with Mr. Bratianu who dominated him, he has invariably called to the palace and intrusted with the power either Bratianu or his nominees who, once in power, proceeded to the formation of a majority by the wholesale manipulation of elections. Granted free elections, as in England or Czecho-Slovakia, the power of the king would at once become nominal. In Rumania, on the contrary, the royal prerogative has so far been used in an absolute manner. It is customary neither to follow the English system of calling to the palace and intrusting with the formation of the new government the largest parliamentary group, nor to follow the momentary currents of public opinion. Consequently, as the elections have been so far engineered, the Crown can impose on the country any government it desires. Thus the Rumanian monarchy, though nominally constitutional, in practice is absolute.

As a result of this the Peasant Party as the exponent of liberalism and agrarian interests has been kept out of power and a type of industrial legislation has been forced on the country which has been universally criticized: instinctively by the peasants and scientifically by economists and sociologists as unsuited to Rumanian needs. It has been contended by the Opposition that the first effort of post-war reconstruction should have been the scientific organization of agriculture, and that only after an internal market had thus been created should attention have been given to those industries that have a natural basis of development. The whole political history of Rumania from 1919 to the present day revolves in fact around the conflict between agrarian and industrial interests and around the formation of an agrarian party.

On the other hand the supremacy of conservatism and of its leader Bratianu has perhaps been unavoidable during this post-war period of rapid changes and new creeds. Herein lies, perhaps more than in anything else, the secret of the late Premier's power, although his dignified bearing, simplicity of life, and breadth of culture added to his popularity. For good or evil, and in spite of his efforts to avert it, Bratianu's invisible dictatorial policy has helped tremendously to bring about the return to the two-party system and the creation of the National Peasant Party by showing the hopelessness of a disunited front against him.

In the dynastic question as such the Peasant Party is not interested. It has repeatedly declared that the solution lies not in the replacement of one crowned head by another but in the adoption of constitutional methods and free elections. The National Peasant Party aims to introduce modern constitutional methods in Rumania and as such it will on no account support the present regime. This is the reason why it has refused to collaborate with the Liberal Party, demanding the dissolution of the Chamber and new and free elections.

Nobody can predict what the future has in store for Rumania but one thing can be predicted: whatever changes take place will be along evolutionary and not revolutionary lines, in spite of the fact that during the last three years several revolutions have been announced in that essentially peaceful country. If a revolution should be made it would have to emanate from one of the existing political parties. The conservatives (the Liberal Party, Averescu, and the rest) are not interested in a revolution while the National Peasant Party stands for legal means and constitutionalism. On the basis of past political history, it would appear that Rumania is approaching a reversal of its present system and a return to normal, constitutional methods in its political life. That would mean government by the Peasant Party, for, given free elections, the party would probably obtain little less than 90 per cent of the votes.

The Regency will have to decide soon whether it thinks it more beneficial to the country to continue the old interpretation of constitutional powers or to adopt the modern English interpretation as demanded by public opinion. Upon this decision will turn the immediate future of Rumania.
